122 h 5

A GENERAL DICTIONARY, Hiſtorical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interſperſed with ſeveral thouſand LIVES never before publiſhed.

The whole containing the Hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of all Ages and Nations, particularly thoſe of Great Britain and Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accompliſhments.

With Reflections on ſuch Paſſages of Mr. BAYLE, as ſeem to favour Scepticiſm and the Manichee Syſtem.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH;
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

And the Articles relating to ORIENTAL HISTORY
By GEORGE SALE, Gent.

VOLUME I.

LONDON,

Printed by James Bettenham,

For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, T. HATCHET in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. BATLEY in Pater-Noſter-Row; T. WORRALL, J. SHUCKBURGH in Fleetſtreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR, C. CORBET in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New Bond-ſtreet; and C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship between the Temple Gates in Fleetſtreet, and ſold at their Shop in SCARBOROUGH.

MDCCXXXIV.

To the HONOURABLE

Sir HANS SLOANE Bart.

PRESIDENT,

AND TO THE

COUNCIL and FELLOWS

OF THE

Royal Society of London,

For Improving Natural Knowledge.

GENTLEMEN,

ALTHOUGH You are ſo aſſiduouſly engaged in the moſt rational and moſt ſublime Purſuits, thoſe of the Mathematicks and of Nature, we yet preſume to interrupt them a few moments, in order to requeſt Your Acceptance of the preſent Volume, as the ſubject of it is the Lives of eminent Men, many of whom bear ſo near a reſemblance to Your Selves; that is, were Perſons who employed the Faculties they had received from Heaven to the nobleſt purpoſes, the enlightning their own Minds, and the improvement of Mankind; and who conſidered the Titles

Titles which Virtue and Learning give, as the moſt ſolid and valuable Diſtinction.

But a circumſtance which adds to the propriety of this Addreſs, is, that ſeveral of Your Predeceſſors in Knowledge will be the greateſt Ornament of our Performance. The bare Names of NEWTON and of BOYLE raiſe the moſt exalted Ideas, and image to us ſomething more than human. And here we very naturally might take notice of ſome of Your preſent Members, who are the Glory of their Age and Country, had we not preſcribed to our ſelves the ſame Law in this Epiſtle, as in the Work itſelf, not to celebrate any living Character, how conſpicuous ſoever.

If the Volume we now offer had been entirely of our own compiling, we ſhould not ſo readily have ventured to inſcribe it to a Society of Gentlemen, who are the Fountains of Learning in the Britiſh Kingdoms; but as the Dictionary of the great Mr. BAYLE makes ſo conſiderable a part of it, we flatter our ſelves that his Name will be a kind of Sanction to us on this occaſion; and that our Endeavours to give an accurate Verſion of his excellent Work, and to ſupply ſuch conſiderable Articles as were omitted by him, eſpecially thoſe relating to our own Nation, will be received by You with Candor, and plead for the Imperfections of,

GENTLEMEN,

Your moſt obedient,

moſt humble Servants,

John Peter Bernard,
Thomas Birch,
John Lockman.

THE

PREFACE.

THE uſefulneſs and importance of an Hiſtorical Dictionary are ſo obvious, that the experience of every Reader will excuſe us from entering into an elaborate proof of that point. We ſhall therefore proceed directly to the conſideration of the ſeveral attempts, which have been made of that kind ſince the revival of Literature. The firſt Eſſay was that of CONRAD GESNER, in his Bibliotheca Univerſalis, publiſhed at Zurich in 1545 in fol. The learned NICHOLAS ANTONIO, Author of the Bibliotheca Scriptorum Hiſpaniæ, obſerves that this Work of GESNER is extremely dry and imperfect as well as erroneous: but this is by no means ſurprizing, if we conſider that he was the firſt, who attempted ſuch a deſign; that he wanted the proper Aſſiſtances for the execution of it; that he was engaged at the ſame time in other Works; and was obliged to uſe his pen as a means of ſubſiſtence (a). We have two Abridgments of this Bibliotheca, the firſt by CONRAD LYCOSTHENES at Baſil 1551 in 4to; the other by JOSIAS SIMLER with Additions, at Zurich in 1555, 1574, and 1583 in fol. The Hiſtorical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary of CHARLES STEPHENS, formed upon the Memoirs and Collections of ROBERT STEPHENS, was publiſhed firſt in the year 1596 in 4to, and afterwards in 1621, 1628, and 1633. This Work, tho' very imperfect and erroneous, was however well received by the Public. Our Countryman Mr. NICHOLAS LLOYD, Fellow of Wadham College in Oxford, and afterwards Rector of St. Mary Newington near Lambeth in Surrey (b), enlarged this Work of STEPHENS, and publiſhed it at Oxford in 1670 in fol. a ſecond Edition of which with great improvements by him was printed after his death at London 1686. This may juſtly be conſidered as the firſt Hiſtorical Dictionary, which was brought to any degree of perfection; for that of JUIGNE', publiſhed at Paris in 1664, and of which eight Editions appeared before the year 1673, is ſcarce any thing but a French Tranſlation of that of STEPHENS abovementioned. Mr. LLOYD's Dictionary, which was the reſult of thirty years application, was well approved of by the Publick, which was certainly obliged to him for the prodigious pains, which he had taken in ſo valuable a deſign. Nay we have been credibly informed, that Dr. WILLIAM LLOYD late Biſhop of Worceſter, whoſe character for Learning is univerſally allowed, had ſo high an opinion of it, that by frequent uſe he had committed the greateſt part of it to his memory. It was upon the plan of Mr. LLOYD's firſt Edition, that MORERI formed his Hiſtorical Dictionary, which was firſt publiſhed at Lyons in one volume in folio in 1674. Some time after he undertook a ſecond Edition much larger than the former, and began it at Lyons in 1681. But he died before it was finiſhed; and the ſecond volume, which is much leſs compleat than the firſt, was publiſhed by the care of Sieur PARAYRE. Since that time there have been a great many Editions of that Work in Holland, as well as in France, notwithſtanding the multitude of enormous errors in it, which are obvious to every man of a moderate ſhare of Learning. And that we may not be ſuppoſed to advance this out of mere prejudice, we ſhall preſent the Reader with the Judgment of ſome of the greateſt names in the Republic of Letters. Mr. MENAGE, who is diſtinguiſhed by the title of the FRENCH VARRO, tells us expreſly (c), that he would never venture to read that Dictionary, becauſe there are ſo many faults in it, that if he ſhould once get them into his head, it would be difficult for him to diſpoſſeſs himſelf of them. Mr. BAYLE has demonſtrated the erroneouſneſs of that Work in almoſt every Article, which is common to them both; and he complains, in his Project of a Critical Dictionary publiſhed at Rotterdam in 1692, of one great defect, which runs thro' the whole, and that is, MORERI's manner of quoting. "He heaps up, ſays he (d), all his quotations at the end of each Ar"ticle, without ſhewing that ſuch a thing was ſaid by this, and ſuch an one by that Author.
"He gives his Reader therefore a great deal of trouble, ſince he is ſometimes obliged to knock "at five or ſix doors, before he can find the perſon, with whom he would ſpeak. This is a "predominant fault in ſeveral other Books, the conſequences of which were well known to a very "intelligent and judicious Writer (e); who has given us lately the Hiſtory of the Roman Em-"perors. To this conſideration I add further, that MORERI advances a thouſand things, which "we either do not find at all in his citations, or which he confirms by no authority, or which "are mutilated in his repreſentation by the omiſſion of ſome circumſtances, which are the moſt eſ-
"ſential parts of the facts, and afford the greateſt ſatisfaction. To conclude, I ſay he does not "always repreſent perſons by the moſt remarkable paſſages of their Lives." We ſhall add the opinion of one Writer more, the ingenious Author of the Mêlanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature (f). "He obſerves, that ſuch a Work as MORERI's required the abilities of a perſon converſant in all parts of Philology, of univerſal Learning, and well skilled in every point, which he treats of; in ſhort ſuch a man, as had the whole ſubject before him, and knew how to make a judicious choice of the Authors and Materials, which he employed. "All theſe qualifications, ſays he, were wanting in MORERI. He is a young man, who having no proper fund

(a) See Father Niceron's Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 17. p. 350, 351. edit. de Paris 1732.

(b) Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. 2. Col. 670. edit. 2d, 1721.

(c) Menagiana, pag. 27, 28. tom. 1. edit. 3. Amſterdam 1713.

(d) Pag. 387, 388.

(e) Mr. de Tillemont. His manner of quoting is with the utmoſt exactneſs.

(f) Publiſhed under the name of Mr. de Vigneul-Marville. See Vol. 1. pag. 361, & ſeq. edit. 4. Paris 1725.

"of

" of good ſenſe and judgment reads books in haſte, without taſte or choice, and writes down " every thing promiſcuouſly, which occurs to him; in ſhort he copies faithfully the errors of others, " to which he adds his own with a great deal of profuſion and generoſity. When he meets with " Authors, who expatiate upon mere trifles, he follows them in their impertinent excurſions; and when " he happens upon others, who are too ſhort upon ſubjects of importance, he leaves them unfiniſh- " ed, having neither genius nor capacity to ſupply their defects. The deſign of his Dictionary is " very good, and very difficult to be well executed, which is the caſe of all Dictionaries. But his " Work is ſo ill performed, that it deſerves neither the approbation of Men of Learning, nor the " application of thoſe, who would really obtain that character. It is only fit for the uſe of the " mere vulgar, to whom it is of no importance, whether they underſtand things or not. Nay a " famous Abbot uſed to call it, by way of peculiar diſtinction, The Dictionary of the Vulgar (g). " It is of dangerous conſequence to youth, and to ignorant people, who take all that he ſays " for Oracles. Inſtead of the pains therefore, which are taken to enlarge it, it would be more " proper to correct it, or rather to begin the whole again." Mr. LE CLERC indeed was engaged in the correction of this Dictionary; but, as we are informed in his Life (h), he found that it was impoſſible to ſatisfy the Men of Learning, unleſs the whole Work was begun abſolutely anew; and his other ſtudies and engagements would not permit him to attempt that, nor the Bookſellers ſupply him with the neceſſary books, or allow the time and expence ſufficient to bring ſuch a ſcheme to any tolerable perfection. He tells us likewiſe in his obſervations upon the Paris Edition of MORERI in 1699, which were publiſhed in Mr. BERNARD'S Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (i), that he aſſumes but very little honour on account of his corrections of that Author, and that he ſhould not have put his name to the Edition, if the Bookſellers had not in a manner obliged him to it: That he often told his friends, that he conſidered all the time, which he employed upon it, as almoſt abſolutely loſt: That very little glory could reſult from the caſtigation of a book ſo extremely full of errors, and which it was impoſſible to render uſeful to the Publick. He obſerves afterwards (k), that the reaſon of his ſpeaking with ſo much contempt of MORERI, in the Preface to his edition of him, was for fear his friends ſhould imagine, that he had an eſteem for ſo bad an Author, becauſe he had undertaken to correct him; for to value a bad book, is almoſt as great a reproach as to write one. He tells us likewiſe (l), that MORERI underſtood Latin but indifferently, and had not the leaſt knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew tongues; and that his Work was not worth the pains of a more accurate correction than he had given of it, ſince the alteration muſt have been almoſt univerſal to have ſatisfied Men of true Learning; whereas what was already done was more than ſufficient for a Dictionary of the Vulgar, as this is juſtly ſtiled (m). All that he therefore did was only to correct ſeveral thouſand errors, which occurred to him, as he curſorily read it over; ſo that this Work ſtill continues very full of blunders, which are increaſed in every new edition by the perſons employed by the Bookſellers to ſwell it, rather than to make it uſeful to the Publick.

(g) Le Dictionaire Bourgeois.

(h) Publiſhed in Latin at Amſterdam 1711, p. 73, 74. See likewiſe Parrhaſiana, Vol. 1. p. 395, 396, 397. ed. Amſterdam 1699.

(i) Mois de Fevrier 1700, Artic. 7. pag. 212.

(k) Ibid. pag. 213.

(l) Ibid. pag. 217.

(m) Ibid. pag. 221.

With regard to the Dictionary, which has received the ſanction of Mr. COLLIER'S name, the greateſt part of it is a mere inaccurate tranſlation of MORERI, and conſequently labours under the ſame, or greater defects. And with reſpect to that part which relates to the Engliſh Hiſtory, it is very much upon a level for exactneſs with the reſt of the performance. This aſſertion is founded upon real evidence of the fact, and obvious to every man of Letters, who will take the trouble of examining it. However for the ſatisfaction of the Reader, we ſhall refer to a paſſage in Mr. BERNARD'S Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (n), which informs us, that when MORERI was firſt tranſlated into Engliſh, thoſe Articles only were ſelected, which were thought moſt eſſential, and related to the moſt famous Perſonages. Mr. COLLIER therefore found in him materials ſufficient for a Supplement; to enlarge which he made uſe of ſeveral other Authors, as BAYLE, BAUDRAND, HOFFMAN, CHARLES STEPHENS, &c. But he was leſs careful to correct their errors, than to copy them with the utmoſt exactneſs; and beſides, he fell into ſeveral other miſtakes for want of underſtanding the French Language ſufficiently. It appeared likewiſe very ſurprizing, that in giving an account of what MORERI relates in his Articles of CALVIN and CALVINISTS, he ſhould retrench the corrections of Mr. LE CLERC, ſince theſe Articles were tranſcribed from MAIMBOURG, who has been convicted of a thouſand falſities upon that ſubject. Mr. COLLIER having carried his Supplement no farther than the year 1688, it was continued by another hand, but in ſo wretched a manner, that nothing can be imagined more abſurd. We ſhall mention but one inſtance of this; he makes Mademoiſelle DE SCUDERY, who wrote ſeveral famous Romances, the wife of Mr. DE SCUDERY her brother.

(n) Nov. 1705, Art. 7. pag. 571, 572, 573.

But we now come to a Work of the moſt ſolid and inconteſtable merit, the DICTIONARY of Mr. BAYLE, which was ſo generally eſteemed, that it not only bore two impreſſions in his lifetime, in 1697 and 1702, but has ſince been reprinted at Geneva in 1715, at Rotterdam in 1720, with his Poſthumous Additions, (which were reprinted at Geneva in 1722 by way of Supplement) and at Amſterdam in 1730; and notwithſtanding the great freedom with which the celebrated Author delivers himſelf on all occaſions, yet a very beautiful edition of this Work is lately printed in France. And indeed it is a Library of itſelf, a noble Treaſure of Erudition, in which an account is given of the Lives and Writings of a multitude of remarkable perſons of different ages and nations (o). " It differs almoſt entirely from that of MORERI. It is a Dictionary of a new " and ſingular kind, and comprehends a prodigious variety of particulars. In the text or body " of the Articles, Mr. BAYLE gives a ſuccinct, though very exact account of thoſe perſons, whoſe " Lives he writes; but then he fully gratifies the Reader's curioſity by the remarks ſubjoined to the " text, (o) See Mr. Des Maizeaux's Life of Mr. Bayle, prefix'd to the laſt French edition of his Dictionary.

" text, which are a commentary on it. He there draws the characters of ſuch perſons, relates the " particulars of their lives, diſcovers the ſeveral ſprings of their actions, and examines the judgment " that has been, or may be formed of them. He expatiates on the moſt important articles of Reli- " gion, Morality, and Philoſophy; and ſometimes the text ſeems to be written merely for the ſake " of the notes. The actions or ſentiments of an obſcure and almoſt unknown perſon give him an " opportunity of entertaining and inſtructing the Reader. Thus ſeveral articles, which at firſt ſeem " to promiſe little or nothing, are often illuſtrated with the moſt curious particulars. He has every " where performed the part of an exact, faithful, and diſintereſted Hiſtorian, as well as of an impar- " tial, penetrating, and judicious Critic, &c.

The uncommon applauſe which this Work ſo juſtly obtained, made thoſe of our nation, who did not underſtand the original, very deſirous of an Engliſh tranſlation; and accordingly it was tranſlated. But as this verſion was undertaken by ſeveral perſons, moſt of whom were not only unacquainted with the Author's ſtyle and manner, but unſkilled in the French, and even in their own tongue, it was univerſally condemn'd, eſpecially by the beſt judges, who were particularly offended to find the Work caſtrated in ſeveral places. Theſe defects were prejudicial to the Bookſellers intereſt, as well as highly injurious to the Author; and indeed the whole appeared to be an impoſition upon the Publick. And yet ſo great was Mr. BAYLE's fame, that this tranſlation, which was at firſt ſold very cheap, was afterwards purchaſed at an exorbitant price.

Beſides theſe great defects, the Greek, Latin, Spaniſh, and Italian quotations were not tranſlated; and there being a multitude of them, moſt of which are very curious, ſuch Readers as did not underſtand thoſe Languages, remained ſtrangers to a conſiderable part of the Work.

From theſe conſiderations we believed that a new tranſlation of this excellent Work would be acceptable. We have remedied the defects of the former tranſlation in ſuch a manner as we hope will prove ſatisfactory to the Publick. The verſions of the citations from the Claſſics, are borrowed from our moſt eminent Tranſlators, and where we had no tranſlations, we ourſelves have attempted them. With reſpect to the modern Latin, Spaniſh, Italian, and French Poets, cited by Mr. BAYLE, we either render them in verſe, or endeavour to convey the ſenſe and ſpirit of them in poetical proſe. This, and the prodigious variety of ſubjects, ſtyles, and eſpecially the quotations from the old French Writers, were almoſt ſufficient to deter us from attempting this tranſlation, though the inimitable Author himſelf had not been ſo vaſtly difficult.

But as Mr. BAYLE did not propoſe to compile a General Dictionary, and made choice of ſuch Articles only as beſt ſuited his views, or for which he had materials already prepared, he omitted a great many perſons illuſtrious for their rank and dignity, as Emperors, Kings, Princes, &c. or conſpicuous for their knowledge in the Arts, the Sciences, and Polite Literature. Mr. LEERS his Bookſeller therefore, ſoon after Mr. BAYLE's deceaſe, thought a Supplement of ſuch importance, that he reſolved to engage ſeveral Men of Learning in England (p), Germany, and Holland, to undertake each of them a certain number of Articles for that purpoſe (q). But as this Scheme was never executed, we have endeavoured to ſupply that omiſſion by interſperſing Articles of the moſt famous perſonages throughout the Dictionary of Mr. BAYLE, and have enlarged and compleated his Articles, wherever we apprehended them to be defective. But with regard to our Additions, our view has been to make the Work curious and inſtructive, rather than voluminous; for which reaſon we have excluded from them whatever relates to Geography, as being foreign to a Work of this kind. The new Articles are drawn up from the original Authors, (who are quoted every where in the moſt exact manner) without any regard to other Hiſtorical Dictionaries, unleſs to correct their errors; and entirely in Mr. BAYLE's manner, that is, with critical Remarks, printed under the Text, which will render the Work leſs voluminous; and theſe Remarks we have endeavoured to render agreeable by a variety of reflections of a miſcellaneous kind.

(p) Mr. Des Maizeaux receiv'd a Letter for that purpoſe.

(q) See Mr. C. Ancillon's Advertiſement prefix'd to his Memoires concernant les Vies & les Ouvrages de pluſieurs Modernes &c. Amſterdam 1709, in 8°.

We believe it may be juſtly affirmed, that no nation boaſts of a greater number of valuable Authors in every branch of Learning than our own; and yet no people have been leſs careful of doing juſtice to their memory. Some Eſſays indeed of this kind were attempted by JOHN BOSTON, a Monk of St. Edmundſbury in the year 1410, who drew up a catalogue of all the Britiſh Authors, and gave ſhort cenſures upon them; by JOHN LELAND in his Collectanea; by JOHN BALE in his Summarium Illuſtrium Majoris Britanniæ Scriptorum, printed at Baſil 1559, in fol.; and by JOHN PITS in his Relation. Hiſtor. de Rebus Anglicis, publiſhed after his death at Paris 1619 in 4^to^. But as the lateſt of theſe Authors did not carry his account beyond the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, and all of them are extremely defective and erroneous, their performances muſt neceſſarily prove unſatisfactory to the Learned, as the Language which they wrote in, is unknown to the Engliſh Reader. Since that time Dr. FULLER in his Worthies of England, publiſhed at London in fol. 1662, has endeavoured to give an account of our Great Men both in Church and State; but as the late learned Biſhop NICHOLSON obſerves (r), " it was huddled up in haſte, for the procurement of ſome " moderate profit for the Author, tho' he did not live to ſee it publiſhed. It corrects many miſtakes in " his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, but makes more new ones in their ſtead.... His chief Author is " BALE for the Lives of his eminent Writers; and thoſe of his greateſt Heroes are commonly miſ- " ſhapen ſcraps, mixed with tattle and lies." Mr. WOOD, it is owned, has taken a great deal of pains in his Athenæ Oxonienſes; but we may obſerve, that his deſign is limited to the Writers of the Univerſity of Oxford; and the greateſt part of thoſe, whom he mentions, are very inconſiderable, while while the more eminent and valuable Authors are far from being repreſented in a juſt and full light. Add to this the general objection urged againſt his performance by Men of Judgment and Candour, that it is executed in a very looſe and inaccurate manner, with a manifeſt partiality through the whole, and without any tolerable method, or the leaſt elegance of ſtyle and compoſition. In ſhort, if we credit the abovementioned Author (s), "his books are little more than a medley of notes and ſuch informations as were ſent in from his ſeveral correſpondents, without being digeſted into any other method "than the throwing them under that particular Author's name, to whom they chiefly related." However we have made uſe of his aſſiſtance, wherever it was proper, as well as that of all other Writers, who can furniſh us with any lights of advantage to our Scheme. Beſides which we have had recourſe to a variety of materials, which lie diſperſed in Dedications, Prefaces, Funeral Sermons, Pamphlets, and other looſe pieces, the laſt of which enjoying generally but a tranſitory life, muſt be copied whilſt they are to be procured, otherwiſe they are in danger of being abſolutely loſt.

(r) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 1, pag. 14.

(s) Ib. Part 2. p. 231, 232.

Eaſtern Hiſtory is a ſpacious field, and furniſhes very entertaining and extraordinary incidents. The genius, turn of mind, manners and cuſtoms of the various nations it treats of, differ ſo much from thoſe on this part of the Globe, that an account of their moſt celebrated perſons cannot but pleaſe an inquiſitive, intelligent Reader. We hope therefore that our reſearches into that Hiſtory, ſince it is ſo little known among us, will prove agreeable; eſpecially as we have not barely had recourſe to D'HERBELOT's Dictionary and other Works on that ſubject written in the European Languages, but the Oriental Authors and Manuſcripts.

It may perhaps be expected, that we ſhould take notice of the objection which has been made to Mr. BAYLE's Work by ſome great and good Men, on account of the vein of unbounded Scepticiſm, and the ſallies of a looſe imagination, which he has indulged in ſeveral Articles. But as this relates to that Author only, whoſe Work we have no right to retrench any part of, we can only condemn whatever is obnoxious in it, and ſhould have taken the liberty of making ſome obſervations of our own upon thoſe paſſages, if we had not already been anticipated by a very eminent Writer, Mr. CROUSAZ, in a late book of his, entitled, Examen du Pyrrhoniſme Ancien & Moderne; whoſe Animadverſions, with thoſe of ſome other conſiderable Authors, we ſhall take notice of under the proper Articles of Mr. BAYLE. However we are confident, that no reaſonable complaint can be formed againſt any part of our own performance, as carried beyond the juſt freedom of reveal'd Religion, or inconſiſtent with the moſt ſevere modeſty. And we doubt not but that a juſt account of the Lives and Writings of great and valuable Men will prove of more real and extenſive advantage to the intereſts of Religion and Virtue, than all the efforts of Scepticiſm can to the contrary.

Thoſe Articles, the materials of which were received too late to be inſerted in their proper order, particularly the Life of Dr. ALLIX, will be ſubjoined to the end of every Letter, to which they relate. And here we cannot omit returning our thanks to ſome Gentlemen of diſtinguiſhed Genius and Learning, whoſe aſſiſtance and approbation we eſteem the higheſt compliment to our performance; and in particular to Dr. JOHN MARTYN, Profeſſor of Botany in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and F. R. S. to whom we are obliged for ſeveral Articles and Obſervations; eſpecially with relation to Phyſick, Botany, and other Parts of Natural Hiſtory.

As therefore we have ſpared no labour or expence to make our Work of advantage to the Publick, we hope, that the Learned and Ingenious will ſtill favour us with their encouragement; and not ſhew any regard to the malicious inſinuations of thoſe, who would perſuade them from the copiouſneſs of the firſt Letter of the Alphabet (which with the two following Letters form one third part of Mr. BAYLE's Dictionary) that our Work will ſwell beyond eight Volumes, to which we ſhall abſolutely limit it. And this cannot be conſidered as an inconſiſtency with our firſt propoſal of ſix Volumes; ſince each Volume will now contain but nine monthly Numbers, whereas it was deſigned before to contain twelve; which upon reflection we imagine would render them too large.

N. B. The additional articles are diſtinguiſhed with this mark, ☞; and the new Remarks inſerted in thoſe of Mr. Bayle are incloſ'd with two Crotchets, with a Star prefix'd, and concluding with CRIT. REM.

PREFACE.

MR. Bayle's Dictionary was ſo generally eſteem'd, that it not only bore two impreſſions in his life-time, in 1697 and 1702, but has ſince been reprinted at Geneva in 1715, at Rotterdam in 1720, with his poſthumous additions (which were reprinted at Geneva in 1722 by way of Supplement) and laſtly at Amſterdam in 1730; and notwithſtanding the great freedom with which the celebrated Author delivers himſelf on all occaſions, yet a very beautiful edition of this work is now printing in France. And indeed 'tis a Library of itſelf, a noble treaſure of erudition, in which an account is given of the lives and writings of a multitude of remarkable perſons of different ages and nations. "It differs * almoſt entirely from that of Moreri. 'Tis "a Dictionary of a new and ſingular kind, and comprehends a prodigious variety of par- "ticulars. In the text or body of the articles, Mr. Bayle gives a ſuccinct, tho' very "exact account of thoſe perſons whoſe lives he writes: but then he fully gratifies "the Reader's curioſity, by the remarks ſubjoin'd to the text, which are a commen- "tary on it. He there draws the characters of ſuch perſons, relates the particulars of their "lives, diſcovers the ſeveral ſprings of their actions, and examines the judgment that "has been, or may be form'd of them. He expatiates on the moſt important articles "of Religion, Morality, and Philoſophy; and ſometimes the text ſeems to be written "merely for the ſake of the notes. The actions or ſentiments of an obſcure and al- "moſt unknown perſon give him an opportunity of entertaining and inſtructing the "Reader. Thus ſeveral articles which at firſt ſeem to promiſe little or nothing, are "often illuſtrated with the moſt curious particulars. He has every where perform'd "the part of an exact, faithful, and diſintereſted Hiſtorian, as well as of an impartial, "penetrating, and judicious Critic, &c."

* See Mr. Des Maizeaux's Life of Mr. Bayle, prefix'd to the laſt French edition of his Dictionary.

The uncommon applauſe this Work ſo juſtly obtain'd, made thoſe of our nation, who did not underſtand the original, very deſirous of an Engliſh Tranſlation; and accordingly it was tranſlated. But as this verſion was undertaken by ſeveral perſons, moſt of whom were not only unacquainted with the Author's ſtyle and manner, but unskill'd in the French, and even in their own tongue, it was univerſally condemn'd, eſpecially by the beſt judges, who were particularly offended to find the Work caſtrated in ſeveral places. Theſe defects were prejudicial to the Bookſeller's intereſt, as well as highly injurious to the author; and indeed the whole appear'd to be an impoſition on the public: and yet ſo great was Mr. Bayle's fame, that this tranſlation, which was at firſt ſold very cheap, was afterwards purchas'd at an exorbitant Price.

Beſides theſe great defects, the Greek, Latin, Spaniſh, and Italian quotations were not tranſlated; and there being a multitude of them, moſt of which are very curious, ſuch Readers as did not underſtand thoſe languages remain'd ſtrangers to a conſiderable part of the Work. We have remedied this imperfection, and in ſuch a manner as we hope will not diſpleaſe. The verſions of the citations from the Claſſics are borrow'd from our moſt eminent Tranſlators; and where we had no tranſlations, we ourſelves have attempted them. With reſpect to the modern Latin, Spaniſh, Italian, and French Poets, cited by Mr. Bayle, we either render them in verſe, or endeavour to convey the ſenſe and ſpirit of them in poetical proſe. This, and the prodigious variety of ſubjects, ſtyles, and eſpecially the quotations from the old French writers, were almoſt ſufficient to deter us from attempting this tranſlation, tho' the inimitable Author himſelf had not been ſo vaſtly difficult.

From the abovemention'd conſiderations, we believ'd that a new Tranſlation of this excellent Work would be acceptable.

But as Mr. Bayle did not propoſe to compile a general Dictionary, and made choice of ſuch articles only as beſt ſuited his views, or for which he had materials already prepar'd; he omitted a great many perſons, illuſtrious for their rank and dignity, as Emperors, Kings, Princes, &c. or conſpicuous for their Knowledge in the Arts, the Sciences, and polite Literature. We have therefore endeavour'd to ſupply this omiſſion, by interſperſing articles of ſuch famous perſonages throughout the Dictionary of Mr. Bayle, whoſe articles we have likewiſe enlarged and compleated, wherever we apprehended it to be neceſſary. But with regard to our additional Articles, our view has been to make the work curious and inſtructive, rather than voluminous; for which reaſon we have excluded from them whatever relates to Geography, as being foreign to a work of this kind.

We have ſelected from the French, Italian, German, Dutch, &c. Hiſtorical Dictionaries, all ſuch particulars as we imagin'd would improve our plan: however, theſe Dictionaries were not barely tranſcrib'd, we having not only corrected the errors with which they abound, but made very conſiderable additions to ſuch articles as we have extracted from them. The Reader will likewiſe meet with a great number of new articles, all which have been careſully drawn up from the original authors, and generally in Mr. Bayle's manner, that is, with critical and other remarks ſubjoin'd to the text, which will render the work leſs voluminous.

The French editors of Moreri's Dictionary being retain'd by the bookſellers of Paris, were more induſtrious to ſwell the work, than to make it uſeful to the Public. As to ourſelves, we are determin'd to inſert ſuch particulars only as we preſume may be eſſential. Theſe editors, who promis'd an Univerſal Hiſtorical Dictionary, confin'd it too much to the French Nation; whence it is that ſo many articles are there found relating to the genealogies of the families of France, and ſo few relating to other countries, eſpecially Great Britain and Ireland. We have therefore attempted to ſupply what was wanting on this occaſion, with as much brevity as was conſiſtent with our deſign, and have been particularly careful to do juſtice, ſo far as lay in our power, to the eminent men of our own country. We ſhall be greatly obliged to thoſe gentlemen who will furniſh us with Memoirs, and to ſuch as ſhall candidly point out any errors we may commit in the courſe of ſo laborious an Undertaking.

Eaſtern Hiſtory is a ſpacious field, and furniſhes very entertaining and extraordinary incidents. The genius, turn of mind, manners and cuſtoms of the various nations it treats of, differ ſo much from thoſe on this part of the globe, that an account of their moſt celebrated perſons cannot but pleaſe an inquiſitive, intelligent Reader. We therefore hope that our reſearches into that Hiſtory, ſince it is ſo little known among us, will be agreeable, eſpecially as we have not barely had recourſe to Herbelot's Dictionary, and other works on that ſubject written in the European Languages, but to the Oriental Authors and Manuſcripts.

Theſe Articles may perhaps ſeem a little diſproportionate to the whole Work, and eſpecially to the reſt of our Additions. But this was occaſion'd by the peculiarity of the Oriental Languages, which has brought a great many Names ſo forward in our Alphabet; whereas few of the Articles relating to European Hiſtory, and particularly to that of our own Countrymen, could poſſibly be introduced in this firſt number. But we aſſure the Reader, that a principal regard ſhall hereafter be had to the latter, as they come in order; and that none of the former kind ſhall be inſerted, but what are remarkably entertaining and important.

This may ſuffice concerning our general plan; and we hope that what we now offer to the Reader will not fall below it with reſpect either to the Matter or the Execution; tho' ſome allowances might juſtly be claim'd from the conſideration of the difficulties, which we muſt unavoidably have met with at the firſt ſettling and digeſting ſo comprehenſive and arduous a Work.

We cannot here avoid taking notice of the uſage which we have met with from the Undertakers of a pretended Tranſlation of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, who have endeavour'd, by all the artifices imaginable, to prevent the public from knowing any thing of our Deſign. Does not this conduct betray an extreme diffidence of their own Verſion? And muſt not ſuch a Partiality make all their ſubſequent efforts againſt us ineffectual with all perſons of judgment and candor? And ſince they have thus appear'd the Aggreſſors, we may be allow'd to ſay, that it was imprudent as well as unjuſt in them to give us ſo much occaſion of Reſentment, whilſt their own Tranſlation is ſo obnoxious to cenſure, with regard to the Inaccuracies of the Style, the flagrant Miſtakes of the Original, and the falſe tranſlations of the Latin, Greek, and Italian Quotations. This every one will be convinc'd of from a few curſory Obſervations we have made upon their firſt Number, of which we ſhall give a ſhort Specimen; tho' a ſlight Attention in their Readers might have ſpar'd us this trouble.

But we ſhall premiſe this general Remark concerning their pretended Tranſlation, upon the moſt candid and impartial view of it, that 'tis either a Tranſcript of the former with its Errors, and a few ſlight Alterations in the Style; or that wherever a new Verſion is attempted, it has added new Blunders to the former.

N. B. The additional articles are diſtinguiſhed with this mark, ☞; and the new Remarks inſerted in thoſe of Mr. Bayle are inclos'd within two Crotchets, with a Star prefix'd, and conclude with CRIT. REM.

P. 68. Note [A], col. 2. for critiques read critics.

CONDITIONS.

I. The whole Work ſhall contain ſix Volumes in Folio.

II. Twenty Sheets ſhall be publiſh'd monthly, which will be ſent regularly to the Houſes of thoſe Perſons who will pleaſe to encourage this Undertaking.

III. The Price of every twenty Sheets will be Three Shillings and Six Pence, which it is preſumed will not be thought unreaſonable, conſidering the Labour ſuch a Work requires, and the Number of Books in moſt Languages that have been purchaſed to complete it.

Such Perſons as are willing to promote this Undertaking, are deſir'd to ſend in their Names and Places of Abode to NICHOLAS PREVOST, againſt Southampton-ſtreet in the Strand.

The Original.	The pretended Tranſlation.	Our Tranſlation.
	Falſe Tranſlations of the Greek.
	P. 17. Marg. Note (2) upon Note [A].
ΑΒΔΗΡΑΣ ΚΟΡΑΣ.	The Maid of Abdera.	Abdera the Virgin.
	The context might have directed the Tranſlators to the true ſenſe of the words; for we are there told, that the moſt learned Antiquaries (the word in the original is Medailliſtes, Medalliſts) underſtood it of Diomedes's ſiſter, who founded Abdera, and gave her name to the city.
	P. 4. Note [B] of the Article ABARIS.
ἀιτροβατῶν τρόπόν τινα.	As if he had been an inhabitant of the air.	He flew thro' the air, and over rivers, ſeas, &c.
	They miſunderſtood the word ἀιτροβάτης, which ſignifies to walk, or paſs thro' the air, and not to inhabit it. Porphyry, in his Life of Pythagoras, tells us that Abaris had the ſirname of Αιθιροβάτης, incedens per aerem, i. e. one who paſs'd thro' the air; which epithet is analogous to ἀιτροβατῶν, which they render an inhabitant of the air. The old tranſlation has this paſſage more exactly.
	Falſe Tranſlations of the Latin.
	P. 26. Note [D].
Poſt diſceſſum ejus, qui mihi præproperus viſus eſt.	After his Death, which ſeem'd to me too haſty.	After his Departure, much too ſoon for me.
	P. 27. Marg. Not. (c).
Ut quoties mihi a ſcholis reverſo vacaret.	That as often as ſhe was at leiſure, upon my return from the Schools.	As often as I was at leiſure, upon my return from the Schools.
	P. 28. Note [H].
Crebriùs oculos amor in ſe reflectebat quam lectio in Scripturam dirigebat.	Love oftner turn'd my eyes on her, than the Intention of Reading directed them to the Scripture.	We gaz'd more frequently on one another, than on the Leſſon.
	Here Scriptura is tranſlated Scripture, which it never ſignifies, unleſs the epithet Sacra be added to it. It means only Writing.
	P. 21. Note [B].
Ex noſtrorum animadverſionibus.	My Animadverſions.	The Animadverſions of Proteſtants.
	Noſtrorum here means thoſe of our Religion, &c. as appears from the Context. The ſame Error occurs in the Verſion of the Quotation that immediately follows, where ex ſuorum, hoc eſt Hæreticorum hominum animadverſionibus, is render'd his own, that is, the Animadverſions of an Heretic.
	P. 23. Note [B]. ABEL.
Rabbini, & ex iis Calvinus.	The Rabbins, and among them Calvinus.	The Rabbins, and after them Calvin.
	This ſuppoſes Calvin to be a Rabbin; and it is plain they knew not who he was, when they call'd him Calvinus, contrary to the general cuſtom of our Engliſh Writers.
	P. 32. Note [Y].
Scilicet ut ipſi prævalentes me interficiant.	To ſuffer them to prevail over me.	And they ſhould ſo far prevail as to kill me.
	Here the moſt eſſential Word, interficiant, kill me, is entirely omitted in the Tranſlation.
	Falſe Tranſlations of the Italian.
	P. 14. Not. [C] of ABDAS.
Per innanzi vi contentavate d'un poco di licenza; hora, la volete del pari; fra poco, vorrete eſſer ſoli, & cacciar noi altri fuori del regno.	The Tranſlation of this paſſage is full of Blunders; vi contentavate is tranſlated, THEY pretend to be ſatisfied, inſtead of, YOU were ſatisfied. Hora, la volete del pari, then THEY deſire to be upon an equality; inſtead of, now YOU look upon yourſelves as equals. Fra poco, next, inſtead of, in a little time. Vorrete eſſer ſoli, & cacciar noi altri, fuori del regno. THEY aſpire to govern alone, and at laſt they would drive us out of the kingdom; inſtead of, YOU'LL be for reigning alone, and driving us out of the kingdom.
	Falſe Tranſlations of French.
Fait par un Miniſtre Wallon, qui ne manque pas de ſe recrier ſur la hardieſſe que l'on a euë d'ajouter certaines choſes d'un côté, pendant que de l'autre on faiſoit des ſupreſſions. Double attentat: Verſion obreptice & ſubreptice; traditions pueriles inſérées: & néanmoins, on ne promet dans la Preface, &c.	P. 1. Note [A].	Written by a Walloon Miniſter, who does not fail to exclaim againſt the audaciouſneſs of thoſe, who thus added or ſuppreſs'd, as they pleas'd. A double crime this! an obreptitious and ſurreptitious Verſion, interſpers'd with childiſh traditions! at the ſame time that the Preface promiſes nothing but, &c.
	Written by a Walloon Miniſter, who fails not to exclaim againſt the impudence of adding in ſome places, and ſuppreſſing in others. But he is guilty of both: in his own Verſion he has artfully foiſted in ſome things, and drop'd others; beſides inſerting childiſh traditions; and yet he promiſes in the Preface, &c.
	This is an egregious perverſion of the ſenſe of this paſſage, and ſuppoſes that the Walloon Miniſter had likewiſe given a Tranſlation of the Bible, and been guilty of the ſame faults which he had complain'd of in the old French Tranſlator; which is abſolutely falſe. The old Tranſlation of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, which the undertakers of the preſent Compleat and Accurate one have themſelves ſo highly condemn'd, has given the juſt ſenſe of this paſſage.
	P. 23. Note [D].
Préceda le mariage des deux freres.	His Death preceded the marriage of HIS two brothers.	He died before the marriage of the two brothers.
	His is not in the Original: the two brothers here intended are Cain and Abel; but according to their Tranſlation, the latter would be dead and married at the ſame time. The old tranſlation is right in this paſſage.
	P. 23. Marg. Not. (22).
Divers jeux de Rhetorique.	Some rhetorical pieces.	Several rhetorical flouriſhes.
	They were not entire pieces or tracts, but only ſome occaſional ſtrokes of Rhetoric introduced in one of the books of Biſſelius. The old tranſlation has render'd this better, ſeveral rhetorical fancies.
	P. 24. in the Text.
Mais comme on n'a que trop de panchant à enta*ſſer* ſupoſitions ſur ſupoſitions afin de faire trouver du merveilleux en toutes choſes.	But as we are apt to fancy we diſcover the marvellous in every ſtory of this kind.	But as men are but too fond of ſtarting a numberleſs multitude of hypotheſes, purely to ſhew the marvellous in every thing.
	Here entaſſer ſupoſitions ſur ſupoſitions is not tranſlated, and afin de faire trouver, is render'd to diſcover, inſtead of to ſhew; and en toutes choſes, in every ſtory of this kind, inſtead of in every thing. The old Tranſlation is much more exact.
	P. 26. In the Text.
Sous pretexte de quelques actions trés-ſales.	On pretence of ſome ſiniſter management.	Upon pretence of his having committed ſome crimes of a very obſcene nature.
	The old Tranſlation has render'd it much more correctly, under pretence of ſome very foul actions.
	P. 26. Text.
L'Ecolatre Anſelm.	His Schoolmaſter Anſelm.
	His is not in the Original. ECOLATRE does not ſignify a Schoolmaſter, but a Canon, who holds a Prebend in a cathedral, by which he is oblig'd to teach Philoſophy and the Belles Lettres to his brethren, and the children of the Dioceſe. The old Tranſlators, probably, underſtood the ſenſe of this word much better than the preſent; tho' they have render'd it by a very unuſual term, viz. the Scholaſter Anſelm.
	P. 27. Text.
Abelard lui tendit des pieges par ces deux Endroits.	Abelard laid hold of thoſe two Foibles to enſnare him.	Abelard made theſe two Paſſions ſubſervient to his deſign.
	Here Endroits is tranſlated Foibles; and conſequently, according to theſe Tranſlators, Fulbert's deſire that his niece Heloiſe ſhould be made a Scholar, was one of his two Foibles.
	P. 28. Text.
Ils s'abandonnerent d'autant plus à ces ſortes de plaiſirs, qu'ils n'en avoient point gouté auparavant.	He indulg'd this pleaſure the more, as he had never before taſted it.	Having never taſted ſuch joys before, they abandoned themſelves to them with the leſs reſerve.
	The old Tranſlation is right in this paſſage.
Il ne faiſoit plus que par maniere d'aquit ſes fonctions publiques.	P. 28. Text.
	He neglected his public functions.	Abelard now perform'd his public functions very carelefly.
	The old Tranſlation is much more exact.

The Original.	The preliminary Translation.	Our Translation.
Il ſe choiſit un lieu de retraite ſur les terres du Comte de Champagne.	P. 28. Text. He choſe a retreat upon the lands of the Earl of Champagne. Terres ſignifies the territories of ſome Lord or Prince, and not lands. Beſides, to chuſe a retreat UPON the lands of a perſon, is a very odd expreſſion. The old Tranſlation has render'd Terres, Dominions; which is more agreeable to the ſenſe.	He then withdrew to the territories of the Count of Champagne.
Lors qu'elle ne ſe trouvoit point d'humeur, ou que le reſpect de quelque fête ſolennelle lui inſpiroit quelque ſcrupule.	P. 28. Note [H]. When ſhe was out of humour, or the ſolemnity of a feſtival inſpir'd HIM with ſome ſcruple.... This ſuppoſes that Abelard chaſtiſed her on account of his own ſcruples. The old Tranſlation has render'd this paſſage right.	When ſhe was not in humour, or was aw'd by the ſolemnity of ſome feſtival.
Sous le nom de beauté.	P. 28. Note [I]. Under the name of the beauty. In the Original, beauty is repreſented as a perſon. The old Tranſlation is right in this paſſage.	Under the name of Beauty.
Le bien public obligeoit le Souverain.	P. 30. Note [O]. The public good oblig'd the Sovereign to uſe this indulgence.	It was neceſſary theſe things ſhould be conniv'd at for the public good.
Les Jéſuites ne plaiſent point là au Souverain.	Ibid. The Jeſuits there are diſagreeable to the Prince. In theſe two paſſages the Tranſlators did not conſider that they were ſpeaking of the government of Venice, where the words Sovereign and Prince are very improper.	The Government of Venice does not care for the Jeſuits.
Un Seigneur Breton.	P. 31. Note [P]. A Britiſh Lord. The word Britiſh can only be apply'd to Great Britain; whereas Breton means a native of Britany in France. The old Tranſlation has retain'd the word Breton.	A Nobleman of Britany.
St. Jérôme, dont l'amitié pour Paule ſervit d'entretien aux médiſans.	P. 31. Note [T]. St. Jerom, whoſe friendſhip for PAULUS SUPPORTED HIM AGAINST CALUMNY. Here Paula, a lady, is miſtaken for a man; and inſtead of St. Jerom's being ſupported againſt calumny, the caſe was juſt the reverſe. This paſſage, which is ſo wretchedly perverted here, is tolerably well render'd in the old Tranſlation.	St. Jerom, whoſe friendſhip for PAULA afforded an ample field for detraction.
Il ne ſe fit nul ſcrupule.	P. 32. Text. He made no ſecret of his marriage. The old Tranſlation has render'd this paſſage right.	His marriage did not raiſe the leaſt ſcruple in his mind.
C'eſt une marque qu'elle avoit demandé cette faveur.	P. 32. Note [Y]. Probably ſhe might petition for the favour. The old Tranſlation is right in this paſſage.	Which manifeſtly ſhews, that ſhe had requeſted it as a favour.
	Omiſſion.
Non eſt, le deuſt-on vif bruſler, Comme un chevaucheur d'eſcouvettes.	P. 4. Marg. Note (3), upon Note [B] of ABARIS. Theſe two verſes of Villon are left untranſlated.	Tho' they ſhould burn him as a hag, He's none of thoſe ....
On devoüoit une perſonne, & puis on l'aſſommoit à coups de pierre.	Omitted in p. 20. in the Text, line 7, after the words an act of religion. This was omitted in the old tranſlation.	Who of a broomſtick make a nag. A perſon was devoted to death, and afterwards ſton'd.
	Ignorance in point of Learning.
	P. 9. Marg. Not. (76). Luneu inſtead of Luſneu. Banage inſtead of Baſnage. Theſe errors are barely tranſcrib'd from the old Tranſlation, and ſhew that the Tranſlators very often did not even conſult the Original. Ibid. Marg. Note (a) in ABBEVILLE. Father L'Abbé, inſtead of Labbe; and ſo in every other place where he is mention'd. Such miſpelling of names creates great confuſion in Hiſtory. This name is right in the old Tranſlation. P. 18. Marg. Note 11. Saumaiſe inſtead of Salmaſius, as he is always call'd by us. P. 29. Note [M]. Mr. Wallis inſtead of Dr.; whence we may preſume that they knew very little of that great man. The old Tranſlation ſtiles him Dr.
	Inaccuracies of Style.
Dont l'imagination contagieuſe, & les paſſions vehémentes ſachent bien ſe faire valoir.	P. 19. Note [H]. Whoſe contagious imaginations and vehement paſſions know how to gain ground, &c. The former Tranſlation has made tolerable ſenſe of this paſſage; but here it is abſolutely unintelligible.	Whoſe infectious imagination and fiery paſſions work in a proper manner, &c.
S'il mourut vierge.	P. 23. Text. Whether he dy'd a Virgin. A Virgin is an expreſſion never apply'd to a man in ſerious writings.	Whether Abel dy'd without having known woman.
	P. 23. Note [B]. Adam and Eve left Paradice in a ſtate of Virginity. It is extremely improper in our language to talk of a man's being in a ſtate of Virginity. But perhaps they meant, that Paradiſe was left in a ſtate of Virginity.	Adam and Eve did not know one another, whilſt they were in Paradiſe.
Qu'il ſoit mort Garçon.	P. 23. Note [D]. Die a Batchelor.	Died without knowing woman.
Qu' Abel a été vierge, Pretre, & Martyr; trois qualitez, &c.	Ibid. That Abel was a Maid, a Prieſt, and a Martyr; upon the account of which three Qualifications, &c. Inſtead of Qualifications, the old Tranſlation has Qualities, which is much more proper.	Abel died without knowing woman, was a Prieſt and a Martyr; for which three Qualities, &c.
L'Ecriture témoigne qu'il perit avec effuſion de ſang.	P. 24. Note [G]. For the Scriptures witneſs, that he died with effuſion of blood. To die with effuſion of blood is a very odd expreſſion. The old Tranſlation has render'd it much better, that he periſh'd by bloodſhed.	The Scripture ſays, his blood was ſpilt,
Cherchant avec ardeur les occaſions de ſe ſignaler contre une Thêſe. Embraſſer la religion des Chanoines Reguliers. S'il lui venoit quelque penſée, elle ne rouloit pas ſur quelque difficulté philoſophique; mais ſur des chanſons amoureuſes, qui furent chantées long tems en pluſieurs provinces.	P. 25. Text. Greedily catching at every opportunity of diſtinguiſhing himſelf againſt ſome Theſis. To diſtinguiſh himſelf againſt ſome Theſis, is a very whimſical expreſſion. P. 25. Text. Embraced the Religion of the Regular Canons. Religion is a Galliciſm for a Religious Profeſſion. P. 28. Note (1). If any new thought came into his head, it turn'd not upon any philoſophical difficulty, but upon amorous ſonnets; which were ſung a long time after in ſeveral provinces. The expreſſion, of a new thought's coming into his head, which turn'd upon amorous ſonnets, has ſomething of the jargon in it.	Seeking ſo eagerly to ſignalize himſelf in diſputation &c. Enter'd among the Canons Regular. If ever he ſtruck out a new thought, it always turn'd on Love, and not on an abſtruſe point of Philoſophy; and theſe thoughts he work'd up into ſongs, which were ſung for many years in ſeveral provinces.
Quorum etiam carminum, ſicut & ipſe noſti, frequentantur & decantantur.	P. 28. Note [I]. Many of which ſongs are favourites. Favourite ſongs is a common phraſe; but ſongs which are favourites is not Engliſh. Beſides, it is unaccountable how frequentantur in the original can poſſibly be tranſlated, are favourites.
L'Abbé de S. Denis chaſſa les Religieuſes d'Argenteuil. Il avoit lu quantité d'exemples de commerce impur entre des femmes & des hommes mutilez. Aimoit ſi ardemment Abélard, quoiqu'on le lui eût châtré. Fit tant peur à l'accuſé, qu'il interjetta apel au Pape.	P. 31. Text. The Abbot of St. Dennis expell'd the Religious of Argenteuil. The old Tranſlation has render'd it Nuns, as it ought to be. P. 31. Note [T]. Having read many inſtances of criminal converſation between women and men, who were diſabled. Diſabled is a ſtrange expreſſion for ſuch a defect in men. The old Tranſlators have render'd it with more propriety, mutilated. Ibid. Fond of Abelard, tho' unmann'd, &c. Unmann'd is an unuſual term in that ſenſe. P. 32. Text. So terrified the accus'd, that he interpos'd an appeal to the Pope. To interpoſe an appeal is not Engliſh. The old Tranſlation has it much better, he appeal'd to the Pope.	The Abbot of St. Denis expell'd the Nuns. He had read of ſeveral men, who, tho' mutilated, did yet engage in an impure commerce with women. Had ſo violent a paſſion for Abelard, altho' he was emaſculated. Which terrified him ſo much, that he appeal'd to the Pope.
	Inverſion of Order.
	The Articles ABDERAME and ABDERUS are placed before ABDERA, which is contrary to the order of the Alphabet.

A GENERAL DICTIONARY, Hiſtorical and Critical.

A

AARON, High-Prieſt of the Jews, and brother of Moſes. As we have a copious account of him in the Pentateuch, in Moreri's Dictionary, and that of Mr. Simon, to give a large article of him here would be ſuperfluous. I therefore ſhall only obſerve, that his weakneſs in complying with the ſuperſtitious deſires of the Iſraelites, with regard to the golden Calf, has given riſe to a multitude of Fictions [A]. One Moncæius publiſhed, about the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, an Apology for Aaron (a), which the Inquiſition of Rome condemn'd, as Cornelius à Lapide the Jeſuit had foretold the author (b). 'Tis ſuppoſed in this Apology, that Aaron intended to exhibit the ſame image which Moſes repreſented ſome time after, I mean a Cherubim; and that the Iſraelites worſhipped it, contrary to the Intentions of Aaron. A Doctor of the Sorbonne, Canon of Amiens (c), completely refuted theſe Suppoſitions in 1609. According to ſome authors, the only reaſon of Aaron's criminal Indulgence on this occaſion, was, the fear he was under of being fell'd by the people; and that he hoped to elude their requeſt, by requiring the women to contribute their ear-rings, imagining they would chuſe to continue without a viſible Deity, rather than give up any of their perſonal Ornaments; but found however, that ſuch Minds as are intoxicated with ſuperſtition and idolatry (d), will ſacrifice every thing to their darling enthuſiaſm. The Scriptures don't any way favour the opinion of thoſe, who aſſert that the Golden Calf was only of gilded Wood [B]

(a) 'Tis entitled, Aaron purgatus. It was reprinted at Francfort anno 1675, in 8vo. The Leipſic edition of 1689, in 12°, mentioned in Tome 17. of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, is exactly the ſame with that of Francfort, except that the booksellers publiſh'd it with a new title.

(b) Cornel. à Lapide Commentar. in Exod. xxxii. 4. pag. 605.

(c) His name is Viſorius, and his book is entitled, Deſtructio Pſeudo-Cherubi Moncæi.

(d) Idem Cornel. à Lapide. ibid.

We

[A] Has given riſe to a multitude of Fictions.] I. Rabbi Solomon (1) imagined, that the calf which the Iſraelites worſhiped was a living animal; and that Aaron ſeeing it walk and eat like other calves, erected an altar in its honour, ſomething like which is related in the Alcoran (2). II. Several Rabbis to juſtify Aaron, relate, that he himſelf did not make the golden calf, but only threw the gold into the fire, purely to free himſelf from the importunities of the people: and that certain Magicians who mixed with the Iſraelites at their leaving Egypt, caſt this metal into the form of a calf. As the Scripture declares expreſly, that the calf was firſt caſt, and afterwards improved by the graving-tool, two things may be inferred; either that a mold was made in the form of the animal abovementioned, and the melted gold poured into it; or that the metal was caſt in an unſhapen maſs, and afterwards wrought into the figure of a calf by the Sculptor's hand. III. Many writers think, that Aaron did not make a whole calf, but the head only. IV. It is related (3) That the aſhes of the golden calf which Moſes caus'd to be burnt and mixed with the water, that was drunk by the Iſraelites, ſtuck to the beards of ſuch as had fallen down before it, by which they appeared with gilt beards, as a peculiar mark to diſtinguiſh thoſe who had worſhipped the calf. This idle ſtory is interwoven with the 32d chapter of Exodus, in a French Bible printed at Paris, in 1538, by Anthony Bonnemere; who ſays thus in his preface: This French Bible was firſt printed in 1495, at the requeſt of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, Charles VIIIth; and afterwards reprinted with emendations. It declares further: That the French tranſlator has added nothing but the genuine truth, according to the expreſs terms of the Latin Bible; nor omitted any thing but what was improper to be tranſlated. So that we are to look upon this fiction of the gilded beards as matter of fact, and another of the ſame ſtamp, inſerted in the chapter above-mentioned, viz. that upon Hur's refuſing to make Gods for the Iſraelites, they ſpit upon him with ſo much fury and violence, that they quite ſuffocated him. The book (4) whence theſe particulars are extracted, was written by a Walloon Miniſter, who does not fail to exclaim againſt the audaciouſneſs of thoſe, who thus added or ſuppreſs'd as they pleaſed. A double crime this! an obreptitious and ſurreptitious verſion, interſpers'd with childiſh traditions! at the ſame time that the preface promiſes nothing but the genuine truth; and declares, that this tranſlation was not calculated for Clerks, but for the Laity, and for unlearned Monks and Hermits. Theſe aſſertions aggravate the infidelity of the tranſlator; for perſons of erudition may guard againſt the ſnare, which the ignorant cannot. * [The Bible abovementioned was tranſlated by Guiars des Moulins, Canon of Aire in Artois, in the year 1224, with ſeveral gloſſes or inſertions in the text, taken out of Petrus Comeſtor's Hiſtoria Scholaſtica. John de Reby, Confeſſor to King Charles VIII, and afterwards Biſhop of Angers, reviſed and corrected it by order of that Prince, and got it printed at Paris by Ant. Verard about the year 1487, and not 1495, as Jer. de Pours affirms. To a ſubſequent edition, printed by the ſaid Verard, was prefixed the Preface cited by de Pours. That Bible has been reprinted ſeveral times, with the ſaid Preface, before Bonnemere's edition of 1538. Le Long Bibliotheca Sacra. CRIT. REM.] To conclude, the ſtory of the golden beards is not the only fiction the Rabbis have palm'd upon the world. They tell us, that the water, impregnated with the particles of the golden calf, which Moſes forced them to ſwallow, had very near the ſame effect as the waters of jealouſy; for it made tumours and ulcers to break out on the guilty, but did not hurt the innocent (5).

[B] That the Golden Calf was only of gilded Wood.] 'Tis ſaid expreſly in the Scriptures (6) that it was a molten

(1) Cornel. à Lapide in Exod. pag. 605.

(2) Aſcemeli Taurum fudit, corporeum, emittentem mugitum. i. e. Aſcemeli caſt a corporeal bull that bellow'd. Azora xxx Latini Codicis, xx Arabici, apud Seldenum de Diis Syris, Synt. 1. Cap. IV. pag. 54.

(3) See Jeremiah de Pours' Divine Melodie, pag. 829.

(4) 'Tis entitled, La Divine Melodie du Saint Pſalmiſte, by Jeremie de Pours, and printed at Middleburgh, anno 1644, in 4°.

(5) See Salian, vol. 2. p. 165. Bocharti Hierozoïc. part 1. lib. 2. cap. 34.

(6) Exod. xxxii. 4.

We are not, I believe, to ſuppoſe that God ſuſpended the power of fire in favour of Aaron, as he did for the three Hebrew children who were caſt into the fiery furnace at Babylon; tho' this is the opinion of ſome Writers [C].

molten calf; and though they afterwards tell us (7), that Moſes burnt, and reduced it to powder, yet it does not neceſſarily follow, that this idol was formed of combuſtible materials; for it may ſignify, that Moſes melted down the gold again, and divided it into very minute particles, which being thrown into the water, became imperceptible, like thoſe which are ſaid to be found in the Tagus and Pactolus. So that Franciſcus Junius may be miſtaken when he obſerves, (8) Quamvis non tam exiſtimari poſſit Vitulus iſte totus ex auro fuiſſe conflatus, quam auri laminis tantummodo obductus, cætera ligneus, ut quem S. Literæ tradunt combuſtum, atque in cineres verſum. i. e. "But "we may rather believe, this calf was not wholly com- "poſed of ſolid gold, but of wood covered over with "thin plates of that metal; agreeable to what the "Scriptures declare, namely, that it was burnt to "aſhes." Franciſcus Junius had more reaſon to rank Aaron at the head of his catalogue of antient Sculptors, Architects, Painters, Statuaries, &c; a place this High-prieſt might juſtly claim by right of antiquity, had not the order of the alphabet given it him. This calls to my remembrance, what ſome writers aſſert, viz. that as Moſes had the art of making gold duſt, or calcining gold, he conſequently muſt have poſſeſt the greateſt ſecrets in chymiſtry. Several are of opinion, that Aaron only ordered the goldſmiths to caſt the golden calf, but did not concern himſelf with the work; and that Moſes did not command the Iſraelites to drink the gold duſt, but having thrown it into the brook, which was the only place they could drink at, 'twas therefore juſtly ſaid, that he made them ſwallow the idol they had worſhiped (9).

(7) Ibid. v. 20.

(8) In catalog. artificium, pag. 1.

(9) See Rivetus on Exod. xxxii. tom. 1. p. 1184.

[C] Though this is the opinion of ſome Writers.] Father Nodin a Franciſcan Friar, and Doctor of Divinity of the faculty of Paris, aſſerts, that the miracle of the burning buſh at Horeb, which remained unconſumed, though ſurrounded with flames (10), was repeated ſome time after, viz. when the fire killed the ſons of Aaron, without damaging their inward garments; and again, when Aaron ſtopt the plague which had carried off a great number of Iſraelites (11). Sicuti factum eſt, quando egreſſus ignis à Domino Nadab & Abiud ignem alienum & prophanum coram Domino offerentes devoravit, id eſt, interfecit: veſtibus & tunicis eorum lineis intactis remanentibus. Idem judicium eſt de Aarone ſummo ſacerdote, qui citiſſimè profectus eſt ad populum, quem ignis egreſſus à facie Domini interficiebat: ſtetitque illæſus inter mortuos ac viventes, licet eſſet in medio flammæ fulgentiſſimæ & flagrantiſſimæ, ſecundum Joſephum. Lib. IV. Antiquit. Cap. III. (12.) That is, "As it came to paſs, "when fire ſent from the Lord, devoured Nadab and "Abihu who were offering ſtrange and profane fire "before the Lord, without touching their coats or "linnen garments: And as it happened to Aaron the "high prieſt, when running out to the people, whom "fire ſtreaming from the face of the Lord was ſlaying, "he yet ſtood unhurt amidſt the living and the dead, "although ſurrounded with fiercely-blazing flames, as "Joſephus tells us, Book IV. Ch. 3. of his Antiquities." Nodin adds to this, among other examples, that of Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, who came unhurt out of the fiery furnace. The reader will take particular notice, that this Friar does not quote the Scriptures, but Joſephus, for thoſe particulars which relate to Aaron; and that the Scripture (13) does not inform us, whether the plague that had ſwept away 14700 perſons, and which Aaron ſtopt, was a miraculous fire, or ſome other thing. The Jewiſh Hiſtorian has ſuppreſs'd this miracle, and mentions only the fire which conſumed the two hundred and fifty men who were offering incenſe. The Scriptures ſpeak of it alſo (14), but as an incident that preceded the havock which Aaron ſtopt. Note, that Joſephus obſerves only this, that the miraculous fire which conſumed Korah and the two hundred and fifty men, did not hurt Aaron; but does not mention any of thoſe circumſtances, for which Nodin calls on his teſtimony. Here follows his own words: Ἀφ' οὗ πάντες, οἵ τε διακόσιοι καὶ οἱ πεντήκοντα καὶ Κορῆς, ἅιξαντος ἐπ' αὐτούς, ἐφθάρησαν ὡς καὶ τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν ἀφανῆ γεγονέναι· περισώζεται δὲ μόνος Ἀαρὼν μηδὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ πυρὸς βλαβείς, τῷ τὸν θεὸν εἶναι τὸν οὐς ἔθελ καιειν ἀπείργοντα (15). "By the force and violence of which "(fire) the two hundred and fifty men, together with "Korah, were ſo effectually conſumed, that not the "leaſt remains of their bodies could be found; Aaron "only continued unhurt, as a manifeſt ſign that this "fire came from God." Joſephus juſtly acknowledges the finger of God on this occaſion; but does not ſpecify whether the fire immediately touched Aaron's body, or that God only prevented his going near to it. Father Nodin ſhould not therefore have deſcended from generals to particulars, nor have cited the Jewiſh Hiſtorian to this purpoſe. Moſt faults of this kind, of which there are innumerable in books, are owing, either to authors not conſulting Originals, or to their preſumption in diſguiſing them by paraphraſes, the better to adapt them to their own hypotheſes.

(10) Exod. iii. 2.

(11) Levitic. x. 2. & 5.

(12) Joan. Nodin. Commentar. in Exod. iii. pag. 142. col. 2.

(13) Num. xvi. 46. & ſeq.

(14) Ibid. xvi. 35.

(15) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. iv. cap. 3. pag. 107, G.

☞AARON, whoſe name ſignifies a Mountain, or a ſtrong Mountain, the firſt High-Prieſt of the Jews, was by the father's ſide great-grandſon, and by the mother's grandſon of Levi; for his father Amram, the ſon of Cohath, the ſon of Levi, married Jochebed his aunt who was the ſiſter of Cohath, and daughter of Levi. (Exod. vi. 20. Num. xxvi. 59.) He was born in Egypt three years before Moſes, eighty three years before the children of Iſrael went out of that Land, A. M. 2430, of the Julian Period 3140, before Chriſt 1574. He married Eliſabeth daughter of Amminadab, and ſiſter to Nahſhon, of the tribe of Judah. God having choſen Moſes to deliver the Iſraelites from the bondage of Egypt, made choice of Aaron to addreſs Pharaoh, becauſe Moſes having an impediment in his ſpeech, could not ſo well expreſs himſelf. Aaron, by God's command, met Moſes at the foot of Mount Horeb, and they went together into Egypt, to deliver the children of Iſrael. Aaron always accompanied his brother, and ſpoke in his ſtead, either to the People or to the King. The firſt prodigies were perform'd by his Rod; it was changed into a Serpent; turn'd the waters into blood; fill'd the land of Egypt with frogs, and cover'd it afterwards with gnats. In a word, Aaron had a great ſhare in all that Moſes did to deliver the Iſraelites; the Scripture calls him the Prophet of Moſes; and he perform'd the ſame function after the People had paſſed over the Red Sea. He gathered the Manna into a veſſel, which was afterwards depoſited in the Tabernacle. He ſupported, together with Hur, the hands of Moſes, whilſt Joſhua was fighting againſt the Amalekites; he aſcended Mount Sinai with two of his ſons, Nadab and Abihu, and with ſeventy Elders of the People: but neither he nor they went up higher than half way the Mount, from whence they ſaw the Glory of God; Moſes and Joſhua only went to the top, where they ſtay'd forty Days. During their Abſence, Aaron, overcome by the People's eager intreaties, ſet up the Golden Calf, which the Iſraelites worſhipped by his conſent. Moſes being returned, upbraided him for it; but Aaron pleaded the importunities of the people. All this happened in the third month after the Iſraelites were come out of Egypt. In the firſt month of the following year he was appointed High-prieſt by God, which function he executed during the time that the children of Iſrael continued in the wilderneſs. He died in the fortieth year after their departure from Egypt upon mount Hor, being then a hundred and twenty three years old, A. M. 2552, of the Julian period 3262, before the Chriſtian Æra 1452. With regard to the miracles performed by his rod, and the attempts of the Ægyptian magicians to imitate the ſame, we ſhall offer ſome remarks in the Note hereunder [A].

[A] We ſhall offer ſome remarks in the Note hereunder.] The Scriptures inform us, that when Aaron by Moſes's order, had caſt his rod upon the ground, it became a ſerpent; and when the Ægyptian magicians had ſucceeded in the ſame attempt, that Aaron's rod ſwallowed up all their rods. We find likewiſe that by means of their rods they produced frogs, and changed the water into blood; but their attempts to equal Moſes and Aaron in the other miracles of the ſwarms of lice, murrain upon the cattle, the plague of flies, &c. proved ineffectual, and they confeſſed that theſe were done by the finger of God; [אצבע אלהים הוא] Atsban Elohim Houa; This is the Finger of God (1). The Targum of Onkelos renders it, This plague comes from God; and the Arabic verſion expreſſes it, A ſign of this nature is of God. The names of the principal of theſe magicians were Jannes and Jambres, as we learn from St. Paul (2); and we find them celebrated both among heathen writers, as Pliny (3) and Numenius (4) inform us; and in the Jewiſh writings, who not only ſay they were Principes Præſtigiatorum, The chief of the Magicians, but alſo that they were the two ſons of Balaam. And Origen acquaints us (5), that there was a book written of them bearing this title, Jannes & Mambres Liber. Artapanus (6) calls them ἱερεῖς ὑπὲρ Μέμφιν, Prieſts of Memphis; and Numenius, the Pythagorean Philoſopher abovementioned, ſays that they were, Αἰγύπτιοι Ἱερογραμματεῦσι, inferior to none in magic ſkill; and therefore choſen by common conſent to oppoſe Muſæus (as the Heathens call Moſes) the leader of the Jews; whom he ſtiles ἀνδρὶ γνωμῶν Θεῷ ἐυξαδαι δυναμενώτατῳ, a man moſt powerful with God in prayer.

A very learned author (7) tells us, that the original of theſe magicians ſeems to have been this; that as God admitted the holy Patriarchs to a familiar intercourſe with him; ſo likewiſe the Devil kept men in obedience to him by pretending to diſcover ſecret things to them. And when God was pleaſed to work miracles to confirm the truth, the Devil directed the latter how to invoke him for the performance of ſtrange things, which confirmed them in their error.

With regard to the Enchantments, which they are ſaid to make uſe of, if the Hebrew word came from Lahat, a Flame (Gen. iii. 24.) it ſhews that they dazzled men's eyes, and impoſed upon them by falſe appearances. But it may be derived from Laat, hidden or ſecret; and ſo intimate to us, that they uſed ſecret whiſpers or murmurs, as enchanters did, who were familiar with Dæmons; and thus it is expounded in Gemara Sanhedrin (8).

A late learned and ingenious writer (9) has obliged the public with ſeveral very curious remarks upon this ſubject of the Egyptians Magicians ſucceeding in ſeveral of their attempts to work miracles. He is not of the opinion that theſe wonders could poſſibly be done by any or all the powers of nature; nor does he agree with ſome authors, who imagine there was not any real tranſmutation, but that they played their parts as juglers, pretending to do what they did not, or that ſome Dæmons aſſiſted them to deceive the ſight of the beholders. For with regard to their impoſing upon Pharaoh by artifice and pretence, this muſt inevitably have given Moſes and Aaron an opportunity of detecting their impoſture. And as to their being able to exhibit the appearances of ſerpents, frogs, and blood, when no ſuch things were really in being, either by themſelves, or the aſſiſtance of Dæmons; this ſuppoſes them to have performed wonders, of which we can give as little account as of a miracle. But the queſtion will recur: If they had no myſtical arts to perform theſe things, how came they to ſucceed in the attempts, which they made in oppoſition to Moſes? To this our author replies. 1. That we have no reaſon to think that the King knew that the works, which he employed them to perform, were within the reach of their art; but rather on the contrary, he ordered them to try to perform them, that he might know whether art could effect them or not, or whether they were true miracles. 2. That it does not appear from the Magicians here trying the experiments, and ſucceeding in them, that they thought at firſt their arts would be effectual; but they would try all experiments in order to judge further of the matter, and upon their attempting, God was pleaſed in ſome caſes to give an unexpected ſucceſs to their endeavours, in order to ſerve his purpoſes by it. For 3dly, their ſucceſs was certainly unexpected, as evidently appears by their not being able to follow Moſes in all his miracles. When they attempted to produce the lice, they could not do it. It is here evident the Magicians did not know the extent of their powers, if they can be conceived to have had any; for they attempted to equal Moſes in all his performances, but upon trial they found they could do ſome, whereas in others, tho' not a whit more difficult, they could not obtain any ſucceſs at all. Had they had any effectual rules of art or ſcience to work by, they would at firſt, without trial, have known what to attempt, and what not; but in truth, they had no arts to perform any thing of this ſort. In ſome inſtances God was pleaſed to give a ſucceſs, which they little expected, to their endeavours, and which they were ſo far from reſting ſatisfied with, that they took the firſt opportunity, which was given them, when their attempts failed, to acknowledge that Moſes was certainly aſſiſted by the Divine Power.

(1) Exod. viii. 19.

(2) 2 Tim. iii. 8.

(3) L. 30. c. 1.

(4) Apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evangel. l. 9. c. 8.

(5) Tractat. 35. in Matth.

(6) In Euſeb.

(7) Biſhop Patrick in Exod.

(8) Cap. 7. n. 10.

(9) Mr. Shuckford, Connection of the Sacred and Prophane Hiſtory, Vol. 2. Book 9. p. 411, & ſeq. 2d Edit.

☞ AARON (Isaac) a Greek, was made priſoner at Corinth, when that city was taken by Roger King of Sicily, about Anno Dom. 1148, and carried into Italy, where he ſoon learn'd the language of that country, and afterwards ſerv'd as interpreter to the Emperor Emanuel Comnenus. His calumny occaſion'd the diſgrace of Alexis, a nobleman of the Empire, who had marry'd Emanuel's niece. However, this perfidy was not long unpuniſh'd, he being ſoon after convicted of practiſing Magic and Sorcery; a book aſcrib'd to Solomon, for the invocation of evil ſpirits, and a kind of tortoiſe, the image of a man, having irons on his feet, and his ſtomach pierc'd with a nail, were likewiſe found in his poſſeſſion: yet theſe crimes, how heinous ſoever, would ſcarce have loſt him the Emperor's favour, who himſelf was very fond of Soothſaying, had he not betray'd that Prince's intereſt, at the ſame time that, in his preſence, he interpreted his will to the Embaſſadors of the weſtern nations; and for this his eyes were put out. But his miſerable condition could not ſuppreſs his ſtrong propenſion to miſchief; for he inſinuated to Andronicus Comnenus, who had uſurped the government, that his enemies ought to be depriv'd not only of their eyes, but of their tongues alſo. But the conſequence of ſo wicked and barbarous a counſel ſoon prov'd fatal to himſelf: for Iſaac, ſirnam'd the Angel, drove Andronicus from the throne, and commanded Aaron's tongue to be cut out. See Nicetas, Hiſt. Manuel. Comnen. lib. 4.

☞AARON HARISCON, a learned Rabbi and a Caraite, wrote an Hebrew Grammar, entitled Chelil Tophi, that is, exceeding fine, or excelling in beauty. This Grammar was printed at Conſtantinople in 1581. Some authors believe this Aaron to be the ſame with Aaron the Caraite, who wrote a Commentary on the five books of Moſes, which is lodg'd in the King of France's Library, and in that of the Fathers of the Oratory at Paris. F. Morin Exercit. Bibl. M. Simon Hiſt. Crit.

" AARSENS (FRANCIS) Lord of Somelsdyck and Spyck &c. was one of the greateſt " Miniſters for negotiations the United Provinces could ever boaſt [A]. His father, " who alſo was a man of great abilities, enjoyed ſuch a poſt, as gave him an eaſy op- " portunity of providing an employment for his ſon [B]. John Olden-Barnevelt, who at " that time preſided over the affairs of Holland and all the United Provinces, ſent him " Agent into France. There he learnt to negotiate under thoſe profound Politicians, Henry " IV. Villeroy, Roſny, Silleri, Jeannin &c. and ſucceeded ſo well as to gain their applauſe. " He afterwards was inveſted with the character of Embaſſador, being the firſt who was " conſidered as ſuch at the French court, at the time when Henry IV. declared, that " the Embaſſador of the United Provinces ſhould immediately follow that of Venice. " He was afterwards deputed to the latter Republic [C], and to ſeveral German and " Italian Princes, upon occaſion of the troubles in Bohemia [D]. Beſides this, he " was [A] Was one of the greateſt Miniſters for negotiations.] This his enemies confeſs; for when they declare, (1) That he was the moſt dangerous ſpirit the United Provinces ever gave birth to, and was the more to be dreaded, as he concealed all the malice and knavery of foreign courts, under the falſe and deceitful appearance of the Dutch frankneſs and ſimplicity; that he was vehement and perſuaſive; could raiſe arguments to ſupport the worſt cauſes; had (2) an intriguing genius; and had held a private correſpondence with ſeveral great men of France, whoſe actions were not only ſuſpected by, but odious to the King; and that having bribed the French Embaſſador's Secretary at the Hague, he got intelligence (3) of the moſt private deſigns of the Miniſters of that Crown: When, I ſay, they allow him theſe qualifications, they deſcribe him as a man infinitely capable of managing the moſt delicate negotiations and the moſt important embaſſies. By the way, du Maurier who inveighs ſo bitterly againſt this Stateſman, lets us into ſome circumſtances, which prevent our being prejudiced by his invectives; for he himſelf acquaints us, that his father and this Dutch Embaſſador, had always been enemies (4); that there was an antipathy in their tempers, which nothing could reconcile; and that their ſtrong, reciprocal averſion was ever increaſing. He even informs us, that on the 13th of Nov. 1613, his father made a ſpeech againſt Francis Aarſens, before the States General (5), in which he reproached him, with ſpeaking irreverently of their Majeſties and the members of their council, who, he ſaid, were the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the liberty of the United Provinces; and accuſed him of audaciouſneſs, of uſing indiſcreet expreſſions in his common diſcourſe, and of ingratitude; repaying with inſolence all the kind offices which France had indulged him. Here are antidotes ſufficient. 'Tis well known that large allowances are to be made, when a man is writing againſt his adverſary.

(1) Du Maurier's Memoirs, p. 376.

(2) Ibid. p. 378.

(3) Ibid. p. 384.

(4) Ibid. p. 388.

(5) Ibid. p. 381.

[B] His father .... enjoyed ſuch a poſt, as gave him an eaſy opportunity of providing an employment for his ſon.] His name was (6) Cornelius Aarſens, Regiſter of the States. Having known Mr. du Pleſſis Mornay at the court of William Prince of Orange, he deſired that great Man to let his ſon attend him, which he did; and young Aarſens continued ſome years with him. This gentleman underſtanding the French tongue, and the affairs of the kingdom, ſucceeded in 1598 to Levin Calüard, who died in the poſt of Reſident for the United Provinces at the court of Henry IV. Aarſens was the States Reſident till the year 1609; but a truce for twelve years having been agreed upon, in which Spain had treated with the United Provinces as a free people, he was recogniz'd Embaſſador by Henry IV. (7). During his fifteen years abode in France, he received great favours and even honours from the King, being ennobled and created a Knight and Baron; and for this reaſon was afterwards received among the Nobles of the Province of Holland. He afterwards became ſo odious to the French court, that if du Maurier is to be credited, they wanted to have him recall'd. See the Note [D] hereunder.

(6) Ibid. p. 377, 378.

(7) Ibid.

(8) See the Preface to the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, tranſlated by Amelot de la Houſſaye.

[C] To the latter Republic.] 'Tis to this period we muſt apply what Cardinal Pallavicino reproaches Father Paul with. He ſays (8), That he has a letter by him of the Sieur de Zuilichem Secretary to the Prince of Orange, in which he declares, that happening to be preſent in Venice at an accidental interview of the Sieur de Sommerdick the Dutch Embaſſador, and Father Paul; the latter complimented this Miniſter with ſaying, that he was overjoyed to ſee the Repreſentative of a Commonwealth, which looked upon the Pope as the true Antichriſt. It appears by the fragments of ſome letters, which the author of Cancellaria Secreta Anhaltina has preſerved, that Francis Aarſens had credential letters given him, which impowered him to negotiate in his way to Venice, with the Proteſtant Cantons of Switzerland, and that he received great honours from theſe. This was a year after the Swiſs Miniſters had been deputed to the Synod of Dort. Gratias ſe imprimis egiſſe, quod civitates & oppida non catholica prædicantes ſuos anno PRÆTERLAPSO ad Synodum Dordracenſem dimiſerint (9). That is, " He very particularly thanked the Proteſtant cities " and towns for ſending their Divines to the Synod of " Dort THE YEAR BEFORE.

(9) Cancel. Anhalt. p. 151.

[D] Upon occaſion of the troubles in Bohemia.] This was in 1620; and it is to be obſerved, " (10) That " the King of France ordered the Duke of Angou- " leme, the Count of Bethune, and Abbé des Preaux, " his three Embaſſadors, not to receive viſits from " Mr. Aarſens, who was ſent by the United Provin- " ces to negotiate with ſome German and Italian " Princes, upon the ſame affairs of Bohemia, for " which the Embaſſadors of France had been depu- " ted. The order which was diſpatched to them, de- " clared, that it was not deſigned as an affront upon " the States, with whom the King deſired to continue " always in amity; but was wholly levell'd at Mr. " Aarſens, for his having acted in a manner incon- " ſiſtent with the ſervice and dignity of his Ma- " jeſty. Thoſe who have any idea of the affairs at " that time, muſt know, that it was becauſe Mr. " Aarſens had headed thoſe perſons, who, in 1619, " oppoſed the affair, which Boiſſiſe and du Maurier, " the French Embaſſadors, ſolicited very warmly at " the Hague by order of their Sovereign." To theſe words of Wicquefort, let us add a paſſage from du Maurier which clears them up. Anno 1618, ſays he, the King commanded Mr. De Boiſſiſe, to complain in his name to the States General, of a defamatory libel, written, ſigned, and publiſhed by Francis Aarſens; to the great ſcandal and diſhonour of the members of his Majeſty's council, for which no ſatisfaction could then be obtained (11). It is probable this complaint was grounded on the French council's having been accuſed of betraying the King, by favouring the deſigns of thoſe perſons in Holland, who were ſecretly endeavouring to reduce again this Commonwealth under the Spaniſh yoke; for if du Maurier is to be credited, the uſual topic of Mr. Aarſen's converſation, the perpetual ſubject of all his writings, and of the papers poſted up in every ſtreet, was, that the Barnevelt faction held a private intelligence with Spain, in order to deſtroy the Reformed Religion in the United Provinces, and extirpate their liberties at the ſame time. On this occaſion it may be ſaid, Se non è vero, è ben trovato, " (Whether this be true or " not, it was a good invention)" ſuch an artifice as this, muſt give us the higheſt idea of Mr. Aarſen's vaſt abilities.

(10) Wicquef. de l'Ambaſſ. tom. 1. p. 658.

(11) Du Maurier, p. 362.

" was ſeveral times Embaſſador extraordinary in France and England [E], of which " he has left very accurate and judicious Memoirs. 'Tis to be obſerv'd, that the va- " rious inſtructions which the States gave him, and all the credential letters he carried " in his laſt embaſſies, were drawn up by himſelf; whence we may conclude, that he " was the ableſt perſon in all that country, not only for conducting of negotiations, but " for inſtructing embaſſadors what to negotiate upon. And indeed he did honour to " the States in all his embaſſies, and to the character with which they inveſted him: " nor have his poſterity any reaſon to regret [F] the years he ſpent in the ſervice of " his country (a). He died in a very advanced age; his ſon who ſurviv'd him [G] was " reputed the wealthieſt man in Holland, and has ſince been very well known by the " name of Monſieur de Sommerdyck (b).

(a) Extracted from Wicquefort's treatiſe on Embaſſadors, vol. 2. p. 435, and 436.

(b) 'Tis thus pronounced though written Somelſdyck.

[E] Embaſſador extraordinary in France and England.] He bore that character in England in 1620 and 1641 (12). The firſt time he was the principal of the three Embaſſadors; and the ſecond, the laſt time. In this embaſſy his collegues were, the Lord de Bredrode as firſt Embaſſador, and Heemſvliet as third; and the marriage of Prince William, ſon to the Prince of Orange, was the ſubject of their embaſſy. Aarſens was Embaſſador extraordinary in France in 1624 (13). As Cardinal Richelieu had but juſt taken the adminiſtration into his hands, and did not know that his predeceſſors in it, had been diſſatisfied with this Embaſſador's conduct, he had a great regard for him; .... and knowing he was an able man, made uſe of him to ſerve his own ends. Aarſens was appointed to go either into France or England in 1628; but not being able to embark becauſe of the ice, he returned to the Hague. Some dogs happening to throw him down, his enemies looked upon it as an ill omen. Arſenius à canibus fortè occurſantibus in terram dejectus, Malevolis occaſionem præbuit ſiniſtra ipſi ominandi (14).

(12) Wicquefort on Embaſſad. vol. 1. pag. 650 and 750.

(13) Du Maurier pag. 386.

(14) Barlæus, Epiſt. 76. p. 217.

[F] Regret the years.] Du Maurier tells us, that Francis Aarſens left behind him an eſtate of an hundred thouſand livres per annum (15).

(15) Du Maurier pag. 377.

[G] His ſon who ſurvived him, was reputed the wealthieſt man in Holland,] He was governor of Nimeguen, and colonel of a regiment of horſe. He left two ſons, the eldeſt whereof, Francis Lord de la Plaate, was drowned in his paſſage from England to Holland, in 1659, after having ſpent eight years in viſiting ſeveral parts of Europe. Cornelius, his ſecond ſon, went by the name of Sommerdyck. He was firſt a colonel in the Dutch armies, and afterwards governor of Surinam, whoſe garriſon mutinying, he loſt his life in it, anno 1688. He married the eldeſt daughter of the Marquis of St. André Monbrun, who brought him ſeveral children; and this Lady died at the Hague in 1695, or thereabouts. He had ſeven ſiſters, three of whom were married to perſons of quality; but the other four carried their ſuperſtitious devotion to ſo great an exceſs, that they follow'd Mr. Labbadie a ſchiſmatical preacher, as though he had been an Apoſtle (19).

(16) See du Maurier's Memoirs, pag. 387, 390.

☞AARSENS, or rather AERSEN (PETER) a Painter, called in Italy and Flanders Pietro Lungo or Long Peter, becauſe of his ſtature, was born at Amſterdam in 1519, of parents who came from Purmerendt, at a little diſtance from that city. His father who was a ſtocking-maker and ſettled in Amſterdam intended to bring up his ſon to his own trade [A]; but his mother finding young Peter had an inclination to painting, would never conſent to it; and ſaid to her huſband, that though ſhe ſhould be forc'd to ſpin always for a livelihood, ſhe was abſolutely reſolved their ſon ſhould purſue the genius he had for painting, to which the good man, for peace ſake, at laſt conſented. Peter Aerſen's firſt maſter was Alart Claeſſer, one of the moſt eminent painters in Amſterdam; young Aerſen had a pretty bold, free pencil from the very beginning, ſo that he ſoon got reputation. In his ſeventeenth or eighteenth year he went to Boſſu in Hainault, (the Governor of Amſterdam having favoured him with letters) [B], purpoſely to view the pieces of various maſters. From thence he went to Antwerp, where he ſtudied under John Mandin a Walloon; married, and entered into the company of painters. Aerſen was particularly famous for repreſenting a Kitchen, with its furniture, and alſo eminent for all kinds of ſubjects, of which his altar pieces, and (a) others, are a proof. An Altar piece of his, viz. a Crucifix, in which an executioner breaking the legs of the thieves with an iron bar, &c. was particularly admired, was deſtroyed by the populace, to the prodigious regret of the artiſt [C] who died the ſecond of June 1585 (b),

(a) Baldinucci Notizie de' Profeſſori &c. tom. 1. p. 299. printed at Florence 1728.

[A] Intended to bring up his ſon to his own trade.] Peter Aerſens would, in all likelihood, have been as unſucceſsful with the Needle, as he was happy with the pencil. There is an elaſtic power, as it were, in all great Genius's; and theſe whenever forced from their natural bent, either return to it or break. Nature will always diſplay her ſelf on ſuch occaſions, and if theſe perſons are obliged either through the frowns of fortune, or ſome other cauſe, to apply themſelves to things they were not deſigned for, life to them is a burthen; and if not enabled to purſue their talent, they pine away with regret. No lover can be fonder of his miſtreſs than they are of their darling ſtudy. Their whole ſoul is fixed upon it, and all other occupations are taſteleſs and inſipid. The parents of Nanteuil, who afterwards was a very famous engraver, were averſe to his practiſing drawing, but the boy uſed to hide himſelf in a tree, and there follow his favourite exerciſe (1). There are many inſtances of ſuch a fondneſs for the arts in all polite countries.

(1) Reflexions Critiques ſur la Poëſie & la Peinture. Vol. 2. p. 17. Dutch edit. 1732.

[B] The Governor of Amſterdam having favoured him with letters.] He probably was a patron to our young artiſt, which muſt neceſſarily fire an imagination like his. To ſee himſelf, though born of mean parents, ſo much taken notice of by a conſiderable Magiſtrate, muſt raiſe it to a pitch it would otherwiſe, in all probability, never have ſoar'd to. The ſmiles of the Great cheriſh a Genius, as much as the warmth of the Sun does plants. When an excellent artiſt meets with favour, how greatly is his fancy invigorated! Wings ſeem to be added to it, and he flies with the boldneſs of an eagle:

Singing, ſhe mounts, her airy wings are ſtretch'd
Towards heav'n, as if from heav'n her note ſhe fetch'd. (2)

(2) Waller to the Queen, alluding to the Muſe.

On the contrary, if he is neglected his imagination droops; he finds himſelf oppreſſed as it were with a dead weight, and cannot produce any thing, at leaſt not worthy of himſelf. Nor is it ſufficient barely to reward a great Genius, but he muſt be recompenſed with diſtinction ... The Roman ſoldier would have deſpiſed the oak-crown, to obtain which he expoſed himſelf to the greateſt dangers, had it been partially beſtowed on the inglorious (3).

(3) Reflex. Critique ſur, &c. ibid pag. 74.

[C] An Altar piece of his ... was deſtroyed by the populace, to the prodigious regret of the artiſt.] This noble piece of painting in the time of the inſurrection anno 1566, being ſeized by the rabble, the Lady of 1585 (b), aged ſixty ſix years. He had a mean aſpect, ſo that had it not been for his pencil, little notice would have been taken of him, he always appearing in a very deſpicable habit [D]. He left three ſons who were painters and raiſed themſelves in the world. Baldinucci Notizie de' Profeſſori del Diſegno, &c.

(b) Baldinucci ſays that Aerſen died in 1563; but as he alſo ſays that our painter died aged 66, there muſt be an error in the date 1563: not to mention that Baldinucci ſays afterwards that Aerſen was living in 1566.

Sonneveldt in Alckmaer offered two hundred crowns for its redemption, as the furious Peaſants were bringing it out of the Church; but they trod it under foot, and tore it into a thouſand pieces. Aerſen was deeply afflicted to ſee moſt of his beſt paintings treated in this ignominious manner; and uſed often to bewail himſelf, when he conſidered that his Name would be deſtroyed, as it were, at the ſame time with his productions. Of this he made ſuch heavy complaints to the populace, that they often were going to murder him (4). What pain muſt it be to a great artiſt to ſee his compoſitions, for which he probably hoped to have his name tranſmitted with honour to lateſt poſterity, tore to pieces by the rabble! Such is the deſtruction which is made by the barbarous Vulgar: their ſacrilegious hands often deſtroy in a few hours, what a ſucceſſion of the greateſt genius's had been whole ages in producing.

(4) Baldinucci ibid p. 299.

[D] He always appearing in a very deſpicable habit.] Aerſen was ſo negligent in his dreſs, that people who uſed to go to his ſhop to beſpeak work, taking him for the colour-grinder, or one in as low a condition, would ask him where his maſter was (5).

(5) Baldinucci ibid p. 300.

☞AARTGEN, or rather AERTGEN, of Leyden, was born in that city in 1498. His father, who was a wool-comber, obliged his ſon to follow the ſame trade till he was eighteen; when young Aartgen having given ſeveral proofs that nature had form'd him for Deſigning, and not for the mean employment abovemention'd [A], he was taken from it, and plac'd with Cornelius Engelhechtz; by whoſe care, the force of his own genius, and maturity of years, he ſoon made a conſiderable progreſs in painting. Aertgen was very much eſteem'd by the painters of his time, and among others, by the celebrated Francis Floris, who having a great curioſity to ſee him, went to Leyden for that purpoſe [B]. Our painter never work'd on Mondays, always devoting to the bottle that day, which he and his diſciples ſpent merrily at the tavern. 'Twas likewiſe his cuſtom to ſtrole about the ſtreets in the darkeſt nights, playing on the German flute, which had like to have prov'd fatal to him, he being once very much wounded in the face, and twice in danger of being drown'd, in his nocturnal rambles. Aertgen loſt his life very unhappily in 1564 (a), being aged ſixty ſix years [C.]

(a) Baldinucci, Notiz. de' Profeſſ. Florence 1728. vol. 1. p. 349 & ſeq.

[A] That nature had form'd him for Deſigning.] The ingenious author of Reflexions critiques ſur la poëſie & la peinture, obſerves, that very few great artiſts in painting were ſons of painters (1). That the Genius of thoſe who are born to make a figure in the Arts and Sciences, viſits and takes them, as it were, from their fathers houſes, purpoſely to lead 'em to Parnaſſus (2). Roberval the famous Geometrician, when a child and keeping ſheep, us'd to draw mathematical figures on the ground with his crook, which pleas'd ſo much a gentleman who happen'd to obſerve the boy, that he took him from this humble way of life, and had him well educated (3).

(1) Vol. 2. p. 14. Dutch edit.

(2) Ibid. p. 15.

(3) Ibid. p. 17.

[B] Floris went to Leyden for that purpoſe.] He enquir'd for Aertgen's habitation, which was a little hovel, half ruin'd, and wretchedly ſituated near the city walls. Having found it, Aertgen was not at home, when Floris deſir'd the diſciples to ſhew him the room where their maſter painted, ſaying that he was come a great way to ſee his works. Accordingly they conducted him into an upper apartment, which was very mean. Floris view'd the paintings, and taking up a piece of charcoal, he ſketch'd on the wall, as large as it would admit, a St. Luke, with the ox's head and the painter's arms, and went away. Aertgen being return'd, and hearing that an unknown ſtranger had been there, he flew to the draught, and at firſt ſight cry'd, This ſketch is ſo beautiful, that it muſt be Floris's. Our painter being very modeſt, and entertaining a mean opinion of himſelf, was confounded to think that ſo celebrated an artiſt ſhould come to viſit him. Floris ſent for him, and being together, the latter ſtrongly ſolicited his brother painter to go with him to Antwerp; promiſing that he ſhould be richly rewarded for his labour, and not in the trifling manner, to the great ſcandal of himſelf and the profeſſion, he was at Leyden. Aertgen gave him many thanks, but declar'd, that he found more ſweets in his poverty, than others did in the greateſt riches. Floris hearing this, went away very much diſſatisfied (4).

(4) Baldinucci, ut ſup. p. 350, 351.

[C] Loſt his life very unhappily, &c.] Coming home late one very dark night, he had occaſion to eaſe himſelf, and pulling off part of his clothes for that purpoſe, he laid 'em on a wall, and went at ſome diſtance; but returning to take 'em, he miſtook the way, and fell into the water, where he was drown'd (5.)

(5) Ibid. p. 351.

L

☞ABADDON is the name which St. John in his Revelations (a) gives to the King of the Locuſt, the Angel of the bottomleſs pit. The inſpired writer ſays, this word is Hebrew, and in Greek ſignifies Ἀπολλύων, i. e. a Deſtroyer. That Angel-King is thought to be Satan or the Devil [A]; but the reader perhaps will be better pleas'd with Mr. le Clerc's opinion concerning Abaddon. He thinks (b) with Dr. Hammond, that by the Locuſt, which came out of the Abyſs, may be underſtood the zealots and robbers, who prompted by the Devil [B], miſerably afflicted the land of Judea, and laid it in a manner waſte, before Jeruſalem was taken by the Romans. Abaddon, the King

(a) Ch. ix. v. 11.

(b) Ham. on Rev. ix. and le Clerc's Suppl.

[A] Is thought to be Satan or the Devil.] Moreri ſays it expreſly, and Dr. Hammond agreeing with him in this, adds further, that this deſtroyer may be the Apollo of the Heathens, becauſe Apollo was their Vejovis or unpropitious God, and was ſuppoſed to be armed with a bow and arrows (1): but this opinion is juſtly exploded by Mr. le Clerc, as being grounded only on the near affinity there is, between the words Ἀπολλύων and Apollo: beſides, it does not appear that the Jews ever worſhiped the Roman Deities. I muſt obſerve by the way, that Mr. Le Clerc himſelf is guilty here of a miſtake, when he ſays, that John of Giſchala was at the head of the Sicarii or Robbers; Joſephus only ſays (2), that this Incendiary acted as King over part of the Zealots.

(1) Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. L. V. c. 12.

(2) De Bel. Jud. lib. iv. cap. 7.

[B] Prompted by the Devil.] All evil actions men commit, the Divines generally lay to the charge of the Devil, as though he were always hovering over the heads of men, and laying baits to enſnare them. How this is conſiſtent with the Providence, Wiſdom and Goodneſs

King of the Locuſt, may be John of Giſchala, who having treacherouſly left that town, a little before it was ſurrendred to Titus (c), came to Jeruſalem, where he ſoon headed part of the Zealots, who acknowledged him as their King, whilſt the reſt would not ſubmit to him (d). This ſubdiviſion of the Zealot-party brought a thouſand calamities on the Jews.

(c) Joſeph. de bel. Jud. lib. iv. cap. 2. Havercamp.
(d) Id. ib. c. vii.

Goodneſs of God, we ſhall not determine; but we would offer to the conſideration of Divines ſome paſſages of the New T. where it is ſaid, that Satan fell from Heaven (3), that Angels, which kept not their firſt eſtate, are reſerved in everlaſting chains, under darkneſs unto the judgment of the great day (4): methinks one may infer from theſe and the like texts, that the Devil has not now the leaſt power in this world; and that if man is tempted, it is, when he is drawn away and inticed by his own luſt (5).

(3) Luc. x. 18.
(4) Ep. Jud. ver. 6.
(5) James i. 14.

ABA (or rather ABAU) HANIFAH ſirnamed Al-Nooman [A] was the ſon of Thabet and born at Coufah [B] in the 80th year of the Hegira; this is the moſt celebrated Doctor of the orthodox Muſſulmans, and his ſect holds the principal eſteem among the four which they indifferently follow. Notwithſtanding this he was not very well eſteemed during his life, inſomuch that the Khaliff Almanſor [C] cauſed him to be impriſoned at Bagdat, [D] for having refuſed to ſubſcribe to the opinion of abſolute Predeſtination, which the Muſſulmans call Cadha. But afterwards Abou Joſeph who was the Sovereign Judge or Chancellor of the Empire under the Khaliff Hadi [E] brought his doctrine into ſuch credit that it became a prevailing opinion, that to be a good Muſſulman was to be a Hanifite. He died in the 150th year of the Hegira in the priſon of Bagdat aforeſaid. And it was not till 335 years after his death that Melick Schah, a Sultan of the Selgiucidan race built for him a magnificent monument in the ſame city, whereto he adjoined a college peculiarly appropriated to ſuch as made a profeſſion of this ſect. This was in the 485th year of the Hegira, and Anno Chriſti 1092.

Herbelot p. 21.

The principal works compoſed by this Doctor are, the Meſuad, i. e. the Foundation or Support, wherein he has eſtabliſhed all the points of the Muſſulman faith by the authority of the * Alcoran, and the Sonnah or Tradition. He alſo writ a Treatiſe entitled, Filkelam, i. e. of Scholaſtick Divinity, and a Catechiſm or Inſtitution of Religion, entitled, Moallem, i. e. the Maſter or Inſtructor; wherein he has aſſerted, That a believer who perſeveres in the faith, cannot be an enemy to, or hated of God, although he falls into divers ſins; that the commiſſion of ſins doth not (in ſuch) deſtroy the grace of faith; and that God's grace is not incompatible with the commiſſion of ſin. Theſe and

* or Khoran.

[A] Al-Noman or Nooman was originally the name of a King who firſt introduced the Tulip or Anemony, a flower appearing early in the ſpring, into Arabia; and thence the word. 'Tis ſaid that name was given at firſt to that flower, and hence our Abu-Hanifah ſeems to be ſo named from his being one of the firſt Doctors of the Muſſulman law.

[B] Coufah.] A city of Chaldea (or the Babylonian Irack) ſituated on the right ſide or nether border of the river Euphrates; its longitude, according to the Arabians, is 79 degrees 26 minutes, or as our calculation is 69 degrees; and hath 31 degrees 30 minutes of north latitude, and diſtant from Bagdat about four days journey.

Khondemir in the life of Omar the ſecond Khaliff of the Muſſulmans writes, that in the 17th year of the Hegira, Saad the ſon of Abu-vacaz, after he had gained the battle of Cadeſia, took the royal city Madain and conquered the whole Empire of Perſia. Afterwards writing to Omar he tells him, that his Arabians could not bear the cold air of the city Madain, and deſired leave to build another city for them, which being granted he raiſed this city, the houſes of which conſiſting at firſt of joiſts and planks covered with earth was called Couſah, that word in Arabic ſignifying ſuch materials; and the ſame thing is ſaid in the Tarik Glafari.

(1) Herbelot, p. 277.
(2) Gol. ad Alfarganum. 125.

But others (1) derive the name from the hills of red ſand wherewith the plains near it are overſpread, and yet Golius (2) in his notes on Alfarganus ſays it had its name from the Rotunditates, either of its walls or of the mount that is in the midſt of the city; and that it was built ſoon after Batra by the Arabians, who built theſe and divers other cities in the beginning of their Empire, on the banks of both the Tigris and Euphrates, in order to ſubdue the Perſians.

Yet notwithſtanding this the Perſians ſay, and perhaps truly, that it was King Houſchenk one of their firſt Dynaſtæ named Piſchdarieus who built the city. But whoever founded it, 'tis certain that Abul Abbas Saffah, the firſt Khaliff of the race of the Abbaſſides made it at firſt his ſeat royal and the capital of his Empire; yet he afterwards left it and reſided at Aubat, and after left Aubat to reſide at Haſchemiah, which he himſelf had built.

But Couſah lies now in ruins, and is not conſiderable for any thing but only for the ſepulchre of Ali which is near it, and which the Schites his followers viſit with great devotion.

The Muſſulmans have a tradition that Noah embarked with his family &c. in the Ark at Couſah. And another, that the Serpent which beguiled Eve was baniſhed thither; but the occaſion of this latter was becauſe of the quarelſom and ſeditious, as well as crafty nature of the inhabitants (i. e. ſons of the ſerpent.) To this purpoſe the hiſtory of the Abbaſſides hath the following ſtory.

The inhabitants of Couſah being naturally difficult to pleaſe and of a tumultuous diſpoſition, were conſtantly complaining of their governors, and one day came to the tribunal of the Khaliff Ali Mamon with complaints againſt one of his officers, whom they charged with being no Muſſulman, but either a very Devil or one of the Devil's attendants. The Khaliff obſerving the impertinence of the charge, and that it conſiſted of nothing in particular, began to take his officer's part, and commended him, for having in the exerciſe of his office always behaved with juſtice, honeſty and integrity. Whereupon one who was ſpeaker for the Couſites replied, That what he ſaid, was indeed true, and that all they had ſaid againſt his officer was mere calumny; but, ſays he, as juſtice is due to every body, it was not juſt that the Couſites only ſhould have the happineſs of having ſo good and juſt an officer, and thereby deprive the other provinces of the Empire of ſo great and invaluable a bleſſing; and therefore we intreat your Majeſty, that you would ſend him to govern ſome other of your Provinces, that he may be equally a bleſſing to them as he has been to us.

[C] Almanſor.] See the article ABBASSIDES.

[D] Bagdat.] See the article ABAKA-KHAN. But a more ample and exact deſcription of this city may be ſeen in the annotations of Geor. Gentius to the Roſarium Politicum, pag. 581, where 'tis ſaid to be two days journey from Old Babylon, &c.

[E] Khaliff Hadi.] He was the 14th Khaliff of the race of the Abbaſſides, and grandſon of Almanſor. See hereafter.

and ſome other like propoſitions occaſion'd one Vazai to write a book againſt him entitled, Ebtelaf abi Hanifah, i. e. the Contradictions of Abou Hanifah.

But many illuſtrious Doctors have written the life of Abou Hanifah with high Eulogiums, and Zamakh Schari, Corderi, Marghinani, Deinouri, Sobahazmouni and Ebu Chalikan are of that number. Some have found his name in the Old Teſtament, and alledge, that he was foretold in thoſe Sacred Writings, as alſo by their own Prophet. All their hiſtorians agree, that he was greatly eminent not only in the knowledge but alſo in the practice of the Muſſulman law, for his life was very auſtere and abſtracted from the things of this world; and 'tis he whom they generally eſteem as the firſt chief Doctor or prime Imam of their law, and none but the Schütes or followers of Ali (of which ſect the Perſians generally are) reject this opinion.

Abou Hanifah, as is ſaid before, was a native of Coufah, and one Malek, who was head of another ſect was a native of Medina. Theſe two being once in familiar diſcourſe, Malek reflecting on the other's native place urged, that Ali ſpeaking of the inhabitants of Coufah, ſaid, they were turbulent and ſeditious; yes (ſays Abou Hanifah immediately) but the Khoran itſelf has charged thoſe of Medina with being hypocrites in religion, rightly inferring that this latter was much the greater crime. Lama gives us this little piece of raillery between theſe two great Doctors in his book entitled, Deſter Lathaif. cap. 1.

The author of Rabilakbiat relates the opinion which our Doctor had of the Sonnah or Tradition, in his own words, as follows. As to thoſe things which we have received from God and his Prophet, we embrace them with an entire ſubmiſſion; and as to the things we have received from the companions or cotemporaries of the Prophet we ſelect only that which is the beſt; but as for the things taught by ſuch Doctors as have followed ſince, we look upon them as coming from men of like paſſions and miſtakes with our ſelves.

Houſſain-vaez in explaining that verſe in the chapter of Amram in the Alcoran, where God ſaith That he hath prepared Paradiſe for thoſe who reſtrain their anger and who pardon injuries [F], relates an act of Abou Hanifah highly worthy our notice, viz. This Doctor having cauſeleſsly received a malicious and violent blow on the face, ſpoke thus to him that ſtruck him. I could return you injury for the injury you have done me, but I will not. I could alſo inform againſt you to the Khaliff, but I'll not be an informer. I could in my prayers and addreſſes to God repreſent the outrage done me, but I will forbear that. In fine, I could at the day of judgment deſire God to revenge it, but far be it from me. Nay ſhould that terrible day arrive this very moment, and could my interceſſion then prevail, I would not deſire to enter Paradiſe without you. An amazing inſtance of a calm, ſerene and forgiving mind. What Chriſtian could ſay more than this man practis'd? One of their Poets writing upon that occaſion ſays thus:

Vain man! don't think true valour does conſiſt
In an intrepid rage or brutal force:
Dare to ſubdue thy paſſions, and forgive
Thine Enemies; this valour's truly great;
It conquers Heaven.——

The moſt eminent ſucceſſors of this Doctor were Ahmed Benali, Al Giaſſas, and Al Razi, who was the maſter of Naſſari; and there is a Moſque particularly appropriated to them in the Temple of Mecca.

(9) Roſar. Polit. Muſladini Sadi p. 39 and 41.

[F] Thoſe who reſtrain their anger &c.] Muſladin Sade in his Roſarium Politicum (3) has a piece of hiſtory to this effect, viz. A certain King had ordered one of his captive ſlaves to be put to death; the fellow ſeeing no hopes of life ſell a railing at and curſing the King. The King not underſtanding what he ſaid, asked one of his courtiers that ſtood by, who being a perſon of wit and good humour, and willing to ſave the man, replied, This wretch ſaith, Paradiſe is prepared for thoſe who moderate their anger, and pardon offenders, and ſo flies to the gate of your Majeſty's mercy. The King hearing this, remitted the puniſhment and gave the man his life. Whereupon another ill natured courtier who hated the former cried out, That it did not become men of their dignity to tell lies in the royal preſence, and turning to the King ſaid, Sir, I will tell you the truth. That wretch has uttered moſt bitter reproaches and curſes againſt your Majeſty, and that Lord has told you an egregious lye. The King knowing the ill nature of this latter and that he hated the former Lord, replied, It may be ſo, but his lye is more acceptable than thy truth, for he has thereby endeavoured to ſave a life, but thou ſtudieſt to deſtroy it; haſt thou not heard of that wiſe ſentence? Better is a lie that works a benefit, than a truth that cauſes miſchief, W.

ABAFFI, ſee APAFFI.

☞ABAKA KHAN, the name of the eighteenth Emperor of the Moguls, of the race of (Cingis or rather Genghis) Khan (a); which ſee hereafter. This Prince ſucceeded his father Holagou Khan in that Empire in the 663 year of the Hegira [A]; that is, in (a) Herbelot. Bibl. Oriental. pag. 1.

(1) Herb. 445.

[A] Hegira.] This word in Arabic (1) ſignifies properly a flight or deſertion; but it is here, and now almoſt wholly apply'd to the flight of Mahomet from Mecca to Medina, to avoid the rage and purſuit of his enemies: and 'tis from hence the Mahometans in general compute the number of their years. Of this flight ſee hereafter in the article MAHOMET. But it appears in their hiſtories, that there was another flight of divers of his diſciples to Negiaſchi King of the Abiſſines, with whom it is ſaid Mahomet held a correſpondence, which may give us light into the meaning of that treaty or compact ſaid to be made between Mahomet and the Chriſtians which is publiſhed at the end of the ſecond edition of Du Ryer's Turkiſh Grammar, printed at Paris anno 1633, and runs in this form.

" Mahomet

in the year of Chriſt 1264: and as ſoon as he was ſeated on the throne, ſent one of his

"Mahomet ſent by God to inſtruct mankind, and "to declare his divine miſſion in truth hath written "theſe things. That the cauſe of the Chriſtian Religion being aſſerted by God himſelf, may remain "in all parts of the world, both in the Eaſt and in "the Weſt, as well among inhabitants as ſtrangers, "near and remote, known and unknown; to all thoſe "people, I enjoin the preſent writing to be obſerved "as an inviolable league, and to be kept as a moſt "ſtrict rule for the determining of diſputes, and for "aſcertaining what is law and right. Therefore whoſoever he be, that is a profeſſor of the Muſulman "faith, that ſhall neglect to perform theſe things, or "ſhall violate what is contained in this treaty in the "manner of an infidel, or who ſhall any ways raſhly "tranſgreſs it, whether he be a Prince or other perſon "among the believers and Muſulmans, he violates the "law, he contemns the will and rejects the covenant "of God. And by this treaty to which I am bound "(as the Chriſtians have requeſted) that I in the "name of my ſelf and of all my followers, would "enter into a covenant of God with them on the "evidence and teſtimony of the Prophets, the Apoſtles "and Elect, and of their holy, faithful and bleſſed "anceſtors and poſterity: I ſay, by this treaty, co"venant, or compact (which I will have kept with "as great obedience as that of a Prophet or an Angel "ſent of God) I promiſe that I will protect and de"fend their Judges, Magiſtrates, &c. within my "provinces, with my forces, and preſerve them &c.

He then proceeds with theſe further covenants, viz.

"To protect them, i. e. the Chriſtians, from their "enemies, both in peace and war. To preſerve "their churches, oratories, monaſteries and places of "pilgrimage. To defend their religion and their pro"perties with as much care as thoſe of himſelf or his "Muſulmans. To take them into his protection againſt "all force, injury, and oppreſſion; and by himſelf and "followers to fight againſt all that oppoſe him or "them, for that being ſet over them it is his duty to "keep them from all adverſity, and to ſee that no "injury be done to them but what ſhall be done to "him and his. That he will remove the grievances "they ſuffer by contributions and impoſitions. So "that they ſhall pay nothing thereof but of their "own free will. And that none ſhall trouble or mo"leſt them on that account (for refuſing it). That "no Biſhop ſhall be forced from his Biſhoprick, or "Chriſtian from his Chriſtianity, nor Monk from "his Profeſſion, Pilgrim from his Pilgrimage, or Religious from his Monaſtery; nor ſhall any Church "&c. be deſtroyed, or converted to a Muſulman "Temple. For whoever does this, violates the co"venant of God, reſiſts his meſſenger, &c. That no "payment ſhall be impoſed on any Biſhop or Monk or "any Perſon (other than ſuch as are bound to pay a ſum "certain by tenure) without their own conſent; and "that the tax laid on rich merchants, fiſhers of pearls, "poſſeſſors of gold or ſilver mines, or of diamonds, "&c. ſhall not exceed twelve pennies yearly; and this "only to be paid by ſuch as dwell and reſide con"ſtantly in a place certain; for as to travellers and "ſtrangers and thoſe whoſe reſidence is uncertain, "they are to pay no tax or impoſition, except they "poſſeſs lands of inheritance. But they who are "lawfully bound to pay, for their lands, a tax to the "Emperor ſhall pay as the reſt do, and no more; "nor ſhall any thing be exacted from them beyond "their power and ability. In like manner he that is "to pay for his lands, houſes or revenues, ſhall not "be burthened above what is cuſtomary, nor ſhall "he pay a greater tribute than other tributaries of "the ſame condition. Theſe confederates (Chriſtians) "ſhall not be compelled to go to war on behalf of "the Muſulmans, either as ſoldiers or explorators: for "theſe confederates are not bound to warfare, and "our contract with them is, that they ſhall not be "compelled thereto; but rather that the Muſulmans "ſhall guard and protect them, &c. Nor ſhall they "be compelled againſt their will to ſupply us with "horſes or arms, but whoſoever does voluntarily do "ſo, it ſhall be eſteemed a benefit, and he ſhall be "compenſated. No Muſulman ſhall infeſt the Chriſtians, nor contend with them but only in doing "good offices; but ſhall entertain them with all hu"manity, and no way trouble or moleſt them where"ever he finds them. If any Chriſtian has committed "an involuntary crime, the duty of a Muſulman ſhall "be to afford him his aſſiſtance, to undertake (be "ſurety) for him, and compound for the cauſe of his "misfortune. He ſhall endeavour to redeem his life; "nor ſhall he deſert him in his diſtreſs, nor withdraw "his help; becauſe by a holy contract I have ſo co"venanted with them, that they and the Muſulmans "ſhall both ſuffer and enjoy among themſelves equally "alike, &c. ſo that theſe ſhall partake with them in "proſperity and adverſity. Let theſe (i. e. the Mu"ſulmans) alſo take care that they uſe no violence in "the affair of matrimony, nor therein force any pa"rent to give him his daughter; nor ſhall any be "moleſted for refuſing or oppoſing ſuch eſpouſals: "for marriage ought to be wholly free, and to de"pend on the Parties will and pleaſure. And if it "happens that any Chriſtian woman ſhall live with "a Muſulman, ſhe ſhall have the liberty of her Re"ligion; to wit, to be directed by her own teachers, "and taught the doctrines of her own faith without "impediment: nor ſhall he trouble her, or threaten "to divorce her, or even ſolicit her to change her "faith; and if he does, he ſhall be eſteem'd as one "that lightly regards the covenant of God, a rebel "to God's meſſenger, and a perjur'd perſon. And "when any Chriſtian being about to reſtore a church, "church yard, or any thing neceſſary for his religion, "hath need of the munificence or aid of the Muſul"mans to that end, they ought to contribute and aid "him to their power, without expecting any reward "or return as a debt; but let it be done freely, as "thereby acting in purſuance of the covenant of God. "Let no Muſulman force any Chriſtian to do any work "or thing againſt his will; for ſuch a one is a tyrant "and oppreſſor, and an enemy to the meſſenger of God.

"Theſe are the covenants of Mahomet the Meſſen"ger of God towards the Chriſtians; and the con"ditions, to the obſervance of which I bind their "faith and conſciences, are theſe: No Chriſtian ſhall "privately or openly aid, or conceal, or harbour any "Soldier who is an enemy of the Muſulmans; nor "ſhall any ſuch enemy be protected or receiv'd, or "permitted to remain in their houſes, churches, "lands, or territories; nor ſend any aid or forces "to take, keep, or defend any caſtles or forts againſt "the Muſulmans; nor ſupply them with arms, horſes, "&c. and if invaded by ſuch enemies, they ſhall re"tire to [redacted] place to fortify it, and fight in de"fence of their lives and their religion. They ſhall "not deny to any Muſulman on his march, &c. "food for him and his beaſt for three days, i. e. "ſuch food as they themſelves do eat; but if he "does not like that, they may refuſe, &c." And if "any Muſulman ſhall be forc'd to lie conceal'd in "their houſe, they ſhall endeavour to preſerve and "deliver him from his calamity, by concealing him, "and no way diſcovering him to the enemy, and "thereby perform an act of duty" &c. . . . And after ſome other clauſes, concludes thus. "The witneſſes "to theſe covenants made by Mahomet the meſſenger "of God with the Chriſtians, and which they are "enjoin'd to obſerve, were,

"Abu Becre aſſadik.
"Othman Ben Afan.
"Moavia Ben abi Sofcan.
"Abu Adrin.
"Abdalla Ben Maſaud.
"Hamza Ben Abdelmottaleb.
"Zaido Ben Thabet.
"Harfus Ben Zaid.
"Saad Ben Moad.
"Aſamet Ben Zaid.
"Abdalla Ben Omar alæas.
"Haſan Ben Thabet.
"Aben Ben Alabas.
"Zaido Ben Arcam.
"Daud Ben Giobair.
"Abu Ahrifa Ben Oſair.
"Omar Ben-jamin.
"Caab Ben Caab.
"Omar Ben alcatab.
"Ali Ben abi taleb.
"Abu-addarda.
"Abu Horain.
"Abdalla Ben-alabbas.
"Fodail.
"Abdalla Ben Zaid.
"Alzobair Ben-alaüam.

Salvo Tenemento ſuo.

his Brothers to reſide at Derbend or Derbent [B], on the Caſpian Sea; and another of them into Choraſan, or rather Khoraſcan [C], to hinder the (c) deſcendants of Zagathai or Giagathai, alſo a ſon of Cingiskan, who then reign'd in the northern parts of Aſia, from making an irruption into the heart of his empire. He then declar'd Soungiak or Sanziak Nouian General of his army, and his Vicegerent or Deputy throughout his Empire; and made Schamſeddin (d) Mohamed both Grand Vizir or Lord Chancellor, and the chief of his Council. Whereupon Schamſeddin made his own ſon Bohaedden Viſir of Iſpahan, and his brother Ala-eddin Athalmolk Vizir of Bagdat. During the reign of this Emperor, the Muſulmans enjoy'd a great repoſe; he repair'd the ruins of Bagdat, and reducing his Moguls or Soldiers to diſcipline and order, and all his ſubjects enjoy'd the fruits of his wiſdom and clemency. Schamſeddin carefully executed his charge, and Athalmolk promoted his Prince's deſigns within his juriſdiction of Bagdat; ſo that in a ſhort ſpace people flock'd to that city from all parts; which not only ſoon regain'd it the ſplendor and glory it had loſt by the ſaccage and ſpoil of Holagou, but even advanced it to be an academy of arts and learning. On the contrary, Bohaeddin, who was Vizir or Chief-Juſtice, and had the government of Iſpahan, was ſo far from imitating the conduct of Athalmolk, that he exercis'd his office with great ſeverity againſt the inhabitants, and often involved the innocent with the guilty in his ſentences: ſo that his raſhneſs and cruelty occaſioned a general complaint of the people againſt him, which coming to the ears of his father Schamſeddin, he often adviſ'd him to moderate his rigour, and to ſpare the blood of his people; which good advice wrought no change in his conduct. But the Divine Juſtice ſoon overtook him; for he died very young. In the beginning of Abaka's reign, Barcah Khan, one of the deſcendants of Zagathai, or Giagathai above-nam'd, endeavour'd to enter Perſia by the Streights of Mount Caucaſus, where Schamat the brother of Abaka, who was poſted at Derbent, diſputed the paſſage; and gaining the victory, forc'd him to retire in diſorder, in the 664th year of the Hegira. But this defeat only enraged that prince the more; ſo that he ſoon after brought an army into the field, conſiſting of three hundred thouſand Horſemen; which had more than threaten'd Perſia with an entire deſolation, had not Abaka march'd with all the forces of his Empire to oppoſe it. For Barcah Khan had march'd this army thro' the deſart plains on the north ſide of the Caſpian Sea, call'd Kapgiack, and had forc'd thoſe Streights between that Sea and Mount Caucaſus, called the Iron Gates, and was got as far as the banks of the river Kyr, or Cyrus. When Abaka arriv'd at Teflis, the capital of Gurgeſtan, or Georgia, the two armies were ready to engage, when King Barcah, happily for Perſia, was taken out of the world. He being dead, his army disbanded, and all the Giagathaian and Kapgiak Tartars returned home with them.

(c) Vide infr.

(d) Vide infr.

In the year of the Hegira 666, (which is 1267 with us Chriſtians) Borak Oglan, who alſo was of the ſaid race of Giagathai Khan, ſent to the court of Abaka a perſon nam'd Maſſoud-Beg, who pretended to come with a congratulatory compliment from his maſter, but had in reality no other deſign than to diſcover the ſtate of Abaka's affairs, and to obſerve by what ways he might beſt be attack'd: yet he could not make his obſervations ſo ſecretly, but that a Soldier perceiv'd it, and gave advice thereof to Schamſeddin, the Lord Preſident of Abaka's council. This cautious Miniſter receiv'd the advice without giving any umbrage to Maſſoud, who was receiv'd and treated with the higheſt civilities; and after ſome ſtay took leave of the court, in order to return to " Thabet Ben Cais.

" Othman Ben matun.
" Aben Rabiah.
" Giafer Ben-ahi-taleb.
" Talha Ben-abdalla.
" Saad Ben Abade.
" Sahal Ben Baida.
" Abu Alaalia,
" Haſchem Ben-aſſia.
" Caab Ben-Malec.

" May they all be the favourites of God.

" The Secretary hereof was Moavi-ben-abi Sofian, " a Soldier of the Meſſenger of God on Monday the " laſt of the fourth Month in the fourth year of the " Hegira, at Medina. May God reward all thoſe " who have atteſted this Writing. Glory to God " the Lord of the Creation.

Note, Herbelot, p. 30. cites a paſſage in the Alcoran, wherein Mahomed declares the Chriſtians of Arabia to be Believers of the true Faith; and it ſeems as if his doctrines were not repugnant to their Belief. See Maracci's Alcoran, p. 116, 132, 228, 704 and 793.

[B] Derbent.] A city ſeated at the foot of Mount Caucaſus adjoining to the Caſpian Sea, in Parthia or Perſia, but bordering on Georgia, and not far from the river Kur. 'Tis called by the Turks Demir (or Temir) capi, i. e. The Iron Gates; not that any iron gates are there, but by reaſon of the ſtrength and fortifications of the place; being formerly ſo ſtrong, and the paſſage there ſo ſtreight, as to have put a ſtop to the greateſt armies; but 'tis now in a declining condition, and the lower part of the city next the ſea is uninhabited. It it ſaid to have been firſt built by Alexander the Great, thereby to ſtop the paſſage of the Scythians and Tartars; but it ſeems to have been of greater antiquity, and to have its name Darabend from one of the Darius's Kings of Perſia. Its longitude is 80 d. 00, latitude 49 deg. 00.

[C] Khoraſſan] This is a Perſian word, compounded of Khor or Khour, which ſignifies the Sun, and Aſſan, a place inhabited, and is expounded a place full of inhabitants towards the ſun's riſing; the ſituation of this large Province being towards the Eaſt of Perſia, and bordering on the Weſt with the Perſian Irack, or Chaldea. Vide ſupra.

[D] Bagdat. This is ſtill the capital of the Babylonian Iraque, but not Babylon itſelf, nor near it, as ſome have imagined, this being ſituated on the Weſtern banks of the river Tigris, whereas that of Babylon is on both banks of the river Euphrates, and ſome miles diſtant. This city Bagdat was built by Almanſor Abugiafer the ſecond Khaliff of the Abbaſſides. (See Golius's Notes on Aſarganus's Elementa Aſtronomica, p. 121, 122. and Hiſtor. Sacr. Lib. 1. c. 3. alſo Herbel. in Artic. Bagdat.) Almanſor miſliking the city Couſah, which was built by his elder brother and predeceſſor Abu Suffa removed the people and ſoldiers hither, and made this the metropolis of his Empire. But this city ſoon extended on the other ſide of the river Tigris, being as it is ſaid about twelve miles in compaſs. Golius, ſupra, ſays, Bagdat is two days journey from Old Babylon.

[E] Iſpahan. See above and hereafter.

to his maſter King Borak, and inform him of what he had obſerv'd. He ſet out, and Schamſeddin caus'd him to be follow'd by ſome couriers: but Maſſoud was too quick for the purſuers, having had the precaution to appoint poſt-horſes to receive him at each ſtage of the road he took; whereby he eſcap'd the Vizir's deſigns: and Borak having got all the intelligence from him he wanted, ſoon diſpos'd of every thing ſo as to ſet on foot the project of invading Perſia, which he had for ſome time before form'd in his mind. Hereupon he rais'd a body of an hundred thouſand horſe, and having in the 667th year of the Hegira paſſed the river Amon or Gihon, he ſoon over-ran the large province of Khoraſan, where he found but a ſlender reſiſtance. But from thence entring into the Adherbigian, where Abaka kept his main forces, the Tartars were ſoon repuls'd, and in the following year the two armies fronted each other near Herat; where a fierce battle was fought, and victory having been long kept in ſuſpence, declar'd at length in favour of Abaka; who not only became maſter of the field of battel, but of all the baggage and ſpoil of his enemies. Borak after this defeat was obliged to repaſs the river Amon: and Abaka having left his brother Beuſchin with troops ſufficient to guard the Khoraſan, return'd into the province of Adherbigian. 'Twas alſo in this year that he ſent another of his brothers, named Mangou Timur, into Syria, to revenge the affronts and loſſes which the Moguls had ſuffer'd from the King of Egypt and Syria. To underſtand the grounds of which war, we are to know, that after the death of Malek Saleh the laſt King of Egypt of the Saladine family, Codouz, one of the Mamalucs or ſlaves of the deceas'd King, ſeiz'd on the Crown, caus'd himſelf to be proclaim'd King of Egypt and of Syria, and aſſum'd the title of Malek Modhaffer. Then Holagou, Emperor of the Moguls, and Father of our Abaka, after he had taken Bagdat, ſent one of his Generals, nam'd Kelt-Boga, againſt this Sultan Maleck, who defeated that General in a pitch'd battle; but did not long enjoy the fruits of his victory; for Bondocdar, another ſlave of the late King Saleh, having raiſed an army, defeated him, and ſtep'd into the throne. This new King, before he would engage in a war with the Moguls, was willing to be an eye-witneſs of the ſtate and condition of their forces. To which end, he, with three or four ſelect perſons paſs'd incognito thro' the Mogul's dominions on this ſide of the Euphrates: and being returned into Egypt, he, by way of gallantry, diſpatched a courier to Abaka, who had then newly ſucceeded on his father Holagou's death, to let him know, that having lately taken a tour, for his diverſion, through Abaka's dominions, he had left at a certain Inn a jewel of conſiderable value as a pledge for ſome expences he had been at; and deſiring Abaka as a friend to diſcharge theſe expences and return him his jewel, Abaka returned a civil anſwer, and ſent him his jewel by an expreſs, who alſo brought back very obliging letters from the Sultan. Thus affairs paſſed between theſe two Princes without any war during Bondoedar's reign, and alſo that of his ſon Malec-Saleh. But this laſt reigning only two years, Seifeddin Kelaoun ſirnamed Alfi ſucceeded him; and it was during the reign of this Prince, that Abaka ſent his brother Maugou Timur with a numerous army into Syria in the year of the Hegira 669. But he had no better ſucceſs on this occaſion than his father, for his forces were entirely defeated by the Egyptians and their General ſlain. Shortly after this defeat there happened great troubles in the court of Abaka, for a certain Lord named Magdelmark Jezdi having, in concert with ſome other Grandees, done ill offices to Schamſeddin by influencing the Prince againſt him, that great Miniſter loſt daily more and more of his authority, and ſoon after his brother Athalmolk was impriſoned and charged with having defrauded the Prince; and whilſt matters ſtood in this ſtate Abaka died ſuddenly at Hamadau in the year 689 (which was believed to have been haſtened by a potion given him by Schamſeddin.) He left a ſon named Argoun Khan which ſee hereafter. But was ſucceeded by his brother Ahmed Khan, which ſee alſo. This Abaka Khan reigned ſeventeen years, and is by ſome authors ſaid to have been a Chriſtian; and thus far it may be admitted, that he joined with the Chriſtians in keeping the feaſt of Eaſter in the city Hamadau ſome ſhort time before his death. But this does not prove his being a Chriſtian; it being common in thoſe times of brotherly love for Chriſtians and Mahometans to join together in keeping the ſame Feaſts, when each would complement the other with doing honour to his Feaſt.

He was poſſeſs'd of theſe great Provinces, viz.

Herbelot. 995.

1. The Khoraſſan, whoſe capital city was then Niſchiabar and hath ſucceſſively had four capitals, viz. Balkhe, Meru, Niſchiabar and Herat.
2. The Perſian Iraque, whereof the capital was Iſpahan.
3. The Arabick (or Babylonian) Iraque, of which the capital was Bagdat.
4. The Adherbigian or Media, of which Tauris was the metropolis.
5. The Province of Fars or Perſia properly ſo called, whereof the principal city was Schiraz, which ſome think to be the antient Perſepolis.
6. The Khuziſtan, or Suſiana, of which Schuſter (the antient Sufan) was the capital.
7. The Diarbekir or Meſopotamia, of which the metropolis was Muſſal or Moſul.
8. The Province of Rum or Aſia Minor, of which the capital was Conia or Iconium.

And yet all theſe were ſcarce the third part of Giagathai Khan's dominions, which alſo included all Tartary as well as that of the Mogul's &c. Arabia &c.

☞ABANTES. This people came originally from Thrace and ſettled in Phoceca a country of Greece, where they built a town which they called Aba, after the name of Abas their leader; and if we may credit ſome antient writers, the Abantes went afterwards into the Iſland Eubœa, now called Negroponto. Others ſay the Abantes of Eubœa came from Athens, and were ſo named from Abas one of their Kings. The Curetes, ancient inhabitants of the Iſle of Crete, who had ſettled at Phocea before the Abantes, uſed to let their hair grow only at the hind part of their head, ſhaving the fore part very cloſe, becauſe their anceſtors had formerly been ſlain by the enemies taking hold of their forelocks; and for that reaſon they were called Curetes, from the Greek word κυρὰ, which ſignifies Shaving. The Abantes followed the ſame cuſtom, from whence Homer calls them ὄπιθεν κομόωντας, that have hair only behind. This people ſent a colony into the Iſle of Chio, where only part of them could ſettle, the reſt having been cut off by Amphiclus, one of Hercules's deſcendants, who was King of that Iſland. The Abantes were a very warlike people, cloſing in with their enemies, and fighting hand to hand. Bochart obſerves that there is a near affinity between the words Abantes and Eubœa: for, ſays that learned author, Abas in Hebrew, ſignifies to fatten; whence the Phœnicians gave that name to thoſe who uſed to keep and fatten oxen, and other cattle, that is, to Shepherds, and ſuch were the people of whom we are ſpeaking; and the Iſland Eubœa is ſo called in Greek, becauſe of its excellent paſtures for oxen. Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 1. Plutarch. in Theſeo. Strabo l. 10. Pauſan. in Achaic. Stephan. de Urbibus. Euſtath. in Homer. Bochart in Canaan. lib. 1. cap. xiii.

ABARIS, a Scythian [A], and ſon of Scuthus. Such a number of fabulous particulars were told of him, that Herodotus himſelf ſeems to ſcruple to relate them, or to enquire particularly into his hiſtory. He tells us only (a), that this Barbarian was ſaid to have travell'd thro' the world with an arrow, and took no ſuſtenance. But this does not acquaint us with the marvellous of that incident; for ſuch as know it, inform us, that he rode thro' the Air on his arrow, as tho' it had been a Pegaſus [B]; by which means, neither ſeas, rivers, nor thoſe places which were inacceſſible to all other men, could retard his progreſs. Apollo had poſſeſs'd this arrow, and 'tis probable

(a) Herodot. lib. 4. cap. 36.

[A] A Scythian.] This Suidas tells us, who alſo declares in the moſt diſtinct terms, that he came out of Scythia into Greece; and flew with the arrow which Apollo gave him, from the laſt mentioned country into that of the Hyperborean Scythians. Τούτου ὁ μυθολογούμενος οἴστὸς τοῦ πετομένου ἀπὸ τῆς Ἑλλάδος μίσχει τῶν Ὑπερβορέων Σκυθῶν. Ἐδόθη δὲ αὐτῷ παρὰ τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος (1). Hujus illa Fabulis celebrata Sagitta volantis ex Græcia, (not ex Scythia as the common tranſlation has it) uſque ad Hyperboreos Scythas. Euſebius alſo ſays that he came out of Scythia into Greece (2). If the article of Abaris in Suidas was not pretty much confuſed, one might juſtly conclude from it, that the author has there pointed at three different countries, viz. Scythia where Abaris was born; Greece, which he viſited; and another Scythia, that of the Hyperboreans, whither he alſo travell'd. We likewiſe might infer from thence, that Abaris did not take his flight with the arrow till his ſecond journey; and conſequently that 'twas in Greece he received this ſhaft from Apollo. Theſe ſeveral inferences would be juſt, was the author in queſtion accurate; or were we ſure that his writings have been tranſmitted to us exactly as he left them. In this caſe we ſhould conclude, that Suidas has followed a very peculiar opinion; ſince moſt writers who mention Abaris, aſſert that he was an Hyperborean (3); that he came from the country of the Hyperboreans into Greece; and that all ſuch as take notice of his flying arrow, declare that he was poſſeſs'd of it before he went into Greece.

(1) Suidas under the word Ἀβαρις.

(2) Euſebii Chronic. n. 1454.

(3) Herodot. lib. 4. cap. 36. Diod. Sicul. lib. 3. cap. 11. Apollonii Admir. Hiſt. ſect. 4. Jamblichi Vita Pythag, cap. 28. p. 127 & ſeq. Harpocration, under the word Ἀβαρις. Scholiaſtes Ariſtoph. in Equit. Euſebius, n. 1568, &c.

[B] Was carried through the air on his arrow.] This Jamblicus expreſſes very clearly. Οἴσῳ τοῦ ἐν Ὑπερβορέοις Ἀπόλλωνος δωρηθέντι αὐτῷ ἐποχούμενος, ποταμούς τε καὶ πελάγη καὶ τὰ ἄβατα διέβαινεν ἀτροβατῶν τρόπόν τινα (4). Cum Apollinis, ejus qui ab Hyperboreis colebatur, Jaculo ſibi donato inequitaret, Fluvios & maria, ac loca inacceſſa per aerem quodammodo incedens permeabat. That is, "When he rode upon the "arrow which was given him by the Hyperborean "Apollo, he flew through the air, over rivers, ſeas, "and inacceſſible places." Mr. Petit ſpeaking of the ſeveral particulars which are told of this arrow, takes notice of what is vulgarly related concerning witches, viz. of their riding on a broomſtick (5) to their nocturnal meetings. A Journaliſt as he was drawing up an extract of Mr. Petit's book, called to mind Villon's verſes, where a wizard is called Chevaucheur d'Eſcouvettes (6) i. e. a broomſtick rider. I ſhall tranſcribe the whole paſſage for the ſake of a little obſervation that may be made on it. Mr. Petit mentions Elijah's tranſlation, Habakkuk's flight through the air, that of Pythagoras, and the dart which the Hyperborean Apollo preſented Abaris with. This was a wonderful dart, and very like the broomſticks on which, we are told, witches ride through the air to their nocturnal meetings (7). Before I make this little remark, it may be proper to copy the following paſſage from another Journal. Mr. Petit relates, after Jamblichus, the ſtory or fiction of the Hyperborean Abaris, whom Apollo had endued with the power of flying through the air on an arrow, in the ſame manner as our witches get aſtride upon their broomſticks, and poſt away to their nocturnal meetings (8). Theſe words illuſtrate the following of Mr. Petit: Auctor eſt Jamblichus, in vita Pythagoræ, cap. 28. id munus Abaridi Hyperboreo ab Apolline conceſſum fuiſſe, ut per aërem quocunque vellet curſum, magico invectus jaculo, tendere poſſet (9). i. e. "Jamblichus tells us in the "life of Pythagoras that * the Hyperborean Apollo, "inveſted Abaris with the power of flying through "the air on a magical arrow, whitherſoever he "pleaſed." 'Tis plain that the epithet Hyperboreo, may refer either to Abaridi or Apolline: the Latin tongue abounds with ſuch ambiguities; but it is manifeſt from the words of Jamblichus (10), which are here cited (11), that Apollo only is called the Hyperborean. 'Twould be idle to cenſure the Journaliſt upon this account, ſince, beſides that Abaris might have had this epithet given him, as was ſeen in the firſt Remark; Journaliſts, 'tis well known, are not obliged to tranſlate literally. I muſt not omit obſerving, that Abaris's arrow was of gold; and of ſo much ſervice to him in his journies, that he was forced to own, he never could have found his way without it (12). Pythagoras artfully extorted this confeſſion from him, by ſtealing his arrow; which put Abaris into ſuch a fright, that he was obliged, like a blind man who has loſt his ſtaff, to confeſs how greatly uſeful it was to him. This calls to my memory a ſett of people, who pretend to trace loſt roads by the aſſiſtance of their wand. If every thing be true that is related on this head, my opinion is, that all circumſtances conſidered, their wand muſt be full as miraculous as Abaris's arrow; for though the former cannot waft the poſſeſſor of it through the air, it yet has the virtue of diſcovering, not only treaſures, metals, land-marks, thieves and murtherers, but likewiſe the adulterous of both ſexes. A celebrated Philoſopher, whoſe opinion was asked in 1689, on part of the incidents abovementioned, declared, that nothing of this kind could be performed without the concurrent

(4) Jamblichi Vita Pythagoræ, p. 128.

(5) Petitus de Sibylla, lib. 2. cap. 7. p. 200.

(6) Non eſt, le deuſt-on vif bruſler
Comme un chevaucheur d'eſcouvettes.
Thus engliſh'd,
"Were they to "burn him as a
"Hag,
"He's none of
"thoſe, who of a
"broomſtick
"make a nag."

(7) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Oct. 1686. artic. I.

(8) Bibliotb. Univerſ. vol. 2. p. 132.

(9) Petit, ubi ſupra, p. 198.

* Or Apollo inveſted the Hyperborean Abaris, &c.

(10) Vide the Citation (4) above.

(11) Petit's Book, p. 199.

(12) Jamblichus, ubi ſupra, p. 131.

bable that he therewith ſlew the Cyclops, who forg'd the thunderbolts which Jupiter hurl'd at poor Æſculapius (b). Apollo, after this ſlaughter, hid his dart under a mountain in the country of the Hyperboreans, and recover'd it in a miraculous manner; for the winds wafted it to him the inſtant Jupiter was ſooth'd (c). 'Tis difficult to know the period in which Abaris liv'd [C]; and the great variety of opinions on this head has miſled ſome modern writers [D]. Authors ſeem not to vary ſo much with regard to the motive of his leaving his native-country, in order to travel all the world concurrent action of ſome intelligent cauſe, which cauſe, he ſaid, could be no other than the devil (13). I this moment heard, that the Chief of theſe wand-conjurers (14) having laſt ſummer (15) given ſome very ſurpriſing ſpecimens of his art at Lions, was ſent for to Paris; and in that great city made ſuch a multitude of diſcoveries, as obliged many people to confeſs, that we are now better enabled than ever to aſſert by indiſputable phænomena, that devils can produce an hundred things, provided they are determin'd thereto by the intervention of ſome occaſional cauſe, ſuch as the application of a certain ſtick or wand (16). This may enforce the belief of what is told concerning Abaris's dart; for ſince there is now a wand (that of James Aymar) which performs ſo many extraordinary feats, why may not there have been anciently ſuch a wonder-working dart as the abovementioned? One might enquire in a metaphyſical way, why this wand ſhould be endued with ſuch a magical virtue; for the old proverb, Virgula Divina, * le tour du baton, and that which our jugglers have perpetually in their mouths, viz. by the virtue of my little wand; are, I believe, all borrowed from the vulgar tradition of the frequent uſe of the wand in Sorcery. What mighty virtues were anciently aſcrib'd to Mercury's Wand! The golden wings which he fixed to his heels, did not wholly enable him to fly; his rod alſo aſſiſting him very powerfully in his airy progreſs; and one would even conclude that he rode upon it.

(b) Hygin. Aſtr. Poët. lib. 11. cap. 15. p. m. 386.
(c) Id. ib.

(13) Father Malbranche in the Mercure Galant of Jan. 1693.
(14) James Aymar, a peaſant of St. Veran in Dauphiné.
(15) in 1692.

(16) See the Note [C] hereunder.

* The figurative ſignification of this phraſe is, the getting money artfully, above what is one's due.

Et primum pedibus talaria nectit
Aurea, quæ ſublimem alis, ſive æquora ſuprà
Seu terram, rapido pariter cum flamine portant.
Tum virgam capit: hac animas ille evocat orco
Pallentes, alias ſub triſtia Tartara mittit,
Dat ſomnos, adimitque, & lumina morte reſignat.
Illa Fretus, agit ventos, et turbida tranat
Nubila (17).

With golden pinions binds
His flying feet, and mounts the weſtern winds:
And whether o'er the ſeas or earth he flies,
With rapid force they bear him down the ſkies.
But firſt he graſps within his awful hand
The mark of ſovereign power, his magic wand:
With this he draws the ghoſts from hollow graves,
With this he drives 'em down the Stygian waves;
With this he ſeals in ſleep the wakeful ſight,
And eyes, tho' cloſ'd in death, reſtores to light.
Thus arm'd, the God begins his airy race,
And drives the racking clouds along the liquid ſpace.
Dryd. Vir.

(17) Virg. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 239. See alſo Homer's Iliad, and the Odyſſey, book the laſt; Ovid. Metam. lib. 1. ver. 75. concerning Argus. Horace, Ode 10. ver. 18. & 24. ver. 16. of Book 1. Statius Thebaid. Book 1.

'Tis pity that the treatiſe on Mercury's rod, which Barthius promis'd (18) to publiſh, is not extant; for he undoubtedly had compil'd a great number of curious particulars on this head, which poſſibly might be more inſtructive than what Antiſthenes the Cynic wrote on Minerva's wand. This Goddeſs had alſo her wand, and with it could make perſons appear young or old, as circumſtances might require (19). But this was nothing to the wonders which were perform'd by that of Circe (20); for ſhe, with a gentle tap of it, transform'd men into beaſts, and beaſts into men. Eraſmus, who adds to theſe ſeveral inſtances Moſes's rod, with which he wrought ſo many miracles (21), ſhould have obſerv'd, that the Devil, who apes the Almighty, took his model from hence, when he made the wand one of his chief occaſional cauſes. Huetius aſſerts, that the ſeveral particulars which the Poets tell us of Mercury's rod, &c. were all borrow'd from that of Moſes (22). Obſerve that the Devil was very quick at imitation; for Pharaoh's magicians, by the power of their rods, wrought ſome miracles which reſembled thoſe of the true God (23). We muſt not omit the Brachmans, who went always with a wand and a ring, to which they aſcrib'd very great virtues (24). I poſſibly may purſue this ſubject under the word Rabdomancy (Wand-Divination.)

(18) De virgæ Mercurialis poteſtate & potentia peculiarem tractationem ſatis myſterioden damus in ſuperſtitionum magno commentario. Barth. in Stat. tom. 2. p. 291. That is, "We have "written a treatiſe on the "power of Mercury's rod, &c.
(19) Homer. Odyſſ. N & Π.
(20) Ibid. K.
(21) On the proverb Virgula Divina, Chil. 1. centur. 1. n. 97.
(22) Huetii Demonſtr. Evang. propoſ. 4. p. 258.
(23) See Exod. vii & viii.

(24) Philoſtrati Vita Apol. lib. 3.

[C] The period in which Abaris liv'd.] Some fix his embaſſy to Athens under the 21ſt Olympiad; Hypoſtratus under the 3d; and Pindar makes him cotemporary with Crœſus (25). Euſebius agreed with the laſt, ſince he had fix'd Abaris's journey, and the beginning of Crœſus's reign, to the 2d year of the 54th Olympiad: but a little after he varied ſhamefully from this computation, by declaring that our ſoothſayer was living the laſt year of the 82d Olympiad. Abaris Hyperboreanus Hariolus agnoſcitur, i. e. Abaris is acknowledg'd to be the Hyperborean ſoothſayer (26). Valeſius ſeems to prefer chiefly the opinion of Porphyry and Jamblichus (27), who aſſert that Abaris flouriſh'd the ſecond year of the 54th Olympiad, and was cotemporary with Pythagoras: and this is infer'd from what Porphyry and Jamblicus relate, viz. that Pythagoras ſhow'd his golden thigh to Abaris Prieſt of the Hyperborean Apollo. Were the epiſtles which are aſcrib'd to Phalaris genuine, Abaris muſt have liv'd at the ſame time with this tyrant; but 'tis not probable that thoſe letters paſt between them, which are found in this collection. However, we may argue preſumptively from thence, that Abaris and Phalaris were cotemporaries, ſince it may be ſuppos'd, that the author who aſcrib'd theſe epiſtles to the latter, was exact in chronology, purpoſely to give an air of greater probability to his fictions. According to Suidas, Phalaris liv'd in the 52d Olympiad. Hypoſtratus's opinion may be corroborated from what follows. Suidas obſerves, that in the 5th Olympiad, the Athenians offer'd the ſacrifices call'd Προηρσίαι (28), in the name of all the Greeks. Theſe were perform'd before the earth was plough'd, in order to draw down the Divine Bleſſing on the approaching harveſt. Now the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes relates, that when the Athenians offer'd, for all mankind, the ſacrifices call'd Προηρσία, the whole earth had been infeſted with a famine, and even a plague alſo, which had oblig'd the ſeveral nations to conſult the Oracle; and that it return'd this anſwer, viz. that the Athenians ſhould offer ſuch a ſacrifice, and then the calamity would ceaſe (29). This was therefore the period when ſo many Embaſſadors were ſent to Athens; and, among the reſt, Abaris from the Hyperboreans; conſequently Hypoſtratus has deviated but very little from the truth, in fixing Abaris's journey to the 3d Olympiad. If Scaliger's conjectures on a paſſage of Firmicus Maternus, concerning the Palladium be juſt, ſome authors have made the age in which Abaris liv'd vaſtly remote; ſince, according to theſe, he flouriſh'd long before the ſiege of Troy: but this we ſhall conſider preſently. Others have brought him as low as the age of Alexander the Great; but as this was merely a rhetorical flight, we ſhall not examine it; which indeed would be vaſtly tedious. Abaris, according to Himerius the Sophiſt (30), was compleatly equip'd after the Barbarian faſhion, when he appear'd before the Athenians: but then, ſays this author, he was a Scythian in his dreſs only; for he ſpoke Greek: and the moment he open'd his lips, the auditors imagin'd they were hearing an oration in the Academy or the Lycæum. A fine abſurdity this, ſince Plato and Ariſtotle founded their ſchools ſo many years after Abaris's time! A writer (31), in order to reconcile theſe difficulties, ſuppoſes two Abaris's, which however won't do, ſince five or ſix would be requir'd for that purpoſe.

(25) Apud Harpocration.

(26) Euſebii Chron. n. 1568.
(27) Henrici Valeſii Notæ in Notas Mauſſaci in Harpocrat. p. 83.

(28) Under the word Προηρσίαι.

(29) Scholiaſt. Ariſtophan. in Equit.

(30) Apud Photium, p. 1136.

(31) Edward Simſon, apud Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova, p. 1.

[D] The great variety of opinions on this head, has miſled ſome modern writers.] Voſſius is of opinion, that thoſe only are right, who fix the age of Abaris between the 30th and 38th Olympiad. In this period, ſays he (32), Euſebius tells us, that Phalaris exercis'd his tyranny; Phalaris tyrannidem exercuit ab Olympiadis XXX (it ſhould have been XXXI) An. 11, uſque ad Olympiadis XXXVIII, Anno 11, teſte Euſebio.

(32) Voſſius de Poëtis Græcis, cap. 3. p. 16.

world over. One tells us (d), that the whole earth being infeſted with a deadly plague, Apollo gave no other anſwer, than that the Athenians ſhould offer up prayers in behalf of all other nations: upon which, ſeveral countries deputed Embaſſadors to Athens, among whom was Abaris the Hyperborean. He was then pretty far advanced in years; and as he return'd to his native country, in order to dedicate to Apollo the Hyperborean, whoſe Prieſt he was, the gold he had collected (e), it might be aſſerted, that one of the motives of his journey into Greece, was to make a gathering, to be diſpoſed of in pious uſes. In this journey he renew'd the alliance between the Hyperboreans and the inhabitants of the iſland of Delos (f). He pretended to propheſy; and as he gave out his predictions in all places whitherſoever his roving vagabond Genius directed his ſteps, he might have been call'd a walking Oracle [E]. According to ſome authors he made the Palladium [F], that fatal pledge of the preſervation of ſuch cities as ſhould poſſeſs it, and ſold it to the Trojans. He

(d) Harpocration, under the word Ἄβαρις.

(e) Jamblici in Vita Pythag. cap. 19. Spanhemii Notæ in Callimach. p. 490.

(f) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 2. cap. 47. p. 126.

Euſebio. Now Abaris was cotemporary with this tyrant. By this computation he refutes thoſe who aſſert that Abaris was Pythagoras's diſciple; by obſerving that this philoſopher flouriſh'd the 1ſt year of the 60th Olympiad, and died about the cloſe of the 70th; and conſequently, that it was not poſſible for a diſciple of Pythagoras to write letters to Phalaris. Laſtly, he aſſures that all the ancients make Abaris prior, not only to Pythagoras, but to Solon. Antiqui omnes de Abari loquuntur ut non Pythagora modo, ſed Solone etiam antiquiori (33). However, theſe remarks of Voſſius are built on a very ſlight foundation, ſince Euſebius above-mention'd, on whoſe aſſertions they are grounded, fixes in another place, Phalaris's reign to the 3d year of the 53d Olympiad, and Abaris's journey to the 2d year of the 54th; a circumſtance Voſſius ſhould have obſerv'd; as alſo, that Scaliger (34) prefers the paſſage of Euſebius he has not cited, to the other which he quotes. Scaliger grounds his conjecture on Suidas's placing the beginning of Phalaris's tyranny under the 52d Olympiad: not to mention what Oroſus tells us, viz, that Cyrus was cotemporary with this tyrant (35). 'Tis plain therefore, that the conſequences which Voſſius draws from Abaris being cotemporary with Phalaris, have very little foundation; for Abaris might have writ letters to Phalaris after the 52d Olympiad, and have ſeen Pythagoras after the 60th (36). But be this as it will, Voſſius ſhould not have aſſerted, that all the ancients fix the age of Abaris before that of Solon; it being known that this Grecian Sage gave his laws to the Athenians in the 46th Olympiad (37), and that Euſebius places Abaris under the 82d (38).

(33) Id. ib.

(34) Scaligeri Animadv. in Euſebium, n. 1452. p. 94.

(35) Id. ib. n. 1390. p. 84.

(36) Obſerve, Jamblichus tells us, Abaris was in an advanced age, when Pythagoras taught him.

(37) Scaliger, ubi ſupra, n. 1422. p. 86.

(38) See the 26th citation of the preceding note.

Moreri has made an ill uſe of Voſſius's obſervations. He imagines, that thoſe who declare Abaris liv'd before Solon, diſagree with ſuch as make the former cotemporary with Tullius Hoſtilius, or Ancus Martius, Kings of the Romans. However, theſe are not two different opinions, ſince every one who is vers'd in Chronology, would not ſcruple to aſſert, that Solon lived after thoſe two Kings. But Moreri was miſled by the following paſſage of Voſſius, Fuerit igitur (Phalaris) temporibus Tullii Hoſtilii & Anci Martii (39); that is, "Phalaris was therefore cotemporary with Tullius Hoſtilius and Ancus Martius," and by the preceding paſſage. Let us obſerve by the way, that Moreri was miſled by theſe words of Cælius Rhodiginus, Hujus (Abaridis) & Gregorius Theologus commeminit in Epitaphio ad magnum Baſilium (40); and fancy'd, "St. Gregory ſpeaks of Abaris, in an Epitaph "he wrote to St. Baſil the Great (41)." Now I have not met with any particulars relating to Abaris, in St. Gregory Nazianzen's verſes on St. Baſil's death. I indeed hoped to have there found the five or ſix lines which Giraldi quotes ex Monodia in Divum Baſilium (42). The word Monodia directs to a piece of poetry, but falſely on that occaſion. However, in turning over the proſe writings of this great Divine, I mean his Sermon preach'd at St. Baſil's funeral, I did not find a fourth part of Giraldi's citation. Moreri is guilty of a particular miſtake, when he ſeems to hint, that this epitaph had not been made for St. Baſil.

(39) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(40) Cælii Rodig. Antiq. Lect. lib. 16. cap. 22. p. 881.

(41) This fault is not in the Dutch editions.

(42) Giraldus de Poëtis, dialogo 3. circa init. p. 119.

[E] A walking Oracle.] Clemens Alexandrinus ranks Abaris among thoſe who pretended to the gift of prophecy. Προγνῶσιν δὲ καὶ Πυθαγόρας ὁ μάγας προσαναθεῖναι σπεύδει. Ἄβαρίς τε ὁ Ὑπερβόρεος (43). Præſcientiæ autem Pythagoras quoque magnus ſemper mentem adhibuit, & Abaris Hyperboreus. i. e. "The great Py- "thagoras and Abaris the Hyperborean, always ap- "plied themſelves to prediction." We have already taken notice (44) of the epithet Hariolus (Soothſayer) which Euſebius gives him in his Chronicle. One of the Commentators on St. Gregory Nazianzen relates, that Abaris travelled over all Greece, and there gave out his oracles (45). Apollonius aſſerts the ſame, and declares further, that theſe oracles were not then loſt. Ἔγραψε δὲ καὶ χρησμοὺς τοῖς χόροις περιερχόμενος, οἳ εἰσὶ μέχρι τῦ νῦν ὑπάρχοντες (46). Scripſit autem & oracula regionibus quas obſervans luſtrabat, quæ ad hoc uſque tempus extant. The Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes (47) ſays likewiſe, "That theſe oracles were "extant in his time." Abaris was not the only perſon of this profeſſion, who thus rambled up and down the world, and eagerly ſpread about his predictions. This was peculiar to Soothſayers, which made Artimedorus aſſert, that when a perſon dreams he is a Prophet, it is generally a ſign he will travel and make a heavy buſtle; for, adds he, Soothſayers generally lead a vagrant life. Φέρει δὲ καὶ ἀποδημίας πολλάκις καὶ κινήσεις τῷ ἰδόντι τὸν ὄνειρον, διὰ τὸ τοὺς μάντεις περιοδεύειν: Portendit ſæpe etiam Peregrinationes & motus hoc Somnium ei qui vidit, propterea quod Vates vitam errabundam agunt (48.) This was common to them with jugglers and empiricks of all kinds. Abaris did not only propheſy; for, 'tis ſaid, he built Temples, and among others, that of Proſerpine the Salutary, (49) Κόρης Σωτείρας in Lacedæmonia. Plato draws him with all the characteriſticks of an Empiric, or rather of an inchanter, who pretended to cure diſeaſes by the virtue of certain words (50).

(43) Stromat. lib. 1. p. 334.

(44) Citation 26th, above.

(45) Nicetas in Orat. 20. Gregor. Nazianz. p. 774.

(46) Apollon. Admir. Hiſt. ſect. 4.

(47) In equit.

(48) Artemidor. lib. 3. cap. 21.

(49) Pauſanias, lib. 3. p. 94. He alſo ſays, that others affirm it was built by Orpheus.

(50) Plato in Charm. p. 465.

[F] He made the Palladium.] We owe this diſcovery to the great Scaliger, who ſubſtituted Abaris (51) for avarus twice, in a paſſage of Julius Firmicus Maternus (52). Here follows the paſſage thus amended. Palladii etiam quid ſit Numen audite. Simulachrum eſt ex oſſibus Pelopis factum. Hoc Abaris Scytha feciſſe perhibetur; jam quale ſit, conſiderate quod Scytha Barbarus conſecravit. Eſtne aliquid apud Scythas humana ratione compoſitum, & illa effera gens & crudeli atque inhumana ſemper atrocitate graſſata, in conſtituendis Religionibus rectum aliquid potuit invenire? Simulachrum hoc Trojanis Abaris vendidit, ſtultis hominibus vana promittens. That is, "Hear what a kind of Deity "this Palladium is? 'Tis a ſtatue formed of Pelops's "bones, and made, as we are told, by Abaris the "Scythian. It's being conſecrated by a Barbarian of "that country, will no doubt give you a ſtrange idea "of it; for does any thing like reaſon appear in this "ſavage people, who are ſo unfit to inſtitute any "thing proper in religious matters? Abaris ſold this "ſtatue to the Trojans, promiſing ſilly people a thou- "ſand idle things." Scaliger has corrected two errors of almoſt the ſame kind, in a paſſage of Ariſtophanes's Scholiaſt (53); by reading Ἄβαριν for βάριν, and Ἀβάριδος for βάριδος, which clears up the ſenſe very much. Ὅτι δὴ καὶ Ἄβάριν φασὶ τὸν Ὑπερβόρειον ἐλθόντα θεωρὸν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα Ἀπόλλωνι θητεῦσαι, καὶ ὕτω συγγράψαι τοὺς χρησμοὺς τοὺς νῦν προσαγορευομένους Ἀβαρίδος. The ſenſe of which is, that Abaris being gone into Greece to conſult Apollo, or make oblations to him, devoted himſelf to the ſervice of that God, and wrote the oracles which ſtill bear the name of Abaris. Valeſius alſo corrects (54) a paſſage in Proclus (55) where Pythagoras is cited ἐν τῷ πρὸς Ἄβαριν λόγῳ, and thinks the true reading is Ἄβαριν (59), whence it would appear that Pythagoras had inſcribed a work of his to this Abaris. But 'tis certain, if Jamblichus (57) is to be credited, that Pythagoras explained his treatiſe of Nature and his book of the Gods to this Hyperborean. I am of opinion that the book mentioned by Plutarch, entitled

(51) Scaligeri Notæ in Euſeb. n. 1454.

(52) De Errore profan. Relig.

(53) In Equit.

(54) Valeſii Notæ in Notas Mauſſ. in Harpocration, p. 83.

(55) In Timæum Platonis, p. 141.

(56) Confer quæ Jamblich. ubi ſupra. cap. 19. p. 92.

(57) Jambl. ibid.

He form'd it of human bones (g); a kind of materials, I am perſuaded, were never employ'd in making taliſmans. 'Tis aſſerted that he could foretell earthquakes [G] drive away plagues, and lay ſtorms; and perform'd in Lacedæmon ſome ſacrifices, whoſe efficacy was ſuch, that this country having till then been very much afflicted with the plague, was never troubled with it after (b). He wrote ſeveral books (i), viz. Apollo's arrival into the country of the Hyperboreans: The nuptials of the river Hebrus: Θεογονία, or the generation of the Gods: A collection of Oracles, and another of Incantations, Exorciſms, or, if the reader pleaſes, Expiatory Prayers (k). All theſe works, the firſt excepted, were in proſe. Had we the entire Oration of Himerius the Sophiſt, a fragment of which Photius has preſerv'd (l), we then ſhould be better able to judge, whether Abaris is the perſon on whom that Sophiſt beſtows ſuch mighty encomiums. However, 'tis certain that he applauds him for ſpeaking pure Greek (m). Others affirm, that his eaſy, unaffected carriage and probity gain'd him the eſteem of all the Grecians (n). I don't find him mention'd either by Callimachus or Lucian, notwithſtanding the aſſertions of a celebrated Critic (o). Had his arrow poſſeſs'd the virtues which are aſcrib'd to James Aymar's wand [H], he might have done great ſervice to mankind, and not fear the reproach of being uſeleſs, which Origen caſt upon him (p). But News is juſt now brought (q), that this Wand enjoy'd but a very ſhort reign [I], and met with its doom in the Prince of Condè's palace at Paris.

(g) Thoſe of Pelops.

(b) Jamblich, ubi ſupra, cap. 19. p. 93. & cap. 28. p. 131. Vide etiam Apollonium, ubi ſupra.

(i) Suidas, under the word Ἄβαρις.

(k) The Greek word in Suidas is καθαρμούς.

(l) Photii Bibliotheca, p. 1136.

(m) See the latter end of the remark [C].

(n) Strabo, lib. 7. p. 208.

(o) Caſauboni Notæ in Strabon. lib. 7. p. 113

(p) Origen contra Celſum, lib. 3. p. 129.

(q) I write this in 1693.

☞ ABARIS

(58) Plut. quomodo audiendi Poët. initio.

entitled Abaris, and written by Heraclides (58), contain'd all the genuine and romantic adventures of our celebrated Soothſayer. By the way, as Scaliger was ſo fond of finding fault, I am ſurpriſed he ſhould refer us to Giraldi, as an author whence the moſt learned particulars could be gathered with regard to Abaris; for how great ſoever Giraldi's erudition might be, it is certain he is not very accurate on this head (59). He ſays, that Valerius Harpocration mentions the wonders of the arrow; and that Herodotus ſays, it wafted Abaris to the country of the Hyperboreans. Now it is certain, that Harpocration does not once ſpeak of the arrow; and that Herodotus takes no notice of Abaris's flight, nor ſpecifies any particular place he went to. Charles Stephens and Moreri fell into the laſt error. Legatus Athenas veniens ad ſuos Hyperboreos rediit nihil comedens, ſays the former; During his long journey from Greece into Scythia he did not take the leaſt ſuſtenance, ſays the latter. Moreri's error is more pardonable than that of Charles Stephens, who tells us in the hurry of his writing, that the oracles of Abaris are ſtill extant. A proof that he tranſcrib'd injudiciouſly, not conſidering the great impropriety of expreſſing himſelf in that manner, ſince thoſe oracles had been ſo long loſt. We ſhall take notice in another place (60) of the miſtakes which ariſe from ſuch a precipation.

(59) See the latter part of the note [D].

(60) In the latter end of the note on the article BALBUS (John).

[G] Could foretell earthquakes.] Porphyry informs us, that Pythagoras had this power, and that of ſtopping plagues, making hail to ceaſe, of calming ſtorms on ſeas and rivers, in order to procure his friends a propitious voyage (61). He adds, that Pythagoras having taught his ſecret to Empedocles, Epimenides and Abaris, they practiſed it on ſeveral occaſions, πολλαχῆ ἐπιτετελικέναι τοιαῦτα. A modern writer (62) obſerving that Pherecydes, Preceptor to Pythagoras (63), Anaximander and Abaris (64) foretold earthquakes, puts this humorous queſtion: If we, ſays he, conſider the Earth as a huge animal, had not Theſe the art of feeling its pulſe, and thereby knew the convulſions it would be troubled with? Now whether Abaris performed theſe ſeveral wonders with, or without his arrow, it is certain that his travels might be vaſtly beneficial to mankind. See the following remark.

(61) In Vita Pythagor.

(62) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 11. p. 127.

(63) He quotes Diog. Laërt. in Pherecyd. Cicero I. de Divin.

(64) With regard to Abaris, he quotes Apollonius, ſirnamed Dyſcolus, ch. 5. the ſame with him cited above.

(65) See the remark [B] above.

[H] Which are aſcrib'd to James Aymar's wand (65).] Nothing ever made more noiſe, or had ſo many books written upon it. I juſt now heard that thoſe who promis'd themſelves ſo many advantages and conqueſts over unbelievers from thence, were very much out in their conjectures. The bare relation of all this would deſerve an article apart; and poſſibly we may take ſome notice of it under the word Rabdomancy (Wand-Divination) or on ſome other occaſion. But be this as it will, I ſhall not recant any thing I advance with regard to the uſefulneſs of this wand. This inſtrument, in the hands of ſo great a traveller as Abaris, would have wrought a greater reformation in the morals of mankind throughout the world, than all the labours of our Miſſionaries and Preachers. Were a perſon of this character to return on the earth, jealouſy, that ſcourge of ſo many husbands, would ſoon be drove from it: the Italians and the Eaſtern nations would have no occaſion to ſet goalers over their wives, or play the Argus themſelves; every man would truſt to their fidelity, and have no more to do but to recommend 'em to the wand. Men would not only diſburden themſelves of an anxious ſolicitude (66), which ſometimes haſtens the very thing they guard againſt, but would themſelves be forc'd to keep the hymeneal vow, when a reputation of this kind might be neceſſary. A criminal would be leſs terrify'd at the thoughts of appearing in a court of juſtice, than of coming before an Abaris. Moſt crimes, the moſt dangerous ſins, ſuch I mean as are committed in hopes of their being conceal'd, would be heard of no more: and 'tis then one might ſay,

(66) Pœnæque gravès in cœlibe vitâ,
Et gravior cautæ cuſtodia vana maritis. Auſonii Idyll. 15.
Thus Engliſh'd.
" Diſtracting
" care a ſingle
" life attends,
" More grievous,
" Fate, to jealous
" husbands ſends.

Tutus bos etenim rura perambulat,
Nutrit rura Ceres, almaque fauſtitas.
Culpari metuit fides,
Nullis polluitur caſta domus ſtupris:
Laudantur ſimili prole puerperæ.
Culpam pœna premit comes (67).

(67) Horat. Od. 5. lib. 4.

That is,

Safe by thy preſence oxen plough the fields,
And Ceres with increaſe her bleſſings yields *:
No baſe adult'ry ſtains our race,
Strict law hath tam'd that ſpotted vice;
The child can ſhew his father's face;
Pain waits on ſin, and checks its riſe †.

* Horace, by ſeveral hands.

† Creech.

As the Devil is the ſworn enemy of mankind, 'tis difficult I confeſs to conceive the reaſon why he ſhould enter into ſuch engagements with them; a circumſtance which is not duly conſider'd by thoſe, who will neither ſuffer us to doubt the virtues of the wand, nor to account for them mechanically.

[I] It enjoy'd but a very ſhort reign.] It ſcarce laſted ſo long in Paris, as was neceſſary for compoſing and printing an article of this Dictionary. The Prince of Condè, whoſe knowledge, when we conſider where he imbib'd it, cannot but be fatal to impoſture and credulity, overthrew all the vain trophies which the followers of James Aymar had rais'd. This creature gave ſo wretched a ſpecimen of his art in the prince of Condè's palace, that he quite loſt his reputation (68). The world has heard the whole ſtory; and ſince the particulars of it have been publiſh'd by that great Prince's order, there can no longer be room for doubt and uncertainty. But indeed, no one pretends to make this a ſubterfuge; all they endeavour is, to find out ſome reaſons why the wand happen'd to be unſucceſsful; as I ſhall obſerve hereunder. Thoſe who ſay, that the abettors of theſe ſoothſayers choſe a wrong point of time; and that ſuch people ſhould not be brought upon the ſtage in ſo philoſophical an age as the preſent, have ſomething like reaſon on their ſide. However, all things conſider'd, they did not argue juſtly. I own that there are more people now than formerly, capable of oppoſing the ſtream, and of guarding againſt illuſion and deceit; but this circumſtance excepted, I aſſert that our age is as much impos'd upon as any: and after what we have ſeen with regard to (68) See Lettres Hiſtoriques, and the Mercure Politique, for May 1693.

☞ ABARIS, was an Hyperborean, as is aſſerted by Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Apollonius, and divers other authors. Suidas indeed and Euſebius call him a Scythian, but they miſtook the land of the Hyperboreans for Scythia. Among the ſeveral places where Abaris travell'd, it appears that he went to Lacedæmon, ſince, according to ſome writers, he there built a temple conſecrated to Proſerpine the Salutary. If the Hebrides (iſlands ſituated northweſt of Scotland) were the Hyperboreans of Diodorus, then the celebrated Abaris was of that country, and likewiſe a Druid, having been the Prieſt of Apollo. Suidas, who knew not the diſtinction of the inſular Hyperboreans, makes him a Scythian; as do ſome others, miſled by the ſame vulgar error; tho' Diodorus has truly fix'd his country in an Iſland, and not on the Continent. And indeed the fictions and miſtakes concerning our Abaris are infinite: however, they all agree that he travell'd quite over Greece, and from thence into Italy, where he convers'd familiarly with Pythagoras, who favour'd him beyond all his diſciples, by inſtructing him in his doctrines, (eſpecially his thoughts of Nature) in a more compendious and plainer method than he did any other. This diſtinction could not but be very advantageous to Abaris. The Hyperborean, in return, preſented the Samian, as tho' he equall'd Apollo himſelf in wiſdom, with the ſacred arrow, on which the Greeks have fabulouſly related, that he ſat aſtride, and flew upon it, thro' the air, over rivers and lakes, foreſts and mountains; in like manner as our vulgar ſtill believe, particularly thoſe of the Hebrides, that Wizards and Witches fly whitherſoever they pleaſe on their broomſticks. The Orator Himerius, tho' one of thoſe, who from the equivocal ſenſe of the word Hyperborean, ſeem to have miſtaken Abaris for a Scythian, yet deſcribes his perſon accurately, and gives him a very noble character. That he ſpoke Greek with ſo much fluency and elegance will be no matter of wonder to ſuch as conſider the ancient intercourſe there was between the Greeks and Hyperboreans; nor would the latter have ſent any Embaſſador (as they did Abaris) to the former, unleſs, among the other requiſite qualifications, he underſtood their language perfectly. But let us hear a little what Himerius ſays: They relate, that Abaris the Sage was by nation an Hyperborean, appear'd a Grecian in ſpeech, and reſembled a Scythian in his habit and appearance. Now to ſhew that his habit was not that of a Scythian, who were always cover'd with skins, but that which has been in all ages, as generally at preſent an explication of the Revelations, let no one ſay, * the world is not to be bubbled any longer. Men are as great ſimpletons as ever, being pleas'd with every impoſture that ſooths their paſſions; don't bluſh when they find themſelves impos'd upon; have the ſame veneration for the deceiver; and exclaim no leſs againſt the belief of thoſe who were not deceiv'd. Here follows what a News-writer (69) has juſt now acquainted us with, which confirms the aſſertions abovemention'd. "The "teſtimony of a great Prince, and the letter of one of "the chief Magiſtrates of the * Chatelet are ſo ſtrong a- "gainſt James Aymar, that not one of thoſe who believe "the pretended virtues of his wand has dar'd to con- "tradict them. But a circumſtance which ſhows the "ridiculouſneſs of credulity, is, that ſcarce one of "theſe people will own they were deluded. And "Mr. Vallemont has juſt now publiſh'd a treatiſe on "the occult Philoſophy of the Divining Wand, in which "he pretends to explain, how the peaſant of Dau- "phiné (tho' he really is maſter of the ſeveral virtues "and talents he boaſts) might yet miſtake in the expe- "riments he made before the Prince. This ſpecies of "philoſophers, and thoſe who explain propheſies, "(for they differ but very little) are a kind of en- "thuſiaſts, that will never confeſs themſelves in an "error; a ſett of people, who after all they have ad- "vanc'd is prov'd falſe, will yet call thoſe perſons "Free-Thinkers, whoſe good ſenſe will not ſuffer "'em to give into their wild chimæra's."

Since the printing of the abovemention'd, three or four years paſt, and no notice was taken of Aymar. Our News-writers had loſt ſight of our conjurer, and left him to his obſcurity: but at laſt, they again brought him on their ſtage in April 1697, to act a very merry part; which however might have been of wonderful uſe, were the ſtory they relate but true. Some time ſince, ſay theſe (70), the prior of the Carthuſians of * Villeneuve chez Avignon, paſt thro' Orange with James Aymar, by whoſe aſſiſtance he intended to find out ſome land-marks which were loſt; but he happen'd to be employ'd in an affair of a different nature. Three days before, a child having been dropt at the gate of the Capuchin monaſtery, the Superior of it deſir'd James Aymar to diſcover the perſon who had laid it there. The peaſant conſenting to it, went to the Capuchin gate, to which the foundling had been brought back. He then, before a great crowd of ſpectators, follow'd the path which the motion of his wand pointed out to him, and went directly to the village of Camaret in the county Venaiſſin, and thence to a farm-houſe, in which he affirm'd the child was born. I forgot to mention, that in his way he met a man on horſeback, whom he knew to be the father of the foundling, by the motion of his wand. The judge of the place, of his own accord, or at the ſolicitation of the parties concern'd, deſired James Aymar and his agents not to make any farther enquiry; promiſing that the child ſhould be taken back, which was accordingly done. I ſhall make three obſervations on this narrative. Firſt, that we are not ſure 'tis true; for how many people take a pleaſure in inventing fictions, which they inſert in the publick papers? Theſe they ſend unſubſcrib'd to an author, obſerving to lay the ſcene of action at ſome diſtance; beſides that they know few will make enquiries. My ſecond remark is, that ſuppoſing all that is related in the Mercure Hiſtorique were true, yet unbelievers won't hold their tongues. James Aymar, would theſe ſay, knew the path he was to take; that one who was acquainted with the whole ſecret of the infant's birth, had play'd falſe with his brethren, overjoy'd to give the alarm, and furniſh ſo fine a ſubject for tattle. However this be, Aymar would be an exception from the rule, that a prophet is not honour'd in his own country; for neither the ſhame he met with in the capital of the kingdom, nor the ſeries of ill ſucceſs which attended him, whereof Mr. Buiſſiere (71) has publiſhed an exact account, would have ruin'd his reputation in the country where he liv'd. I ſhall obſerve in the third place, that this property of the wand would be highly advantageous; it would diſcharge the publick of the funds appropriated for the ſupport of foundlings, by diſcovering the parents, who would then be oblig'd to maintain them. Beſides, it would increaſe the dread of the conſequences that are a check to lewdneſs, which otherwiſe would be much more prevalent and ſcandalous. The Fair, who are generally more aw'd by this fear than the other ſex, tho' ſometimes 'tis otherwiſe, would keep a ſtricter watch over their chaſtity. Did the wand poſſeſs the virtues which are aſcrib'd to it, all precautions would be to no purpoſe; ſuch as the retiring to a lone-houſe in order to lie in; the bringing a midwife hoodwink'd to

* This is a ſarcaſtical alluſion to Mr. Jurieu's Accompliſhment of the Propheſies.

(69) Mercure Hiſtorique for May 1693. p. 565.

[* A Court of Juſtice in Paris]

(70) Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique for April 1697. p. 440, 441.

* A little city in Languedoc, ſeated on the Rhone, and oppoſite to Avignon.

(71) Mr. Buiſſiere, the prince of Condè's apothecary, writ the book entitled, Lettre à Mr. L'Abbé D. L. ſur les veritables effets de la baguette de Jaques Aymar, par P. B. A Paris, chez Louis Lucas, 1694. i. e. "A "Letter to Abbé "D. L. concern- "ing the real ef- "fects of Ay- "mar's wand, &c.

preſent, worn in the Hebrides, and the neighbouring Highlands, it needs only to be deſcrib'd, to remove at once all doubts and ſcruples. Abaris came to Athens, continues Himerius, holding a bow in his hand, having a quiver hanging on his ſhoulders, his body wrapt up in a plad, girt about the loins with a gilded belt, and wearing trowzers reaching from his waſte to the ſoles of his feet. A gun and piſtol being of modern invention, could make no part of his equipage. By this we find he did not make his entry into Athens riding on a broomſtick, as is fabulouſly reported, but in the native garb of an aboriginal Scot. As for what relates to his abilities, 'twas impoſſible for his principals to have made a better choice; ſince we are inform'd by the ſame Himerius, that he was affable and pleaſant in converſation, in diſpatching great affairs ſecret and induſtrious, quick-ſighted in preſent exigencies, in preventing future dangers circumſpect, a ſearcher after wiſdom, deſirous of friendſhip, truſting indeed little to fortune, and having every thing truſted to him for his prudence. Neither the Academy nor the Licæum could furniſh a man with fitter qualities to travel ſo far abroad, and to ſuch wiſe nations, about affairs no leſs arduous than important. But if we attentively conſider his moderation in eating, drinking, and the uſe of all thoſe things which our natural appetites inceſſantly crave; joining the candour and ſimplicity of his manners with the ſolidity and to it thro' by-ways; or dropping the infant in the ſtreet at midnight: for that Inſtrument would ſhew the way to the very apartment of the lying-in woman, more certainly than the ſcent directs a dog to a hare's form. 'Twould put a ſtop to the falſe oaths (72) which great numbers of men take, in order to ſhift from themſelves the maintaining of baſtards, when the mothers would oblige them to it, by appearing, without ſhame, before a magiſtrate for that purpoſe.

(72) The ſtory ſays, that Aymar knew a horſeman, who rid by, to be the father of this foundling. Aymar confeſſes the whole fraud. Reflexions thereon.

As the moſt infallible method of undeceiving the credulous, will be to ſhew that Aymar confeſs'd himſelf an impoſtor, I ſhall ſet the whole affair in the cleareſt light. For this purpoſe I have a proof ſtill more poſitive than the teſtimony of Mr. Robert, the King's Attorney in the Chatelet at Paris, whoſe letter (73) to Father Chevigni, aſſiſtant to the Father-General of the oratory, takes notice only of ſome unſucceſsful experiments of the wand, and goes on thus; "I have heard that Aymar's wand was as "unlucky in ſeveral other tryals made at Verſailles "and Chantilly; nay, that he himſelf had been con-"victed of fraud, and confeſſed it. However, I "know this only by hear-ſay, thinking ſuch imper-"tinencies beneath my notice; which ſhew how "apt mankind are to credit any novelty, that appears "ſo extraordinary in their eyes." What follows is more expreſs. Mr. Buiſſiere writes to me, that Meſſieurs Dodard and Sauveur, members of the Academy of Sciences (at Paris) having deſir'd him to publiſh a ſecond edition of his letter, and to put his name to it; he determin'd to comply with their requeſt, becauſe the Prince of Condé will have him do it, by his expreſs order, purpoſely to undeceive the advocates for the wand; that he will annex to it a narrative of Aymar's ſearch (74) after thoſe villains who aſſaſſinated one of the horſe-patrole in St. Denis's ſtreet; and laſtly, to undeceive totally the wand-advocates, that he will likewiſe add what Aymar confeſſed, in the Prince of Condé's preſence, viz. That he was ignorant of all thoſe things which were aſcrib'd to him; and that all he had done hitherto, was merely for the ſake of getting a livelihood . . . His Royal Highneſs finding him ſo ingenuous, gave him thirty Louis D'Ors, that he might be enabled to return immediately into his own village; for otherwiſe, being no longer under that Prince's protection, thoſe he had accuſed falſely would have ſecur'd him . . . . . Mr. Robert, ſays Mr. Buiſſiere, tells me, that had Aymar been put into his hands, he ſhould have been condemned to the Gallies, ſince the proofs againſt him were undeniable. The ſame letter informs me, that a lad of fourteen, who was taught his leſſon, had impos'd upon a great number of perſons; but as his feats came too cloſe upon thoſe of Aymar, people were guarded againſt them; and at laſt the whole affair was detected, to the utter confuſion of the gentleman who had made him act this part. Mr. Buiſſiere being ordered to examine this lad, found him arch enough for one of his age. Being confin'd for ſome days, apart from the gentleman, he was prevail'd upon, by a little money, ſome promiſes of being ſetled in the world, and a few menaces, to diſcover the whole fraud. This letter of Mr. Buiſſiere is dated from Paris the 25th of July, 1698. To this I ſhall add the extract of a letter of (73) 'Tis printed with that of Mr. Buiſſiere above-cited.

(74) Mr. Robert mentions this in his letter.

M. Leibnitz, which he permitted to be publiſhed in Tenzelius's Journal in 1694, with that (75) of Mr. Robert. Mr. Leibnitz affirms, he had heard the Dutcheſs of Hanover, ſiſter in law to the Prince of Condé, declare, that ſhe had been an eye-witneſs to Aymar's impoſtures in his Royal Highneſs's palace at Paris; and agreed in opinion with this Prince, that 'twould be better to acquaint the public with this fraudulent ſcene, than to ſtifle it, upon pretence that a great number of wicked wretches ſtood in fear of the wand; and that it procured the reſtitution of a great many ſtolen goods. Her Highneſs aſſured, that Aymar at laſt confeſſed the whole was a cheat, for which he begg'd pardon, and excuſed himſelf by ſaying, that had not mankind been ſo credulous, he ſhould not have been ſo bold (76). Is (Princeps Condæus) Aimarum Lugduno accerſiverat indaginis cauſâ: excuſſum multis modis homuncionem & deprehenſum, tandem ad confeſſionem fraudis adegit; quam ſibi agnoſci petiit ſupplex, & graviora metuens, cauſatus non tam propriâ audaciâ, quam aliena credulitate hominum falli volentium, & velut obtrudentium ſibi, quæ alioqui nec jactare auſus fuiſſet, ſeſe in hæc impulſum eo tandem perveniſſe, unde pedem commodè non potuerit referre. Facile condonavit homini magnanimus princeps; ſed erant, qui ſuaderent diſſimulari comperta, & conſervari famam hominis vel artis, utili dolo, quod conſtaret, furibus aliiſque malis hominibus magnum metum fuiſſe injectum, & ob famam adventantis alicubi rerum furtivarum pretia fuiſſe relata; ſed Duciſſæ pariter noſtræ ac principis egregii ſententia fuit, potiorem habendam rationem veritatis. To this Mr. Leibnitz adds a reflexion, highly worthy ſo great a Genius; that it were better to examine, how ſo many eminent perſons at Lyons could be impos'd upon, than to enquire phyſically into the pretended virtues of the wand (77). Et ſcripſi nuper Pariſios, utilius & examine dignius, mihi videri problema morale vel logicum, quomodo tot viri inſignes Lugduni in fraudem ducti fuerint, quam illud pſeudo-phyſicum, quod tractavit Vallemontius, meliori materia dignus, quomodo virga corylacea tot miracula operetur? Nam moralis illa quæſtio, excuſſa pro dignitate, multorum errorum popularium origines ſæpè ſpecioſas aperiret. "Were "ſuch a moral queſtion as this is, examined in a pro-"per manner, it might diſcover the often ſpecious "original of a great many popular errors." I believe, that had the magiſtrates of Lyons, who caus'd the murderer to be hang'd whom Aymar diſcover'd at Beaucaire, threaten'd to burn this fellow alive, as a wicked magician; and ordered the executioner to appear before him, with the ſeveral inſtruments of torture, they would have extorted from him the whole ſecret of the murder; and how he came to know the particular place in Beaucaire where one of the aſſaſſins was. 'Tis very probable, that ſome perſons who were to ſhare with him in the profits of his wand, prompted him to act this part, in order to raiſe his reputation. Mr. Buiſſiere obſerves in his letter (78), That a ſett of people made it their buſineſs to cry up this fellow in all parts of Paris; and inſerted in the Mercure Galant for February 1693, that he had found this thing and t'other, whereas the whole was an errant falſhood. People were ſo infatuated, that Aymar would have got a prodigious deal of money, could he but have maintain'd his

(75) Mr. Paſch p. 778 of the work above cited, calls the Father to whom this letter was written, Cheulgni; which probably is an error of the preſs for Chevigni.

(76) Leibnitzius apud Tenzelii Colloq. Menſtr. anni 1694. I have tranſcrib'd this paſſage from the work entitled, De Inventis nov-antiquis, p. 779. Edit. 1700. written by Mr. Paſch, a learned profeſſor of philoſophy in Kiel.

(77) Id. ib.

(78) Lettre ſur les veritables effets de la Baguette, p. 13, 14. i. e. "a letter "on the real "effects of the "wand.

and wiſdom of his anſwers, all which we find ſufficiently atteſted; it muſt be own'd, that the world at that time had few to compare with Abaris. The author from whom all this is extracted, intended to explain what was couch'd under the romantic expedition of Abaris, with the true meaning of the arrow itſelf, the nature of the predictions that Abaris ſpread in Greece, and the doctrines which he learn'd at Crotona; with the conceit of the Hyperboreans, that Latona the mother of Apollo, was born among them, and their moſt exact aſtronomical Cycle of nineteen years; but was prevented by death, he not having ſo much as begun his intended Hiſtory of the Druids, in which he was to explain the abovemention'd particulars. Pauſanias in Laconic. Toland's account of the Druids, in his Poſthumous Works, vol. 1. p. 161, &c. See HEBRIDES.

ABARIS, a city of Egypt. See the article PITHOM.

his credit. The reader ſhall judge, whether his adherents had not reaſon to promote his deceitful arts. "No impoſtor was ever in greater credit (79). Peo"ple were ſo ſtrongly prejudiced in his favour, that
"they made him attempt ſeveral things he himſelf
"never dreamt of; and ſought for arguments to "excuſe him, whenever he was unſucceſsful. His "ſpecious ſimplicity and ruſtic air, and the country
"dialect he always ſpoke, impos'd upon the world;
"whereas he was quite the reverſe of what he ap-
"pear'd. The whirl of his wand eluded the eye;
"the ſpectator ſaw a forked ſtick turn ſo ſwiftly in "his hands, that he could not perceive the motion
"of his wriſt, which gave a ſpring to the wand,
"and made it whirl round with great ſtrength and "velocity. Beſides his apparent ſimplicity, he af"fected to be very devout; was often at confeſſion;
"went every day to maſs, and aſſumed all the out-
"ward characteriſtics of the vaſtly pious Catholic;
"and us'd to declare, that he had never known wo"man; otherwiſe, would he ſay, my wand would
"have loſt all its virtue. He never went into the "ſtreets in the day time, for fear, as he pretended,
"of being knock'd down by thieves and ſharpers; but "his real view in this, was, that darkneſs was a "better cloak to all his knaviſh artifices. Tho' his "whole conduct was vaſtly ridiculous, it nevertheleſs
"was approved by ſome people, who conſequently
"cried him up. Had not Aymar been kept from "going abroad, when he was at the Hotêl (palace)
"of Condé, (the Prince who ſent for him to Paris
"purely out of curioſity, being reſolved to ſee ſome
"ſpecimens of his ability, before he exhibited them
"in public) he would have been hurried to death by
"the multitudes who flocked to conſult him. One "would enquire, whether the thieves could not be
"diſcovered, who had committed ſuch a robbery, at
"ſuch a time, and in ſuch a place, &c. Another
"would ask, whether ſuch a Saint was not the true
"one, and not that of a certain pariſh, which alſo
"pretended to have his body? Others would bring a "parcel of relicks to know whether they were the "true ones of ſuch a Saint. I my ſelf ſaw a ſimple
"young fellow, a ſilk weaver, who was contracted
"to a girl, give Aymar a couple of crowns, purely "to know if ſhe had her maidenhead. Thoſe who "ſhared the profits with him, took care to bring
"griſt to his mill; and made people pay before hand,
"in order to obtain ſucceſs in what they came "about."

(79) Extract of the letter Mr. Buiſſiere honour'd me with, dated July 15. 1698.

Such a man as this in Paris, would have brought conſtant profit, and have proved a Peru to thoſe who were to ſhare with him. The ſuſpicious and the ſuſpected would have ſtrove to rival one another in their bounty to him; he would have got money from both husband and wife; from the innamorato and the fair-one; and the wand would have been immoveable, or have whirled round, according as the caſh was depoſited. My opinion is, that were the myſtery of theſe pretended prodigies laid open, the whole would be reduced to this; a knot of people are bent upon getting money, and for this purpoſe, one part of them boaſt their poſſeſſing an extraordinary talent, while the other, labour under hand to perſuade the public that they really are maſters of it. But then, I believe ſome empiricks have no need of emiſſaries, becauſe the bare credulity of mankind, gives them opportunity ſufficient to ſpread their impoſture. Not long ſince, ſome German quacks rambled over Holland, pretending to cure all ſorts of diſeaſes, without the application of medicines. Only ſend us, ſaid they, your urine. The cures they performed were all the talk; every one related wonders on that head; and their habitations, like the pool of Bethſaida, were crouded with the ſick and weak: but I don't think that thoſe who moſt cried up this wonderful Noſtrum, were in the ſecret, in order to ſhare the profits with them. Some took a pleaſure in recommending this bubble, becauſe it was of the marvellous kind; others who had applied to regular phyſicians in vain, prais'd it merely out of ſpight to the Faculty. However, this cheat did not laſt above a month or two, and being detected (80), ſuch multitudes had been impoſed upon by theſe urine-inſpectors, that the latter were as much deſpiſed as they had before been applauded.

Mr. Leibnitz obſerved very juſtly, that if the narrative of Aymar's ill ſucceſs in the Prince of Condé's palace had not been made public, the credulous would ſtill have diſputed the victory. But 'tis to be feared, Aymar's defeat will ſoon be forgot; and that people will be as much pleaſed to ſee this farce repreſented again, ſhould the ſame motives bring it upon the ſtage ſeven or eight years hence. Niſi princeps Condæus cognoſcendæ rei tantum ſtudii imò & ſumptus impendiſſet, laboraremus adhuc & conflictaremur cum quibuſdam ingeniis, quibus gratius eſt per mira falli, quàm nudæ veritatis ſimplicitati acquieſcere (81). "Some people "had rather be impoſed upon by things of a mar"vellous kind, than yield to the ſimplicity of naked "truth.

(80) Mr. Luſneu, a very able Phyſician of Roterdam, publiſh'd a little treatiſe in Flemiſh and French, to prove the vanity and folly of this practice. See l'Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for May 1697, p. 408 & ſeq. and the Journal des Savans, for Jan. 13. 1698. p. 30. Dutch edit.

(81) Leibnitzius, ubi ſupra.

☞ ABAS (SCHACH) There were two of this name both Sophis of Perſia; the firſt of whom called Abas the great, was third Son of Codabendi, ſeventh King of the race of the Sophis. Mirza Salmas his father's firſt Miniſter, bearing a mortal hatred to young Abas, conſpired to take away his life, by endeavouring to perſuade the Sophy his father that he meditated an inſurrection of his ſubjects [A.] Abas who had always been very ſubmiſſive to his father, being informed of what was plotting againſt him, ſent two noble men of his friends to the King to aſſure him of his loyalty; when the affair being narrowly examined, Abas was found innocent, and the Miniſter put to death. His father dying, Abas being but eighteen years of age, ſucceeded him in 1585 [B]. At his acceſſion to the crown, he found the affairs of Perſia at a very low ebb,

[A] Meditated an inſurrection of his ſubjects.] Mirza-Salmas had likewiſe a political view in this his treacherous procedure againſt Abas, for he wanted to ſacrifice this young Prince to the intereſt of Emir Hemſe his ſon-in-law, whom he hoped by that means to raiſe to the throne (1).

(1) Chardin Voyage: & L'Hiſtoire de la derniere Revolution de Perſe. Preface.

[B] Abas ſucceeded him in 1585.] Moreri has here committed an error in chronology, by aſſerting that Abas ſucceeded his two brothers Emir Hemſe, and Iſmael the third (2); for Abas began his reign in 1585, which plainly appears from what Moreri himſelf ſays in the ſequel of the article. Death, ſays he, put an end to his victories in 1629, after he had reigned forty four years. But if he began his reign in 1587, and died in 1629, he could not have reigned forty four years, as he aſſerts.

(2) See Hiſtoire de la derniere Revolution de Perſe, Preface, p. 85, 87.

ebb, occaſioned by the conqueſts of the Turks and Tartars [C]; for which reaſon he reſolved immediately to regain, if poſſible, the Provinces they had ſeiz'd. Accordingly he entered with an army into that of Chorazin, beat Abdallah Prince of the Uſbek Tartars whoſe head he cut off; made himſelf maſter of the Province; and from thence returned to Iſpahan which he made the capital of his kingdom, embelliſhing it with many noble, magnificent buildings. He then turn'd his arms againſt the Turks, took the city Tabris or Tauris in the Province of Adirbeitzan, afterwards entered the Province of Kilan, and reduced the inhabitants of it who had revolted in the reign of Schach-Tamas. Abas gained ſeveral victories over the Turks, and retook the iſland and city of Ormus [D] from the Portugueze. Death put a ſtop to the courſe of his victories in 1629, after a reign of forty four years. He was the greateſt Prince that had reigned in Perſia for many ages, and his memory is held in the higheſt veneration by them, he being with reaſon looked upon as the reſtorer of his country. And though at the beginning of his reign he gave very great hopes of what he would one day be, he even ſurpaſs'd the moſt flattering expectations of his ſubjects; and if ſome acts of cruelty with which he may be juſtly reproached [E] are excepted, he was endued with all thoſe qualifications which conſtitute the illuſtrious monarch. He was not only a great warrior, but one of the ableſt politicians of his age; which ſufficiently appears by the methods he employ'd in rendring himſelf abſolute in his kingdom [F], and in forming the civil government thereof, on a more perfect model than it had been before. But the ſuperior force of his underſtanding and good ſenſe, are particularly conſpicuous in the orders he gave at his laſt moments of concealing his death till the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſecured to Schah Sefi his grandſon. The manner in which this was executed is thus: His body was expos'd every day in the hall where he us'd to adminiſter juſtice, ſeated in a chair of ſtate with his eyes open, as though he had been alive, and his back turned towards the tapeſtry

[C] By the conqueſts of the Turks and Tartars.] Theſe were very great, for the Turks, after the death of Iſmael the firſt, extended their conqueſts over that great tract of land lying betwixt Taurus and the extremity of the kingdom of Cakel, being no leſs than four hundred miles from ſouth to north; and as many in breadth from the weſtern coaſt of the Caſpian Sea to the Black Sea, which the Muſcovites now poſſeſs. Beſides, they had alſo extended their conqueſts into the very heart of Perſia, as far as Amadan a hundred and eighty miles ſouth of Taurus, and made themſelves maſters of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria (3). All which, and many other places upon the black and red ſeas, Abas recovered from the Turks (4).

(3) Hiſt. de la derniere Revolution de Perſe. Preface, p. 89.
(4) Chardin Voyages en Perſe, &c. tom. 1. p. 126, 181, 187. Chalcondyle, liv. 21.

[D] Retook the iſland and city of Ormus.] Ormus is an iſland of Aſia in the Perſian gulph with a city of the ſame name. The Portugueze being perſuaded that this place was abſolutely neceſſary for carrying on their Eaſt-India trade, ſeiz'd upon it in 1507 under the conduct of the Duke of Albuquerque, and built a ſtrong citadel to defend it: which Abas, by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, retook the 25th of April 1622. whereby the Portugueze loſt to the value of eight millions of crowns (5).

(5) Hollert's Voyages, p. 39, &c. Tavernier, p. 1. l. 5. c. 23.

[E] The acts of cruelty with which he may be juſtly reproached.] Abas had during the courſe of his reign committed ſeveral acts of cruelty, which diſcover a very ſtrange contraſt in one who was otherwiſe a great Prince; and may ſerve to aſcertain the truth of the common maxim, that no man, how perfect ſoever, is without ſome fault. The firſt act of his barbarity was exerciſed on his own governor Murſchid-Kuli-Kan, who alſo had been his beſt friend, and to whom he owed the crown. Kuli-Kan believing he might ſtill uſe the ſame authority over this Prince that he had aſſumed while he was under his tutelage; and putting too high a value on the ſervices he had done him, became by that means ſo odious to Abas, that after ſtriking Kuli-Kan himſelf, he ordered one of his own grooms to diſpatch him, whom, for this action, he afterwards made a Kan, and Governor of Herat (6). Nor did his cruelty ſtop here, for the next day he ordered all the relations and friends of Kuli-Kan to be maſſacred (7). The next act of his cruelty was, his cutting off the head of Prince Abdallah, contrary to the law of nations and of arms (8). The third act which ſullied his glory moſt, was exerciſed upon his own children, againſt whom he conceived ſuch unjuſt and ill grounded ſuſpicions, that he ordered the eyes of the two youngeſt to be put out, reſerving Sofi-Myrza the eldeſt for his ſucceſſor. But afterwards ſuſpecting this Prince alſo, he commanded him to be put to death, which was no ſooner done than he was ſeized with the deepeſt regret; and ſuch was his remorſe of conſcience, that to atone for his crime, he ſhut himſelf up ten days in a dark place, and wore ſackcloth during the reſt of his life (9).

(6) Hiſt. de la derniere Revol. de Perſe. Preface, p. 86.
(7) Id. p. 87.
(8) Id. ibid. p. 88.
(9) Id. ibid. p. 93.

[F] By the methods he employed in rendring himſelf abſolute.] The kingdom of Perſia before Abas aſcended the throne, was divided between twenty little Princes, each of whom had uſurped a ſovereignty over the countries in their dependance; and all of them combined to maintain themſelves independent on the Kings of Perſia, which very much retrench'd the power of thoſe monarchs. Abas being abſolutely determin'd to eſtabliſh a deſpotic and arbitrary form of government in his kingdom, made it his firſt endeavour to ruin the ancient and moſt powerful families of the country, and to weaken the veteran troops who were alſo a check upon him. He did not however diſcover his deſign till he had filled his troops with Georgians and Armenians, who being moſtly Chriſtians, bore a mortal hatred to the Courtches (of whom theſe troops were formerly compoſed) as being deſcended from the Turcomans and Saracens ſo famous in hiſtory for their enmity to the Chriſtians (10). He filled the great poſts and employments of the ſtate with foreigners, who being originally ſlaves, were not attach'd by kindred or relation to the Grandees; ſo that the government of Perſia, which was anciently very mild, became by his means one of the moſt deſpotic and abſolute in the world (11). Abas recommended to his ſucceſſor as a good political maxim, to puniſh corporally the Grandees of the kingdom when they committed a crime, but to inflict pecuniary mulcts only on the common people on thoſe occaſions, giving this as a reaſon, that the rich have ever been more ſenſible of the infamy which corporal puniſhment is attended with, than the loſs of any part of their poſſeſſions; whereas the poor are always more affected with the loſs of theirs than with any other puniſhment. This maxim of Abas has been ever ſince obſerv'd in Perſia, ſo that when any of the nobility commit a crime that is not capital, they are condemned to receive a certain number of ſtrokes with a cane on the ſoles of their feet, of which they often die (12). Another ſecret, but dangerous maxim of government, he recommended to his ſucceſſor was, that if he hoped to reign in peace, he muſt ſow diviſion among his ſubjects. Abas himſelf practis'd this maxim with great ſucceſs, by introducing into each city of his kingdom colonies of foreigners, from ſuch provinces as were the moſt incompatible in their language, cuſtoms, manners and way of living, whereby he eſtabliſhed in every city of his kingdom two different factions, which ſubſiſted till the laſt revolution: This Prince being ſenſible of the great advantages of commerce to enrich a nation, and that nothing is more proper to invite foreign merchants than the ſecurity of their perſons and effects from all violence and inſults, applied himſelf particularly to provide for the ſecurity of the high-ways; and the regulations he made for that purpoſe are excellent, and highly worthy of imitation (13).

(10) Id. ibid. p. 91.
(11) Id. ibid. p. 92.
(12) Hiſt. de Revol. de Perſe, p. 84, 85.
(13) Tavernier's Voyages, tom. 1. Paris edit. 1681. p. 556.

tapeſtry behind which the Aga Juſuf was conceal'd, who liſted up his arm by the means of a ſmall cord of ſilk, while Timerbeg made a ſhew of propoſing to him the ſeveral grievances of the people who ſtood at the other end of the hall, and of receiving his judgment upon them; by this artifice Abas's death was kept from the knowledge of the public for ſix weeks. See Olearius and Pietro della Valle's Voyages into Perſia.

ABAS (Schah) the ſecond ſon of Sefi, and grandſon to Schah Abas the Great, was the ninth King of Perſia of the race of the Sophis. This Prince ſucceeded his father Sefi when but thirteen years old in 1642, after having run the hazard of being made incapable of the ſucceſſion. Schah Sefi his father, whoſe cruelty was ſo great as not to ſpare his only ſon, commanded one of the principal eunuchs to paſs the iron before the eyes of young Abas, without giving any reaſon for ſo barbarous a ſentence. Sefi intended undoubtedly, that the eunuch ſhould paſs a red-hot iron before his ſon's eyes [A]; but as he had not expreſſed himſelf clearly, the eunuch pitying the young Prince, and being perſuaded, that as the King had no other heir he would afterwards repent ſo cruel an order, taking advantage of this equivocal expreſſion, only paſs'd a cold iron before the Prince's eyes; and told the King his orders were executed. In the mean time Abas, being inſtructed by the eunuch, counterfeited the blind man ſo well, that every body believ'd he had really loſt his ſight. When Schah Sefi was upon his death-bed, he lamented bitterly that he had depriv'd himſelf of the only heir he could leave the crown to, by having render'd Abas incapable of ſucceeding him. While he was under this extremity of affliction, and often declar'd to thoſe about him, that he could die ſatisfy'd, provided he had a ſon to ſucceed him; the eunuch, who ſaw his end approaching, aſſured him he had a ſecret whereby he could reſtore the Prince to his ſight, of which he was ready to give him a proof. The King tranſported at what he heard, immediately diſpatched two of the principal noblemen, with orders to bring the Prince before him; and finding the eunuch's ſecret had its effect, his joy was ſo great, that it prolong'd his life for ſome days. Abas the ſecond's reign was very different from that of his father Sefi [B]; and 'tis certain, that if we except Iſmael the firſt, and Schah Abas the firſt, there never was a greater Prince of the race of the Sophis than Abas; though, like the former Abas, he was not exempt from imperfections. Abas being but thirteen years old when he aſcended the throne, as was before obſerv'd, committed the affairs of the kingdom to his mother, and to Athemat-Doulet, a venerable old man in whom ſhe placed great confidence. They govern'd very peaceably for three years, till Jani-Kan, a nobleman of great power and intereſt, envying Athemat's exalted fortune, and miſinterpreting a word which the King had dropt in converſation, went, as tho' by the orders of his Sovereign, and aſſaſſinated him. The King's mother was enraged at this, and believing herſelf inſulted in the perſon of Athemat-Doulet, ſhe urg'd the King to revenge the murther. Abas being then ſixteen years of age, was forc'd to diſſemble; but ſo far from puniſhing Jani-Khan, he gave him the employments and the eſtate of Athemat, and two days after created him Generaliſſimo of Perſia, whereby he had thirty thouſand men under his command. This new miniſter might have ſupported himſelf much longer in the King's favour, notwithſtanding the hatred his mother bore him, had he not conſpired to take away her life; but Abas was oblig'd, as ſoon as he was informed of it, to put him and all his accomplices to death [C]. The young Prince having by this act of vengeance eſtabliſh'd his authority, took the reins of empire into his own hand. Abas was eighteen years old when he laid ſiege to the city of Candahar, which had ſurrender'd in his father's reign to the Great Mogul; but he made himſelf maſter thereof, and of all the province about it, and preſerv'd it ever afterwards, in ſpite of all the efforts of that Indian Emperor, who beſieg'd it more than once with an army of three hundred thouſand men. The longer Abas reign'd, the more he endear'd himſelf to his ſubjects, and became the dread of all his neighbours. He was a great lover of juſtice, and ſhew'd no mercy to ſuch governors of provinces, or other officers, as oppreſs'd the people, of which there are many inſtances in his life [D]. He had a noble and [A] That he ſhould paſs a red hot iron before his eyes.] Depriving criminals of their ſight is a puniſhment very frequent amongſt the Perſians, and the manner of inflicting it, was formerly by paſſing a red hot piece of iron before their eyes (1).

(1) Chardin Voyage de Perſe, tom. 2. p. 214.

[B] Abas the ſecond's reign was very different from that of his father Sefi.] The reign of Schah Sefi was a ſeries of cruelty and ſlaughter, he being the moſt blood-thirſty Prince that ever ſat on the throne of Perſia; ſo that it became proverbial among the Perſians, that he came into the world with his hands full of blood. Abas the firſt had alſo foretold that he ſhould bathe his hands in blood, which proved but too true in the ſequel. The firſt act of his cruelty was againſt his only brother, whoſe eyes he order'd to be put out. He alſo gave a command, that his two Uncles, whom his father Abas had deprived of their ſight, ſhould be thrown down a rock, alledging for his reaſon, that being blind they were good for nothing elſe in this world. He likewiſe put to death the moſt conſiderable noblemen of his empire, many of whom were particularly attach'd to his perſon and family. Nor did his barbarity ſtop here, for he buried his own mother, his aunt, and forty of his concubines alive all together in a deep ditch, which he had ordered to be dug for that purpoſe. An inſtance of barbarity exceeding even that of Nero and Caligula.

[C] Put him and all his accomplices to death.] Tavernier (2) declares, this was by the order of Schah Sefi his father; but Chardin, who was much better informed, and in every reſpect more exact than he, aſcribes it to Abas the ſecond.

(2) Tavernier's Voyages to Perſia.

[D] Many inſtances in his life.] Schah Abas was ſo rigorous and inflexible on theſe occaſions, that he never pardoned any perſons who were found guilty (3). A remarkable example of which we have in the puniſhment of one of his own Nazars or Great Maſters of the houſhold. For this man, though his particular favourite, he ordered to be ſtrip'd naked, cauſed him to be expos'd to the heat of the ſun for three days, and to the inclemency of the air for as many nights, and afterwards condemn'd him to perpetual impriſonment, and to wear a chain about his neck, for having ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by bribes.

(3) Id. ibid. book 5. c. 5, 6, & 7.

and elevated ſoul, lov'd foreigners, and openly protected the Chriſtians [E], whom he would not ſuffer to be moleſted in any manner on account of their Religion, ſaying, that God alone was Lord of the conſciences of men. As for myſelf, ſays he, 'tis my duty to preſide over the external government of the ſtate, and to take care that all my ſubjects, of what Religion ſoever, may have juſtice equally adminiſtred to them [F]. He form'd a noble deſign, viz. to extend the limits of his kingdom towards the north, for which he had made conſiderable preparations; and it was generally believ'd Abas would have been ſucceſsful, he having levy'd a powerful army of choſen troops, and found means to amaſs vaſt ſums of money without burthening his ſubjects, by keeping vacant many of the great, but unneceſſary poſts of the kingdom, and retrenching from his own private expences. By this good œconomy, upwards of twelve millions of crowns were brought yearly into the treaſury. But death put a ſtop to all his great deſigns. He fell ſick at one of his country-ſeats, ſix miles from Damagaan, a city of the province of Tabriſtan, and after having languiſh'd four months in a diſeaſe, into which a virulent Lues Venerea had thrown him, he dy'd the 25th of September 1666, aged thirty ſeven years, leaving two ſons, but without naming which of them ſhould ſucceed him.

[E] Protected openly the Chriſtians.] The favourable ſentiments which this Prince and the other Kings of Perſia, ſince Abas the firſt, entertain'd for the Chriſtian religion, may be aſcrib'd to their being born of Georgian women. For ever ſince Abas the great conquer'd that country, the Sophis of Perſia have had their Haram or Seraglio ſupplied by Ladies of that country, who being originally Chriſtians, not only preſerve a veneration for the religion of their fathers, but alſo inſpire their ſons who are educated in their ſight till they are ſeven years old, with a particular regard for it. Schah-Abas the ſecond was ſo prejudiced in favour of Chriſtianity, that nothing could offend him more than to hear any one ſpeak ill of it; and many of his Courtiers incurred his diſpleaſure, and were diſgraced on that very account. Some aſcribe the death of Athemal-Doulet, who governed in his minority to the invincible averſion he diſcovered on all occaſions againſt it; and the Armenians of his time uſed to ſay amongſt themſelves, that Abas was more a Chriſtian than a Mahometan (4). I believe no great credit ought to be given to a common report which prevailed among the people at that time, viz. That Abas was baptized a little before his death by his Phyſician F. Raphael, a Capuchin, who was in great favour with him. I ſhould think there is the greater reaſon to doubt of the truth of this, ſince Chardin, who in his hiſtory of the coronation of Solyman ſeems pretty well informed of all the particulars of the death of this Prince, does not mention a word of ſo remarkable an incident; ſo that we may rather conclude it to be a fiction of the Romiſh Miſſionaries.

(4) Chardin's Coronation of Solyman, p. 169. Paris edition.

[F] May have juſtice equally adminiſtred to them.] There is a ſhining inſtance of this ſpirit of toleration in Abas, and his impartial equity to all his ſubjects, on occaſion of a Perſian's having ſtabb'd an Armenian Chriſtian, for taking a fiſh, which they look upon as ſacred, out of the baſon of a Moſque. The criminal being abſolved by the Sedre or High-Prieſt of the kingdom, who declared, that the Armenian had been juſtly killed; Schah-Abas hearing of it was of a contrary opinion, deſpiſed the ridiculous reaſoning of the Prieſt, who pretended that the taking of a conſecrated fiſh was ſuch a ſacrilegious crime, as the firſt who ſaw it, had a right to puniſh with death: Abas therefore reprimanded the Prieſt ſeverely, condemned him to pay a fine to the benefit of the family of the deceaſed Armenian, and puniſhed the murtherer as he deſerved.

☞ ABASSON, a famous Impoſtor, went into France, where he pretended to paſs for a Perſian Prince; by this means he got from ſeveral perſons of diſtinction conſiderable ſums of money, which he ſpent in company with wicked and profligate wretches. From France he went to Iſpahan the capital of Perſia; there he conceal'd himſelf from morning till night, in order to get thoroughly acquainted with the language and manners of the Perſians. Paul Lucas the traveller, who gives an account of this Impoſtor, tells us he had ſeen him often ſtudying his part. In a few years, Abaſſon thinking he was now well prepar'd to appear in publick, perſuaded a Perſian lady of his acquaintance [A], that he was brother to the King of Perſia, ſon of Solyman, and great-grand-ſon of Abas the great: that his mother, who was an Arabian, had hid him immediately after his birth, for fear the King ſhould ſacrifice him, in like manner as he had done his other brothers. He alſo made her believe, that having wander'd up and down ſeveral countries, he reſolv'd at laſt to return to Iſpahan, with an intention to free his countrymen from the tyranny of a Prince, who unjuſtly poſſeſs'd a crown to which he only had a right by his birth. To make his ſtory the more plauſible, the cunning Abaſſon ſhew'd an emerald, on which he had cau'd to be engrav'd the name of Solyman, with that of a ſon of his, born indeed of an Armenian woman, but who dy'd a child. He likewiſe pretended that ſeal had been given him, as a token by which, if occaſion offer'd, he might make himſelf known for the true ſon of Solyman. In a little time he had ſo far infatuated ſeveral Armenians, that they adviſed him to go into Turkey, and beg the Sultan's aſſiſtance, in order to reſtore him to the Perſian throne. The Armenians collected among themſelves a large ſum of money, which they gave to Abaſſon, together with ſeveral bills of exchange upon the Armenian merchants at Conſtantinople. Abaſſon thus furniſh'd, went to that city, where the Armenians receiv'd him with open arms. The Grand Signior having had notice of his arrival, offer'd him five hundred rixdollars (a) a day, and a guard of Janizaries; but the haughty Abaſſon refus'd theſe offers, as being beneath the dignity of ſo great a Prince. This magnanimity, as his friends call'd it, endear'd him more and more to the Armenians, who furniſh'd him liberally with money, ſo as to enable him to live in a manner ſuitable to his birth. But worldly felicity is not laſting; for the Grand Signior began to ſuſpect Abaſſon to be an Impoſtor: ſo that he gave orders to have him ſeiz'd, upon which he was carry'd under a ſtrong guard into the iſle of Lemnos in the Archipelago. In the mean time the Grand Signior ſent an Aga to Iſpahan, to enquire into the truth of the whole affair. Abaſſon hearing this, was deeply afflicted; he apply'd to the French Conſuls in the Levant, in order that by their intereſt he might get leave to go to France. The Conſuls, impos'd upon by the ſeal abovemention'd, wrote to Count Pontchartrain in France in favour of this mock-prince; but before they could have an anſwer, the Aga had inform'd the Grand Signior, that Abaſſon was an Impoſtor. Upon which his pretended Perſian Majeſty was beheaded, by the Turkiſh Sultan's order, together with three of his abettors; and their heads were expos'd to the view of the whole army before the Viſier's tent, to teach all ſuch Impoſtors as Abaſſon, not to impoſe upon the credulity of the people, by ſpecious fictions; becauſe the truth never fails, ſooner or later, to come to light (b).

[A] Perſuaded a Perſian lady.] It is uſual with Impoſtors and Hereſiarchs to practiſe firſt upon the fair ſex, and to endeavour to inveigle them; becauſe they know women generally have a great aſcendant not only over their husbands, but alſo over other men. Their power is often ſo great and ſo unlimited, that even men of honour, of birth and quality, and capable of ſerving their country, muſt be contented to lead a private life, if they will not ſubmit ſo far as to addreſs ſome proud and ambitious woman who bears ſway in courts, and diſpoſes of all the poſts and preferments. Thus under the late French King, Madam de Maintenon was ſo powerful, that not the leaſt favour could be obtain'd but by applying firſt to her. Even the Princes of the Blood were oblig'd to make court to that lady. But this was no new grievance; there are inſtances of it in the hiſtory of the commonwealth of Rome. Lucullus, the moſt worthy man of his time, of whom Abbé St. Real ſays, that one thing only could be laid to his charge, viz. that he did not know how to be vicious (1); Lucullus, I ſay, notwithſtanding all his ſhining qualities, could not obtain the government of Cilicia, nor the command of the army againſt Mithridates, without humbling himſelf before Præſcia, and making love to her. This Præſcia was a woman notorious at Rome for her lewdneſs. Cethegus, then the idol of the people, was in love with her, and ſhe had ſo great an aſcendant over him, that to obtain any thing from Cethegus, people were obliged to apply to Præſcia; and to procure the people's favour, Cethegus was to be courted. Lucullus, tho' an enemy to Cethegus, and deſpiſing Præſcia, was nevertheleſs prevail'd upon to pay her ſome reſpect; which ſhe miſtaking for love, was the prouder of it, becauſe Lucullus was univerſally eſteem'd, and had till then ſeem'd little inclin'd to gallantry. Præſcia return'd his addreſſes in a ſatisfactory manner, reconciled him with Cethegus; who blindly believing any thing his miſtreſs told him, was laviſh in all places of the praiſes of Lucullus; apply'd to the people in his favour, and at laſt obtain'd for him the government he deſir'd (2). Thus a man of great abilities and uncommon merit, was promoted to an honourable poſt by the mediation of a woman, nay a lewd woman. I don't know whether the Perſian lady, our Abaſſon apply'd to, was of the ſame character with Præſcia; but in all likelihood Abaſſon would have gain'd little credit among the Armenians, had he not been ſupported by her powerful intereſt.

(1) Oeuvres de St. Real, tom. 1. p. 207.

(2) Id. ibid.

(a) A Rixdollar is worth about four ſhillings and ſixpence of our money.

(b) Paul Lucas Voyage dans la Turquie, &c. en 1714, tom. 1. p. 56.

☞ ABBADIE (JAMES) an eminent French Proteſtant Divine, was born at Nay, a town within four leagues of Pau in Bearn, in the year 1654. After he had made a ſufficient progreſs in claſſical learning, under the inſpection and encouragement of the famous John la Placette, miniſter of Nay, he was ſent to the Academy of Sedan, where he ſtudied philoſophy and divinity. From thence he went into Holland, and afterwards into Germany; and having receiv'd holy Orders and the degree of Doctor of Divinity, he was miniſter of the Elector of Brandenburg in the French church of Berlin. But he left that place about the year 1690, and came over into England, and was for ſome time miniſter of the French church in the Savoy, London. Some time after, the Deanery of Killalow in Ireland being vacant, he was promoted to that dignity, which he enjoy'd till his death. Having made a tour into Holland in order to publiſh one of his books, ſoon after his return he was taken ill at London, and dy'd at St. Mary la Bonne, near London, on the 25th of September 1727, in the 73d year of his age. He was a ſtrenuous aſſertor of the orthodox or primitive doctrine of the Proteſtants, as appears by his writings, which are numerous [A]. Beſides an uncommon knowledge of the learned languages and the claſſical authors, he was well vers'd in eccleſiaſtical and prophane hiſtory. But what rais'd and ſupported his reputation was his elevated genius, great penetration, and ſtrong nervous eloquence.

☞ ABBAS

[A] His writings are numerous.] He publiſh'd the following books. Sermons ſur divers textes de l'Ecriture. Leiden 1680, in 8°. This volume contains four ſermons. Panegyrique de Monſeigneur l'Electeur de Brandebourg. Rotterdam 1684, in 8°. Traité de la Verité de la Religion Chretienne. Rotterdam 1684, in 8°, 2 vol. A ſecond edition of the ſame in the year 1688, with large additions. This book was ſeveral times reprinted in France, and tranſlated into Engliſh, Dutch, &c. Reflexions ſur la Preſence réelle du Corps de Jeſus Chriſt dans l'Euchariſtie; compriſes en diverſes Lettres. La Haye 1685. in 12°. Reprinted at Rotterdam in 1713. But the author diſown'd theſe editions, as being full of typographical errors, which often perverted the ſenſe, or made it unintelligible. Les Caracteres du Chretien & du Chriſtianiſme; marquez dans trois ſermons ſur divers Textes de l'Ecriture, avec des Reflexions ſur les Afflictions de l'Egliſe. La Haye 1685, in 12°. Traité de la Divinité de Nôtre Seigneur Jeſus Chriſt. Rotterdam 1689, in 8°. L'Art de ſe connoitre ſoy-même, ou la Recherche des Sources de la Morale. En deux Parties. Rotterdam 1692, in 8°. It has been reprinted ſeveral times in France, and tranſlated into various languages. The High-Dutch Tranſlation is printed at Augsburg in 1712, in 8°. Defence de la Nation Britannique, où les Droits de Dieu, de la Nature, & de la Societé, ſont clairement établis, au ſujet de la Revolution d'Angleterre, contre l'Auteur de l'Avis important aux Refugiez. Londres 1692, in 8°. Reprinted in Holland. Panegyrique de Marie Reine d'Angleterre, d'Ecoſſe, de France, & d'Irlande, de glorieuſe Memoire, decedée à Kenſington le 18 Decembre 1694. La Haye 1695, in 12°. Hiſtoire de la derniere Conſpiration d'Angleterre. Avec le detail des diverſes entrepriſes contre le Roi & la Nation, qui ont precedé ce dernier Attentat. Londres 1696, in 8°. This book was written by order of King William, and extracted from the memoirs and original papers communicated to the author by the Earl of Portland, and Sir William Trumbal Secretary of State. It was reprinted in Holland, and tranſlated into Engliſh. La Verité de la Religion Reformée. Rotterdam 1718, 2 vol. in 8°. Dr. Lambert, Biſhop of Dromore in Ireland, judging that this book might be proper for the inſtruction of the Roman Catholics of his Dioceſe, deſired a Clergyman, who was his friend, to tranſlate it into Engliſh; but when the Biſhop ſaw that verſion he diſliked it, and tranſlated it himſelf. Le Triomphe de la Providence & de la Religion,

* Note this name is ſometimes written with a ſingle b, becauſe the Arabians very rarely write any double letters; their uſual way being to ſet this mark (ω), which they call Teſdid, i. e. a forcing or doubling over ſuch letters as they intend ſhall have a double ſound as عباس ω ω Abas for Abbas, &c. See Erpenius's Grammar, p. 21, &c.

☞ ABBAS *, the ſon of Abdalmothleb or Abdolmutalib, and uncle of Mahomet; at firſt rais'd a war againſt his nephew, whom he eſteem'd an impoſtor and an infidel: but he having been vanquiſh'd and taken priſoner by Mahomet at the battel of Bender, which happen'd in the ſecond year of the Hegira, he was ſet at a very great ranſom. Whereupon one day complaining to Mahomet, he ſaid; Can you think it reaſonable to reduce your own uncle to ſuch a wretched poverty, as will bring a diſhonour on your family, by forcing him to beg his bread from door to door. Mahomet, who knew that Abbas had got large ſums conceal'd, reply'd, What then are become of thoſe purſes fill'd with gold, which you gave to your mother to keep for you the day you came from Mecca? Whereupon Abbas being very much ſurpriz'd at Mahomet's knowledge of what he thought had been extremely ſecret [A], began to have a better opinion of his nephew than he formerly had, and to think him an extraordinary perſon; and thereupon promiſed him not only to pay his ranſom, but alſo to embrace his new religion; which accordingly he did: and ſome years afterward he declar'd publickly, That God had been pleas'd to reſtore to him the money he had ſo disburs'd an hundred fold, which he eſteem'd as an effect of God's favour [B] to him for embracing Muſulmaniſm. After this he became one of Mahomet's principal captains, and fought on his behalf at the battel of Henain againſt the Thakefites in the eighth year of the Hegira, which was ſome time after the taking of Mecca. It was at this battle that Mahomet's life was in great danger, and he had certainly been loſt, had not Abbas, who had an exceeding ſtrong and loud voice, recall'd and re-animated the flying ſoldiers with theſe words: Oh ye ſervants of God! Don't you know his prophet is here? Where will you flee? Where will you hide yourſelves? Are you the faithful people ſpoken of in the Scripture, and to whom the promiſes of God are made, and will you deſert the Prophet of God? &c. Theſe words of Abbas being ſpoken with a piercing and lofty tone, ſo animated the flying Muſulmans, that they return'd to the charge, and reſcu'd their Prophet from the hands of his enemies. But this our Abbas was not only a good Soldier, but alſo a Doctor of the Muſulman Law, and became very knowing therein in a ſhort time; for all their learning then conſiſted in reciting and explaining the chapters of the Alcoran, which Mahomet pretended were ſent to him from Heaven from time to time: and next, to preſerve in their memory certain apocryphal hiſtories which paſſed among them for prophetic traditions. But in that kind of learning our Abbas was greatly ſurpaſſed by his ſon, uſually nam'd Ebn Abbas, i. e. the ſon of Abbas. Our Abbas was ever had in great veneration by the Muſulmans, and both the Khalifs, Omar, and Othman, never came into his preſence on horſeback, but they alighted on foot to ſalute him. He died in the thirty ſecond year of the Hegira; and a hundred years after his death, one of his grandſons, viz. Abul-abbas, ſirnamed Saffah, was proclaimed Khalif, and in him began the Dynaſty, or government of the Abbaſſides, who poſſeſſed the Khalifate for the ſpace of 524 years: and there were thirty ſeven Khalifs of his Race, who ſucceeded one another without any interruption. His ſon Ebn Abbas Abdallah, couſin-german to Mahomet, was grandſon to Abdalmothleb, who was the grandfather of the falſe Prophet. He was one of the moſt conſiderable of thoſe Muſulman Doctors, who are by way of eminence denominated Sabahah, i. e. the companions of the Prophet; and his authority has a preference beyond all of 'em in the doctrine of traditions [C]. 'Tis reported of him, (but without foundation) That the Angel Gabriel, who had brought the Alcoran to Mahomet, appear'd to him at the age of ten years, and endu'd him with a perfect underſtanding of that Book, and that therefore he was dignified with the title of Targiuman Alcoran, i. e. the Interpreter of the Alcoran. He dy'd in the ſixty eighth year of the Hegira; on whoſe death there was an univerſal cry, That the Grand Rabbani [D] (i. e. the great Doctor or Inſtructor) of the Muſulmans is dead. Herbelot, p. 3.

☞ ABBASA, ſiſter of Harun Raſchid, fifth Khalif of the race of the Abbaſſides. (See the next article.) The Khalif her brother marry'd her to Giafer his favourite, upon this hard condition, That they ſhould not bed together: but their reciprocal paſſion made them forget, or diſregard the condition; ſo that a ſon was born to them, ou l'Ouverture des ſept Sceaux par le fils de Dieu: où l'on trouvera la premiere partie de l'Apocalypſe, clairement expliquée par ce qu'il y a de plus connu dans l'Hiſtoire & de moins conteſté dans la parole de Dieu. Avec une nouvelle & tres ſenſible Demonſtration de la Verité de la Religion Chretienne. Amſterdam 1723, 4 vol. in 12°. Beſides theſe books, he publiſh'd ſome ſermons ſeparately, and ſome other ſmall pieces, which met with as great approbation as his other works. A little before he dy'd, he put out propoſals for printing a new edition of all his works, in 4 vol. 4°, which was to include ſome new Pieces that had never been made publick; but was prevented by death.

[A] Extremely ſecret.] 'Tis poſſible Abbas was much ſurpriz'd at the diſcovery of this ſecret; and yet 'tis more than probable Mahomet was no Prophet as to the means of the diſcovery: for tho' he was expel'd Mecca, he had yet many friends and agents there, who might be ſuppos'd to have ſome knowledge of the affair tranſacted between Abbas and his mother, and conſequently convey that knowledge to Mahomet.

[B] As an effect of God's favour.] I cannot ſee any good ground for this Faith or Hypocriſy, (call it which you will) in Abbas, ſince he, ſoon after the fight at Bender, join'd with Mahomet, became a coadjutor of his councils and actions, and conſequently ſhar'd with him in his future rapines and conqueſts; which in a few years augmented their fortunes, as Abbas ſays, an hundred fold.

[C] The doctrine of traditions.] The whole body of the Mahometan Religion, like that of the Jews, conſiſts either in the book call'd the Coran or Alcoran, or in another book of traditions call'd Sonnah. See the article ABOU-HANIFAH.

[D] The Grand Rabbani.] The word Rabbani, or Rabbana, ſignifies both in Arabick and Hebrew, our Maſter, or our Inſtructor. The Muſulmans likewiſe call ſuch of their Doctors as they eſteem the moſt ſpiritual and devout, Rabbanian and Rabbanioun, (in the plural number.) See Herbelot, p. 704. B.

them, whom they ſent ſecretly to Mecca to be nurs'd. This being afterwards diſcover'd by the Khalif, was the cauſe of both their misfortunes [A]; for Giafar, according to ſome authors, thereby loſt the favour of his Sovereign; and Abbaſa being baniſh'd the imperial palace, was reduc'd to a moſt miſerable ſtate. Some years after, Abbaſa happening to meet with a great lady her former acquaintance, the latter was vaſtly ſurpriz'd to ſee her in ſo mean and deſpicable a dreſs; and asking how ſhe who had been ſo rich, was now become ſo poor; Abbaſa anſwer'd, Once indeed I had four hundred ſlaves at my command; but my condition is now ſo much chang'd, that two ſheep-skins ſerve me, the one as a ſhift and the other for a gown. Abbaſa ſaid farther, That ſhe aſcrib'd her misfortunes to her ingratitude for the benefits ſhe had receiv'd from God in the time of her proſperity: And declar'd, That having acknowledged her crime, and been truly penitent for it, ſhe then liv'd contented. The lady hearing this gave her five hundred drachms of ſilver, (about ſeven or eight pounds); at which Abbaſa was as joyful as if ſhe had been reſtor'd to her former grandeur. In the Arabic collection, entitled Saba, 'tis ſaid that this Princeſs had an elevated genius, and compos'd elegant verſes. And Abou Hagelah relates, that there is a very moving ſonnet of Abbaſa's to Giaffer her husband. We give a ſtanza of it, tranſlated from the Arabic, in the Remarks [B].

[A] The cauſe of both their misfortunes.] An eminent Perſian hiſtorian accounts for it as follows. (1) Khondemir. "Harun Raſchid having a ſiſter call'd Abbaſa, whom "he tenderly lov'd, and a chief favourite named "Giafer, whoſe converſation gave him very great "delight, was in effect ſuddenly deprived of both, "his ſiſter withdrawing her ſelf into the moſt ſecret "apartment of the court-ladies, where ſhe would "ſcarce admit of the Khalif's viſits; and Giafer, "having loſt much of that wit and gaiety wherewith "he us'd to entertain him. Harun being uneaſy at "this, ſoon found that the mutual affection which "Giafer and Abbaſa had for each other was the cauſe "of it, and therefore to ſatisfy in ſome meaſure their "paſſion, which he perceiv'd was very violent, he "reſolved they ſhould marry; hoping by that means "to enjoy the pleaſing converſation of both without "ſcruple or difficulty. He indeed annext to it this "hard condition, viz. that they ſhould neither bed "together, nor have any manner of familiar con-"verſe, except in his preſence. But notwithſtanding "this reſtriction, the inclination of the young Lady, "made her ſtrongly urge Giafer, who was young and "very handſome, to a more intimate correſpondence. "Giafer, being likewiſe naturally amorous, could not "long reſiſt the ſollicitations of his fair-one, and ſoon "found means ſecretly to ſatisfy her deſires. Abbaſa "proving pregnant not long after this, was delivered "of a male child, but ſo privately that the Khalif "could never have known it, had not one of her "ſlaves diſcover'd it to him. In the mean time they "had ſent the child to Mecca to be nurs'd, which "being whiſper'd in the Khalif's ear, he took a "journey thither upon pretence of a pilgrimage, but "before his arrival into that city, the infant had been "ſo ſecretly conveyed into the province of Yemen or "Arabia Felix, that Harun could not trace it with any "certainty. Upon this, 'tis ſaid, the Khalif form'd a "reſolution of deſtroying Giafer and his whole fami-"ly, call'd the Barmecides, which was very numerous."

(2) Abul Pharagius's Hiſtory of the Dynaſties of the Khalifs, or Mahomet's ſucceſſors.

Another celebrated author (2) gives the following account of this incident. "The 108th year of the "Hegira (anno Dom. 802.) Al-Raſchid, ſeizing on "the Barmecides put Giafer to death, which is "aſcrib'd to the following cauſe. Raſchid was ac-"cuſtomed whenever he wanted to relax his cares "with drinking, to make Giafer and Abbaſa the com-"panions of his pleaſures, and was ſo delighted with "their converſation, that he could not bear the "abſence of either. It happened that Raſchid in one "of his jovial entertainments with them, ſaid thus to "Giafer, I'll give Abbaſa to thee for a wife, ſo far as "to gaze upon, and converſe with her in my pre-"ſence, but not to touch or converſe with her in "in private. Giafer accepted of her on theſe terms; "but they being both young, ſoon found an oppor-"tunity of gratifying their mutual wiſhes, ſo that "Abbaſa became pregnant and was deliver'd of male "twins. Raſchid hearing of this was ſo exaſperated, "that he cauſed Giafer to be beheaded, and confin'd "Jahia his father and his brother Fadhel (3) in the pri-"ſon of Rakka, where they remain'd till their deaths. "And writing to his governors and miniſters of the "provinces, he order'd all the Barmecides throughout "his dominions to be ſeiz'd, and at the ſame time "poſſeſs'd himſelf of all their eſtates. This being "done, he commanded Abbaſa to be ſhut up in a "tower, where ſhe was put alive into a well, or ra-"ther thrown into a dungeon (4), and ſending for "her two children, they appear'd like orient pearls "in his eyes, when gazing upon them he could not "forbear weeping, but at laſt, he gave orders for "their being thrown into a well or pit, which was "no ſooner done but the ſame was fill'd with earth." Some other Arabic authors mention this incident, but not with any clearneſs. Erpenius (5) ſays ſomething of it, but mentions only one ſon.

(3) There were two other brothers alſo impriſon'd. See the articles FADHEL and GIAFER.

(4) Pocock has render'd this, as tho' Abbaſa was buried alive in a well; but I take the ſenſe rather to be, that ſhe was kept alive in a cloſe priſon or dungeon.

(5) In Hiſt. Saracen.

[B] We give a ſtanza of it tranſlated from the Arabic.] This copy of verſes was written after their ſeparation, and therein ſhe laments her being fruſtrated the enjoyment of his company, by reaſon of the cruel commands of her brother.

I had reſolv'd to keep my love conceal'd
In the receſſes of my aching heart;
But ah! the little Rover's on the wing,
And, ſpight of me, betrays what I wou'd hide,
If this fond overture does not recall you,
My honour, and my ſecret,——both are loſt.
Or, if I yield to (6) his ſevere command,
'Twill ſave my life, but then I ſhall be wretched--
Happen what will, at leaſt, I ſhall not die
Unmourn'd and unreveng'd, ſince my ſad exit
Will palpably point out the dire aſſaſſin.

(6) Harun's.

Abbaſa wrote theſe lines to Giafer her husband, before ſhe ſuffer'd him to violate the too rigorous orders of her brother. They abound with the ſofteſt ſentiments of love for him, and diſcover the dilemma ſhe is in, whether ſhe ought to obey the dictates of her paſſion, or the Khalif's ſevere injunction She writ 'em in an ambiguous, obſcure manner, purpoſely that her brother might not diſcover her to be the author of 'em.

☞ ABBASSIDES. 'Twas in the hundredth year of the Hegira, which anſwers to the common Æra of Chriſtians 718, and under the Khalifate of Omar II. that Mahomet (a) Herbelot, p. 4. the ſon of Ali, and grandſon of Abdallah, and great grandſon of Abbas (a), began to publiſh his pretenſions to the Khalifate: he was therein ſupported by many great lords of the Empire, who ſent twelve ſelect perſons into the province of Khoraſan and elſewhere, to incite the people in favour of the Abbaſſides againſt the Ommiades, who then poſſeſſed the Khalifate. Theſe reported and ſpread thro' all thoſe parts, That the Abbaſſides were the true ſons of the houſe or family of the Prophet, as being deſcended from Haſchem and Abdalmothleb, the paternal uncles of Mahomet; and that the Ommiades had uſurp'd from them the Empire, which ought to have been hereditary in their family, and to belong to the blood of their firſt Prince and Legiſlator. See the articles OMAR ſon of Abdelaziz, and MARVAN. Now as the Abbaſſides treat the Ommiades as uſurpers; ſo the Alides, or deſcendants of Ali, treat the Abbaſſides in the ſame manner, but not with the ſame ſucceſs: for they have all along pretended that the Khalifate belong'd to them by direct and plain right, as being neareſt of kin to Mahomet. And this has been a frequent cauſe of diſturbances in the empire of the Abbaſſides. See the article ALIDES. They compute thirty ſeven Khalifs of this family of Abbas, who reigned from the 132d year of the Hegira to the year 656, during the courſe of five hundred and twenty three Arabic or lunar years, two months, and twenty three days. This race hath been ſo prolific, that in the 200th year of the Hegira, under the Khalifate of Al-Mamon, the number of the men and women of this Houſe amounted to 33000. Notwithſtanding which, after they had reign'd five hundred and twenty three years, the people of Egypt, &c. in the year of the Hegira 656, refuſed to acknowledge them, when Moez the Fathimite was there proclaimed Khalif; and the authority of the Abbaſſides was not re-eſtabliſh'd, until Saladine, Anno Chriſti 1171. reſtor'd it *. This family having been in the ſaid year 656 ſubverted by the Tartars, obtain'd notwithſtanding, about three years after, ſome ſhadow of authority (at leaſt as to religion) in Egypt: for Bibans, Sultan of the Mamalucs, reviv'd it there, and caus'd it to be ſupported in ſuch ſort, that Selim the Turkiſh Emperor, on his conqueſt of Egypt, found remaining there one of thoſe Phantoms, nam'd Khalif Moſtangedbilla, whom he carry'd with him to Conſtantinople. The hiſtory of theſe laſt Abbaſſides, Khalifs of Egypt, hath been written by Diarbecri, and inſerted in his Chronicle entitled Alkamiſi. But the hiſtory of the former race hath been written by divers authors, viz. Tarick al abbas, and Akhbar beni al abbas; alſo Abdalla, the ſon of Houſain, the ſon of Bader Kateb, hath treated of them: and Soiouthi hath wrote a particular book of their excellencies, entitled, Aſſas fifadhl beni al abbas. We are to know, that after the death of Mahomet there ſucceeded him as Khalifs, 1ſt, Abubecre; 2dly, Omar; 3dly, Othman; after whoſe death the Khalifate became divided into the Alides, the Ommiades, and the Abbaſſides. See the articles ALIDES and OMMIADES. The Abbaſſides ſucceeded in the order hereunder [A].

* See a particular account of the manner of this reſtoration in the Excerpta from Abul-Feda, ch. 5. lately publiſh'd at Leyden by Albert Schultens, in his Life of Saladine.

[A] Succeeded in the order hereunder.]

1. The firſt Khalif of the race of the Abbaſſides was Aboul Abbas Saffah, as was before ſhewn. He was the ſon of Mahomet, the ſon of Ali, the ſon of Abdallah, the ſon of Abbas. See before. He reigned four years and nine months.
2. Abougiafar Almanſer the brother of his predeceſſor, He reign'd two years.
3. Mahadi the ſon of Almanſor. He reigned ten years and one month.
4. Hadi the ſon of Mahadi, reigned one year and three months.
5. Harun Raſchid the ſon of Mahadi and brother of his predeceſſor. Reigned ten years and eight months.
6. Amin ſon of Harun Raſchid, reigned four years and nine months.
7. Al Mamon the ſon of Harun and brother of Amin his predeceſſor, reigned twenty years three months.
8. Motaſſem the ſon of Harun and brother of the two preceding, reigned eight years, eight months, and eight days.
9. Vathec the ſon of his predeceſſor Motaſſem, reign'd five years, nine months and thirteen days.
10. Motavakkel ſon of Motaſſem and brother of Vathec. Reigned fourteen years, nine months and nine days.
11. Montaſſer, ſon of Motawakkel, reigned ſix months.
12. Moſtain, ſon of Motaſſem, and brother of Vathec and Motavakkel, reigned three years, nine months, and ten days.
13. Motaz, ſon of Motawakkel, and brother of Montaſſer, reigned three years, ſix months, and twenty one days.
14. Motadi, ſon of Vathec, and grandſon of Motaſſem, reigned eleven months and two days.
15. Motamed, ſon of Motawakkel, reigned twenty three years.
16. Motadhed, ſon of Moffic, (who was never Khalif) and grandſon of Motawakkel, reigned nine years and nine months.
17. Moctaffi, ſon of Motadhed, reigned ſix years, ſeven months, and twenty days.
18. Moctader, ſon of Moctadhead, and brother of Moctafi, reigned fourteen years and eleven months.
19. Caher, ſon of Moctadhed, and brother to Moctader and Moctaffi, reigned one year, five months, and ſeven days.
20. Radhi, ſon of Moctader, reigned ſix years, ten months, and ten days.
21. Moctafi, ſon of Moctader, and brother to Radhi his predeceſſor, reigned ſix years, eleven months, and fifteen days.
22. Moſtacfi, ſon of Moctafi, reigned one year, four months, and two days.
23. Mothi, the ſon of Moctader, and brother to Radhi and Moctafi, reigned twenty nine years and ſix months.
24. Thai, the ſon of Mothi, reigned ſeventeen years, ten months, and ten days.
25. Cader, the ſon of Iſhac, (who was never Khalif) and grandſon of Moctader, reigned forty one years and four months.
26. Caim or Cajem, the ſon of Cader, reigned forty four years and ſix months.
27. Moctadi, the ſon of Mohammed or Mahomet, (who was never Khalif) and grandſon of Caim, reigned nineteen years and five months.
28. * Moſtedaher, the ſon of Moctadi, reigned twenty five years, ſix months and fifteen days.
29. Moſteraſched, the ſon of Moſtedaher, reigned ſeventeen years and two months.
30. Raſched, the ſon of Moſteraſched, reigned two years.
31. Mottaki, the ſon of Moſtedaher, reigned twenty four years and eleven months.
32. Moſtanged, the ſon of Mottaki, reigned eleven years.
33. Moſtadhi, the ſon of Moſtanged, reigned three years and eight months.
34. Naſſer, the ſon of Moſtadhi, reigned forty ſix years and eleven months.
35. Daher, or Dhaher, the ſon of Naſſer, reigned nine months and fifteen days.
36. Moſtanſer, the ſon of Daher, reigned eighteen years and eleven months.
37. The laſt Khalif of Bagdat was Moſtazem, the ſon of Moſtanſer, who reigned eleven years and ſeven months. But three or four years after his death and the ſubverſion of this Khalifat, as aforeſaid, there appear'd in Egypt another Moſtanſer, a Prince of the ſame family, who was acknowledged for Khalif (i. e. a ſucceſſor of Mahomet) in thoſe parts, and founded a ſecond Dynaſty or race of Abbaſſides: but theſe poſſeſs'd the dignity of Khalif, as to matters of religion only, and being poſſeſs'd of no temporal eſtate never pretended to any temporal power. See what is ſaid of 'em above, and for their ſucceſſion ſee article MOSTANSER, and other particular articles there mentioned. W.

* Note the Saracenic hiſtory, publiſh'd by Erpenius, ends with this Khalif.

☞ ABBESS, the Superior of Nuns and Canoneſſes in monaſteries of virgins. Tho' Nuns are more ancient in the Church than Monks, there nevertheleſs were Abbots long before Abbeſſes. The firſt virgins, who conſecrated themſelves to God, uſed to reſide in their father's houſes. Afterwards, in the fourth century, they went and lived together in monaſteries; but not having any churches aſſign'd them, they always went to the cathedral or parochial churches with their Superiors. In the time of St. Gregory there were churches in almoſt all the convents of Nuns. Formerly the Abbeſs was elected by the Community, who uſed to chuſe her among the eldeſt Nuns who was thought the moſt capable to govern the reſt; the Abbeſs elected, whoſe place was for life, was bleſſed by the Biſhop. Some Abbeſſes have claimed divers prerogatives that did not belong to them [A]. See ABBOT.

[A] Some Abbeſſes have claimed, &c.] It is certain, ſays Father Simon (1), that when women are placed at the head of monaſteries, they are very bold and preſuming; ſome Abbeſſes have ventured to give epiſcopal bleſſing, by laying hands and making the ſign of the croſs upon the heads of men; and though Charles the great forbid it, they yet diſregarded his edict, and went on in this cuſtomary way: nay ſome of them have been ſo ſelf-conceited, and entertained ſo good an opinion of their own talents and abilities that they dared to adminiſter baptiſm, and even to preach. Pope Innocent the third gave ſtrict orders to reſtrain the boldneſs of ſuch Abbeſſes as preſum'd to perform epiſcopal functions, which no way become their ſex.

(1) Biblioth. Critiq. de M. De Sainjore, t. 1. p. 6.

ABBEVILLE, in Latin Abbatiſvilla, capital of the earldom of Ponthieu in Picardy, on the river Somme, five leagues from the ſea, in the dioceſe of Amiens; was anciently, as its name ſhews, only an Abbot's country ſeat. 'Tis thought this Abbot was St. Riquier, (Richarius) or one of his ſucceſſors, who liking the ſituation and conveniency of this place, being two leagues from his abbey of Centule, firſt built a houſe (a), and afterwards a caſtle on it, where was a Priory ſubordinate to the Abbey (b). Hugh Capet took it from the Monks (c), to make it a ſtrong hold againſt the incurſions of barbarous nations; and fortifying it, gave it Hugh his ſon-in-law, who ſtiled himſelf Avoüé (Patron or Defender) becauſe the King his father-in-law had put St. Riquier's church under his protection. Angelram his ſon took no other title, till he had killed in battle the Count of Boulogne, and married his widow; for then he aſſumed the title of Count of Ponthieu, which his deſcendants enjoy'd (d). Abbeville is ſince become very conſiderable; 'tis ſo large, that ſcarce ten or twelve cities in all France exceed, or even equal it in circumference (e), ſays Sanſon, who in 1636, computed that it had thirty five, or forty thouſand inhabitants. 'Twas his native place; and what is remarkable, it gave birth within a few years to three eminent Geographers; himſelf, Peter Du-Val (f), and Father Philip Briet the Jeſuit. The river Somme is here divided into ſeveral branches, which run within and without the city. Authors don't agree with Sanſon (g), when he affirms that Abbeville was always the capital of Ponthieu [A], and much more ancient than any city of that county [B]; much leſs will they allow of his aſſertion, that this city was anciently call'd Britannia [C], and one of the moſt flouriſhing in Gaul, long before our

(a) Father Labbe, Tableaux Method. de la Geographie Royale, p. 322. edit. 12°.
(b) Sirmond. Notæ in Epiſt. 36. Alexandri III.
(c) Hariulfus, Centulenſis Monachus in Chronico Monaſterii ſui, lib. 4. cap. 12. apud Hadr. Valeſium, Notit. Gall. p. 1.
(d) Valeſii Notitia Galliar. p. 1.
(e) Sanſon Recherche de l'Antiquité d'Abbeville, p. 2.
(f) Son to one of Sanſon's ſiſters.
(g) Sanſon Antiquité d'Abbeville, p. 59, 60.

[A] Was always the capital of Ponthieu.] Father Labbe refutes him thus: Mr. Sanſon, you have not read the titles and records of St. Riquier's Abbey, which inform us, that under Lewis le Débonnaire, in 815, there were within the walls of Centule 2500 houſes, ſeveral artificers, a great many ſtreets, &c. and that Abbeville is rank'd among the towns and villages ſubordinate to Centule (1). If we may believe the verſe ſo often repeated in that Province.

(1) Labbe Tableaux Methodiq. p. 320. Edit. 12°.

Turribus à centum Centula nomen habet.

That is

(2) Ibid. p. 316, 317.

"Call'd Centula from its known hundred towers (2).

[B] Abbeville ... much more antient than any city of that county.] "This, ſay thoſe of St. Riquier (3) is an "untruth; ... And what have you, like antiquity, "in Abbeville, ſince your collegiate church of St. "Wulfran recognizes for its founder, William of "Talluas, and John his ſon, after anno Dom. 1100; "and that the Priory of St. Peter, of St. Bennet's "order, was founded but a few years before? For "as to the pariſh of our Lady du Chatel, it has "ſtill the appearance of a village." As to Fredegarius, whoſe teſtimony Sanſon quotes, to prove that Abbeville was ſtanding in the time of Ebroin the Maire; 'tis anſwered (4) that we are to read in chapter 96. Atque à Bacivo villâ evadens aufugit, and not Atque Abacivo villa evadens aufugit.

(3) Ibid. p. 320.

(4) Labbe Tableaux Methodiq. p. 321.

[C] That this city was antiently called Britannia.] Sanſon grounds his opinion on a paſſage of Strabo, who he thought declared (5), That Scipio enquiring of thoſe deputed from Marſeilles, what they knew of Britannia, Narbo, and Corbilo; not one of them could ſay any thing remarkable of thoſe cities, though they were the chief in all Gaul. Sanſon ſuppoſes that theſe Deputies diſcovered their ignorance in the matter, in the year of Rome 532, and gives this reaſon, viz. becauſe the Scipio who ask'd theſe queſtions, was he who loſt the firſt battle Hanibal gained over the Romans. He ſuppoſes, that this Scipio, in order to get intelligence of Hannibal's march, ſail'd to the mouth of the Rhone; and that it was there the Deputies of Marſeilles, who were come to pay him their compliments, could not anſwer his queries: but this we ſhall examine under the article Pytheas. Let us now take a view of Sanſon's other hypotheſes. He obſerves, I. That Narbonne, though one of the moſt antient and moſt flouriſhing cities of Gaul, is yet (6) named after that of Britannia, among the three cities which Scipio enquired after. II. That the Belgium in Cæſar's Commentaries, was a diſtrict of the Belgi (7), including the Beauvaiſis, Amienois, Artois, and perhaps the Vermandois and the Senliſiens. III. That thoſe who inhabited the coaſts of Great Britain came from Belgium (8), and have retained the names of the ſeveral cities whence they ſprung, as Cæſar informs us. IV. That according to Pliny's enumeration (9), thoſe he calls Britanni muſt have inhabited Ponthieu (10). V. That from the ſeveral parts of Belgium whence people croſt into England, 'tis natural to ſuppoſe that moſt came from the ſea-coaſt, that is, from Ponthieu. Sanſon infers from theſe particulars, that the Britanni of Pliny are the Chiefs of Belgium who came into England (11); that they at firſt retained their antient name, and gave it afterwards to the laſt mentioned country, and would not have been called Britanni, but from their capital city; conſequently, ſays Sanſon, this antient Britannia, the metropolis of Ponthieu, muſt have been the city which Scipio enquired about; now as Abbeville is the capital of Ponthieu, it therefore exiſted under the name of Britannia before the ſecond Punic war, and was then the moſt flouriſhing city of Gaul.

(5) Sanſon Recherche de l'Antiquité d'Abbeville, p. 4.

(6) P. 8.
(7) P. 39.
(8) P. 17.
(9) Lib. 4. cap. 17.
(10) Sanſon Recherche d'Abbeville, p. 46.
(11) Cluvier. German. Ant. lib. 2. cap. 27. prefers Britanni to Britanni.

It muſt be confeſs'd, that Sanſon has ſhewn ſome genius our Saviour. Father Labbe cenſur'd him very ſeverely upon this account, the particulars of which we ſhall give hereunder [D]. Abbeville enjoys very great privileges; and having never been taken, is call'd la Pucelle (the virgin or maiden) of the country (b); and its motto is, Semper fidelis, i. e. Always faithful. Thoſe who would know all that relates to this city, the privileges of its ancient inhabitants, the eminent men who were born or died in it, &c. (i) may peruſe L'Hiſtoire Généalogique des Comtes de Ponthieu, i. e. The Genealogical Hiſtory of the Counts of Ponthieu, printed in Paris for Francis Clouſier, anno 1657, in folio. The author has conceal'd his name under theſe Letters, F. I. D. J. M. C. D. which ſignify, Frere Ignace de Jeſus Maria, Carme Déchauſſé; that is, Brother Ignatius of Jeſus Maria, a bareſooted Carmelite. See the article SANSON (JAMES).

(b) Du-Val in his Traité de la France.

(i) I juſtly put an &c. this work abounding with numberleſs d'greſſions; ſuch as the chevalier Bayard, and others who have no relation to Ponthieu.

genius and erudition in this long train of hypotheſes and conſequences; but then the reſult will be chimerical and romantic, becauſe the whole is grounded on a paſſage taken in a wrong ſenſe. The matter ſtands thus. Strabo tells us (12), that Polybius conſidered what follows, as one of Pytheas's fabulous ſtories, viz. That not one of the inhabitants of Narbonne or Corbilo, the chief cities of the country; nor one of the deputies of Marſeilles, who waited upon Scipio, could tell him any thing remarkable concerning Britannia (Great Britain) upon his enquiring about it... This is the true ſenſe of the Greek text, as appears, both from the grammatical conſtruction, and the turn of mind of the writer in queſtion. Περὶ ἧς φησὶ Πολύβιος, μυησθεὶς τῶν ὑπὸ Πυθέου μυθολογηθέντων, ὅτι Μασσαλιωτῶν μὲν τῶν συμμιξάντων Σκηπίωνι οὐδεὶς εἶχε λέγειν οὐδὲν μνήμης ἄξιον ἐρωτηθεὶς ὑπὸ τοῦ Σκηπίωνος ὑπὲρ τῆς Βρεττανικῆς, οὐδὲ τῶν ἐκ Ναρβῶνος, οὐδὲ τῶν ἐκ Κορβιλῶνος αἵπερ ἦσαν ἄριστοι πόλεις τῶν τοῦδε (13). I mean Pytheas, who, to ſet off his rhodomontades and fictitious ſtories, always vaunted he would inform his readers of a thouſand particulars, which till then had been unknown. We may therefore believe, that he boaſted himſelf to be the firſt who had given an account of the Iſland of Great Britain, and drew his proof from hence; that Scipio could not learn any thing concerning it from the inhabitants of Marſeilles, of Narbonne or of Corbilo on the Loire, though theſe were the moſt flouriſhing cities of Gaul. 'Tis plain Sanſon miſtook the ſenſe of the antient Geographer, and probably was partly miſled by the Latin verſion following. Cujus Corbilonis mentionem faciens Polybius, ſimul Pytheæ refert commentum, Maſſilienſium ſcilicet qui Scipionem convenerant nullum quicquam habuiſſe dignum memoratu quod diceret interrogatus de Britannia, itemque Narbonenſium & Corbilonenſium, cum hæ tres urbes Galliæ omnium eſſent optimæ. An inattentive reader may ſuppoſe, that the three beſt cities of Gaul which the tranſlator mentions, are Britannia, Narbo and Corbilo; but if the paſſage be conſidered, we ſhall find that Βρεττανικὴ ſignifies there the Iſland Britannia; Strabo always expreſſing himſelf in this manner, without adding the word νῆσος, inſula (14) i. e. Iſland.

(12) Strabo, lib. 4. p. 190.

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) See, among other paſſages, book 1. p. 71.

(1) Cum in primordiis fidei pauci quidem, ſed probatiſſimi, monachorum nomine cenſerentur, qui a beatæ memoriæ Evangeliſta Marco, qui primus Alexandrinæ urbi Pontifex præfuit, normam ſuſcepêre vivendi. Caſſian. lib. 2. de Inſtit. Cœnob. cap. 5. That is, "In the beginning of Chriſtianity, a few perſons, but of the beſt note, were called Monks, who had received their ſtatutes or rule of life from Mark the Evangeliſt, the firſt Biſhop of Alexandria." Note, Mr. Selden in his Origines Eccleſiæ Alexandrinæ, p. 32 and 143, &c. has prov'd from undoubted authorities, that till the time of Demetrius XI. Patriarch of Alexandria, i. e. Anno Chriſti 175, there was no Biſhop in any of the Provinces of Egypt, and that St. Mark was neither Biſhop of Alexandria, nor ever inſtituted any Biſhop there.

[D] Father Labbe cenſur'd him very ſeverely upon this account.] He denounced war againſt Sanſon, and his firſt act of hoſtility was as follows. Britanniam Abbavillæus chalcographus interpretatur Abbeville, lepidiſſimo commento, quod non tam ex Pytheæ mendaciis, quam ex ignoratione linguæ Græcæ editum malignam in lucem demonſtrabimus alias, cum primum ſingularem illum de Britannia tractatum nanciſci & legere datum fuerit. That is; "The map-"engraver of Abbeville, (Sanſon) by a very pleaſant "fiction takes Britannia for Abbeville; which error "is owing, not ſo much to his following the falſities "of Pytheas, as from his ignorance of the Greek; "which we ſhall ſhew, when we get a ſight of his "extraordinary treatiſe on Britannia." Theſe are his words in his Pharus Galliæ antiquæ, printed at Moulins in 1644. Father Labbe had not then peruſed the book which Sanſon publiſhed on this ſubject in Paris, anno 1636: having only ſeen his new Phænomenon of Britannia; not in the large map of ancient Gaul, which Sanſon publiſhed in 1627, but in the ſmall one that appeared afterwards. This book falling at laſt into Father Labbe's hands, he refuted the foundations of it, anno 1646, in his Tableaux Methodiques de la Geographie Royale; and obſerv'd, that if Strabo's text is taken in Sanſon's ſenſe, the reſult would be, that the inhabitants of Marſeille knew abſolutely nothing of the city of Narbonne, the 532d year of Rome, tho' Marſeille had then ſtood near four hundred years, and Narbonne was a very flouriſhing city. Sanſon was ſenſible of the great ſtrength of this objection, and anſwered it to the beſt of his abilities (15). But would any one believe, thoſe of Marſeilles were ſo often at war with their neighbours, that they had no time or opportunity to hear of Narbonne? Don't we find by the paſſage of Juſtin (16) which Sanſon quotes, that before the year of Rome 362, they had often defeated the Carthaginians, and made an alliance with the people of Spain? Father Labbe did not gain much by his triumph; for Sanſon fell upon his Pharus Galliæ antiquæ, and almoſt demoliſhed it. We are to obſerve, that Sanſon wrote a reply (17), with regard to his hypotheſis concerning Britannia, which is ſtill in manuſcript.

(15) Sanſon, Recherche d'Abbeville, p. 76 & ſeq.

(16) Juſtin. lib. 43. cap. 5 & 6.

(17) See the Remark [A] towards the cloſe of the article PYTHEAS.

ABBEY. This name was given to the Monaſteries of men and women [A], when their Superiors took the title of Abbots or Abbeſſes. In the Empire of Germany Abbies were diſtinguiſhed into Singular and Collegiate. The Germans call the former Geſurſtete Abteyen, or Princely Abbies, becauſe their Abbot is a Prince of the Empire, and has a right to vote in the College of Princes. The Abbot of Fulde, who is Chancellor to the Empreſs, is the moſt conſiderable, and as it were the Primate of all the Abbots in Germany; ſo that in the Diets of the Empire, he has often pretended to the preeminence over the Biſhop of Hildeſheim, and even over the Archbiſhop of Cologn. The ſingular Abbies of Germany are Fulde, Kempten, St. Gall, Elwangen, Bergteſgaden, Corvey, Pruym, Stavlo, Weiſſenburg, Luterburg, Morbach. The Collegiate Abbies are, Weingarden, Salamonſweyer, Schuſſenriedt, Peterhouſen, Zwyfalten, Marchtal, St. Peter,

[A] This name was given to monaſteries of men and women.] The monaſtic life began in Egypt about the year 300, where a great many Chriſtians being perſecuted for religion, were obliged to fly their native country; though ſome authors think, there were Monks in Egypt long before the date abovemention'd (1). From Egypt the monaſtic life was introduced into Greece, where, about the year 370, St. Baſil gave it the form it now has. It was introduced in Italy ſo early as the year 350 by Athanaſius, but did not gain much ground at Rome and the places adjacent till the year 500, when St. Equitius and St. Benedict regulated it, and ſpread it over all Italy; but the inſtitution of the former did not laſt long. At that time Monks were not Clergymen, but Laymen, and were obliged to work for their ſubſiſtence, though they now and then received alms from charitable people; and, when their Convents were in towns, ſome ſmall gifts from the Church of the town, where they lived. Abbot Tritheme ſays, there were in his time fifteen thouſand monaſteries of Benedictine Monks, beſides the ſmall convents of that order (2): What a prodigious number of unprofitable or rather devouring vermin did thoſe monaſteries entertain? However, the Benedictine Monks have ſometimes been very uſeful to the publick; for their monaſteries were like ſo many inns where they received and entertained gratis, gentlemen and other travellers, and inſtructed youth (3).

(2) Fra. Paolo, Traité des Benefices, p. 37, 38.

(3) Mezeray, Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 678.

St. Peter, St. Heimeran, Urſperg, Quedlimburg, Eſſen, Hervorden, Andlau. Beſides thoſe Abbies, there are ſeveral which have been ſecular'd, and annex'd to the dominions of ſome Princes: ſuch is the Abbey of Hirfeld, which has the title of a Principality, and by the treaty of Munſter was granted to the Prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. See Otto Mencken, in his Notes upon Hormius; where he obſerves that the great Maſter of the Order of St. John has a ſeat in the Council with his Abbots, who are Princes. Abbeſſes are reckoned in the Colleges of the Prelates of the Empire. But as it would not be decent for them to be preſent in the Diets, where affairs of State are debated, they ſend deputies to act in their name. There are fifteen of thoſe Abbies, which I place in the ſame order with Imhoff, in his Notitia S. Rom. Germanici Imperii Procerum, lib. 3. cap. 29. Eſſenden, Buchau, Quedlimburg, Andlau, Lindau, Hervorden, Gernrode, Ratisbon two Abbies, Bortſcheid, Ganderſheim, Heggenbach, Gurenſel, Roten-Munſter, Baindt. The Abbies of Lindau, and the four laſt, are of the circle of Suabia; the others belong to the circle of the Rhine. There are alſo Royal and Imperial Abbies; theſe are monaſteries built and endowed by Kings and Emperors [B], of whom they are immediately held, and are not ſubject to the juriſdiction of Biſhops. They have this privilege, that Abbots cannot be preferred to them, nor inveſted with the Temporalities, but by the ſame Prince, from whom they receive the Croſier. This is an ancient cuſtom, as appears by the Charter of the Emperor Henry II, in 1012; and by Suger's Hiſtory of Lewis VI, King of France. Adam, Abbot of St. Denys being dead, the Monks unanimouſly elected Suger in his room; but that election could not take place till the King, who did not immediately hear of it, had eſtabliſhed Suger by his royal authority, as a perſon who was acceptable to him. As theſe Abbies were erected by the generoſity of Princes, the Abbots in return were bound to ſome feodal ſervice, and eſpecially to ſerve in the armies [C], or to ſend ſome perſon in their ſtead, as Du Freſne ſhews by ſeveral inſtances of the Abbots of St. Denys, and of St. Sulpitius at Bourges. In paying homage to the King, they uſed theſe words; I become your vaſſal, and I promiſe to be loyal till death.

There were no Abbies of women, at leaſt in France, till about the year 567, when Queen Radegunde, fourth wife of Clotharius the firſt, founded at Poitiers a monaſtery, by the name of the Holy Croſs. Several women followed her example; ſo that by degrees the kingdom was fill'd with Abbies, ſome of which are very rich, and of a royal foundation; as thoſe of Chelles, Poiſſi, &c. So early as the third Century, there were ſeveral maidens who reſolved never to marry, as Tertullian and Cyprian inform us. Thoſe uſed to live with their parents, or with ſome near relation, and were not yet confined to Cloiſters, only wearing a veil when they went to the publick places of worſhip, to which they reſorted with the other Chriſtians: ſuch were Paula and Euſtochium, to whom St. Jerom wrote ſeveral letters. Monaſteries were not built for Nuns, till the end of the ſixth Century. 'Tis ſuppoſed that the Abbey of Jouare in France is one of the moſt ancient; that it was erected about the middle of the fourth Century; and that the firſt Abbeſs of it was Thelechilde, who inſtructed Bertilla, the firſt Abbeſs of Chelles, in the principles of religion. Abbies have ſometimes been given to marry'd women, as Chriſtopher Juſtel obſerves (a). He mentions a charter belonging to the Monaſtery of Brioude, bearing date Anno 879. "As the Lords, ſays he, then "took the name of the eccleſiaſtical benefices they enjoy'd by the King's favour, and

(a) Hiſt. de la Maiſon d'Auvergne. lib. 1. chap. 6.

5 "call'd

[B] Endowed by Kings and Princes.] At firſt Abbies were not very rich; the Friars and Nuns, as well as the Clergy, were maintained by the alms and free gifts of the people; they had no property nor real eſtates; but in a little time they diſcovered a ſafe, ſecure, and inexhauſtible fund, by which they ſoon gained immenſe riches, I mean the fooliſh and ſuperſtitious credulity of the Laity. On this the Clergy both ſecular and regular went to work; they forged a thouſand Saints and Relicks, which were to be ſeen and worſhip'd in churches and monaſteries, where they performed numberleſs miracles. It would take up whole volumes, ſhould we give an account of theſe ſpurious Saints and Relicks, and their pretended miracles. In the church of the monaſtery of Glaſton in England, ſeveral valuable Relicks were kept, among which were "ſome remains of Rachel's Sepulchre, of "the Altar on which Moſes poured oil, of Moſes's "Rod, of the Manna, of Iſaiah's Sepulchre, and the "Relicks of the three children who were delivered "out of the fiery furnace." De ſepulcro Rachel, de altare Moyſi, in quo fundebat oleum, de virga Moyſi, qua eduxit filios Iſrael de Ægypto, de manna filiorum Iſrael, de ſepulcro Iſaiæ Prophetæ, reliquiæ de tribus pueris, quos liberavit Dominus de camino ignis ardentis, &c. (4). Nor were they leſs provided with Relicks relating to the New Teſtament: they ſhewed, among others, ſome parts of the place where Chriſt was born, two bits of the manger in which he lay, a bit of the gold the wiſe Men preſented him with; they alſo had part of the Virgin Mary's ſepulchre, a little of her milk, and a croſs of cryſtal which ſhe gave to the famous King Arthur (5). All other monaſteries abounded with ſuch like relicks, nay ſometimes the ſame Saint, or the ſame part of a Saint was found in ſeveral monaſteries or churches: thus the Monks of St. Hermeran at Ratisbon and thoſe of St. Denys in France equally boaſted they poſſeſs'd the body of St. Denys the Areopagite; and the head of John the Baptiſt was ſhewed in three or four places. Theſe Saints and Relicks daily wrought a million of miracles, on which occaſion the deluded laity flock'd to convents and churches, where they paid very dear for their ſuperſtitious credulity: ſee the book quoted in the margin (6). Beſides this the Monks and the ſecular Prieſts had the art of intoxicating widows, old maids, and other ſilly people, to ſuch a degree, that they obliged them to diſinherit their own relations, and bequeath their eſtates to churches or monaſteries, ſo that a father often diſinherited his own children to enrich a ſett of lazy Monks, or greedy Clergymen. This at laſt became ſuch a grievance, that Princes were forced to redreſs it (7). Charles the great enacted a particular law to this purpoſe (8) viz. That no Churches or Monaſteries ſhould receive legacies, by which the children or relations of any perſon were diſinherited.

(4) Monaſt. Anglic. Ed. Lond. An. 1655 cit Bibl. Crit. de Mr Sainjore (Father Simon) t. 3. p. 342.

(5) Id. ibid. p. 343.

(6) Bibliotb. Critique de Mr Sainjore, t. 3. c. 32, 33.

(7) Fra. Paolo, Traité des Benefices, p. 23, 24.

(8) Ibid. in Notis.

[C] To ſerve in the armies] Mezeray obſerves (9) that in the tenth Century, Biſhops and Abbots, notwithſtanding the repeated prohibitions of Princes and Councils, bore arms, and went into the field; which cuſtom at laſt became a law. The dignified Clergy at that time lived like Princes rather than like Apoſtles of Chriſt, and Miniſters of the Goſpel; they were ambitious, proud, and immers'd in all kind of vices.

(9) Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 464.

" call'd themſelves Abbots, Lay-Abbots, or Soldier-Abbots, Abbates Laici, Abbates " Milites, Abbatioli, Abbatiarii; tho' they had not the title of Abbots, but only en- " joy'd the income of their Abbies, whereof ſeveral inſtances are found in hiſ- " tory. It happened alſo that ſuch benefices were given to marry'd women: thus " Alpaïs, wife of Earl Begon, was Abbeſs of St. Peter of Rheims; Thietberge, wife " of Lotharius, was Abbeſs of Avenay in the year 864; Bertha, mother-in-law of " Otho I, was Abbeſs of Merenſtein in 952; Rothilda, mother-in-law of Hugues the " Great was Abbeſs of Chelles; Orgine, mother of Lewis IV and Greberge his wife, " were ſucceſſively Abbeſſes of St. Mary of Laon." See ABBOT.

☞ ABBON or ALBON, Abbot of Fleury or of St. Benedict, upon the river Loire, lived in the tenth Century. He was born at Orleans; his father's name was Letus, and his mother's Ermengarde. Abbon ſtudy'd firſt in the Monaſtery of Fleury, where he was taught the firſt elements of the Sciences by two learned Prieſts, Gunbolus and Chriſtianus. In that Abbey he receiv'd the religious habit from Wulfaldus, who was Abbot thereof. Abbon made a wonderful progreſs in Grammar, Arithmetic, and Logic; and going to Paris and to Rheims, apply'd himſelf to other branches of learning. He went to Orleans, and there learn'd Muſick: after which he went into England, by order of his Abbot, and at the preſſing invitation of Archbiſhop Oſwald, ſtay'd two years in England; during which he inſtructed the Monks of an Abbey of Benedictines, which Oſwald had founded. Abbon was ordained Prieſt by that Archbiſhop; and having gain'd the eſteem of the King and of the principal Nobles, who made him very rich preſents, he return'd to his Convent, of which he was choſen Abbot. Fulbert of Chartres calls him in one of his letters, the moſt learned Philoſopher, and the Teacher or Doctor of all France. He aſſerted vigorouſly the rights of the Monks againſt ſome Biſhops, who wanted to uſurp the tithes belonging to Monaſteries. This rais'd him ſeveral enemies, which oblig'd him to make an apology for himſelf, as he has done in his Letters. He went twice to Rome, once under Pope John XV; and a ſecond time, by the King's command, under Pope Gregory V. He compos'd the difference which aroſe between that Pope and the King of France, on account of Arnould Archbiſhop of Rheims, who had been depos'd by a Council held in that city, the Pope threatning to ſuſpend the whole kingdom from divine ſervice. Abbon having obtain'd from the Pope ſome new privileges for his Convent, return'd home again, and brought with him the Pallium for the Archbiſhop. See ARNOULD. Our Abbot, attended by ſome Friars, amongſt whom were Aimoin, went into Gaſcony, to reform the Monaſtery of Squirs, ſituated on the banks of the Garonne; but the women of the places adjacent and the Gaſcoon Friars, not liking the regulations he would make, and wanting to continue their diſſolute way of life, rais'd a ſedition againſt him (a), in which he was kill'd the 13th of November 1004; on which day the Martyrology of France and that of St. Benedict have fix'd his feſtival. He was a celebrated author [A]. See the circular Letter of the Monks of Fleury on the death of Abbon, and his Life written by Aimoin his ſcholar. Glaber. lib. 3. Fulbert of Chartres in Epiſt. Sigebert, de Viris Illuſtribus, c. 140. & in Chron. ad Ann. 990. Trithem. in Chron. Du Sauſſay. Voſſius. Du Breuil. Father Mabillon, Act. Sanct. Benedict. tom. 1. & in Analectis. Baillet Vie des Saints.

(a) Mezeray Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 466.

[A] He was a celebrated Author.] He wrote the lives of ſome Popes collected from the Hiſtory of Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius, or the Librarian; an apology directed to King Hugh Capet, and to Robert his ſon; the life of Edmund King of England; ſeveral letters to Pope Gregory V, and other perſons; a collection of canons or church laws, which the learned Father Mabillon publiſh'd; a treatiſe of Cycles, and ſome other ſmall tracts. His apology and ſome of his letters were printed at the Louvre in 1687, and at the end of the Codex Canonum Vetus (1).

(1) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. X Siecle.

ABBOT (George) Archbiſhop of Canterbury, author of ſeveral books [A], was a Sherman's ſon, and born at Guilford in Surrey anno 1562. He went thro' his ſtudies at Oxford, and in 1597 was choſen Principal of Univerſity College. Two years after, he was made Dean of Wincheſter, and continued ſo till 1609, when he ſucceeded Dr. Thomas Morton in the Deanery of Gloceſter. Hitherto his promotion had not been very quick, nor made much noiſe; but he afterwards roſe to great dignities in a very ſhort time; being appointed Biſhop of Lichfield on the third of December 1609; thence tranſlated to London in February 1610, and to Canterbury in March following (b). The favour of the Earl of Dunbar, whoſe chaplain he had been, contributed more to his advancement than either his learning, or his abilities as a preacher. His conduct did not pleaſe univerſally; it being thought ſtrange that an Archbiſhop ſhould pay a greater regard in his palace to his Secretary than to his Chaplains; and out of it, reſpect the Laity more than the Clergy. 'Twas ſuppos'd, that as he had never paſs'd thro' the lower benefices, to which a cure of ſouls is annexed; or in other words, had not known the difficulties which attend the ſpiritual direction of a pariſh, 'twas not ſo natural tural for him to be indulgent to the Clergy. His ſeverity towards theſe, and his conniving at the increaſe of the Puritans, made many people inveigh againſt him. The laſt circumſtance occaſion'd a modern author to obſerve, that if Laud had ſucceeded Bancroft, and the ſcheme for univerſal Conformity had not been interrupted under Abbot, the Schiſm would undoubtedly have been ſuppreſs'd in England (c). The Archbiſhop became obnoxious to King James, by not joining with that Monarch in his reſolution of marrying the Prince of Wales to the Infanta of Spain. This the Archbiſhop's enemies perceiving, fancy'd it a proper juncture to ruin him; hoping to impoſe upon the King, from a religious principle, by alledging the ancient Canons of the Church. The better to underſtand this, the reader is to know, that Archbiſhop Abbot had accidentally * kill'd the keeper of Burnhill Park, belonging to the Lord Zouch. Upon this, the Biſhop of Lincoln, then Lord-Keeper, inſinuated to the Duke of Buckingham, that the Archbiſhop was degraded ipſo facto, by the murther he had committed. He enforc'd his aſſertions from the laws of the kingdom, and the ancient ſeverity of church-diſcipline; and ſaid, he was afraid the Papiſts would draw an advantage from his Majeſty's ſuffering a man, whoſe hands had been imbrued in blood, to exerciſe the archiepiſcopal functions and the Primacy: in a word, he prevail'd ſo far, that a commiſſion was iſſued out, appointing certain Biſhops and other Lords to examine the affair. The reſult however was not ſatisfactory to his Grace's enemies; it being declar'd, That as the murther was involuntary, he had not forfeited his archiepiſcopal character. This was in 1621. Six years after, another ſtorm broke over his head, which cruſh'd him. But this is no wonder, ſince the King's favourite (d) bore him a grudge, for admitting certain perſons he hated, too often to his table, which was one of the moſt ſplendid at that time. The pretence for ruining the Archbiſhop, was his refuſing to licence a ſermon of Dr. Sibthorp's on apoſtolical obedience, tho' his Majeſty had expreſsly commanded him to do it. Upon this, he was ſuſpended from all his functions as Primate; and they were exercis'd by certain Prelates, of whom William Laud, afterwards his ſucceſſor, was one (e). Abbot then withdrew to the place of his birth, and afterwards to Croydon-Houſe, where he died, Auguſt 4. 1633. His monument, adorn'd with variety of ornaments and inſcriptions, is ſtill ſeen in Guildford church. He founded an hoſpital in that town, and endow'd it richly. There was another George Abbot [B] who publiſh'd in Engliſh, A Paraphraſe on Job, and Short Notes on the Pſalms, and Vindiciæ Sabbati (f). He liv'd in 1640.

(b) Ex Athenis Oxonienſibus, vol. 1.

[A] Author of ſeveral books.] The principal are, Quæſtiones ſex theologicæ totidem Prælectionibus diſputatæ. That is, Six theological Queſtions, argued in ſo many Lectures. Printed at Oxford in 1598. Dr. Hill's Reaſons for Papiſtry unmask'd. Printed at Oxford in 1604. Sermons on the Prophet Jonas. The Hiſtory of the Maſſacre of the Valteline *. A Geography; the ninth edition whereof, which is not the laſt, was publiſh'd in 1607, and the treatiſe on the perpetual Viſibility of the true Church, printed at London in 1624, but without the author's name.

* A country ſubject to the Griſons.

(c) Fuller's Worthies of England.

* With a croſs-bow.

(d) The Duke of Buckingham.

(e) Extracted from Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collections, Vol. 1. in which a pretty large tract of Archbiſhop Abbot on the proceedings of his ſuſpenſion is inſerted.

(f) Athenæ Oxonienſes, Vol. 1.

[B] There was another George Abbot.] Henninges Witte is miſtaken in his Diarium Biographicum, where he aſcribes the works of this George Abbot, viz. his Paraphraſe on Job and on the Pſalms, and his Vindiciæ Sabbati, to the Archbiſhop. He alſo makes him author of a treatiſe againſt Biſhops, and another againſt the Browniſts. 'Twould be very extraordinary for an Engliſh Metropolitan to write againſt Biſhops.

☞ ABBOT (GEORGE). We hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here ſome additions to the article of that great and good man, of whom Mr. Bayle, being a ſtranger to the Engliſh tongue, could not give a very full account. The motive for ſequeſtring Archbiſhop Abbot from his office and juriſdictions (a), as expreſs'd in the commiſſion itſelf, was that the Archbiſhop could not, at preſent, perſonally attend thoſe ſervices, which were otherwiſe proper for his cognizance and juriſdiction. But the true reaſon was [A] that the King was perſuaded, the Nonconformiſts to the diſcipline of the church, increaſed too much by the remiſneſs of his government (b). My Lord Clarendon treats Abbot with great ſeverity, when he draws his character thus. "He had been, ſays he, Head or Maſter of one of the pooreſt Colleges in Oxford, "and had learning ſufficient for that Province. He was a man of very moroſe manners, and a very ſour aſpect, which at that time was called gravity; made Biſhop "before he had been Parſon, Vicar, or Curate of any Pariſh Church of England, or "Dean or Prebend of any Cathedral Church, and was in truth totally ignorant of the "true conſtitution of the Church of England, and the ſtate and intereſt of the "Clergy [B], as ſufficiently appears through the whole courſe of his life. He conſi-"dered

(a) Baker's Chron. p. 460.

(b) Le Neve, The lives, &c. of all the Proteſtant Biſhops ſince the Reformation, vol. 1. part 1. p. 101, 102.

[A] The true reaſon was &c.] If we may credit Mr. Rapin, what exaſperated the King * and his Miniſters againſt the Archbiſhop was his refuſing to licenſe (1) Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon, in which that courtier maintained to the utmoſt the doctrines of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance; aſſerting, that the King only had the power of making laws; and that when Princes command things, which ſubjects cannot perform, either becauſe they are inconſiſtent with the laws of God or Nature, or becauſe they are impoſſible, ſubjects are nevertheleſs obliged in conſcience humbly to undergo the puniſhments inflicted for their diſobedience, without reſiſting, murmuring, or barely complaining; thus they muſt ſubmit to a paſſive obedience, where they cannot pay an active one: Sibthorp further ſaid, that he knew of no other caſes but thoſe mentioned, wherein ſubjects were not bound implicitly to obey their Prince (2). Theſe were opinions which Abbot could not digeſt, though they pleaſed the King and his Miniſters. The Biſhop of London would not have ſcrupled to licenſe Sibthorp's Sermon; but that would not have done the buſineſs of the miniſtry, who wanted to have Abbot ſuſpended from his functions, and therefore they ſent for his licence, knowing well enough that he would not grant it; this gave them an opportunity to exaſperate his Sovereign more and more againſt him. The King himſelf ſent one of the Lords of the bed-chamber twice to Abbot to try whether he could not overcome his ſtifneſs, but all in vain; the Archbiſhop continued inflexible, and this it was that drew the King's diſpleaſure upon him.

* Charles I.

(1) See alſo Le Neve, Lives of Biſhops, &c. p. 101.

(2) Rapin, Hiſtoire d'Angleterre, vol. 7. p. 336.

[B] Ignorant of the ſtate and intereſt of the Clergy.] It muſt perhaps be granted that Abbot did not labour to aggrandiſe the Clergy and enlarge their power. But it ſhould alſo be granted, that he underſtood well enough the conſtitution of England, and the true intereſt of the State. It was certainly the intereſt of Great Britain to maintain King Frederick upon the throne of Bohemia, in order to ſtrengthen the Proteſtant cauſe.

" dered the Chriſtian religion no otherwiſe than as it abhorred or reviled Popery, and " valued thoſe men moſt, who did that the moſt furiouſly. For the ſtrict obſervation " of the diſcipline of the Church, or the Conformity to the Articles, or Canons eſta- " bliſhed, he made little enquiry, and took leſs care; and having himſelf made a very " little progreſs in ancient and ſolid ſtudy of Divinity, he adhered only to the doctrine " of Calvin, and for his ſake did not think ſo ill of the diſcipline as he ought to have " done (c)." Abbot was nevertheleſs very much beloved and eſteemed by the people of England, to whom his diſgrace and baniſhment contributed to endear him more. Before he went to his houſe at Ford, the report of his misfortunes made the viſits of thoſe who came to take their leave of him ſo numerous and popular, that the diſpleaſure of the court againſt him was greatly increaſed, and when he was got to Ford, inſtead of his making ſubmiſſion to the King [C], he wrote a large narrative of his own caſe, which gave new occaſion to the court to be more offended againſt him (d). However, in the latter end of the year 1628 Abbot was ſeemingly reſtored to the King's favour (D), being ſent for to Whitehall, and received from his barge by the Archbiſhop of York and the Earl of Dorſet, and by them introduced with much ſolemnity to the King, who gave him his hand with a very favourable aſpect, bidding him not fail to pay his attendance at the council table twice a week (e). Notwithſtanding this ſeeming alteration of his affairs, as to his being reſtored to the King's favour, &c. he had afterwards little comfort in the exerciſe of his function. Whether an unconquerable ſorrow and concern for the caſual homicide he committed, might ſo far engroſs all his thoughts, as to render him too indolent and remiſs; or whether he did not ſee through the fineſſe of court policy in the late taking off his ſequeſtration, and imagined it done, not out of any reſpect to himſelf, but barely to pleaſe a party in the houſe of commons, whilſt moſt of his authority was devolved on the Biſhop of London (f), who afterward prov'd his ſucceſſor; which of theſe cauſes haſtened his end, I ſhall not pretend to determine, but take it for granted that one or both did (g). Dr. Welwood in his Memoirs, gives us the following character of Archbiſhop Abbot. " He was a perſon of wonderful " temper and moderation, and in all his conduct ſhewed an unwillingneſs to ſtretch the " act of Uniformity beyond what was abſolutely neceſſary for the peace of the church, " or the prerogative of the crown. Being not well turned for a court, though other- " wiſe of conſiderable learning, he was either unwilling or incapable to ſubmit to the " humour of the times, and now and then, by an unſeaſonable ſtiffneſs, gave occaſion " to his enemies to repreſent him as not well inclined to the prerogative, or too much " addicted to popular intereſt, and therefore not fit to be employed in matters of go- " vernment (h)." It ſeems that towards the latter end of his life Abbot was grown more ſevere againſt the Nonconformiſts, for one of his laſt acts of juriſdiction was an act of diſcipline to enforce conformity even beyond the rules of the church; an order and injunction that the pariſhioners of Crayford in Kent ſhould receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper kneeling at the ſteps aſcending to the communion table (i). This Archbiſhop was very charitable, as appears by an account of his alms and gifts reported by Mr. le Neve (k): and it is ſaid, that all the money he could ſpare he ſent to the Queen of Bohemia, for whoſe intereſt he was very zealous, as well as for that of the Palatines. Beſides the books mentioned by Mr. Bayle, Abbot wrote ſeveral other pieces [E].

(c) Clarendon, Hiſt. of the Grand Rebellion, apud Le Neve, loc. cit. p. 103, 104.

(d) Le Neve, ibid.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Laud.

(g) Le Neve, ubi ſupra. p. 110.

(h) Apud le Neve, ibid. p. 111.

(i) Id. ibid.

(k) Ibid. p. 114, 115.

ABBOT

Abbot was very well appris'd of this, therefore, when the news came to London that the States of Bohemia had offered the crown to the Elector Palatine, the Archbiſhop, who being then troubled with the gout could not go to court, wrote to Nawnton Secretary of State, " That in his opinion the Elector ought to " accept of the crown, and England ſhould ſupport " him in his pretenſions, and that, as ſoon as the " news of his coronation arrived, all the bells ſhould " be rung, the guns let off, and bonefires made every " where, that all Europe might know the King was " reſolv'd to maintain his ſon in law" (3). The King would not follow this advice as being founded on reaſons that ſavour'd of Puritaniſm, Frederick was forſaken, and every body knows what was the conſequence of it. This is one inſtance which ſhews that Abbot underſtood the intereſt of Great Britain. Another inſtance of his knowledge in ſtate affairs, and his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, was his vigorouſly oppoſing the intended marriage between the Prince of Wales, and a daughter of the King of Spain, and a general toleration of the Papiſts: the letter he wrote to King James I. on theſe ſubjects may be ſeen in Rapin (4), and in the authors quoted by him. This letter, ſays that Hiſtorian, ſhews, it was not without ſome reaſon, the Archbiſhop paſs'd for a Puritan, according to the notions of the court, who called all thoſe Puritans that would not aſſert the King's power to be unlimited (5).

(3) Rapin. ibid. p. 131.

(4) Ibid. p. 211.

(5) Ibid. p. 212.

[C] Inſtead of making his ſubmiſſion to the King.] What ſubmiſſion could he make, if his fault conſiſted only in refuſing to licenſe a Sermon, which tended to overthrow the conſtitution, and in not complying with the meaſures of the miniſtry, who would raiſe money upon the ſubjects by unwarrantable methods? Theſe were his crimes! crimes indeed againſt an arbitrary Prince and a corrupt and ambitious Miniſter; but which made him more ſhining in the eyes of all good Patriots, and beloved by the whole nation, for whoſe cauſe he ſuffer'd.

[D] He was reſtored to the King's favour.] Neither Mr. Wood (6), nor Mr. Bayle, nor Mr. Rapin take notice of this; they all ſpeak, as if Abbot had never been reſtored to his functions, tho' Mr. Le Neve, as we have ſeen, ſays expreſly, that his ſequeſtration had been taken off. Mr. Wood has committed another miſtake. At length, ſays he, Abbot being found guilty of a caſual homicide retired for a time to Guildford; afterwards removing to Croydon, he gave way to fate, in his palace there (7), though it is certain that he was cleared from all imputation of guilt, and according to that judgment had a ſpecial pardon paſs'd the ſeals, dated Nov. 22, 1621, which may be ſeen in Sanderſon's Continuation of Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. xvii. p. 337—340 (8).

(6) Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 585.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Le Neve, u ſupra, p. 99.

[E] He wrote ſeveral other pieces] viz. A Preface to the Examination of George Sprat London 1608 4^to^. A Sermon preach'd at Wincheſter, May 26, 1608, at the Funeral of Thomas Earl of Dorſet, on Iſaiah xl. 6. London 1608, 4^to^. A Narrative concerning his diſgrace at Court, in two parts, written 1627 (9). His Judgment of bowing at the Name of Jeſus, Ham. 1632, (9) Ruſhworth Collect. vol. 1. p. 434.

ABBOT (Robert) elder brother to the former, was alſo born at Guilford (a), and went thro' his ſtudies in Baliol College in Oxford. He was firſt Lecturer at Worceſter, then Rector of All-Saints in that city; and a little after, Rector of Bingham in Northamptonſhire: all this happen'd between 1581 and 1588. He took his Doctor's degree (of Divinity) in Oxford anno 1597, and was Chaplain in ordinary to King James, in the beginning of his reign. In 1609 he was made Maſter of Baliol College, and three years after, the King's Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford. The ſubject he choſe for his lectures pleas'd the King ſo much, and was treated with ſuch judgment and erudition, that 'tis believ'd this alone rais'd him to the See of Salisbury. His ſubject was the authority of Kings, which he defended againſt all the ſubtile attacks of Bellarmine and Suarez, as appears from his book, De ſuprema Poteſtate Regia, i. e. Of the ſupreme Power of Kings; Printed at London in 1619. He had publiſh'd a Latin treatiſe in 1613, which gave no leſs ſatisfaction than his lectures; and that was an anſwer to Eudæmon Joannes's Apology for Henry Garnet his brother Jeſuit. He was not long Biſhop, having been conſecrated December 3, 1615, and dying of the ſtone March 2, 1618 (b), about two years before he had marry'd a ſecond wife, which greatly diſpleas'd the Archbiſhop of Canterbury his brother (c). As he diſcover'd ſo much genius and learning, both as an orator and a writer, ſucceeding in all things, in preaching, in his writings, and in his lectures, in theſes, in diſputations, and in reſolving the moſt difficult queſtions to admiration; ſome have wondered, that he was not made a Biſhop ſooner: but for this three reaſons are aſſign'd; firſt, he was not ambitious; ſecondly, he was ſuſpected to be a Puritan; thirdly, his relations were not willing he ſhould leave the Univerſity, and his Profeſſorſhip for a Biſhoprick (d); but the laſt reaſon appears to me falſe. However this be, ſuch as have drawn a parallel between the brothers, affirm, that the Archbiſhop's Sermons were more eloquent, and thoſe of the Biſhop more learned. That the former had a better talent for affairs, and the latter was the abler Divine; and that the Archbiſhop's gravity was mixed with an air of ſeverity, whilſt that of the Biſhop was temper'd with ſmiles (e). The Biſhop paſs'd for a Calviniſt, (not of the rigid kind) becauſe he explained the tenet of Predeſtination, according to the Infralapſarii. Here follow the titles of his works [A]. Since his time there has been a Robert Abbot born in Cambridge, who wrote ſeveral books. He preached for ſome time in Kent, &c. and afterwards in London. The catalogue of the Bodleian Library makes three authors of this Robert Abbot, three being there mentioned under that name, and to them the books which were written by one only are aſcribed.

(a) In 1560.

(b) Mr. Witte ſays, that he died March 11. 1617. but what led him into this error, was, becauſe the Engliſh don't begin the year like other nations.

(c) Athenæ Oxonienſes.

(d) Fuller's Engliſh Worthies.

(e) Ibid.

1632, 8vo. A Letter to the Archbiſhop of York, deſiring him to put in practice the King's * deſire, that none ſhould preach but in a religious form, dated Sept. 4. 1622. printed in 1642, 4to. A Letter to Dr. Williams Biſhop of Lincoln Lord Keeper, to the ſame purpoſe, printed in 1642. Several Speeches and Diſcourſes in Parliament and elſewhere (10).

[A] The titles of his works.] Beſides thoſe already mention'd, he wrote The Mirror of Popiſh Subtilties, printed at London in 1594. Sermons on the 110th Pſalm. Printed in the ſame place, Anno 1601. A Defence of William Perkin's Reform'd Catholic, againſt Dr. Biſhop; and A Reply to this Doctor's Anſwer. London 1611. Theſe four, the titles of which I abridg'd, are in Engliſh. Antichriſti Demonſtratio contra Pontificios. Londini 1603 (1). Exercitationes de gratiâ & perſeverantiâ Sanctorum. Lond. 1618. Animadverſio in Richardi Thomſoni Diatribam de amiſſione juſtificationis & gratiæ, ibid. 1618. His Latin Commentary, in four volumes on St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans was found among his papers, and preſented to the Bodleian Library by Dr. Edward Corbet, husband of Mrs. Margaret Brent, daughter to Martha Abbot, who was only daughter and heir to Robert Abbot Biſhop of Sarum (2). This learned Prelate has ſhown his great skill in polemical Divinity, in every article of the Epiſtle to the Romans, which admits of controverſy.

* [Beſides thoſe books he wrote, The Old Way, a Sermon at St. Mary Oxon on Act Sunday, 8 July 1610. on Jerem. vi. 16. London 1610. 4to. (3). Addit. Rem.]

* James I.

(10) Wood Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 585.

(1) Scaliger applauds this work highly in the Scaligerana, p. 1 & 2.

(2) Vide the Engliſh authors quoted in the text of this article.

(3) Wood Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 431.

☞ ABBOT (1). This name was given particularly to the chiefs of the Friars in monaſteries, who were alſo call'd by the Greek Archimandrites, Ἀρχιμανδρίτης, the chief Monk. The ancient Abbots were either Monks, who had founded monaſteries, which they themſelves governed, as St. Anthony, and St. Pachomius did; or, the Abbots were appointed Chiefs by thoſe who had inſtituted the monaſtic life in ſome countries; or they were choſen by all the Monks of a convent. It was ordered by the fourth Canon of the council of Chalcedon, held in the year 451, that all the Abbots in the Eaſt with their monaſteries ſhould be ſubject to the Biſhops; the ſame decree was made in the Weſt, by the 21ſt Canon of the firſt council of Orleans, by the 19th of the council of Epaone, by the 22d of the IId council of Orleans, by the conſtitutions of Charles the great, and in the Canon Monaſteria 18, quæſt. 2. But ſuch was the ambition of Abbots and Monks, that notwithſtanding thoſe ſeveral laws and conſtitutions, there were at that very time divers monaſteries, who would not ſubmit to the juriſdiction of the Ordinary; and it appears, by the acts of the council held at Carthage in the year 525, under Archbiſhop Bonifacius, that the founder of a monaſtery, if he were not in holy orders, had the liberty to ſubject it either to the Archbiſhop of Carthage, or to any other Biſhop of Africa, as he pleaſed, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Dioceſan Biſhop. The council of Arles, held in the year 455, did alſo ratify the privilege, which the monaſtery of Lerins enjoy'd, of not being ſubject to the juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Frejus. Since that time ſome Abbots obtained for themſelves, and for their Abbies an exemption exemption from the Ordinary's juriſdiction [A], which ſometimes was granted by the Biſhop's conſent at the requeſt of the King, or the founder of the monaſtery. Abbots have had ſeats in councils [B], but below the Biſhops; and ſome were permitted to have the Croſier-ſtaff and Mitre; nay, there have been Abbots, who claimed a right to epiſcopal juriſdiction. Some have had the privilege not only to ſhave the crown of their Friars, but moreover to adminiſter the leſſer orders. It is ſuppoſed by ſome authors, that Pope Innocent VIII. granted to the Abbot of Citeaux, the power of ordaining Deacons and Subdeacons, and to conſecrate with epiſcopal bleſſing ſeveral perſons and things, as Abbeſſes, Altars, Chalices, &c. The large eſtates which [C] monaſteries became poſſeſs'd of in time, ſoon excited the covetouſneſs of the Laity [D]; for [A] An exemption from the Ordinary's juriſdiction.] Exemptions of convents were at firſt granted by the Biſhops; and all the Grandees, who founded monaſteries, were proud to make them enjoy ſeveral immunities, which in the beginning conſiſted only in this, that convents ſhould be free from paying certain charges and taxes: afterwards they obtained new privileges, and eſpecially the right of chuſing their own Abbots, and regulating the diſcipline of their monaſteries, and that at their requeſt the Biſhop ſhould ordain ſuch Prieſts as they deſired; at laſt they went ſo far as to make themſelves independent on the Ordinary; but this they could not obtain without the Biſhops conſent, the authority of the Pope, and the King's good will (1). Theſe exemptions encreaſing daily, the Pope at laſt pretended he alone had the right of granting them, and endeavoured to ſubmit all monaſteries to the holy See, notwithſtanding the vehement oppoſition of the Dioceſan Biſhops (2). Theſe favours were not granted gratis; the Abbots and Monks ſtripp'd their monaſteries of every thing valuable, to buy this independency, and made themſelves tributary to the Popes, paying yearly a certain ſum to the Apoſtolick Chamber. Such was at that time the corruption of their manners, that they ſpared no pains nor coſt, to indulge their vices without controul. It was however incumbent on all Abbots immediately after their election, to pay obedience in writing to the Biſhop, which they for the moſt part refuſing to do, the Council of Rheims made a particular Canon to oblige them to it; but they were ſo little inclined to ſubmit, that King Henry II. of England made heavy complaints to Pope Innocent II. againſt Hugo Archbiſhop of Rouen, who would oblige the Abbots of Normandy to pay obedience to him. Innocent ſeeing with how much earneſtneſs the King had writ to him, ordered the Archbiſhop not to inſiſt upon his right, for fear of ſome greater evil (3).

(1) 'Tis obſerv'd by Paſquier in his Recherches lib. 3. c. 3. That in the primitive church all titles were rather names of charge or ſervice than of honour or dignity, and that the word Abba or Father was introduced in the 2d Century to gratify the ambition of ſome who lov'd to have pre-eminence, and hence ſprung the title of Abbot, which induced St. Jerom in his Commentary on Galat. 5. to complain, that by an irregular ambition, men had aſſumed thoſe titles which Chriſt had aſcribed to God alone, i. e. Abba Father.

(1) Mezeray, Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 669.

(2) Id. ibid. p. 670.

(3) Id. ib.

[B] Abbots have had ſeats in councils.] In England before the conqueſt, they were often called to the Wittenagemote. Thus King Canute, in the fifth year of his reign, held a Wittenagemote (4) of Biſhops, ſeven Dukes, ſeven Earls, many Abbots, &c. wherein the Abby of Bury was exempted from the epiſcopal juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Elmham (5), which ſhews, that the exemptions of monaſteries were granted here in England by the King, and the great council of the nation, without much minding the Biſhop of Rome. Abbeſſes were alſo ſummoned to the Wittenagemote, as appears by the code of laws made in a Wittenagemote held at Barkhemſted by Wightred King of Kent: the decrees were ſigned by the King, the Biſhops of Canterbury and Rocheſter, the Abbots and Abbeſſes (6). The Ladies of birth and quality ſate in council with the Saxon Wita's; the Abbeſs Wilda, ſays Bede (7), preſided in an eccleſiaſtical ſynod. In Wightred's great council at Beconceld, A. D. 694, the Abbeſſes ſate and deliberated, and five of them ſigned the decrees of that council together with the King, the Biſhops and Nobles (8.) All Abbots that held their poſſeſſions by Barony were members of the Norman Parliaments, of theſe there were twenty ſix (9), viz. the Abbots of Glaſſenbury, Canterbury, Weſtminſter, St. Albans, St. Edmundsbury, Peterborough, Colcheſter, Eveſham, Winchcomb, Croyland, Battle Abbey, Reading, Abington, Waltham, Shrewsbury, Cirenceſter, Gloceſter, Bardenay, St. Bennet de Holme, Thorney, Ramſey, Hide, Malmsbury, York, Selby, to which muſt be added Taviſtock, by a particular patent a little while before the diſſolution. There were alſo two Priors, who had ſeats in Parliament, viz. the Priors of St. John and of Coventry. The Prior of St. John had the precedence of all Lay-Barons (10). Several other Abbots and Priors, that did not hold by Barony, were frequently ſummoned to Parliament, as were the Peers, and omitted when the King pleaſed (11). It happened ſometimes that theſe Abbots did not care to ſit in Parliament: thus the Abbot of St. James by Northampton being in the twelfth year of Edward the ſecond ſummoned to Parliament as a Baron, petitioned to be eras'd out of the roll of Barons, he not holding by Barony or Knight-Service in capite, his poſſeſſions being Frank-almain, and his name was eras'd out of the roll as he deſired (12). The Abbot of Leiceſter alſo being ſummon'd to Parliament as a Baron, petitioned the King to be eras'd out of the Barons roll, for that his abbey was founded by Robert de Bellamont, Earl of Leiceſter, and conſequently not held in capite, for which reaſon the King did grant quod idem Abbas, & ſucceſſores ſui de veniendo ad Parliamenta & conſilia noſtra vel heredum noſtrorum quieti ſint & exonerati in perpetuum, "that this Abbot and "his ſucceſſors ſhould for ever be diſcharged from "attending at the King's or his heirs Parliaments and "councils (13).

(4) Coke 9 Rep. Pref. 7.

(5) Thornhawgh Gurdon, Hiſt. of the High Court of Parliament vol. 1. p. 37.

(6) Id. ib. p. 26. a b.

(7) Bede lib. 3. cap. 25. p. 135. lib. 4. cap. 23, 24.

(8) Spel. Conc. tom. 1. p. 189. 101. 348. quoted by Gurdon, Hiſt. of Parliam. vol. 1. p. 201. See alſo p. 202. 207.

(9) Thorn. Gurdon ubi ſupra, pag. 193.

(10) Atkins's ancient and preſent ſtate of Gloceſterſhire.

(11) Gurdon, ubi ſupra, p. 193.

(12) Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 731. 734.

(13) Sir Edward Coke's Inſtitutes of the Laws of England, Part iv. 45. 49.

[C] The large eſtates of monaſteries.] That the reader may judge how rich they were grown, we will here ſet down an account of the number and revenues of abbies in England, about the time of Henry the Eighth when they were ſuppreſs'd. The abbies ſuppreſs'd in England and Wales were ſix hundred forty five, according to Camden, in his Britannia; their yearly revenue is computed at a hundred thirty five thouſand five hundred twenty two pounds eighteen ſhillings and ten pence. Beſides this, the money raiſed out of the ſtock of cattel and corn, out of the timber, lead and bells, out of the furniture, plate and church ornaments, amounted to a vaſt ſum, as may be collected from what was brought away from the monaſtery of St. Edmunds-Bury; it appears from records, that five thouſand marks of gold and ſilver, beſides ſeveral jewels of great value, were ſeized by the viſitors of that convent. As to the revenues of the abbies, they were ſometimes undervalued by the viſitors, perhaps in hopes of an eaſier grant or purchaſe; and therefore in all likelihood, upon rack-rents and modern computation the lands would riſe to near twenty times as much (14). Not to mention what they got by relics, which makes me recollect the following ſtory. A certain Monk called Frere Oignon, having been at Jeruſalem, ſaw there ſeveral valuable and curious relicks, among which were the following. "A bit of the finger of the Holy Ghoſt, as ſound "and entire as it had ever been; the ſnout of the "Seraphim, that appeared to St. Francis; one of the "nails of a Cherubim; one of the ribs of the Ver-"bum caro factum, (the Word made fleſh); ſome "garments of the holy Catholick faith; ſome rays of "the Star, which appear'd to the three Kings in the "Eaſt; a vial of St. Michael's ſweat, when he was "fighting againſt the Devil; a hem of Joſeph, which "he fetch'd when he cleaved his wood, &c. all which "things, adds the Monk, I have brought very de-"voutly with me home." Un Moine de St. Antoine raporte, qu'étant allé à Jeruſalem, le Patriarche lui montra pluſieurs reliques & entre autres celles-ci: un peu du doigt du S. Eſprit, auſſi ſain & auſſi entier, qu'il avoit jamais été; le muſeau du Seraphin, qui apparut à S. François; une des côtes du Verbum caro factum; des habillemens de la Ste. Foy Catholique; quelques rayons de l'Etoile, qui apparut aux trois Rois en Orient; une fiole de la ſueur de S. Michel quand il combattit le Diable, un han de Joſeph &c. leſquelles choſes, ajoute le moine, j'apportay fort devotement avec moy (15).

(14) Collier's Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. of Great Britain.

(15) Henri Eſtienne, Traité preparatif à l'Apologie pour Herod. chap. 39.

[D] Excited the covetouſneſs of the Laity.] In the beginning of Chriſtianity the church did not enjoy any real eſtate; firſt, becauſe Chriſtians, we are told, did not care to acquire any, believing the end of the world was near at hand; ſecondly, becauſe by the laws for even in the fifth Century, Kings and Princes ſeized upon the richeſt monaſteries in France and in Italy, either to enjoy the revenue themſelves, or to gratify their favourites with it; and though the Popes and the Biſhops oppoſed this grievance as much as lay in their power, they could never get it redreſſed till the reign of King Dagobert; who was a well-wiſher to the church, that is to ſay, (as the Roman Catholicks ſpeak) to the Clergy. But this grievance began again under Charles Martel, when ſeveral Laymen invaded part of the eſtates belonging to the monaſteries, and took alſo the title of Abbots: we meet in hiſtory with ſeveral Kings and temporal Lords, who enjoy'd that title. Pepin indeed and Charles the great revived the laws againſt thoſe who uſurped the Church-revenues; but notwithſtanding theſe laws, and the repeated addreſſes of the Biſhops, monaſteries ſtill remained in the poſſeſſion of Laymen: nay, Princes themſelves gave the income of them to their officers as a reward for their faithful ſervices; hence came the name of Benefice. Charles the Bald made ſeveral laws to render this cuſtom leſs general and grievous, but to very little purpoſe, for it continued under his ſucceſſors; ſince Philip I. and Lewis VI. and afterwards the Dukes of Orleans are called Abbots of St. Agnan of Orleans in the hiſtory of the church of that city written by Hubert. The Dukes of Aquitaine aſſum'd the title of Abbots of St. Hilary of Poitiers; the Earls of Anjou that of Abbots of St. Aubin; and the Earls of Vermandois that of Abbots of St. Quintin. This grievance ceaſed at laſt under the firſt Kings of the third family, which was that of the Capets; before that time the greateſt Lords did not deſpiſe the title of Abbot, which was then as honourable as that of Earl or Duke; they uſed to chuſe one of the Monks to govern the reſt in their ſtead, and he was ſtiled Dean. In ſome monaſteries the Friars themſelves elected a Superior, whom they called the Abbot. Hugues, Duke and Governor of Orleans, and the Province of Anjou, who was in great favour with King Charles the Bald, Lewis the Stammerer and his children, is very often called Abbot in the hiſtory of thoſe times. The Clergy often endeavoured to rectify this abuſe, and in the year 892 the Prelates of France held a provincial council at Rheims, in which they threatned to excommunicate Baldwin Earl of Flanders, becauſe he had ſeized upon the Abbey of St. Waaſt of Arras, and called himſelf Abbot thereof. Afterwards the revenues of abbies were not beſtowed on Laymen: but the ſecular Clerks deſired to have the abbies in commendam, which was granted them by the Pope's conſent. It ſeems thoſe commendams ſhould have been granted but for a limited time, but uſe has made them perpetual: however, the Pope grants them only as a particular favour, under a diſpenſation, and on condition that the perſon named to the abbey, ſhall take Prieſts orders, as ſoon as he is of age. At firſt abbies were very ſeldom given in commendam to ſecular Prieſts; but this cuſtom is now become ſo univerſal, that moſt abbies are held in commendam [E], that is to ſay, that a ſecular Prieſt bears the title of Abbot, and enjoys two thirds of the income of the abbey, as being in the place of a regular Abbot, tho' he has no authority nor juriſdiction over the Monks. According to the concordate or agreement made between King Francis I. and Pope Leo X. the commendatory Abbots are choſen by the King, but inveſted with the abbey in commendam by the Pope's Bulls. Some have been called Cardinal Abbots; this happen'd when two abbies, which had formerly been united, came to be divided; he that govern'd in chief one of thoſe abbies, was ſtiled the Cardinal Abbot. This title has alſo been granted by courteſy to ſome Abbots; thus Pope Calixtus granted it by a ſpecial bull to the Abbot of Cluny, who ſometimes ſtiled himſelf the Abbot of Abbots. Pontius Abbot of Cluny aſſum'd that title in the council held at Rome in the year 1116, which Cajetanus Chancellor of the laws of Rome, no corporation or ſociety of men could poſſeſs any real eſtate, nor receive any legacy, without the conſent of the Senate or the Prince (16). This did not hinder the church from amaſſing ſuch large ſums of money, that ſince the year 220 of the Chriſtian Era, they were envied by the Emperors themſelves. Decius ordered St. Laurence Deacon of Rome to be ſeized, in order to make himſelf maſter of the treaſure of that church (17); but the cunning Deacon ſuſpecting the tyrant's covetouſneſs, diſtributed beforehand all the money at once amongſt the poor of Rome, which was always the cuſtom when any perſecution was apprehended. And indeed moſt of the perſecutions, which the church ſuffered ſince the death of the Emperor Commodus, were occaſion'd by their riches: when the Prince or his officers wanted money, the readieſt way they had to procure it was to ſeize upon the eſtate of the church (18).

[E] Moſt abbies are held in commendam.] This is a grievance the Monks can hardly bear with; they exclaim bitterly againſt it. In the year 1673 Mr. Des Bois publiſh'd a book againſt that abuſe, with this title, L'Abbé Commendataire, The Commendatory Abbot; and the next year Mr. de Froimond publiſhed a ſecond part upon the ſame ſubject: a little while after came out a third part of that book, containing a letter written by Mr. Schouter, and ſome reflections made by Mr. De Bonneſoy (19). The commendatory Abbots were very hardly dealt with by the authors of this book, who ſhewed among other things what a great hardſhip it was, that Abbots ſhould enjoy the greateſt part of the revenue of monaſteries, without performing any functions, or taking the leaſt care of their Monks. Mr. Bayle however ſeems to make an apology for the commendatory Abbots, but indeed 'tis in an ironical way. "After all, ſays he, it is not "impoſſible to juſtify thoſe Abbots; for it is very "probable, that their birth and quality, their pomp "and luxury are, though indirectly, very ſerviceable "to the church and ſtate, and contribute much "more to weaken the Hugenots (20), than the "retirement, and all the writings, ſermons and mor-"tifications of a regular Abbot could do." Dans le fond il n'eſt pas impoſſible de juſtifier les Abbez commendataires, car il eſt fort apparent que leur qualité, leur éclat, & leur magnificence rendent indirectement de grands ſervices à leur Egliſe & à leur patrie; & contribuent à l'affoibliſſement des Huguenots tout autrement, que ne feroit la retraite, les écrits, les ſermons, & les auſteritez d'un regulier (21). However, father Simon thinks, that the regular Abbots were a worſe grievance than the Abbots who hold in Commendam; for theſe, ſays he, diſpoſe only of a third part of the revenue of their abbey, one part being appointed for the (16) Fra-Paolo, Traité des Benefices, p. 16.

(17) Prudentius brings in an officer of Decius ſpeaking to St. Lawrence after this manner. Quod Cæſaris ſcis, Cæſari da, nempe juſſum poſtulo; ni fallor, haud ullam tuus ſignat Deus pecuniam. That is, "Give to Cæſar "what you "know belongs "to Cæſar; I "ask nothing "but what is "juſt; for if I "am not miſ-"taken, thy God "does not coin "money." Apud Fra-Paolo, Traité des Benefices p. 15. in notis.

(18) Fra-Paolo, Loc. cit.

(19) Bayle, Rep. des Lett. tom. 4. p. 1033, 1034.

(20) This was written in the year 1685, before the final blow was given to the Proteſtants in France, by the repeal of the edict of Nantes.

(21) Bayle, id.

the Pope did not like, becauſe the title was new, and belonged more properly to the Abbot of Mount Caſſino, in the kingdom of Naples, becauſe that abbey is the firſt where the ſtatutes of St. Benedict were obſerved, and the Abbot of it is called, by the Emperors and Popes, the Vicar of that Saint over all the monaſteries of this order. The regular Canons have alſo given the title of Abbot to him who was at the head of the chapter. Theſe Abbots are mentioned in the ſecond council of Aix-la-Chapelle, where they are diſtinguiſhed from the Abbots of Monks; they are mentioned alſo in the conſtitutions of Charles the Great; nay, ſome chapters of regular Canons have given by courteſy the title of Abbot to Clergymen, who did not belong to the chapter. In the Greek church, ſome Abbots called themſelves univerſal Abbots, æcumenici univerſales, in imitation of the haughty ſtyle of the Patriarchs of Conſtantinople. The great maſter of the royal chapel was alſo ſtiled Abbot. The ſtatutes of St. Benedict mention ſome Monks, who claim'd the title of ſecond Abbots. When monaſteries were firſt founded, their Abbots were not in Prieſts orders; in proceſs of time ſome were ordained Prieſts, but not all. Sometimes the chief Curate or Rector of a pariſh was called an Abbot, and if we may credit Mr. Du Cange, there were generally three principal officers in every Pariſh. 1. The Abbot or Guardian, who is now called the Rector. 2. The Prieſt or Chaplain. 3. The Sexton, who was inferior both to the Abbot and Chaplain. The Prieſt or Chaplain had the cure of ſouls: the Abbot was to have an eye over the behaviour of the Prieſt, and to take care that the pariſh wanted nothing. Some Biſhops have been called Abbots, becauſe their Biſhopricks were originally abbies; ſuch were the Biſhop of Catane and of Mount Real in Sicily, who were elected by the Monks. The chief magiſtrate of the Republick of Genoa has alſo been called the Abbot, as appears by the treaty made between that State and Charles King of Sicily, in the year 1307, where Nicholas Frambe is often ſtiled, The Abbot of the People, Abbas Populi. * Blondeau, Biblioth. can. Pierre Diacre, Chron. Lib. 4. Hugues Biſhop of Cluni. Beſli, Hiſtoire des Comtes de Poitou. L'Abbé Commendataire. Du Cange, Gloſſarium Latinitatis.

the maintenance of the Monks, and the other for the neceſſary charges of the monaſtery; whereas the regular Abbots had the diſpoſal of the whole income, and let their Monks ſtarve, whilſt they ſpent their revenue by living in a manner very unbecoming their profeſſion. I am confident, ſays Father Simon, that the Monks don't wiſh that regular Abbots ſhould be reſtored to the ſame power they had formerly; and he quotes Abbot Trithemius, who deſcribes very ingenuouſly the ſtrange depravation of manners, and ſcandalous way of living of the regular Abbots of his time. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find here, in what manner he reproves them in a publick oration deliver'd in 1493. "You, gentlemen Abbots, ſays he, that "are ignorant and perfect enemies to the knowledge "of ſalvation; you, that ſpend whole days in whoring, drinking and gaming; you that mind nothing "but this world, how will ye anſwer for your ſelves "before God and before St. Benedict your founder?" Vous, Meſſieurs les Abbez, qui êtes des ignorans, & ennemis de la ſcience du ſalut, qui paſſez des journées entiéres dans les plaiſirs impudiques, dans l'ivrognerie, & dans le jeu, qui vous attachez aux biens de la terre, que repondrez vous à Dieu, & à votre fondateur St. Benoit (22)? Trithemius aſſerts further, that of ten thouſand monaſteries there were not a thouſand that kept the ſtatutes of their orders, and that all Abbots lived a lewd and diſſolute life (23). Abbots were anciently obliged to preach to their Monks on certain days; and there is a ſtatute in the order of Citeaux, by which it is enacted, that the Abbots ſhould preach every Sunday in the year, except on Trinity Sunday, when they are excuſed becauſe of the difficulty of the ſubject then to be explained (24), which ſhews, by the way, what little notion was entertained of their parts and learning.

(22) Hiſtoire &c. des Revenus Eccleſiaſtiques, par Jerôme à Coſta (Father Simon) apud Bayle, Rep. des Let. tom. 1. p. 251, 252.
(23) Id. ibid.
(24) Vigneul Marville, Melange d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature, apud Rep. des Lettres 1700. Janvier, p. 100.

☞ ABDALCADER, was ſirnamed GHILI and GHILANI, becauſe he was a native of the Province of Ghilan [A] in Perſia. He was a Scheikh or Doctor, and highly eſteem'd by the Muſulmans for the ſanctity of his life. Jafei (a) hath written his hiſtory in a ſeparate and diſtinct piece, different from another work wherein he has collected the lives of perſons eminent for their piety, and which he has adorn'd with the title Aſna al Mecaſled, or The Excellent Hiſtory: alſo Noureddin al Kahami, in a book entitled, The Secrets of Bahagiat-al-aſrar, or of the life ſpiritual, hath very highly extoll'd him. His life hath alſo been written in Turkiſh by Mahammed Ben Haſſan Gian, and by Ebn Hagi Haſſan Edreni, a native of Adrianople; and Muſladin Sadi, in the ſecond chapter of his Guliſtan or Roſarium, has given us a prayer [B] which he made when he was at Mecca. See Herbelot, p. 5.

(a) See his Article hereafter.

[A] The Province of Ghilan.] This name Ghilan is uſually given to four Provinces in Perſia, each of which is diſtinguiſhed by ſome addition; but the moſt noted are thoſe of Ghilan Reſchat, and Ghilan Lachſchan. The inhabitants of this Province do generally feed on a ſort of bread made of rice which grows there in great plenty. This Province doth likewiſe abound in fiſh and fowl, &c.

(1) See the Annotations on Roſarium Politicum, p. 565.

[B] A prayer which he made at Mecca.] The prayer here mentioned is related by Muſladin Sadi, thus: Oh Almighty God! do thou pardon my ſins, but if thou doſt think me worthy of puniſhment, let me be raiſed blind at the day of reſurrection, leſt I ſhould bluſh to appear in the number of thy Saints: whereto the author ſubjoins his own prayer made at the ſame time and place, viz. Oh Almighty God, as I thy ſervant do never forget thee, ſo do thou pleaſe ſometimes to remember me. Which laſt ſeems ſomewhat like that inſcribed on Martin Eltingbrod's tomb, viz.

(2) See Roſarium Politicum, p. 149.

Here ligg I Martin Eltingbrod;
Have mercy on my ſoul Lord God!
As I would do, if I were God,
And thou wer't Martin Eltingbrod.

And this, if rightly conſidered, will appear to be as juſt and pious a prayer as can be made by a juſt man to a juſt God; and to bear ſome analogy to that expoſtulation of Abraham, with God, Gen. xviii. 25. Shall not the Judge of all the world do right? or that claim of right made by Job, ch. xxiii. where he demands to plead with God touching the cauſe of his ſufferings. But I find the Muſulmans do not all appear before the throne of grace with the like boldneſs. For the ſame author has given us, among divers

ABDALCAHER, a famous Grammarian, author of the Aouamel. This book hath been commented on by Ebn Heſchain, and is in the French King's library, N° 1086. It hath alſo been printed at Rome with a Latin Tranſlation, under the title of Centum Regentes, i. e. The hundred Arabic Particles which govern the ſeveral Caſes of Nouns in that Language. This author hath alſo compos'd an abridgment of the Arabic Dictionary of Giauhari, and entitled it Mohktar al Sehah, which is alſo in the ſame library, N° 1088. The entire name of this author is, Mohammed Ben Abubeker Ben Abdalcaher al Razi, or Raji, he being a native of the city Rai [A].

ABDALLA, the ſon of Abdalmothleb, and father of their Prophet Mahomet. Mirkoud in his life of Mahomet, p. 3. relates, That many predictions were found in vers other prayer, one made at Mecca by another perſon in the following form.

* Note, this prayer is in Perſian verſe, in the original; of which kind there are divers in the ſame author.

* Oh moſt merciful God! who alone art all powerful to pardon,
Thou beſt doſt know what is fit to be granted to a ſinful and ignorant man.
I come to thee with a deprecation for the errors of my devotion.
Wicked men who repent, pray to have their ſins forgiven,
And good men requeſt thee to accept their imperfect ſervices.
Thus ſervants require a reward for their ſervices,
Thus traders demand a price for their wares,
But I come to thee with the hopes of a ſlave, not the aſſurance of a ſervant;
I make my addreſſes to thee as a beggar, and not as a trader;
Deal therefore with me as it ſeems good to thee,
For whether thou wilt deſtroy me or accept me to thy grace,
Lo I reſign my ſelf to thee, and fix my head on thy threſhold;
For I thy ſlave will make no requeſt,
But willingly ſubmit my will to thine.

I confeſs there is expreſs'd, in this form, a moſt profound ſubmiſſion to the will of God, and it may therefore be well termed a pious ejaculation; but as it contains no petition it cannot be eſteemed a prayer. See Selden's Comment on the Origin of the Alexandrian Church, p. 57, 58. touching the Muſulman Liturgy or book of Common Prayer, wherein is inſerted a form of prayer uſed by Chriſt, far different from that which we call the Lord's Prayer, and is as follows, viz.

* See hereafter in the Article ISSA, a moſt ſolemn and ſublime prayer or addreſs made by a Mahometan to Jeſus Chriſt.

A prayer of * Jeſus the ſon of Mary, upon whom be peace (i. e. ſalvation.)

" Oh God! I am not able to avoid that evil which " I hate, nor can I acquire that good which I would,
" and others have the reward which I deſerved, or
" expected, yet there is a reward laid up in heaven
" for my labour, though at preſent, there is none
" more poor than me. Oh! adorable God! grant
" that by thy favour I may not become either the " ſcorn of my enemies, or the contempt of my " friends, nor permit 'em to urge my ſufferings a-" gainſt my religion. Grant that this world be not " made my concern, or the object of my ſtudy; nor
" let him have power over me who will have no pity
" on me. This I deſire for thy mercies ſake, oh thou
" the moſt merciful of merciful Beings."

This is the prayer they ſay He made in the garden the night he was betrayed. But it ſeems the moſt common form of private prayer uſed by the Mahometans at this day is thus in Arabic (3).

(3) See Makometiſm Explain'd, vol. 2. p. 108,

Ya Alhamdu Lillahi Rabbi el Aalammin! el Rahamin el Rahami! Maliki youm Din; Wiakan aabadon; Waiakana ſtaein; Hedina ſerat el Muſtakima ſerat el adina; Anaimta alikim Mugudrobi, alikim Waladalin Amin. And thus in Engliſh.

" Oh! ever living God! the omnipotent Lord of " all things! all gracious and all merciful! King and
" Judge of the day of judgment, whom I ſincerely
" worſhip, and from whom alone I ſeek pardon for " my ſins, guide me in the way of thoſe thou haſt in" ſtructed with thy grace, but keep me from the " road wherein the perverſe Jews and blinded Chri-
" ſtians are wandring. Amen." See further of their prayers and form of worſhip, in Reland de Mahumedica Religione.

To theſe we may add a prayer mentioned in the Notes on the Guliſtan, pag. 617. to have been made by Mahomet when he fled from Mecca, viz. Oh God! ſeeing I am forced to leave that city which is moſt dear to me, guide or lead me to that which is moſt dear to thee; and they ſay that God hereupon conducting him to Medina, declar'd that city to be more holy than Mecca.

[A] Rai] This word is variouſly written by divers authors, viz. Rei, Ray, Rey, Raja, Ræa, &c. There were two cities of this name (1), the one in Egypt and the other in Parthia. This latter, is that which is here meant, and is by ſome ſaid to have belonged to the Province of Deile, but by others to that of Choraſan. It was formerly a famous city and very populous, being ſituated in a large open plain, covered on the north ſide with a rocky mount that ſeemed to hang over it, and was one day's journey towards the north-weſt, from Com or Kom, a city of the Perſian Irac. Which two cities, according to Abulfæda, limit the deſart of Choraſan towards the weſt. Rai is by ſome Aſtronomers ſaid to be one degree and a half more eaſt, and one degree more ſouth than Chazbin. From which city Abulfæda makes it diſtant thirty paraſangs (2), but Hamdalla ſays it is only twenty ſeven. 'Tis ſuppoſed to have been the moſt antient city of Parthia, becauſe from the monuments or records of the Magi it appears to have been repaired by Huxenk the firſt Legiſlator of the Perſians, and that it was afterwards rebuilt by Menughir the ſon of Feridun the ſixth King of Perſia of the Piſchdadian family.

(1) See Golius's Notes on Alferganus, p. 210 & 213. That Rei in Egypt is but a ſuburb of Grand Cair.

(2) A paraſang is near four miles.

Theſe Piſchdadians (3) are ſaid to have been the firſt race of the Perſian Kings, and ſo named from Piſch, which in their language ſignifies the firſt, and Dad which imports juſtice, as tho' they were ſo denominated from being the firſt diſpenſers of juſtice. The firſt of which race, i. e. Kiumert, brought the people from a wild and ſavage courſe of life to inhabit houſes, build towns and cities, and cultivate the earth. But the firſt city he built is ſaid to have been Jetchar (perhaps Shiraz) which was built with ſo much art, labour and coſt, as if he intended thereby to leave an eternal monument of his power and riches to all poſterity. 'Twas here that both he and his ſucceſſors had their court and palace for many years. This city was very much enlarged by other Kings, eſpecially by Haſchenſch, i. e. Huxenk abovenamed, and Schimſchid. King Feridun alſo abovenamed is ſaid to have been the fifth King of this family, and Gerſcha or Jerſchaſuſus (perhaps Darius Hiſtaſpis) was the laſt. After which ſucceeded the family of the Kianans conſiſting of nine Kings, of whom the firſt was Keicabadus, and the laſt they name Alskander Darabi (i. e. Alexander ſon of Darius *, whom they ſo term, for that he, as they ſay, was begot by the laſt Darius but one, King of Perſia, on a daughter of Philip of Macedon.) They alſo ſay, that Cyrus who reſtored the Jews from their captivity was the ſon of Bahmon, the ſon of Eſfendiar the ſixth King of this family, and by him begot on a Jewiſh woman, and afterwards made by his ſaid father Præfect or Governor of Babylon; and that the mother as well as the wife of King Bahman was a Jeweſs, and derived her pedigree from King David; and hence it is that in Perſian authors we frequently find their Kings ſtiled the ſeed of David, the ſucceſſors and heirs of Solomon, &c.; and they alſo aſſert, that Solomon had his court and palace at Schiras or Cyropolis in Perſia. The third race of the Perſian Kings are called Eſchganiens, and of theſe they reckon twenty five. The firſt of which they name Schabur, and the Romans Sapor (4), and the laſt Bihram. The fourth race they call Saſans, as my author ſays, but I rather think the word to be Schaſchans or Shaekkans and reckon their number to have been thirty one, and ſay, that the firſt of theſe was Ardeſchir Babegan the ſon of Schaſhan; and the laſt Iſdeſchird or Iſdegirdes the ſon of Scheoriari, who being hated by his ſubjects for his unjuſt and tyrannical government gave an (5) opportunity to the Arabs and Mahometans to ſubject all Perſia to their dominion.

(3) See the Notes on Roſarium Politicum, p. 599, 600.

* Alexander the Great.

(4) See Roſar. Politic. p. 11 & 539.

(5) Note, the Perſians ſeem in a great degree to have voluntarily ſubmitted to the Arabians, as their deliverers from the tyranny of their Kings.

found in the books, both of the Jews and Arabians in his time, relating to his perſon. But it is very probable thoſe prophecies were either forg'd at firſt, or afterwards feign'd to flatter Mahomet. The ſame author, in the fourth page of the ſame book, ſays, That this Abdalla was ſent for to eſpouſe a powerful Queen of Syria, who had been inform'd by her Doctors, That a ſon would be born of this marriage, who ſhould be a mighty conqueror, and make himſelf maſter of a great part of the world.

☞ABDALLA, the ſon of Ali, who was the husband of Fatima the daughter of Mahomet. This Abdalla was uncle to the two firſt Khalifs of the race of the Abbaſſides, i. e. Saffah and Almanſor (a); and it was he who uſed the moſt effectual endeavours to eſtabliſh his family on the ruins of the Ommiades (b); whereby he ſecur'd the empire to his ſaid nephew Saffah. But after the death of Saffah, he could not endure that his nephew Almanſor ſhould ſucceed, to the prejudice of himſelf; and therefore he took arms, and caus'd himſelf to be proclaim'd Khalif. But he did not long enjoy that dignity; for being defeated in battle by Abu Moſlem, the General of Almanſor's army, he fled to Baſſora, where his brother Soliman, who commanded there for Almanſor, kept him conceal'd for ſome time: but at length being diſcover'd, he was taken and impriſon'd in a houſe, the foundation whereof, 'tis ſaid, was laid with ſtones of ſalt; and the Khalif his nephew having turn'd a water-courſe againſt the foot of the building, the houſe ſoon fell, and involv'd Abdalla in its ruins. Herbelot, p. 6.

(a) Vide poſt; ABDAL. SAMAD.

(b) See hereafter in Article OMMIADES a moſt inhuman execution made by this Abdalla on eighty of the principal Ommiades.

☞ABDALLA, the ſon of Jaſſin, was the firſt Doctor of the Almoravides or African Marabouths [A], and a native of Cairoan in Africa. It was he who condemn'd to death Giauhar Gedali, the firſt Chief and Prince of the Marabouths, for having acted contrary to a law which he himſelf had made.

[A] African Marabouths.] Theſe Marabouths were originally a ſort of religious perſons among the African Muſulmans, and are alſo called Molathemiah and Molathemoun, becauſe they formerly kept their faces concealed under a veil, which in Arabic is named Letham. They are alſo called Morabetha and Morabethou, and by the Spaniſh writers Almoravides. Thoſe were chiefly of this ſect who made ſuch a vaſt conqueſt in Spain, that they won almoſt all that country in eight months, which the Spaniards could hardly recover in eight hundred years.

Anthony Guevara a Spaniſh Biſhop in his Familiar Epiſtles, pag. 227. ſpeaking of this conqueſt of the Moors in Spain, ſays thus. "It was in the year of "Chriſt 752, on the fifth day of the month of July be-"ing Sunday about break of day when that unfortunate "battle was fought between the Goths (who then poſ-"ſeſs'd Spain and the Alarves (i. e. Almoravides) on the "bank of the river Bedalake near Xeres on the frontiers "wherein King Rodrigo was ſlain, and all the Kingdom "of Spain loſt. The name of the Mooriſh General was "Muſa, who knew ſo well how to improve this victory, "that in the ſpace of eight months he won and obtain'd "the dominion from Xeres on the frontiers, to the rock "Horadada which is near the town Onnia; and that "which we apprehend to be moſt calamitous is, that "the Moors won in eight months that which was al-"moſt eight hundred years in recovering; for ſo much "time elapſed from the loſs of Spain until the regain-"ing of Granada." See alſo the relation which Alphonſus Biſhop of Carthagena in Spain gives of this battle (which he ſays was fought for eight days together without intermiſſion) in his book entitled, Anacephalæoſis, cap. 44.

☞ABDALLA, the ſon of Ibrahim, the ſon of Scharokh, the ſon of Tamerlan. He is commonly ſtiled Mirza, i. e. ſon of the Prince, as all other the deſcendants from this conqueror are. Ibrahim his father being dead, he became poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty of the province of Fars, or Perſia properly ſo nam'd, whereof Schiraz is the capital, by conſent of his grandfather Scharokh, who liv'd till the 850th year of the Hegira, which is of Chriſt 1481: but he was diſpoſſeſſed thereof in the year 854, by Mohammed Mirza the ſon of Baiſangor, another ſon of Scharokh, who was his couſin german. This oblig'd Abdalla to fly for refuge to his uncle Uleg Beg, who was the eldeſt of all the ſons of Scharokh, and at that time reign'd in Tranſoxane. Uleg Beg receiv'd him very favourably, and gave him his daughter in marriage. At length Uleg Beg having been kill'd in a battle fought againſt his ſon Abdallathif with another of his ſons alſo; and Abdallathif not having enjoy'd the ſucceſs of his parricide above ſix months, this Abdalla, as ſon-in-law of Uleg Beg, took poſſeſſion of his dominions, but did not enjoy them above one year; for Abuſaid, the ſon of Mohammed, the ſon of Miraufchah, the ſon of Tamerlan, who was conſequently his couſin german, and reign'd in Khorazan, declar'd war againſt him, and defeated him in a pitch'd battle, wherein he periſh'd, in the year of the Hegira 855. See the articles ABDALLATHIF and ULEG BEG. 'Tis ſaid * he was ſhot by the arrows of his own ſoldiers, either by chance or deſign; which was look'd on as a divine puniſhment for the murther of his father. This was in the 85th year of the Hegira. Khondemir.

* Abdallathif.

☞ABDALLA, the ſon of Jezid or Yezid, a famous Lawyer amongſt the Muſulmans. He was the diſciple of Abu Hureira and Ebu Abbas, both whom were companions of Mahomet. He liv'd till the 100th year of the Hegira. He is noted for ſaying, That a wiſe and able Doctor ought to leave to his ſucceſſors and diſciples for an inheritance, a view or confeſſion of his own ignorance in many points of the law. And that he ought not to bluſh to ſay often, La Adri, i. e. I do not know [A]. See GEHEL.

[A] I do not know.] This confeſſion ſeems to be in imitation of Pythagoras and other Philoſophers, who teaching their pupils to confeſs their ignorance, thereby trained them up to modeſty and humility, and other real virtues, without which, knowledge and learning are only the parents of pride, ſelf-conceit, ill nature, turbulent diſpoſitions and other ill qualities and actions.

☞ ABDALLA (Ben Mahomet) the brother of Mondir or Almondir [A], was the ſeventeenth Khalif of the race of the Ommiades that reſided in Spain. He was proclaim'd at * Cordova in the 275th year of the Hegira, which is 913 of Jeſus Chriſt. He reign'd twenty five years, and liv'd ſeventy three. One Omar, a Prince of his court, rebelling twice againſt him, he pardon'd him the firſt time, but purſu'd him ſo cloſely the ſecond, that Omar was forc'd to throw himſelf into the hands of the Chriſtians, and was baptiz'd, and feign'd himſelf to be one of them. After this, Abdalla reduced the city of Seville to his obedience, which had revolted during this civil war, as ſays the Turkiſh Magrebi.

* Corduba.

[A] Almondir.] He is named by Alphonſus Biſhop of Carthage in his Anacephalæoſis, cap. 66. and by Roderic Archbiſhop of Toledo in his Chronicon Almanſor and Almanzor. He conquered many places in Caſtile and Leon, Aſturia, Valentia, &c.

☞ ABDALLA (Ben Massud.) See MASSUD.

☞ ABDALLA, the ſon of Muavie, and grandſon of Giafer the brother of Ali. It was believ'd by many, that he had a right to the Khalifate, by reaſon of the proximity of his blood to the family of Ali; inſomuch that when the people began to be diſguſted with the government of the Ommiades, and to caſt their views towards the Abbaſſides, in order to raiſe them to the ſovereign dignity, he was ſupported by a great party which was form'd in the city Coufah, where the memory of Ali was in great veneration, who there proclaim'd this Abdallah Khalif: but the captains who commanded in thoſe parts on the behalf of Mervan the ſecond of that name, ſoon drove him thence, and forced him to fly into the province of Khoraſan; where Abou Moſtem, who ſupported the party of the Abbaſſides, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated. During his continuance in Khoraſan, ſome perſons happened to ask him, how it came to paſs that the names of Abdalla and Giafer, which had been hereditary in the family of Ali, were united in his perſon with that of Moavie their implacable enemy? He reply'd, My grandfather Giafer, being in the company of Moavie, the firſt Khalif of the race of the Ommiades, receiv'd news of the birth of a ſon; whereupon Moavie ſaid to him, I will give thee a thouſand pieces of Gold if thou wilt call thy ſon by my name. My grandfather conſented to the propoſal; and thus I am become the ſon of Moavie. They then told him (which after grew into a proverb) You have got a [A] vile name for a little pelf. And in the event it prov'd, that the name Moavie, which he bore, being deteſted by all the family and kindred of Ali, was the principal cauſe of Abdalla's misfortunes and death.

[A] A vile name, &c.] 'Tis a proverb among the Arabians, That an ill name is ill luck, and he that has an ill name is utterly undone. Which ſeems to be of a like import of that with us, viz. Give a dog an ill name, and beat his brains out.

Herbelot, p. 7.

☞ ABDALLA the ſon of Mondir or Almondir [A], was the eighteenth Khalif of Spain, and commenc'd his reign in the 295th year of the Hegira (i. e. of Chriſt 893.) and died in the year 300. His brother named Abdalrahman the third of that name ſucceeded him. See hereafter the article ABDALRAHMAN.

[A] Son of Mondir or Almondir.] It appears from the Article Abdalla Ben Mahomet ſupra, that this Abdalla was nephew or brother's ſon to the former. The Spaniſh hiſtorians frequently mention the acts of Almondir the father of this Abdalla, whom they generally name Almanzor.

Ebn Batrick, vol. 2. p.

☞ ABDALLA ſirnamed Motaſeb Billah, drove the Aglabites out of Africa, and placed on the throne one of the family of Ali, named Obeidallah, who after he was well eſtabliſhed thereon, put this Abdalla, to whom he owed his advancement, to death [A]. See the Article Obeidalla.

[A] Put this Abdallah to death.] This act of royal gratitude has ſometimes been practiſed in countries that boaſt of greater civility than Africa. Thus was the Lord Stanley rewarded by Hen. 7. The Duke of Buckingham by Rich. 3. The Earl of Warwick by Edw. 4. and the three Piercies by Hen. 4. The cauſe of Princes ingratitude, ſays Machiavel, (1) is, that 'tis more natural to return an injury than a benefit, the latter being burthenſome, whereas revenge is ſweet; and he obſerves in his Prince (2), That becauſe the advancement is founded on either the conduct or the power of the donor, it therefore naturally renders both ſuſpected by the Prince.

(1) Machia. Diſcourſes, l. 1. c. 29.

(2) His Prince, chap. 3.

☞ ABDALLA the ſon of Omar, was one of the moſt knowing or learned Arabians among the cotemporaries or companions of Mahomet, and is therefore dignified with the title of Sabaha (i. e. a companion.) He is alſo very famous for his liberality [A], having

[A] Famous for his liberality.] 'Tis wonderful to find how greatly the Eaſtern nations, and eſpecially the Perſians and Arabians, even before Mahomet's time, eſteemed, and gloried in acts of liberality and charity. To this purpoſe they have many ſtories of one Khatem Taj an Arabian Lord (before Mahomet) who diſtributed all his wealth in his life time in doing great and good actions, ſo that throughout Perſia and Arabia his name is famous to this day, thoſe people often mentioning him in verſe to this effect:

Tho' Khatem Tai has long amongſt the dead
Been number'd; yet his bounty to the poor
Embalms his name, and gives him immortality. (1).

The editor of the Guliſtan or Roſarium Politicum, in having beſtowed, at one charitable donation only, above thirty thouſand drachms (i. e. about five hundred pounds) and generouſly made free above a thouſand of his ſlaves. He died in the ſeventy third year of the Hegira.

(1) Note, Herbelot in artic. Man calls him Hatem.

in his notes thereon, pag. 586, 587, has ſelected, out of many, ſome inſtances of the liberality and generoſity of Khatem-Taj, as alſo of his mother and daughter, ſo that theſe virtues ſeem to have been natural and hereditary in his family. Indeed the ſtory of his killing and dreſſing his fine Arabian horſe, for the entertainment of the Emperor's meſſengers, looks with an air ſomewhat odd to us Europeans: But whoever will conſider the different cuſtoms of countries, and that what appears barbarous to us, is an act of generoſity and civility with others, will not be ſurprized to find Khatem-Taj, or any other Arabian Lord, before Mahomet's time, entertaining his gueſts with roaſted horſe fleſh; and camel's fleſh roaſted or boiled is, I take it, a uſual diſh with them at this day. Note, The author of the abovementioned Guliſtan has in divers parts of that work, endeavoured to raiſe in his readers a noble idea of generoſity and liberality. See ibid. p. 435 to 455, and p. 233. He applauds a ſentence written on Bihram Cour a King of Perſia's monument, viz. A liberal hand is better than a ſtrong arm; importing, that the authority of Princes is better ſupported by bounty and munificence, than by meer power or force of arms. See further of liberality, &c. Article KHATEM-TAJ.

☞ ABDALLA the ſon of Saba. He carried the veneration he had for Ali even to adoration; and yet was ſo far ſuſpected of Judaiſm, that he became equally abhorred both by the Sunnites and the [A] Schiites, i. e. of the orthodox and heterodox Muſulmans.

[A] The Schiites.] Theſe were they who followed the doctrine of Ali; ſuch were in general the Perſians and thoſe who ſubmitted to the government of the Alides, who are eſteemed as hereticks by the reſt of the Muſulmans. The Sunnites are one of theſe four ſects which they eſteem orthodox, and follow indifferently. There is erected in the temple at Mecca four Moſques, where theſe four ſects, to wit, the Hanefites, the Hanbelites, the Shafaeites and the Malekites, do reſpectively worſhip. See Reland's Treatiſe of the Mahometan Religion, pag. 120, 139. But the word Sunnites, when ſet in oppoſition to that of Schiites, doth generally include all orthodox Muſulmans. Vide ib. p. 36, 139, 140. Hadrianus Relandus in his book De Mahumedica Religione, p. 36, 37. ſays, "That the moſt material difference between "the Sunnites and the Schiites is, that the former, "of which ſect are generally the Turks, Tartars, Arabians, Africans, and the Moguls, eſteem "Abubeker, Omar and Othman, to be the rightful "ſucceſſors of Mahomet; whereas the Schiites, of "which ſect are the Perſians, and generally all under "their dominion, as alſo many in the Eaſt-Indies, "Golconda and the coaſt of Cormondel, &c. eſteem "Abubeker, &c. to have been a mere uſurper; and "that the real right of ſucceſſion was in Ali and his "deſcendants, who were of the blood of the Pro-"phet, whereas the others were not." So that this difference of opinion ſeems to be rather political than religious. And therefore, p. 129. he ſays, "That "many of the Perſians are Schaefites, and many of "the Turks are Hanefites, i. e. mutually of the ſame "religion, though they perſecute each other bitterly "on account of the right of ſucceſſion abovemen-"tioned."

☞ ABDALLA the ſon of Zobair. After the battle of Kerbela, wherein Houſſain the ſon of Ali was ſlain, the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina obſerving that Jezid (or Yezid) (a) the ſecond Khalif of the race of the Ommiades uſed his utmoſt endeavours to exterminate the houſe of Ali, made an inſurrection againſt him, and proclaimed this Abdalla, a deſcendant of Ali, Khalif of the Muſulmans in the ſixty ſecond year of the Hegira. Jezid, receiving news of this revolt, ſent one of his heralds to Mecca with a collar or yoke made of ſilver, i. e. as a preſent to Abdalla, and ordered him to tell Abdalla in his name, that if he would ſubmit himſelf to him and wear that yoke, he would let him live peaceably at Mecca; but if he refuſed to acknowledge him for Khalif, he would come and put that collar about his neck and drag him to Damaſcus. Abdalla refuſing to accept of theſe terms, Jezid ſent a powerful army into Arabia, which took and pillaged the city Medina, and then beſieged Mecca where Abdalla had retir'd and fortify'd himſelf: but it was ſo warmly aſſaulted by Jezid's men, that the temple there, eſteem'd by them as a moſt ſacred place, was burnt and deſtroy'd. But the news of Jezid's death arriving during the ſiege, i. e. Anno Hegiræ 64; Jezid's army drew off, and return'd to Damaſcus; and Abdalla was thereby deliver'd from the attacks of his powerful enemy, and likewiſe remain'd peaceable poſſeſſor of the Khalifate. Immediately after this his ſovereignty was acknowledged by all the Provinces of the Empire, except thoſe of Syria and Paleſtine, which ſubmitted to Moavie the ſon of Jezid. He enjoyed this dignity during nine years, i. e. to the 73d year of the Hegira, which was the 72d of his age, he being the firſt who was born at Medina after the arrival of Mahomet in that city. It muſt then be in this 73d year, that the Khalif Abdalmalek, the ſon of Maryan the ſucceſſor of Moavie who then reigned in Syria, ſent his General Hegiage with an army to form the ſiege of Mecca [A] and to force Abdalla thence, who lay intrench'd therein. Abdalla defended himſelf for ſeven months, and gave evident proofs of great courage both in oppoſing the aſſaults of his enemies, and in enduring the utmoſt extremity of hunger, thirſt and heat. But at length not being able to keep the city any longer after he had been prepared, or intoxicated

Herbelot.

(a) See Ebnſaid Batrick, vol. 2. 360.

[A] To form the ſiege of Mecca.] Ebn Said Batrik, above cited, gives us, in his life of the Khalif Abdalmalek an account of this ſiege, thus. In the thirteenth year of Abdalmalek's Khalifate, he ſent Hejagie Ebn Joſeph to Mecca to beſiege Abdalla Ebn Zobair in the temple there, where Hegiage by flinging ſtones beat down the top or roof of Abdalla's houſe or palace. Abdalla fearing the houſe would fall on him, ran out of it, and being urged to engage the enemy by his mother, who charged him with fearfulneſs, he reply'd, Oh mother, I am not afraid of death, but of barbarous uſage if taken priſoner. His mother retorts, Oh Son! the ſheep when his throat is to be cut, is not afraid to be skinn'd. The ſame author tells us, that his mother made him drink a whole pound of muſk before ſhe could ſpirit him up to the action in which he periſhed; which may well make us ſomewhat doubt of his extraordinary courage.

cated, by a perfumed drink, which his mother, then ninety years old, gave him in order to encourage him to a defence, he made a laſt effort to raiſe the ſiege, and in fact killed a great number of his enemies; but being overpowered by their numbers, he at length was forced to retire, and intrench himſelf within the limits of the temple, where ſoon after, in an aſſault, he was ſtruck with a ſtone which took away his life, whereupon his head was cut off and ſent to the Khalif Abdalmalek. The couragious mother of Abdalla abovementioned was the grand-daughter of Abubeker, the firſt Khalif or ſucceſſor of Mahomet, and named Aſima, who during the ſiege uſually exhorted her ſon to the combat with theſe words, My ſon! fight for God; and whether you conquer or are conquered, you'll live for ever. 'Tis alſo ſaid, that the news ſhe received of the taking of Mecca and her ſon's death cauſed ſo great an emotion in her, that her Menſtrua returned, though ſhe was then ninety years of age, and ſhe died within five days after. This Abdalla was very valiant, but covetous to the laſt degree, ſo that it became a proverb among the Arabians to ſay, Courage and liberality were ever united, except in the perſon of Abdalla the ſon of Zobair. See before the Article ABDALLA the ſon of Omar. He yet was very much reſpected by reaſon of his piety, which they ſay was ſuch, that being at his prayers his devotion was ſo fixed and intenſe, that when a Pigeon came and perch'd on his head [B], he continued a long time in divine raptures without perceiving it. 'Tis commonly reported among the Arabians, that the whole family of Zobair the father of this Abdalla were particularly remarkable for their folly. See Article HEGIAGE touching this, as alſo the diſcourſe that paſſed between this captain Zobair and an Arabian peaſant: and note, this family were the enemies of, and therefore were perſecuted by both the Alides and Ommiades.

[B] A pigeon came.] The ſtory of Mahomet's pigeon ſeems to be founded on this incident, and miſtaken for it.

☞ ABDALMALEK, or ABDALMELEK, the ſon of Marvan, was the fifth Khalif of the race of the Ommiades. He began his reign [A] in the 65th year of the Hegira (i. e. Anno Chriſti 648) and ended it in the 86th year; he is ſurnamed by way of ſarcaſm Raſch al Hegiarat, i. e. the Skinner of a Stone, becauſe of his extreme avarice; he was alſo named Aboulzebab, for that his breath was ſo poiſonous as to kill all the flies which reſted on his face; yet he excelled all his predeceſſors in power and dominion, for it was in his reign that the Indies were conquered in the eaſt, and his armies penetrated Spain in the weſt. It was in this Province, i. e. Spain, that it is ſaid they ſearched for a caſtle that had been built by the Fairies, among the moſt inacceſſible mountains, and the relation tells us how they at length diſcovered this caſtle, and that over the gate were written in very ancient characters theſe four verſes.

'Tis no eaſy enterprize to open the gate of this enchanted caſtle;
The iron teeth thou ſeeſt are not thoſe of a ſaw, but of a furious dragon.
Know then that none ſhall be able to diſſolve or break this charm,
If fate does not put the key into his hand who ſhall endeavour to open it.

This Khalif alſo extended his Empire towards the ſouth, by rendring himſelf maſter of Medina and Mecca, where Abdalla the ſon of Zobair was canton'd; and afterwards his troops defeated Maſaab the brother of the ſame Abdalla. He was then at Coufah, and the head of Maſaab being brought thither to him, one that ſtood near him ſeeing it, told him, that he could not forbear relating to him a very ſingular obſervation he had made thereon, viz. I have ſeen, ſays he, within this very caſtle, the head of Houſſain the ſon of Ali, brought to Obeidallah who had defeated him; and afterwards the head of Obeidallah brought to Mokhtar, who had conquered him; and after that the head of Mokhtar brought to Maſaab who had vanquiſh'd him; and now that of Maſaab which they preſent to you. Abdalmalek was ſo much ſurpris'd and troubled at this diſcourſe, that he commanded the caſtle to be demoliſhed that very inſtant, in order to divert the like ill fate from attending himſelf. He is ſaid to have dreamt one night, that he made water in the ſacred porch at Mecca, and that he dreamt the ſame dream four times ſucceſſively; and that one Saad, a man very ſkilful in expounding dreams, thereupon told him, That (a) four of his ſons ſhould enjoy the Khalifate one after another, which was verified in the event. This Prince was ſo great an enemy to the houſe of Ali, that he could not endure Ferozdac an eminent poet of the Arabians who had praiſed him in divers parts of his works. See the Articles FEROZDAC, MOKHTAR, HEGIAGE, SCEHBIB and MASAAB. See alſo SCHANBA the miſtreſs of Gemil, who made a very witty anſwer or repartee to this Khalif. He reigned fifteen years, and had for his ſucceſſor Valid the eldeſt of his ſix ſons, whereof three, beſides Valid, viz. Soliman, Vezdid (or Yezid) and Heſcham ſucceeded each other as Khalifs. He was buried without the gate of Damaſcus; and they remark of him his great moderation towards the Chriſtians [B] that he would not remove them from (a) How low the dream! making water. How high the thing ſignified by it! the enjoyment of the Khalifate. A wonderful analogy.

[A] He began his reign, &c.] Ebu Said Batrik in his Alexandrian Chronicle, vol. 2. p. 372. ſays, "That "he died on the tenth day of the month Shawal, in the "84th (for 85th) year of the Hegira, aged ſixty two, "having reigned twenty years." See there a deſcription of his perſon, one church there, which he with intreaties desired of them, and they as unworthily refused, though he offered them double the value. See Ben Schunah, Bina Kiti, Hafed Abru and Ebn Said, Vol. 2. p. 364.

[B] His moderation towards the Chriſtians.] The imprudent conduct of the Chriſtians of Damaſcus towards this Emperor, is obſerved and cenſured by Ebu Said Batrik, ibid. p. 364. who there obſerves, that he ordained pilgrimages ſhould be made to Jeruſalem and not to Mecca, becauſe of Abdalla Ben Zobair.

☞ ABDALMALEK, son of Nouh (or Noah) Ben Nasser, was the fifth Sultan or King of the race of the Samanides. He succeeded his father Noah, and was thereby obliged to engage in a fierce war with Rocneddoulat, a Prince of the family of the Bouides: but after many battles fought, this last was obliged to pay to Abdalmalek the yearly tribute of two hundred thousand gold drachms, which had been formerly stipulated with his father Noah. 'Twas under the reign of this Prince that Alphteghin, or Olupteghin, from whom the Sultans Gaznevides deriv'd their origin, rose from the condition of a common soldier to be the General of his armies, and governor of the large province of Khorasan. This Prince reign'd seven years, and dy'd of a fall he receiv'd in managing his horse, or as some say, in throwing at the ring on horseback in the Hippodrome in the 350th year of the Hegira, i. e. Anno Christi 961. (a) Herbelot, p. 8. Khondemir. Lebtarikh.

☞ ABDAMALEK (Ben Noah Ben Mansor) [A] who was the ninth and (a) last of the Samanides. He succeeded his brother Mansor, after he had depriv'd him of his sight and crown, by the authority of two Turkish Captains, named Faik and Tozon [B,] who at that time had all the forces of the kingdom under their command. But Mahmoud the son of Sebekteghin, who was then Sultan of the Gaznevides, being inform'd of what had happen'd, advanced with a puissant army into the Khorasan, where both Faik and Tozon thought fit to submit to him, and to go and sue for peace: to which end they took with them their King Abdalmalek, they walking on foot on each side his horse, and holding his bridle and stirrups, on pretence of doing him honour. Mahmoud receiv'd them very civilly, and granted them the peace they desir'd; which prov'd but of short continuance: for soon afterwards some differences arising, Mahmoud made so fierce a war on them, that he forc'd the one to save himself in the city of Bokhara, and the other in that of Nischabour. Nor would he permit Abdalmalek to remain long in the quiet possession of his dominions, which he invaded under pretence of protecting him. This gave colour to Il-khan King of Turquestan [C] to enter with great forces into the Khorasan, on pretence of succouring Abdalmalek against Mahmoud: and proceeding from thence towards Bokhara, the capital at that time, it prov'd Abdalmalek's entire ruin; for he too late observing that he was rather burthened than benefited by such numerous aids; and not knowing how to get rid of them or to defend himself against them, he took a resolution to retire, and conceal himself. By this means, Il-khan soon made himself master of the capital (a) Herbelot, p. 8. Khondemir. Lebtarikh.

[A] Abdalmalek . . . the last Prince, &c.] History can scarcely produce a more unfortunate Prince than this Abdalmalek, who by caressing and advancing the murtherers of his brother, entrusting the government of his kingdom to slaves and flatterers, by depending on the aid of foreign forces, and plundering and oppressing his own subjects, proved within the compass of a few months not only the cause of the loss of his own liberty, life and kingdom, but also the destruction of his family and posterity, and the subversion of a potent and flourishing Empire.

[B] Faik and Tozon.] These two Turks had been the captive slaves of Abdalmalek's father Nouh, and been advanced to some posts in the army by his brother Mansor; but their treachery and ingratitude was such as to extend to the deposing and murthering of their first benefactor, which might have given our Abdalmalek an idea of what he might expect from slaves, traytors and murtherers.

[C] Mahmoud son of Sebekteghin . . . and Il-khan King of Turquestan.] Here we find the conduct of two neighbouring Princes who raise numerous forces and fly to the aid of a distressed Monarch, but with what view the event declares; each of them seizes on what he could get, while the poor Monarch being abandoned by his own subjects, is so far from being aided by those foreign powers on whom he relied, that they prove the entire ruin of himself and his family. I am apt to think the ingenious author of the Gulistan (1) had a view to this unhappy Prince, when he gives us the following historical observations, viz. "A "certain Persian King having by unjust ways and "means grievously plundered and oppressed his peo- "ple, many wealthy and trading men among them "withdrew themselves and their effects into foreign "countries, as the only way to secure their liberties "and properties. Soon after this a war arising, the "Prince finds his kingdom deserted of its inhabitants, "his revenue very much lessened, his exchequer "emptied, and no way left to raise the necessary sup- "plies to oppose the enemy but a military force, "which encreased the mischief; For, says Sadi,

(1) Rosarium Politicum.

The Prince who desires to have necessary supplies in time of war,
Should govern his people mildly and gently in time of peace.
For even slaves, tho' adorn'd with golden chains, will avoid a tyrannic master.
Would you have men serve you freely, use 'em as freemen?

It happened that about this time a piece of history in the book entitled, The Treasury of Princes (2), was read to the same King, viz. how Suhac, one of the most potent Princes of the East, was deposed from his kingdom and Feridun a private person substituted in his room; whereupon the King asked one of his courtiers, and as it happened an honest counsellor, who stood near him, How this Feridun, who had neither armies, nor treasure, nor attendants, could possibly obtain the kingdom? Why, says the Counsellor, as your Majesty hath heard from the history, the people esteeming him for his justice and liberality flocked to him from all parts, and with their general vote and fixt resolutions advanced him to the kingdom; and then adds, Seeing the people's affection is the Prince's chief security, how could your Majesty, by listening to evil counsellors, thus strive to render your subjects disaffected, except you were grown weary of your kingdom? For seeing Kings are known to reign by the people's favour, they ought to value that favour equal with their lives. On this discourse the King asks the Counsellor, By what means the people might be won to come to his assistance? Ah Sir, replied the other, in every king that would have the free assistance of his subjects, justice and benignity, or mildness are required; that so his subjects may think themselves secure of their liberties and properties under his government. For an unjust Prince can no more be said to be a King, than a wolf that attends a flock of sheep can be termed a shepherd; and that King who by colour of law imposes things unjust, destroys the fundamentals of his own kingdom. The King enraged at this bold but honest discourse, ordered his Counsellor to be thrown into prison, but in a short time after the Nobility (2) A famous Persian book.

capital of the kingdom; and a little after, diſcovering where Abdalmalek lay hid, he ſeiz'd on his perſon, and ſent him priſoner to the caſtle of Dizghend, ſituate in the remoteſt part of Turqueſtan. This happen'd in the 389th year of the Hegira, i. e. Anno Chriſti 999; a year fatal to the empire and family of the Samanides: for tho' Ibrahim, who was of that royal race, did for near ſix years after skulk about from province to province with the name of Sultan, he yet was never regarded but as an abdicated Prince, being maſter but of very few troops, which were at length routed, and himſelf ſlain by one of Sultan Mahmoud's Generals. Thus our Abdalmalek had not reign'd above ſix months and ſeventeen days, before Mahmoud ſon of Sebekteghin transferr'd the monarchy of the family of the Samanides, which had given ſeveral powerful and valiant Princes to the Eaſt, to that of the Gaznevides, Anno Chriſti 999.

(a) Herbelot, p. 9. Rabialakhiar.

☞ ABDALMALEK (a) the ſon of Saleh [A], the ſon of Abdalla, the ſon of Abbas, or, as the Orientals write it, Abdalmalek Ben Saleh Ben Abdalla Ben Abbas, was related in blood to the Prophet Mahomet. The Khalif Harun Raſchid inveſted him with the government of Egypt; and when he ſent him thither, gave him the following inſtructions [B]; viz. So behave yourſelf in your office, as one who negotiates with God on the behalf of his ſervants. A wiſe merchant, when he finds that no profit ariſes from his commerce, will withdraw his capital in time. When you are at the head of your troops, never let them pillage the place where you intend to quarter; and in ſtratagems of war, ſeek rather to conceal your own, than to diſcover thoſe of the enemy; or, in other words, endeavour to ſucceed in your own deſigns, rather than to elude thoſe of the enemy. He continu'd in this government till the year of the Hegira 178, when Harun diſpoſſeſſed him of the office, ſuſpecting him to affect the empire, and that he caball'd with the Barmecides; after which, 'tis ſaid Harun impriſon'd him, committing him to the cuſtody of his Vizier Fadhel [C]; and that he was kept confin'd till Harun's death, when Ainm ſucceeding his father, deliver'd him, and inveſted him with the government of Syria, wherein he continu'd till his death.

bility and Commons revolted from their allegiance; ſuch as had fled their country, returned and added weight to the defection, and the agents of his oppreſſion, and even the King's own creatures joined in the revolt; ſo that all concurred to dethrone him. For, ſays Sadi,

If a King will, tho' by colour of law, act that which is unjuſt,
Even the agents of his oppreſſion will in the time of his diſtreſs be his worſt enemies.

Therefore let Princes make their ſubjects their friends in time of peace, that ſo they may be ſecure againſt their enemies in time of war. For even the meaneſt ſpirited ſubject will aſſume courage, and fight in defence of a juſt and good King. Thus far Sadi.

[A] Abdalmalek the ſon of Saleh.] This Abdalmalek ſeems alſo to have been nearly related to Harun, and to be the ſon of that Abdalmalek, to whom Giafer made thoſe romantic promiſes on the Khalif's behalf, which will be mentioned in the Article GIAFER.

[B] Gave him the following inſtructions.] The inſtructions here given ſeem to contain the nobleſt maxims of political prudence. The firſt relating to religion and juſtice. The ſecond, to trade and commerce. The third, to war and conqueſt; and the laſt to politicks in general. Muſladine Sadi in the third chapter of his Roſarium Politicum, has given us many excellent rules and maxims of government, from whence I ſhall ſelect a few, only to ſhew the genius of the Eaſtern people, and their ideas of the government of Princes and the liberties of the people. Two things are deſtructive both of government and religion, a paſſionate Prince and an ignorant Prieſt. How can he expect obedience from men who has rejected his obedience to God? A Prince ſhould ſo govern his anger to his enemies that he may not become a terror to his friends. Man is made of humid clay or moiſt earth, let him take care not to appear to be compos'd of fire. The Prince who is a friend to ill men is an enemy to good men, and even his friends will prove his enemies. 'Tis better for a Prince to regard his people's good than his own grandeur, for Princes reign by the benefit or favour of their people. An oppreſſive Prince knows no more to reign or be a King, than a wolf does to be a ſhepherd. The civil and peaceable ſubjects of a Prince will be his beſt ſoldiers in time of war. Inform not a Prince of the frauds of his courtiers, except you can hold the Prince faſt by the ears, &c.

(3) See Roſarium Politic. cap. 8. Vide ib. p. 61, 63, 65, &c. the author's fine remarks on the cauſes which ruin Kings and Kingdoms. See alſo ibid. p. 107, 115, 123, 129, 475, 481, &c.

[C] Committing him to the cuſtody of Fadhel . . .] It ſeems very impolitic in Harun to commit a perſon for conſpiring with the Barmecides, to the cuſtody of Fadhel, who was one of the Chiefs of that family; and therefore I am apt to think, that the commitment here mentioned (4) was rather to Fadhel's ſucceſſor in the Vizierſhip, and the rather for that it ſeems Fadhel himſelf with all his family was in priſon at that time. See hereafter Article FADHEL, &c.

(4) We find that another Fadhel, i. e. Fadhel Ben Rabia ſucceeded the former.

(a) Herbelot, p. 9. ☞ ABDALMALEK (a) [A] (BEN ZOHAR) an eminent Phyſician, commonly call'd by the Europeans, Avenzoar. He was an Arabian by deſcent, a Spaniard by birth, and of the Muſulman religion, but of good eſteem among the Chriſtians, on account of his skill in Phyſic, whereof he wrote divers books. See the article ZOHAR.

[A] Ben-Zohar.] This word Ben generally ſignifies Son among the Orientals, viz. in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Samaritan, &c. But the Arabians, Perſians and Turks do commonly write and pronounce it Ebn or Ibn, and from them the Spaniards and other European Chriſtians have formed the word Aven; and hence inſtead of Ben Eſra, Ben Roſched, Ben Sinai, and the like, we uſually write and pronounce Aveneſra, Avenroſched or Averroes, Avenſina or Avicenna: and the ſame of other like names; as Avenpace or Avempace, &c. tho' theſe names may more properly be reduced under the reſpective Words of Eſra, Roſhed, Pace, Sina, Zobar, &c. and therefore ſee thoſe articles.

☞ ABDALMOTHLEB, or as others write it, Abdol Motalleb [A], the ſon of Haſhem and

[A] Or as others write it Abdol Motalleb.] The learned Mr. Gagnier Profeſſor of the Oriental Languages at Oxford, has in his Life of Mahomet, lately publiſhed in French, collected divers paſſages relating to this Abdalmothleb, or Abdol Motalleb, as he names him, particularly pag. 71, 72. of his embaſſy to Nagiaſhi King of Æthiopia, of the orders that he iſſued thereupon, his prayer at Mecca, &c. p. 83. The feaſt he made at Mahomet's birth, &c. all which will be found hereafter under the Articles ABRAHAH and MAHOMET.

and father of Abdalla, and grandfather of Mahomet the Prophet of the Muſulmans. We have ſaid ſomething of him in the life of his ſon Abdallah, and ſhall add more to it in that of his grandſon Mahomet; as likewiſe in the article ABRAHAH: but I cannot but inſert here, what is obſerved in our common Dictionaries, viz. That he was of ſuch wonderful comelineſs and beauty, that all women who ſaw him fell in love with him; which may have given occaſion to the report of that prophetic light which the Arabians boaſt to have ſhined on the foreheads of him and his anceſtors and deſcendants; it being certain they were very handſome and graceful men, as well as perſons of an eminent rank and nobility. He took a peculiar care of Mahomet, but died when Mahomet was only eight or nine years old; tho' 'tis ſaid by ſome, that Abdalmothleb had then liv'd an hundred and ten, and by other writers an hundred and twenty years.

(a) Herbelot, p. 9, 10. Khondemir Leb-tarikh.

☞ ABDALRASCHID (a), or ſome write it Abderraſchid, the ſon of Sultan Mahmoud. This Prince had been kept in priſon the greateſt part of his life, but was at length on the death of his nephew Ali the ſon of Maſſoud taken thence, and proclaimed Sultan of the Gaznevides, and was the ſeventh Prince of that Dynaſty, or rather the eighth, if we compute Mahomet the Blind for one of them. 'Twas he who gave the government of Segeſtan to Togrul the Turk [A], who had been brought up in the court of Maudoud the ſon of Maſſoud Sultan of Gazna, for whom he had ſuch an affection, that he inveſted him therein with an almoſt abſolute power. But Togrul abuſed very much the good nature of this Prince, and ſoon after arrogated to himſelf a ſovereign authority, and carried his ingratitude ſo far as to dethrone and murther his maſter and benefactor; for having privately collected forces he led them ſuddenly to attack Abdalraſchid in his capital of Gazna, who being ſurprized at the ſuddenneſs of the attempt, was forced to retire with the few people he had then about him into the caſtle. Togrul in a ſhort time made himſelf maſter of the city, and having taken the caſtle by ſtorm, unmercifully ſlew the Sultan and all his family therein, reſerving only Anca the daughter of Maſſoud, whom he married, and poſſeſs'd himſelf of his maſter's crown and dominions. From this uſurpation 'tis that Togrul was commonly ſirnamed Kafernamet, i. e. the Ungrateful; and this treachery rendered him ſo odious to his new ſubjects, that Kharkhir, who at that time governed the Provinces of India dependant on the crown of Gazna, having received the news of this ſtrange revolution, wrote ſo earneſtly and effectually to the magiſtrates of the city Gazna, and to the Princeſs Anca herſelf, that they all conſpired in an inſurrection againſt the tyrant, who was ſoon after killed in the palace, and on the throne itſelf. Of this they immediately diſpatched an expreſs to Kharkhir, who coming to Gazna, cauſed, with the conſent of the principal Lords of the kingdom, Ferokhzad the ſon of Maſſoud, who happened to eſcape the cruelty of the tyrant, to be proclaimed lawful Khalif of that great Empire. Abdalraſchid's death happen'd in the 445th year of the Hegira, i. e. anno Chriſti 1053. W.

[A] Togrul the Turk.] At this time the chief forces of the Empire conſiſted of Turks, whereby thoſe foreigners became poſſeſſed of the higheſt employments in the ſtate, the miſchief whereof was before obſerved in the Article ABDALMALEK BEN NOAH. But we muſt here note, that this Togrul is not that Togrul or Thogrul Beg, a Turk, who lived about the ſame time, and was the firſt Sultan of the race of the Samanides.

ABDAS, a Perſian Biſhop, in the reign of Theodoſius the Younger. His raſh zeal gave occaſion to the breaking out of a dreadful perſecution againſt the Chriſtians. Theſe enjoyed a full liberty of conſcience in Perſia, when Abdas preſum'd to demoliſh a temple in which fire was worſhip'd. The Magi complain'd immediately to the King [A], who ſent for Abdas, and after a very gentle cenſure, commanded him to get the temple rebuilt. Abdas refuſed, though the Monarch declared he would deſtroy all the Chriſtian churches in caſe he did not obey. He put his (a) threats in execution, and abandon'd the faithful to the mercy of his Clergy [B], who being grieved at the toleration

(a) Ex Theodoret. Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 39.

[A] To the King.] This was Iſdegerdes, according to Theodoret (1); but Socrates (2) ſays, that the perſecution did not begin till Vararanes, Iſdegerdes's ſon and ſucceſſor. Baronius (3) does not know which of the two hiſtorians is in the right.

(1) Theodoreti Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 39.
(2) Socrates Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 7. cap. 18.
(3) Baronius Ad ann. 420.

[B] The mercy of his Clergy.] So I call the Magi, who among other things were to ſuperintend religion, and prevent any innovation from being made in it. Theodoret compares them to thoſe hurricanes which lift up the waves of the ſea. Τριάκοντα δὲ ληλυθότων ἐτῶν ἡ ζάλη μεμένηκεν, ὑπὸ τῶν μάγων καθάπερ ὑπό τινων καταιγίδων ῥιπιζομένη. Triginta jam elapſis annis permanſit nihilominus tempeſtas, a Magis, tanquam quibuſdam ventis ac turbinibus ſuſcitata (4). That is, "The ſtorm "which the Magi, like a whirlwind, rais'd, has con"tinued thirty years, and is not yet abated." This was their employment, for thirty years, when the Church of Perſia was ſo violently buffetted by tempeſts. Socrates tells us, that the Magi employ'd various kinds of impoſture, to ſtop the progreſs of Chriſtianity; being afraid that Iſdegerdes's friendſhip for the holy Biſhop Maruthas would prompt him to abandon their religion (5). Theſe had the boldneſs to conceal a man in a place under that temple, in which the King us'd to worſhip fire; and ordered this man to cry aloud, whilſt the King was at his devotions, that he deſerv'd to be dethroned, for ſo wickedly believing, that a Chriſtian Prieſt could be the friend of God. If what Libertines ſo falſely aſſert were true, viz. that Religion is a mere human invention, eſtabliſhed by Sovereigns purely to keep their ſubjects in awe; muſt we not own, that Princes fell firſt into the ſnare they had laid for others? for Religion is ſo far from making them abſolute maſters over their people, that it ſubjects Princes to them; becauſe Kings are not allow'd to profeſs the Religion which they think the beſt, but that of their ſubjects: and whenever they attempt to embrace one different from it, their crown hangs but by a thread. We have heard what menaces the Magi vented againſt their Sovereign, only becauſe he had

(4) Theodoreti Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 39.

(5) Socratis Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 7. cap. 8.

leration the Christians had been indulged, fell upon them with the utmost fury. Abdas was the first Martyr who suffered upon this occasion, if that man may be so entitled, whose (b) rashness [C] expos'd the church to so many calamities. The Christians having thus forgot one of the chief points of the Gospel patience, had recourse to a remedy, whereby apother deluge of blood was shed; for they applied for succour to Theodosius, and by that means lighted up a long war between the Romans and Persians (c). The latter indeed had the disadvantage; but who could tell whether the Persians would not be victorious, and then the Christian churches in general might have been persecuted? Such evils may the indiscreet zeal of one man occasion. The persecution raged for thirty years (d). Those writers are inexcusable, who suppress the motive which prompted the Persians to this cruelty (e). These may be impeach'd, if the figure is allowable, of a like crime, at the bar of the republic of letters, as in a court of justice, such trades-people are who conceal defects in their goods (f); and happy it were, would the publick treat all historians, who suppress certain incidents with greater severity than they usually do. So few but are guilty in this particular, that 'tis very fit a stop should be put to it for the future.

(b) Vedelius a Protestant Divine censures this Bishop. See Voetii Disputat. Theolog. tom. 3. p. 310.

(c) Socratis Hist. Eccl. lib. 7. cap. 18.

(d) Theodoreti Hist. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 39.

(e) Vide the Remark [C].

(f) Cum ex duodecim tabulis satis esset ea præstari quæ essent lingua nuncupata, quæ qui inficiatus esset dupli pœnam subiret, à jureconsultis etiam reticentiæ pœna est constituta. Quidquid enim esset in prædio vitii id statuerunt, & si venditor sciret, nisi nominatim dictum esset, præstari oportere. Cicero de Offic. lib. 3. cap. 16. See also Grotius de Jure belli, lib. 2. cap. 8. num. 7. and Puffendorf de Jure Nat. lib. 5. cap. 3. "For it was "enacted by the "twelve Tables, "that it was e-"nough those "defects should "be made good, "that were men-"tioned by word "of mouth, which "whoever refus-"ed, was to pay "double dama-"ges; but the "lawyers laid a "penalty upon "such as con-"cealed any de-"fects in the "things they "sold, viz. that "whoever should "sell an estate, "and not tell all "the inconvenien-"cies of it, should "be obliged to "make them "good. Tully's Offices B. 3. c. 16.

had a friendship for a Bishop. Are we not told, that the last King of Siam lost the diadem, upon no other account, but because he was too indulgent to the Christian missionaries (6)? The abovemention'd Socrates, who relates the artifices the Magi employ'd to check the progress of the Gospel, informs us likewise, that after Isdegerdes's death, they breath'd so violent a spirit of persecution into his son, that he was surprizingly barbarous to the Christians. They had endeavour'd to instil the same cruelty into his father, but in vain; he being very near embracing the Christian religion. This Socrates tells us, who ought to have confess'd ingenuously, that the rash conduct of Abdas the bishop, furnish'd the Magi with a very plausible pretence for acting as they did. Compare this with the remark [B] of the article JUNIUS (Franciscus) professor at Leyden.

(6) I write this in 1693.

[C] A man, whose rashness.] All Church Historians have not been so disingenuous as Socrates, in the circumstance I reproach'd him with; for Theodoret owns frankly, that the Bishop's demolishing a temple, was the cause of the dreadful persecution which rag'd against the Christians in Persia (7). Theodoret does not deny, that the zeal of this prelate was unseasonable; but then he asserts, that his refusing to rebuild such a temple, was worthy of admiration and the crown: for, continues he, 'tis equally impious, I think, to build a temple in honour of fire, as to worship that element. Nicephorus transcrib'd all these particulars from Theodoret (8). But in my opinion, no man, tho' a Metropolitan or Patriarch, can dispense with this law of the Religion of Nature, That we must compensate, by restitution, or otherwise, the injury we have done our neighbour. Now Abdas, who was but a private man, and a subject of the King of Persia, had destroy'd the possessions of another; possessions, which should be so much the more secure, as they belong'd to the establish'd Religion; he therefore was indispensably obliged to obey his Sovereign's commands, with regard to the restitution or reparation of the things he had destroy'd. And 'twas a poor excuse, to alledge, that the temple he had orders to rebuild, was for idolatry; since Abdas would not have put it to that use, and consequently not have been answerable for the abuse which those it belong'd to might have made of it. Would it be a just reason, after a man had stole a purse, to refuse restoring it, because the person robb'd, spent his money in riot and debauchery? We might say thus to the robber, Let the other go on; if he lavishes his money in wicked courses, you won't answer to God for it: let him enjoy his possessions; what right have you to 'em? Besides, what proportion was there between the rebuilding of a temple, without which the Persians would have continued in their idolatry, and the demolition of several Christian churches? The Bishop therefore should have prevented the latter evil, by complying with the former, since the King left it to his choice. In fine, what can give all nations a greater abhorrence of the Christian Religion, than to see a sett of people insinuate themselves into a country, with a specious pretence of merely proposing their doctrine; afterwards, rise to such a pitch of boldness, as to destroy the temples of the established Religion, and refuse to rebuild them when commanded by the Sovereign? Does not this give infidels occasion to say, These people at their first coming sue only for toleration; but they'll soon be for sharing the posts and employments with us, and afterwards become our masters. They at first think themselves very happy, if they are not committed to the flames; and afterwards, very unhappy, if they are not allow'd all the privileges which the rest of the subjects enjoy; and at last very miserable, if they don't get all the power into their own hands. For some time they resemble Cæsar, who would not admit of a Superior, and afterwards Pompey, who would not allow of an Equal.

(7) Theodoreti Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. 39.

(8) Lib. 14. cap. 19. I find in Saldeni Otia Theol. p. 639. that Socrates calls this conduct of the Bishop, exertim rem non opportunam, i. e. a very ill-tim'd action. The Hist. Tripar. lib. 10. cap. 30. is cited: but this chapter is certainly borrowed from Theodoret. Voetius Disputat. Theolog. vol. 3. p. 310. quotes Eusebius, who could not have mentioned it.

Nec quicquam jam ferre potest Cæsarve priorem; Pompeiusve parem (9).

English'd,

Superior pow'r, fierce faction's deares care,
One cou'd not brook, and one disdain'd to share.
Rowe.

(9) Lucanus lib. 1. v. 125. Vide etiam Florum, lib. 4. cap. 2.

The persecutors of the Protestants in France insinuated this reflexion maliciously into Charles IX, who, 'tis said, spoke thus to Admiral De Coligni: Per innanzi, vi contentavate d'un poco di licenza: hora, la volete del pari; fra poco, vorete esser soli, & cacciar noi altri fuori del regno (10). That is, "At "first you were satisfy'd with a little liberty; now "you look upon yourselves as equals; and in a little "time you'll be for reigning alone, and driving us out of the kingdom." Such are the calamities to which those are inevitably expos'd, who assert with so much heat, that the secular arm ought to be employ'd to establish Orthodoxy. These were Abdas's principles; and what havock would he not have made of the idolaters under a Christian Emperor, since, in the dominions of a Pagan Prince who tolerated the gospel, he destroyed a temple which the Heathens had in peculiar veneration? Compare this with the Note [B] of the article BRAUN (George).

(10) Davila Hist. delle Guerre Civili di Francia, lib. 4. p. 158. Sopra l'anno 1566.

ABDERA, a maritime city of Thrace, near the mouth of the Nestus (a). Some say (b) it was built by the sister of Diomedes [A], who, they tell us, call'd it by her own name; but that it was rebuilt in the 31st Olympiad by the Clazomenians, who gave it theirs.

(a) Herodot. lib. 7. c. 109, 126.

(b) Solin. cap. 10. See also Mela, lib. 2. cap. 2.

[A] That it was built by the sister of Diomedes.] Moreri would persuade us that Abdera, built by the Teians, was named from Diomedes, the King of it; and that Herodotus informs us of this. Now the whole is absolutely false; for first, the particulars which concern Diomedes, relate to the poetical or fabulous age; but those which relate to Teos's being deserted by its inhabitants, and their retiring to Thrace, where they built Abdera, belong to the historical age, and happened in the 59th Olympiad; consequently the joining these two incidents, so as to make the fabulous posterior to the historical age, is a great absurdity. An author who would follow Herodotus with regard to the building of Abdera by the Teians, must not then introduce Diomedes, who if he ever existed, had been dead several Centuries; or if theirs. According to Herodotus, theſe only laid the foundation of it, under Timeſius (c); but were drove from thence [B], and all their meaſures defeated. Abdera was properly built by the Teians, who, when Harpagus, Cyrus's Lieutenant, was going to ſeize upon their country, choſe to abandon it, rather than ſubject themſelves to the Barbarians; and accordingly they all embark'd, and went and completed what Timeſius had only begun (d). This gave occaſion to a proverb (e), which Eraſmus did not very well underſtand [C]. I ſhall not take notice of what ſome aſſert, viz. that Hercules founded this city [D]; and think it more to the purpoſe, to mention ſome ſingularities which are told of Abdera. The graſs of the country round it was ſo ſtrong, that ſuch horſes as eat of it ran mad (f). In the reign of Caſſander King of Macedon, this city (g) was ſo peſter'd with frogs and rats, that the inhabitants were forc'd

(c) See his article.

(d) Herodot. lib. 1. c. 168.
(e) Strabo, lib. 14. p. m. 443.
(f) Plinius lib. 25. c. 8.
(g) Juſtin. lib. 15. c. 2.

if ſuch an one would treat of this antient King of Thrace, he ſhould obſerve, that he proceeds on an opinion different from that which relates to the Teians. Secondly, Where Herodotus ſpeaks of the building of this city, he makes no more mention of Diomedes than of the Grand Signior. Laſtly, Abdera was never called from Diomedes. It ſhould be ſaid, Solinus tells us, this city was built by Diomedes's ſiſter, who gave it her own name; whence Salmaſius juſtly concluded, that ſhe was called Abdera (1). Goltzius gives us a medal, on which a woman's head is repreſented, with the inſcription ΑΒΔΗΡΑΣ ΚΟΡΑΣ (2); and this the moſt learned medalliſts ſuppoſe relates to the ſiſter of Diomedes, foundreſs of Abdera (3).

(1) Salmaſii Exercitat. Plinianæ, p. 160.
(2) Abderæ virginis, i. e. of Abdera the virgin. κόρας Doricè pro κόρης.
(3) Spanhemii Epiſt. ad Laurent. Begerum.

[B] But were drove from thence] Herodotus ſays this expreſly: ὑπὸ Θρηικῶν ἐξελάσθεις, à Thracibus expulſus (4), i. e. Drove from Thrace. We ſhall take notice in the following Remark of a miſtake Pinedo made on this occaſion. 'Tis highly probable, the other miſtake, Thracibus ejectis, for ejectus, in Spanheim's learned letter to Begerus, is a typographical error.

(4) Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 168.

[C] A proverb which Eraſmus did not very well underſtand.] 'Tis this, Ἄβδηρα καλὴ Τηίων ἀποικία. That is, "Abdera the fine (noble) colony of the "Teians. This, ſays Eraſmus, ſignifies, If I am plagued too much, I know whither to fly. Hoc Ænigmate proverbiali ſignificamus, non deeſſe quò confugiamus ſi quis præter modum pergat eſſe moleſtus (5). Pinedo the Portugueze, who was forced to abandon his country, becauſe of the inquiſition, employs this proverb in that ſenſe; but adds, that experience had taught him not to recommend, in general, theſe voluntarily baniſhments. Quo (proverbio) ſignificabatur non deeſſe quo confugiamus, ſi nobis contumeliæ inferantur, ut fecere Teii; ſed hoc non ſemper feliciter ſolet evenire, & doctus & expertus loquor (6). However, Pinedo's complaint would be unjuſt, were it no better founded than his aſſertion in the ſame page, viz. that the Teians drove away Timeſius the Clazomenian, who was beginning to build Abdera. To return to Eraſmus. I don't ſo much cenſure his explanation of this proverb, as his adding, that Tully perhaps alluded to it in his epiſtles to Atticus. He cites two paſſages from theſe (7), in which it is evident, that Cicero mentions Abdera for no other reaſon, but to repreſent it as a city, where all publick matters were tranſacted in the moſt injudicious and ſtupid manner. But if Eraſmus, who us'd the word perhaps, deſerves cenſure, what ſhall we ſay of Moreri's deciſive tone, Cicero undoubtedly alludes to, eſpecially when we are told the circumſtance to which Moreri refers this alluſion? Eraſmus's conjectures don't refer to the thing itſelf, for then the error would not be ſo conſiderable, but to a certain ſplendor or magnificence which Moreri is ſure the Clazomenians, who were drove out of Aſia, gave the city of Abdera, that made it ſo famous, and occaſioned the Greek proverb, ABDERA THE BEAUTIFUL. I again declare, that Tully mentions Abdera only to ridicule its government; conſequently 'tis falſe to ſay, he undoubtedly alludes to the ſplendor, the glory and beauty of that city. But further, the pretended ſplendor which gave riſe to the proverb, was not owing to the Clazomenians. I confeſs, Solinus tells us, that theſe rebuilt and enlarged Abdera, which time had ruined, but this is all we read of them; and as for Herodotus, he relates, that the Thracians did not even allow them time to build it. After all, does not Strabo expreſly refer this proverb to the Teians who fled to Abdera, to ſecure themſelves from the inſults of the Perſians? And is not the word Teians mentioned in the proverb? Beſides, I ſhould be glad to know where Moreri read, that the Clazomenians had been driven from Aſia, when they came to build this city in Thrace; for neither Herodotus nor Solinus mention a word of it. To conclude, all the writers I have perus'd take this proverb rather as a flur than an encomium on Abdera; and Eraſmus himſelf has not rejected Vadianus's explication, though not much to the honour of this city. Exiſtimat convenire proverbium ubi quis fortunam tenuem, ſed cum libertate conjunctam, anteponit amplis opibus, ſed obnoxiis ſervituti. Cujus ſententiæ non refragor; nam damnatus eſt Abderitarum aer & item paſcua. See Iſaac Voſſius on Pomponius Mela (8). That is, "He thinks this "proverb may be applied to a man who prefers a ſmall "competency, ſweetened with the bleſſings of li-"berty, to the poſſeſſion of great riches, expoſed to "ſervitude." I don't, ſays Eraſmus, diſapprove this interpretation, for both the air and paſture about Abdera were very unwholſome.

(5) Eraſm. Adag. chiliade 2. cent. 4. num. 53.

(6) Pinedo in Stephan. de urbib. p. 5.

(7) Epiſt. 16. lib. 4. & Epiſt. 7. lib. 7.

(8) p. 135.

[D] That Hercules founded this city.] Salmaſius (9) has proved only on Tzetzes's authority, that Hercules is ſaid to have founded Abdera, but he might have given a better teſtimony from Apollodorus (10), who tells us the following particulars. "Hercules hav-"ing carried off Diomedes's mares, was told, that "the Biſtones had taken up arms; upon which he "ordered Abderus, his darling youth, to take care "of thoſe beaſts, and himſelf march'd againſt the "Biſtones. Hercules killed part of them, among "whom was Diomedes, and put the reſt to flight; "but at his return found the mares had torn Abderus "to pieces. He then built a city near the monu-"ment of this youth, and deliver'd the mares to "Euryſtheus." Stephanus Byzantinus obſerves no more than this, that the city of Abdera had its name from Abderus, Hercules's minion (11); but does not ſay, whether the hero or his favourite built it. Marcianus of Heraclea declares it was the latter (12). Had we the ſeventh book of Strabo complete, it would poſſibly clear up this matter, but the extracts of it relate only this, that the city of Abdera is the name of a man whom Diomedes's horſes devoured. Take notice that Hyginus ſeems to ſay very clearly, that Abderus was one of Diomedes's ſervants, and was killed by Hercules; Diomedem, Regem Thraciæ, & equos quatuor ejus, qui carne humana veſcebantur, cum Abdero famulo interfecit (13). Salmaſius obſerves very juſtly on this occaſion, that we are not to expect uniformity in fables; for indeed the writers on the fabulous ages relate quite oppoſite particulars of the ſame incidents. But perhaps it may be ſaid Hyginus's meaning was, that Hercules, aſſiſted by Abderus, killed this barbarous King of Thrace, who fed his horſes with human fleſh; however, I don't warrant this interpretation. Vigenere had before taken notice, that Hyginus and Philoſtratus differ widely (14). We alſo might obſerve, that the latter differs vaſtly from Apollodorus; for he tells us (15), that Diomedes expos'd Abderus to his mares; that Hercules going to deliver his minion, found him half devoured, and that to puniſh Diomedes, he gave him as food to thoſe beaſts (16). Philoſtratus does not ſay with Apollodorus, that Hercules built a city near his darling's ſepulchre; but on the other ſide, Apollodorus does not agree with Philoſtratus, in ſaying that Hercules inſtituted games or exerciſes in honour of Abderus. I believe we are told but by one author (17), that Patroclus and this Abderus were brothers. Some pretend to prove by medals, that the Abderites choſe to derive the name of their city from Abdera ſiſter of Diomedes, rather than from Hercules's favourite youth (18).

(9) Salmaſii Exercitat. Plin. p. 160.
(10) Apollodori Biblioth. lib. 2.
(11) Ἀπὸ Ἄβδηρίτου τοῦ υἱοῦ Ἡρόμης Ἡρακλέης ἐρωμένου. Salmaſius has obſerved very juſtly, that inſtead of Ἀβδηρίτου, we muſt read, Ἄβδηρα, which is the name, Apollodorus (He ſays Apollonius) gives to Hercules's favourite youth. Pinedo and Berkelius ſay, it muſt be corrected thus; but they don't take notice that Salmaſius had made this obſervation before. The former cites Apollonius, but did not ſee that it was either an error of the preſs, or that Salmaſius writ it by miſtake, for Apollodorus. Philoſtratus might be cited.
(12) Apud Salmaſ. Exercit. Plinian. p. 160.
(13) Hygin. Fab. 30.
(14) Vigenere Annotations ſur le Sepulchre d'Abdere de Philoſtrate.
(15) Philoſtrat. in Iconib.
(16) Vigenere does not ſay true, when he tells us, that Tatian, in his diſcourſe againſt the Gentiles, affirms, that Hercules found Abderus half devoured.
(17) Ptolem. Hæpheſt. apud Photium, p. 484.
(18) Spanhemii Epiſtola ad Laur. Beger.

[E] Were forced to quit it.] Juſtin relates, that Caſſander being afraid this people would invade Maforc'd to quit it [E]: but we muſt ſuppoſe they ſoon return'd to it [F], or that others went in their ſtead. The Abderites, or Abderitani, were very much derided for their want of wit and judgment [G]; and yet their city has given birth to ſeveral eminent perſons; Protagoras, Democritus, Anaxarchus, Hecatæus the Hiſtorian, Nicænetus the Poet, and many others, who were mention'd among the illuſtrious men (b). In the reign of Lyſimachus (i), Abdera was afflicted for ſome months with a moſt unaccountable diſeaſe [H]: this was a burning fever, whoſe criſis was always on the ſeventh day, and then it left them; but it ſo diſtracted their imaginations, that they fancy'd themſelves Players. After this, they were ever repeating verſes from ſome tragedy, and cedon, concluded a treaty with, and ſettled them on the frontiers. Some have ridicul'd this dread of Caſſander (19); and indeed, could a Monarch who made all Greece tremble, be apprehenſive that the inhabitants of a ſingle city, who fled from rats and frogs, would diſpoſſeſs him of his dominions? Moreri, who poſſibly never heard that Juſtin had been animadverted upon, for making Caſſander thus fearful, has done all he can to obviate this cenſure; for he declares, that Caſſander received the Abderites very graciouſly in Macedonia. Such as rely upon his Dictionary won't think of cenſuring this ancient hiſtorian. 'Tis added, that Caſſander was thus gracious, the year of the world 3650, according to Euſebius's Chronology. But who that reads this, will believe that Euſebius does not mention a word of this action of Caſſander, nor even make the beginning of the world his æra? The caſe ſtands thus. Juſtin obſerves that Caſſander ſeated the Abderites on the frontiers of his kingdom, before he killed Alexander's ſons. Now Calviſius (20) tells us that he diſpatched them all, the year of the world 3641: thus Moreri's chronology is as erroneous, as Caſſander's kindneſs claſhes with the only hiſtorian he could have followed.

(b) Πλείους δ' Ἀβδηρίται ὑπὸ τῶν πινακογράφων ἀναγράφονται. Plurimi autem Abderitæ extitere, de quibus doctorum virorum indices commemorant. Stephan. Byzant. Verbo, Ἄβδηρα.

(i) Lucianus, quomodo Hiſtor. ſit conſcribenda, initio.

(19) See Glareanus in Juſtin. Variorum Græv. p. 333.

(20) Moreri generally follows Calviſius's chronology.

[F] That they ſoon returned to it, &c.] The diſeaſe of the Abderites, which Lucian mentions, happened in the reign of Lyſimachus, and conſequently after what we are told of the frogs, which Juſtin ſays (21), was before Lyſimachus and Caſſander aſſumed the title of King. Add to this, that Abdera was in a pretty flouriſhing condition in the time of the laſt Macedonian Monarch. 'Twas plundered by Lucius Hortenſius the Prætor; but the Roman Senate diſapproved of this action, and the Abderites were reſtored to their liberty (22).

(21) Juſtin. lib. 15. cap. 11.

(22) Livius, lib. 43.

[G] The Abderites have been very much derided for their want of wit and judgment.] We have ſeen how Tully treats them in his epiſtles to Atticus. Nor does he ſpare them in another part of his writings (23), where, after citing an opinion, which he takes to be ridiculous, he adds; Quæ quidem omnia ſunt patriâ Democriti, quàm Democrito digniora. That is, "All "which are more worthy Democritus's country, than "Democritus himſelf." Juvenal, who could not deny but Democritus was a man of great wit and ſenſe, pretends to prove from thence, that great Genius's may be born under foggy climates, and in a country fruitful in blockheads.

(23) Cicero de natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 42.

Cujus prudentia monſtrat
Summos poſſe viros, & magna exempla daturos,
Vervecum in patriâ, craſſoque ſub aëre naſci (24).
In Engliſh,
"Learn from ſo great a Wit; a land of bogs,
"With ditches fenc'd, a heaven fat with fogs,
"May form a ſpirit fit to ſway the ſtate,
"And make the neighbouring Monarchs fear their fate. Dryden's Juvenal.

(24) Juven. Sat. 10. ver. 49.

Martial had not a much more favourable opinion of the underſtanding of the Abderites, when he ſays,

Si patiens, fortiſque tibi, duruſque videtur,
Abderitanæ pectora plebis habes (25).
Thus Engliſh'd,
"If patient he appears to thee, or brave,
"Then Abderite ſtupidity's thy lot.

(25) Martial Epigr. 25. lib. 10.

Vigenere is groſly miſtaken in thinking theſe verſes are addreſs'd to the criminal on the ſtage, who repreſented Mutius Scævola thruſting his hand into the fire (26), whereas 'tis directed to thoſe who could be ſilly enough to look upon this as an heroic action, ſince had not the criminal ſubmitted to it, he would have been burnt alive.

(26) Vigenere, Annotations ſur le ſepulchre d'Abdere de Philoſtrate.

Nam cum dicatur tunica præſente moleſta,
Ure manum, plus eſt dicere, non facio (27).
Thus Engliſh'd,
"For, when, the ſcorching coat brought forth, the ſlave's
"Bid burn his hand; 'tis more to cry—I'll not.

(27) Martial Epigr. 25. lib. 10.

Iſaac Voſſius, who ſometimes is peculiar in his way of thinking, ſtruck out a new kind of apology for the Abderites. He owns that many of theſe were born mad, or grew ſo; but this, he ſays, was not an indication of ſtupidity; ſince blockheads and heavy-headed creatures (having no brains) never run diſtracted; which the greateſt genii often do (28). And as to what Hippocrates relates, that the fever which ſeiz'd ſeveral Abderites, was attended with a delirium (29), Voſſius aſſerts, that the proverb, in ridicule of this city, did not take its riſe from that circumſtance, but rather from the delightful paſſion which ſucceeded their fever. Ex affectu jucundiſſimo, qui ipſorum febribus ſuccedere ſolebat, ut teſtatur Lucianus, ſcripto de conſcribendâ hiſtoriâ (30). They grew extravagantly fond of poetry, muſic, and acted like ſo many Comedians in the ſtreets. Heavy, phlegmatic ſouls, ſays Voſſius, are never ſeiz'd with ſo elegant a diſtraction. Tam elegans inſania non cadit in craſſos & pituitoſos, nedum in vervecea capita; but he ſhould have remember'd Ariſtotle's maxim, One ſwallow does not make a ſummer; and not have aſcrib'd to cuſtom and habit the conſequences of a fever, the like of which happen'd but once. What he quotes from Lucian is an unparallel'd incident, that does not give occaſion for ſuch proverbs. I ſhall tranſiently obſerve, that Eraſmus did not rightly comprehend a thought of Tully (31), from whoſe words we ought to infer, that the bewilder'd Abderites gave into the moſt incredible paradoxes; and not that they were ſtupid. Abderitanis naturâ peculiarem fuiſſe mentis ſtuporem indicat Marcus Tull. in libris de natura Deorum: that is, "Cicero tells us, in his book de Natura Deorum, "the Abderites were born with a peculiar kind of ſtu- "pidity. Thus ſays Eraſmus (32). Now ſome very able writers (33) quote theſe as Cicero's words; ſo true it is, that the collections of us Literati reſemble Fame; every change of place gives them increaſe (34). Thoſe who aſſert, that the word Ἀβδηροβόρος, which is us'd proverbially in Tatian's diſcourſe againſt the Greeks, ſignifies a teller of whimſical, ſilly ſtories, no ways derogate from the underſtanding of the Abderites, ſince it is not uſual for ſimpletons, ninnies, and boobies to impoſe or play upon people: not to mention that Tatian applies this word to the doctrines of Democritus, which we may believe were far from ſtupid.

(28) Iſaac Voſſius in Pompon. Melam, p. 135.

(29) Hippocrat. lib. 3. de Morib. vulgar.

(30) Is. Voſſius, in Pompon. Melam, p. 135.

(31) In his firſt book, De Naturâ Deorum.

(32) Adagior. Chil. 4. Centur. 6. num. 27.

(33) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, Abderitanos ſtupori mentis obnoxios, Scribit i. e. "That the Abderites were "ſtupid, &c." Laur. Begerus Obſerv. in Numiſm. quæd. p. 16. See alſo Lloyd, and Hoffman under the word Abdera.

[H] Abdera was infected for ſome months with a moſt unaccountable diſeaſe.] Lucian, who deſcribes the ſymptoms of it, pretends the cauſe was this: Archelaus, an excellent player, acted the Andromeda of Euripides before the Abderites, in the height of a very hot ſummer. Several had a fever at their coming out of the theatre; and as their imaginations were full of the tragedy, the delirium which the fever rais'd, repreſented perpetually, Andromeda, Perſeus, Meduſa, &c. and the ſeveral dramatic incidents, and called up the ideas of thoſe objects, and the pleaſure of the repreſentation ſo ſtrongly, that they could not forbear imitating Archelaus's action and declamation. I ſuppoſe that ſuch as firſt acted thus in the ſtreets, after their continual fever had left them, infected ſeveral who were on the mending hand. Every thing conſpir'd to favour the progreſs of this contagion. The mind is as ſubject to epidemical diſtempers as the body; all the art is, to begin under propitious auſpices, and when the matter is duly prepar'd. Let an hereſiarch, or an enthuſiaſt, whoſe infectious imagination and particularly out of the Andromeda of Euripides, as if they had been upon the ſtage; ſo that many of theſe pale, meager actors were pouring forth their tragic exclamations in every ſtreet. This delirium continu'd till the winter following, which was a very cold one, and therefore fitter to remove it. Moreri gives a very falſe account of this [I]. Begerus (k), who publiſh'd his conjectures on a medal of the Abderites [K], and ſuppos'd it ſtruck, to perpetuate the remembrance of this unhappy diſtemper, chang'd his opinion upon reading the excellent diſſertation inſcrib'd to him on that ſubject (l). There are many particulars concerning Abdera in this diſſertation, ſome of which I have inſerted in the laſt note. On certain days, a kind of ceremony, which being a religious act, might in ſome meaſure be conſider'd as an Auto de Fé, was ſolemniz'd in this city. A perſon was devoted to death, and afterwards ſton'd. I believe this is mention'd only by Ovid, who ranks it among the curſes he wiſhes may light upon his enemy:

(34) Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo, Virg. Æneid. lib. 4. v 175. That is, "Every moment "brings new "vigour to her "flights, new "pinions to her "wings. Dryd.

(k) Laurentius Begerus. His book was printed at Berlin in 1691 4°.

(l) By Ezekiel Spanheim. 'Tis printed with Begerus's Treatiſe.

Aut

nation and fiery paſſions work in a proper manner, ſtart up at ſuch a juncture, they ſhall ſoon infatuate a whole kingdom, at leaſt great numbers; whereas in another age or country, they would not have three followers. The Mileſian maidens were for ſome time ſo unaccountably out of love with life, that they would have laid violent hands on themſelves, had not the government threaten'd to expoſe their naked, dead bodies to public view (35). The remedy only ſhews, that their paſſion was a diſeaſe of the mind, void of all reaſon. Something like this happen'd at Lyons towards the cloſe of the fifteenth century (36). There is no difference between theſe diſeaſes, the plague, or the ſmall-pox, except that the latter happen infinitely oftner. I will take it for granted, that the havock which Archelaus the tragedian, and the violent heat, made in the minds of the Abderites (37), is leſs a mark of ſtupidity than of vivacity and ſprightlineſs; but ſtill it denotes a weakneſs, and for the truth of this remark, I appeal to ſuch as have obſerv'd what kind of perſons were moſt affected at dramatic performances. Quos terrores (or errores) auxerunt poëtæ; frequens enim conſeſſus theatri, in quo ſunt mulierculæ & pueri, movetur audiens tam grande carmen:

Adſum atque advenio Acheronte vix via alta atque ardua,
Per ſpeluncas ſaxis ſtructas aſperis, pendentibus,
Maximis, ubi rigida conſtat craſſa caligo inferûm (38).

That is, " which horrors (or errors) the Poets have " heighten'd; women and children, being mov'd in the " theatre at the repreſentation of ſo grand a poem:

" From Acheron I come, thro' dreadful paths;
" Thro' caves, where mighty, horrid ſtones impend;
" And Hell's black fogs eternally are ſpread.

(35) Plutarch. de fortibus fact. Mulierum.

(36) Brodæus, Miſcell. lib. 5. cap. 27.

(37) The common maxim of Philoſophers, Sol & homo generant hominem; i. e. " That the Sun " and man en- " gender man, was here particularly verified.

(38) Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. 1. c. 16.

[I] Moreri gives a very falſe account of all this (39).] The Abderites did not die in the theatres, nor did the diſeaſe they were then troubled with give riſe to the proverb, Abderitica mens. Should any one be called upon to prove, that ſuch a proverb was antiently uſed, he would find it a difficult task. 'Twould not be enough to aſſert, that the Abderites were generally looked upon as ſtupid; but it muſt be ſhewn, that the very words, Abderitica mens, were employed to denote that general opinion: now 'tis certain, Eraſmus has not quoted one writer who uſed thoſe words. But let us wave this incident, and even look upon the following reflection as falſe, viz. That 'tis probable ſo tranſient a thing as this diſeaſe of the Abderites which is mentioned by no other writer but Lucian (and that only in the preamble to a diſſertation) could give riſe to a proverb, which throws an everlaſting odium on a people. For if it be objected, that the Serò ſapiunt Phryges, The Phrygians are wiſe too late, might have been founded on a ſingle fault or defect of the Phrygians, a good diſtinction may preſently be made; ſince it is certain, that as ſoon as this fault became proverbial, it was not applied to the Phrygians, more than to any other nation; whereas the reproaches caſt upon the Abderites related to them perpetually, and in a literal ſenſe, like as thoſe which are levell'd at the Normans and Gaſcons, reflect on the natives of thoſe Provinces (40.) However, let us look upon this as mere quibble, ſince what follows will be found unanſwerable. Moreri's proverb, Abderitica mens, declared the Abderites were very ſtupid; now the diſeaſe mentioned by Lucian is not ſtupidity, but a crazy imagination, and a kind of frenzy, which ſeizes perſons of exalted genius, rather than blockheads and idiots; conſequently Moreri was in the wrong to affirm, that his proverb was founded on the frenzy Lucian ſpeaks of. Though I mention Lucian, I know Moreri cites only Cælius Rhodiginus, as was objected to him (41), and that he borrowed this citation from Charles Stephens. Moreri and a multitude more imitate that Italian, who would never quote any writer, becauſe he himſelf wanted to be quoted, which would never have happen'd, had he referred to his authors in the margin.

(39) He has committed ſeveral other miſtakes. See the Remarks [A] [C] and [E].

(40) 'Tis certain that proverbs which are made in deriſion of the Normans and Gaſcons, are founded on permanent and habitual defects, that paſs on from one generation to another.

(41) In the Dutch edition of his Dictionary.

[K] On a medal of the Abderites]. On one ſide is a griffin, and on the other a man's head, beardleſs, and crown'd with laurel, with theſe words, ΕΠΙ ΙΔΙΟΣ ΛΑΙΟΥ. Begerus conjectured, that this medal conſecrated to Apollo under the title of Jupiter the Impropitious, ſub Jove ſiniſtro (the ſame as ſub Vejove in Rome) denoted the too hot influence of the ſun, which cauſed thoſe imperfections the Abderites were branded with, but at the ſame time made them fit diſciples of Apollo. Spanhemius thinks this inſcription alludes either to the Prætor or Governor of Abdera (42); and obſerves, that as it appears from ſeveral medals, a griffin was the ſymbol of Teos, 'tis no wonder the inhabitants of Abdera who were a colony of Teians, ſhould uſe that ſymbol in their publick monuments. 'Twas uſual for colonies to pay this compliment to the cities whence they ſprung, of which Syracuſe and * Corfu, whoſe arms were a Pegaſus, in imitation of Corinth, are a proof. As to the head crowned with laurel, it either repreſents Abderus, Hercules's minion, or Tiſamenes of Clazomene, whom the Teians that fled for refuge to Abdera (43) rever'd as a hero. Iſaac Voſſius thinks the inſcription on the medal ſignifies, Jupiter frumentarius, i. e. Jupiter the corn beſtower (as though Ζεὺς λαΐος, was the ſame as Ζεὺς ἐπικάρπιος) (44), becauſe the territory round Abdera abounded every where with corn and graſs, which prompted the Triballi, according to Diodorus Siculus, when oppreſs'd with famine, to go thither, as to the moſt fruitful country (45). Spanhemius does not deny this, and cites another paſſage from Diodorus Siculus, where Abdera is ſaid to be one of the moſt powerful cities of Thrace in that age (46). He alſo quotes another paſſage from an epiſtle aſcribed to Hippocrates, which obſerves barely, that Abdera is not an obſcure city, μία πόλεων οὐκ ἄσημος; however, he refutes Voſſius's explication of the medal .... Before we conclude, it muſt be obſerved, that 'twould be wrong, to conſider what paſs'd between the Abderites and Hippocrates, with regard to Democritus, as a mark of little ſenſe (47). The great concern they ſhewed for the health of ſo famous a Philoſopher, their countryman, does honour to their judgment. Hippocrates indeed did not confirm the idea theſe entertained of Democritus, who took him for a madman; whereas Hippocrates thought him wiſer than they. But this was nothing. I am perſuaded the reſt of the Greeks would have judged as unfavourably of Democritus as his countrymen did. A Philoſopher would now be conſidered in the ſame light, who ſhould laugh at every thing; ſhould affirm that the air is filled with images; ſtudy the muſic of birds; ſhut himſelf up in ſepulchres, &c. Thoſe only of an exalted genius, and who ſoar above prejudice, would be capable of forming a right judgment of him; but theſe ſeldom ariſe in any age or country, and are as few, perhaps fewer, than the virtuous, whom Juvenal declares, ſcarce equal the mouths of the Nile (48).

(42) Epidius Laii filius. i. e. " Epidius ſon of " Laius.

* Or rather Corcyra, as 'twas antiently call'd.

(43) By this name Spanheim calls the man, to whom Herodotus gives the name of Τιμήσιος.

(44) Iſ. Voſſius in Pompon. Melam. p. 135.

(45) Diodor. Sic. lib. 15. p. 354.

(46) Idem, lib. 13. p. 194.

(47) See the letters written on both ſides on this occaſion, among thoſe of Hippocrates.

(48) Rari quippe boni: Numerus vix eſt totidem, quot Thebarum portæ, vel divitis oſtia Nili. Juvenal. Sat. 13. verſ. 26. " Good men are " ſcarce, the juſt " are thinly " ſown, " They thrive " but ill, nor can " they laſt when " grown. " And ſhould we " count them, " and our ſtore " compile, " Yet Thebes " more gates " wou'd ſhew, " more mouths " the Nile.

Aut te devoveat certis Abdera diebus,
Saxaque devotum grandine plura petant (m).

(m) Ovid. in Ibim. verſ. 469.

Thus Engliſh'd,
" Or may'ſt thou in Abdera be devoted,
" And ſhowers of murth'ring ſtones at thee be hurl'd.

Commentators are ſilent on this paſſage; undoubtedly, becauſe they could not find either the origin or particulars of this ceremony. I ſhall obſerve elſewhere (n), that Parmenio deſtroy'd a temple dedicated to Jaſon, in Abdera.

(n) In the article JASON. [Mr. Bayle has not compos'd this article.]

ABDERAMA Governor of Spain under Iſcham, Caliph of the Saracens in the eighth Century, endeavoured to enlarge their conqueſts by the addition of France, a little after they had ſubdued all Spain. They had reaſon to be ſatisfied [A] with what they had already won, and yet it was natural not to ſtop ſhort in ſo glorious a career. Had we Abderama's hiſtory by a Saracen, 'twould undoubtedly acquaint us, that this General was naturally form'd to ſatiate the boundleſs ambition of his Sovereign, and was one of the greateſt Heroes that ever liv'd; the whole would be a ſeries of illuſtrious actions and triumphs. I know that ſome Chriſtian writers make honourable mention of him, and indeed his piercing into the midſt of France proves him a great warrior: but there's nothing like having a writer of one's own party. Abderama quickly remov'd the obſtacle which Eudes, or Eudo, Duke of Aquitain had thrown in his way, by ſoon reducing the governor of Cerdania (a), whom this Duke had ſtirred up to rebellion, to the ſad neceſſity of killing himſelf; but he treated his widow [B], a lady of exquiſite beauty and daughter of Duke Eudo, with great humanity. As ſoon as he had quell'd this inſurrection, he made ſuch diſpatch in raiſing a force neceſſary for conquering France, that the year after (b), he march'd into it with the greateſt army that had been ſeen many years. It ſpread far and wide, and carry'd terror and deſolation into all places; inſomuch that the common people of thoſe provinces, which were thus made a ſcene of Blood, ſtill talk of it. 'Tis not known whether the Gaſcons, whoſe Duke was join'd in amity with that of Aquitain, reſiſted [C] or ſubmitted to the Saracens; we are only told, that Abderama advancing to Bourdeaux, took that city, and ſet fire to all the churches in it; and afterwards defeated Eudo in a bloody battle [D] fought a little on the other ſide (c) the Dordogne [E]. He croſs'd Poitou, plunder'd St. Hilary's church in Poitiers, and

(a) His name was Munuza. See his article.

(b) In 732.

(c) With reſpect to the Pyrenean Mountains.

[A] To be ſatisfy'd.] Perhaps we have no examples of ſo long a train of victories and mighty conqueſts, as in the hiſtory of the Saracens. The idea which a Roman Poet (1) form'd of a vaſtly extenſive empire, took in only part of theirs. Reaſon prompted them to diſcontinue, and to purſue their exploits; which, tho' a ſeeming contradiction, is nevertheleſs true. Had the Saracens diſcontinued, they might have been applauded upon many accounts: but then they alſo might have been blamed for ſeveral reaſons; for firſt, they would have been thought weak and imprudent: people would have ſaid, they did not dare, nor knew how to make an advantage of the opportunities which Providence indulged them; and that with a little more heroiſm and intrepidity, they might have conquer'd the world. Thus are thoſe always calumniated, who perform illuſtrious actions. When the ſlanderers can't deny their having atchiev'd them, they then obſerve coolly, that all they did was nothing to what another would have perform'd on a like occaſion: and in this manner do they detract from what they were oblig'd to own. The Heathens would have call'd this a critique of fortune, on the ill choice of thoſe whom ſhe favours with opportunities.

(1) Latius regnes avidum domando
Spiritum, quam ſi
Lybiam remotis
Gadibus jungas,
& uterque Pœnus ſerviat uni.
Horat. Od. 2. lib. 2.
" That man a " wider empire
" gains,
" That his own
" craving wiſh
" reſtrains;
" Than he whoſe
" ſword and wide
" command,
" Join diſtant
" Spain and Ly-
" bia's ſand;
" Than if they
" did his arms
" obey,
" And either
" Carthage own
" his ſway.
Creech's Horace.

[B] His widow.] We ſhall obſerve elſewhere (2), that Duke Eudo's daughter, wife to the governor of Cerdania, was the moſt beautiful Princeſs of her age; and how being brought to Abderama, after her husband's death, he ſent her to the Caliph. A Saracen hiſtorian would not have paſs'd ſo lightly over this incident as the Chriſtian writers do, but have extoll'd it above whatever the Greeks boaſt of Alexander, and the Romans of Scipio. The Grecian monarch indeed did not offer the leaſt violence to Darius's wife or daughters, his captives (3); and the Roman General ſuppreſs'd all unchaſt deſires, with regard to a very beautiful young lady his priſoner; and ſent her back to the perſon of quality to whom ſhe was promis'd in marriage (4). But an hiſtorian who was to attempt the elogium of Abderama, would ſet the continence of this General in a ſtill more amiable light. The widow of a rebellious Chief was entirely at his diſpoſal; ſhe was a finiſh'd beauty, and yet he did not offer her the leaſt violence.

(2) In the article MUNUZA.

(3) Vide the Note [C] of the article MACEDONIA.

(4) Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 3.

[C] If the Gaſcons reſiſted.] The moſt accurate Hiſtorians obſerve (5), that Abderama entered France by that part lying between the Garonne and the ocean; and that this country was then ſubject to the Duke of the Gaſcons, and not to the Duke of Aquitain. Theſe writers don't mention the ſiege of Arles, which Moreri ſays, Abderama attempted, before he march'd to ſuccour the Saracens in Aquitain, or had ſubdued Languedoc, Querci, &c. Theſe miſtakes are the greater, becauſe it is certain the Saracens were poſſeſs'd of Languedoc, before Abderama paſt the Pyrenean Mountains. The courſe of his march will be of uſe to me hereafter, in juſtifying the Duke of Aquitain. The miſtakes of Auguſtinus Curio (6) cauſe a ſtill greater confuſion. He tells us, that Abderama entred France before Munuza's death, and vanquiſh'd Eudo in this country; that returning thither after Munuza's deceaſe, he croſt the Rhone and made a dreadful ſlaughter at Arles. That he then beſieg'd Toulouſe, but without ſucceſs; afterwards Bourdeaux where he came off victorious, and laſtly, that he plundered and burnt St. Martin's church in Tours.

(5) Mezeray, Cordemoi.

(6) Hiſtoria Saracen. lib. 11. p. 111, 112.

[D] Defeated Eudo in a bloody battle.] The Chriſtians loſt ſo many men, that to uſe the words of Iſidorus Biſhop of Badajos (7); God only knows the number of French that were then cut to pieces. Mezerai relates, that Duke Eudo fought with the utmoſt bravery, but at laſt was kill'd, with a numberleſs multitude of his ſoldiers (8).

(7) Iſidorus Pacenſis Chronic.

(8) Mezeray Abregé Chronol. vol. 1. p. 192.

[E] A little on the other ſide the Dordogne.] I don't know what Cordemoi means in obſerving, that had Eudo but waited, as he ſhould have done, the coming up of Charles Martel, the Saracens would never have paſs'd the Dordogne (9); for had not they croſs'd it before the battle was fought (10), or that Charles Martel had paſt the Loire (11)? To what purpoſe then ſhould he have waited for him, to hinder the paſſage of the Dordogne? He ſhould have ſaid, that had Eudo waited for Charles Martel, the Saracens would not have ſpread themſelves over Saintonge and Poitou, and then he would not have loſt the battle which he fought; and having all his forces, he could have aw'd the Saracen army, by poſting himſelf advantageouſly. Thus had he but preſerv'd his forces till he was join'd to Charles Martel, there was a greater probability of the Chriſtians defeating the Saracens entirely, wherever they might come up with them. It would, poſſibly, be difficult to determine, whether the

(9) Cordemoi Hiſt. de France, p. 404.

(10) Eudo did not retreat, when news came that Abderama had paſt the Dordogne, but fought him. Cordemoi, ibid.

(11) Ibid.

and advanced towards Tours, to ſeize the treaſure of St. Martin's church: but now Charles Martel, in conjunction with the Duke of Aquitaine, ſtopt his furious progreſs. Abderama having ſo great an army, his plundering ſo many cities, and firing ſo many churches in his way through Perigord and Saintonge, render'd his march exceeding ſlow; which gave Eudo an opportunity of drawing together a conſiderable body of freſh troops, before he reinforc'd Charles Martel. The Chiefs being join'd, march'd beyond Tours (d), to meet Abderama. And now the armies being come in ſight, ſix days were ſpent in skirmiſhes; but on the ſeventh, which fell on a Saturday, in October 732 [F], the battle was fought, when a prodigious ſlaughter was made of the Saracens. We muſt not however believe it ſo great [G] as the hyperboles of ſome hiſtorians make it. Abderama loſt his life in the Field; but the remains of his army retreated with leſs difficulty than (e) could be expected [H]. The Duke of Aquitain, who has been unjuſtly accus'd of occaſioning this inroad [I], had a great ſhare in ſire which hurried Eudo on to the engagement, or Charles's great ſlowneſs in marching towards the Loire, moſt deſerv'd cenſure. Both theſe Generals would act the cunning part; for Eudo deſired to gain the victory without Martel, who, on the other ſide would have had the Saracens over-run Aquitain, and vanquiſh Eudo. This removed the obſtacles he feared from that quarter, with regard to his great deſign of making himſelf King; and the glory of having delivered France, muſt have riſen in proportion to the little ſhare his rival Eudo ſhould have in it. According to ſome Spaniſh writers, Eudo was defeated between the Garonne and the Dordogne (12.) Mezerai wrote from better memoirs, when he ſays (13), that Eudo did not dare to wait the coming up of the Saracens on the other ſide the rivers, and therefore retreated on this ſide the Dordogne, where, being reconciled to Martel, he aſſembled his forces, expecting he would reinforce him with the French. Abderama did not give him time for this, but puſhing ſtill forward, paſs'd the river to attack Eudo in his camp. The Duke waited for him, and fought with the utmoſt intrepidity. This ſhews, that Charles Martel's dilatorineſs deſerv'd cenſure more than Eudo's impatience.

(d) With reſpect to Paris.

(e) See Cordemoi, Hiſt. de France, vol. 1. p. 403 & ſeq.

(12) In Catel Memoir. de l'Hiſt. de Languedoc, p. 526, 529.

(13) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. vol. 1. p. 192.

[F] Anno 732.] 'Tis ſurpriſing that Hiſtorians ſhould not be agreed on the period, when ſo ſignal a victory was gain'd. Catel, pag. 529 of his Memoirs (14), fixes it to anno 725; but page 531 he places it in 727. The year following, ſays he, viz. in 728, Eudo Duke of Aquitain died. Calviſius places it in 726, and cites the Annals of Fulde for that purpoſe; according to Petavius 'twas in 725 (15). Formerly all writers fixed it to 725 or 726, but within ſome years it has been placed in 732; Father Labbe, Mezerai, Cordemoi, &c. fix it to that date, according to the Annals of Mets, and the moſt antient chronicles.

(14) For the hiſtory of Languedoc.

(15) Petavii Rationar. Temp. part 1. lib. 8.

[G] A dreadful ſlaughter was made . . . We muſt not however believe it ſo great, &c.] Three hundred and ſeventy, or three hundred and ſeventy five thouſand Saracens were cut to pieces, and only fifteen hundred French, according to Anaſtaſius the Librarian (16), Paulus Diaconus, and ſeveral other Hiſtorians; but this account is now looked upon as fictitious. Mezerai ſays clearly, that the Saracen army conſiſted but of fourſcore or an hundred thouſand men. We are to remember particularly, that they fought till night, without giving way (17), and were not purſued the next day, when news was brought that they had march'd all night. Now 'tis almoſt impoſſible ſo prodigious a havock ſhould have been made of men who ſtood their ground; ſo many hundred thouſand could not be put to the ſword, except they fled, and were purſued and had no quarter given; therefore as the battle was interrupted by the coming on of the night, we are to look upon what du Haillan relates as romantic, viz. That King Abderama, and moſt of his chief officers were found among great heaps of the ſlain, being ſtifled by the multitudes who crouded upon them in their retreat. Had there been weekly news-papers in that age, the publick would have run leſs hazard of being deceiv'd, in judging of the number of the Saracens, from ſuch papers as were publiſhed before the engagement, than from the accounts of the battle itſelf. While theſe Barbarians were on their march, ſuch Gazetteers as were hirelings, or writ by authority, would have repreſented the Saracen army as inconſiderable, and have weakned it daily by deſertion and ſickneſs; but after the victory, they'd bethink themſelves, and hear from mighty good hands, that the Saracen army was prodigiouſly numerous. Thus might people be impoſed upon by the News-papers both before and after the battle; but were we to chuſe, methinks it would be ſafer to rely, at all adventures, on the former than on the latter.

(16) This he extracted from the narrative which Eudo writ to Pope Gregory II. See the note [K] following.

(17) See the ſubſequent Remark.

[H] Retreated with leſs difficulty than could have been expected.] We ſhall rectify the idea which people generally form of this great victory, by examining what the moſt accurate Hiſtorians ſay of it. "The Sara- "cens hurl'd their darts to no purpoſe, the French "warding them off, by diſpoſing their ſhields one "over the other; and when the Saracens advanced "reſolutely ſword in hand, the Chriſtians kept ſo "cloſe, that the enemy only broke their own ranks "in endeavouring to force ſo great a body of men. "Charles, who made a proper uſe of advantages, "took the opportunity of charging them, when the "French, who ſtill kept very cloſe, killed prodigious "numbers. Abderama was ſlain in the field, but "night drawing on put an end to the battle; Charles "Martel not knowing the great advantages he had "gained. This general would not ſuffer the ſcatter'd "remains of the Saracen army to be purſued, for fear "of ambuſcades, which ſhould always be guarded "againſt when the enemy are very numerous. He "even made his ſoldiers retreat in good order, ſword "in hand, into their camp, and paſs the night there; "but at day-break he again drew them up in battle "array, in ſight of the Saracen camp. But now ſuch "numbers of the enemy's tents were ſeen, that tho' "the field they fought in the day before, was cover- "ed with the bodies of the Saracens, yet Martel had "reaſon to ſuſpect, a great number of theſe were "ſtill under the tents, and ſuppos'd they were com- "ing out. At laſt, after having long expected this, "he found they had abandoned their camp; and ſpies "brought advice that they had marched all night to- "wards Septimania. However, he looked upon this "flight of an army, which he thought more conſi- "derable than his own, as a ſtratagem, to draw him "into an ambuſcade, and therefore only plundered "the Saracen camp, where he found all their bag- "gage, and the booty they had taken (18)." For this reaſon it has been ſaid, That Charles Martel might have made a better advantage of his great victory (19). I will ſuppoſe that he, like ſo many other Generals (20), knew very well how to conquer, but did not make a proper uſe of his conqueſts. Yet who can ſay, whether Martel might not let the Saracens march away unmoleſted, to give them the better opportunity of oppreſſing the Duke of Aquitain, whom he conſidered as a dangerous enemy? This uſurper and his ſon Pepin, had infinite difficulties to ſtruggle with before they could ſubject this family, which was the laſt that paid homage to them. But to return: Abderama's ſucceſſors were not intimidated at his ill fortune, for they returned ſome years after and made great havock.

(18) Cordemoi, Hiſt. de France, vol. 1. p. 405.

(19) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. vol. 1. p. 193.

(20) See the remark [A] under the article CÆSAR.

[I] Who has been unjuſtly accuſed of occaſioning this inroad.] Never accuſation could be more unjuſt, according to outward appearance; for firſt, Eudo (21) had married his daughter to the Governor of Cerdania, to engage him in a civil war, and thereby prevent the Saracens from paſſing the mountains; Munuza his ſon-in-law periſh'd miſerably in this enterprize, and his daughter was taken by Abderama, and ſent to the Caliph of the Saracens. Secondly, It does not ap-in the victory [K]. 'Tis ſurpriſing that the writers of this age ſhould not have given a juſt account of this battle, and yet that the moderns ſhould preſume to relate ſo many particulars of it [L].

(21) See his article.

pear that Eudo any ways favoured the incurſions of thoſe barbarians, for he did not ſuffer them to march through his territories, they having entered Gaul by thoſe of the Duke of the Gaſcoons, and had advanced to Bourdeaux. Farther: We don't find that the Saracens ſpared the Duke of Aquitain's dominions, but treated him all along as an enemy; ſo far from reſtoring any thing he had been diſpoſſeſs'd of in their preceeding expeditions, which they certainly would have done, had he engaged to favour Abderama's enterprize. Laſtly, What occaſion was there to invite this General into France? Had not the Saracens been there before; had not they poſſeſs'd themſelves of Narbonne, Carcaſſone, and ſpread as far as the Rhone? Abderama only continued what his predeceſſors had ſo happily begun, and wanted to extend their conqueſts beyond (22) the mountains; but to make his enterprize ſtill more glorious, he reſolved to ſtrike out a new path. Abderama therefore ſeized on the paſs of the Pyrenean mountains towards Biſcay, and ſo could not but conquer the firſt ſtep he took; but had he gone by Rouſſillon, as Hannibal did, he would immediately have entered a Province already conquered. Now, though a great number of hiſtorians have ſlandered the Duke of Aquitain upon that account, yet this circumſtance does not outweigh what may be offered in his favour; for theſe writers did little more than copy one another, and the firſt borrowed their materials from a tradition, which owed its riſe to the artifices of Charles Martel's faction; and there were ſeveral reaſons why this faction ſhould accuſe their antagoniſts of holding a private correſpondence with the enemies of the church and ſtate. We don't find that Iſidorus of Bajados, Sebaſtian of Salamanca, Rodericus Toletanus, or any other Spaniſh hiſtorian (uninfluenced by that faction) accuſe Eudo of bringing in the Saracens. This it is to be born under a happy planet. 'Tis really my opinion, that Charles Martel did not invite the infidels, and yet he ought to be ſuſpected rather than Eudo, ſince this Duke was to be firſt cruſh'd; whereas Martel might naturally believe, that whilſt the Saracens were ridding him of ſo formidable an enemy, he himſelf would be preparing to repulſe their attacks; and that ſhould he have the good fortune to defeat them, it would ſhorten his way to the throne. What a handle does this afford thoſe authors, who are apt to give the conduct of the Great a malicious turn? and yet Charles has not been once ſuſpected of holding a correſpondence with Abderama.

(22) With reſpect to Spain.

[K] Had a great ſhare in the victory.] Some Hiſtorians don't mention his engaging that day in conjunction with Martel; but others declare expreſsly that he did. Paulus Diaconus ſays, Deinde poſt decem annos, cum uxoribus & parvulis venientes, (he ſpeaks of the Saracens) Aquitaniam Galliæ provinciam quaſi habitaturi ingreſſi ſunt. Carolus ſiquidem cum Eudone Aquitaniæ principe tunc diſcordiam habebat, qui tamen in unum ſe conjungentes contra eoſdem Sarracenos pari conſilio dimicarunt; nam irruentes Franci ſuper eos trecenta ſeptuaginta quinque millia Sarracenorum interemerunt; ex Francorum verò parte mille & quingenti tantum ibi ceciderunt; Eudo quoque cum ſuis ſuper eos irruens pari modo multos interficiens omnia devaſtavit (23). "Ten years after, the Saracens "with their wives and children enter'd Aquitain, a "province of France, as tho' they were come to in- "habit it. Charles was then at enmity with Eudo "Prince of Aquitain; however, they join'd their "forces, and fought againſt the Saracens. The "French ruſhing upon theſe, ſlew three hundred "and ſeventy five thouſand, with the loſs only of "fifteen hundred of their own men. Eudo alſo "pouring upon them with his forces, made a great "ſlaughter." Rhegino ſpeaks alſo of Martel's reconciliation with Eudo, which, he ſays, was before the battle; and that afterwards they fell, in conjunction, upon the Saracens. Sigebertus ſo divides the glory of this battle between the two Generals, that the only advantage he ſeems to allow Eudo is, that he forced the Saracen camp, and cut to pieces the remains of their army, Eudo quoque reconciliatus caſtra Sarracenorum irrupit, & reliquias eorum contrivit. We have a good proof in Roderic Archbiſhop of Toledo, for he relates (24), that Charles Martel's forces conſiſted chiefly of Germans, Goths and French, who ſurviv'd in the battle which Eudo loſt againſt the Saracens near the Dordogne. We muſt not omit Eudo's letter to Pope Gregory the IId, in which he gave an account of the battle. This letter is mentioned by Marianus Scotus, Otho of Friſingen, and Anaſtaſius the Librarian (25); and a very particular circumſtance is, that the latter aſcribes all the glory of this victory to the Duke of Aquitain, but does not once mention Charles Martel; and declares, that three hundred and ſeventy thouſand Saracens, and but fifteen hundred French were ſlain. Anaſtaſius refers for the truth of this to Eudo's letter abovementioned, whence he extracted a burleſque kind of incident, viz. That on the day of battle Eudo caus'd to be chopp'd into very ſmall pieces three holy ſpunges, which the Pope ſent him, from among thoſe that were us'd at his table, and gave them his ſoldiers to eat, which had ſo happy an effect, that all who did ſo were neither kill'd nor wounded. To underſtand this cuſtom of uſing ſpunges at table, we muſt remember theſe words of Martial, Hæc tibi ſorte datur tergendis ſpongia menſis utilis (26). That is, This ſpunge which ſportive chance on thee beſtows, will clean thy table.

(23) Hiſt. Longob. lib. 6. cap. 46. apud Catel Memoires de Languedoc. p. 530.

(24) Roderic. Hiſtor. Arabum, in Catel's Memoirs, p. 529.

(25) In Catel Memoires de l'Hiſt. de Languedoc. p. 531.

(26) Martial. Epigram. 144. lib. 14.

[L] That the moderns ſhould preſume to relate ſo many particulars of it.] I ſhall borrow a judicious reflection from the hiſtorian, whom I have chiefly followed in this article. This battle, ſays he (27), deſerves the higheſt notice, and we cannot enough blame the antient annaliſts, for not mentioning a ſingle circumſtance of ſo memorable an engagement. But on the other ſide, the lovers of truth will ſcarce pardon ſome moderns (28), who yet are perſons of great merit, for deſcribing this battle ſo minutely. Theſe ſpeak of it, as though they had been preſent in all the councils, and ſeen every motion of both armies; they not only deſcribe the arms both of the French and Saracens, but in what manner Martel and Abderama drew up their forces. They give us long ſpeeches, filled with falſe and improper particulars. They tell us the ſtratagems Abderama employed, and with what art Martel eluded them; and conclude with deſcribing the various poſtures in which the dead lay in the field; neither do they omit the groans of the expiring, nor the applauſes which Martel and Eudo, the Generals of the French army, beſtowed on each other.

(27) Cordemoi, Hiſt. de France, p. 406.

(28) He quotes Paulus Æmilius, and Fauchet in the margin.

ABDERUS, Hercules's minion. See the note [D] of the article ABDERA.

ABDIAS of Babylon, a writer who deſerves a place among the boldeſt legend-writers. This impoſtor boaſted he had ſeen our Saviour; was one of the ſeventy two diſciples; had been an eye-witneſs of the actions, and preſent at the death of ſeveral apoſtles; had follow'd into Perſia St. Simon and St. Jude, who he ſaid made him the firſt Biſhop of Babylon. The work which goes under his name is divided into ten books; and entitled, Hiſtoria Certaminis Apoſtolici. Wolfgang Lazius (a) found the manuſcript of it in a cave of Carinthia; and tho' a man of judgment and learning, he yet was ſo impos'd upon by this fabulous writer, as to reſolve to publiſh his work, as a piece of great importance. He gave credit to the inſcription on this manuſcript, importing that Abdias, made Biſhop of Babylon by the Apoſtles themſelves, had written that hiſtory of their actions in the Hebrew language, that Eutropius tranſlated it into Greek (b), and Africanus into Latin. He publiſh'd it at Baſil in 1551 (c), with ſome other other lives of the ſaints; but it has ſince borne ſeveral impreſſions in different places [A]. Fabricius ſays, thoſe are miſtaken (d), who imagine it was inſerted in the Bibliotheque of the Fathers. Laurence de la Barre took it into his hiſtory of the Fathers, printed at Paris in 1583 (e). Pope Paul IV, and not Pope Gelaſius, as Moreri relates, rejected this work of Abdias (f) as ſpurious. Several Catholic and Proteſtant writers diſcover'd the fraud; and the latter pretend to have undeceiv'd the former [B], which the Catholics deny [C]. But little glory would accrue to either; for this impoſtor was ſo unguarded, as to quote Hegeſippus, who liv'd an hundred and thirty years, or thereabouts, after our Lord's aſcenſion (g). He alſo mentions one Cratho, a diſciple of the Apoſtles, who, he ſays, writ a hiſtory in ten books, of all the actions and ſufferings of St. Simon and St. Jude in Perſia, for thirteen years; which hiſtory, he ſays, Africanus the hiſtoriographer tranſlated into Latin (h). Now how can this Africanus be any other, but Julius Africanus, who died about the year 230 (i)?

(a) A Phyſician of Vienna in Auſtria, and Hiſtoriographer to the Emperor Ferdinand the firſt. See the epiſtle dedicatory to his edition.

(b) Julius Africanus ſays in his preface, that Eutropius was the diſciple of Abdias.

(c) In folio, printed for Oporinus.

(d) Jo. Alb. Fabricius in codice Apocryph. Novi Teſtament. p. 401.
(e) Not in 1581, as Moreri ſays.
(f) Labbe de Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 3.
(g) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, p. 200.
(h) Abdiæ Hiſt. Certamin. Apoſtol. lib. 6. p. 83.
(i) Cave, Hiſtor. Literar. p. 72.

[A] Borne ſeveral impreſſions in different places.] Du Pin takes notice of the editions of 1557, 1560, and 1571, with a Baſil edition of 1532 (1), and one of Paris 1583, but omits the firſt, which is moſt worthy of notice. As I have not the Paris edition of his Bibliotheque Eccleſiaſtique, I won't preſume to aſſert, that du Pin himſelf mentions this pretended edition of Baſil, printed in 1532. Now as he ſpoke but of one Paris edition, that of 1583, his readers may conclude, that the others he mentioned are not printed there. However, 'tis certain, this work was publiſhed in Paris anno 1560, in 8°, with a Preface written by John Faber, Doctor of Sorbonne. The Epitomizer of Geſner and Dr. Cave mention the Paris edition in 8°, anno 1571. The Eponymologium of Magirus, ſays, that this work was firſt printed at Paris in 1551, which is not true.

(1) 'Tis thus ſaid in the Amſterdam edition, vol. 1. p. 18.

[B] To have undeceived the former in this particular.] See the ſixth chapter, book the firſt, of Rivetus's Criticus Sacer, i. e. Sacred Critic, where, after taking notice of Lazius's prepoſſeſſion, and the authority which Harding and Bellarmine aſcribe to Abdias, he adds; Ejus nugas & mendacia non eſt quod operoſiùs perſequamur, quia jam oculatioribus pontificiis ita patent, ex noſtrorum animadverſionibus, ut eos tam putidi commenti pudeat (5). That is, "'Twould be "needleſs to take any farther notice of his lies and "trifles; for the animadverſions of Proteſtants have ſo "plainly diſcovered them, that the more clear-ſighted "Romaniſts are aſhamed of them, they are ſo groſs." He cites Baronius, Molanus, Poſſevinus, and even Baronius (now more judicious) as confeſſing this hiſtory of the Apoſtles to be ſpurious.

(2) Riveti Opera, tom. 2. p. 1076.

[C] Which the Catholicks deny.] Father Labbe inveighs bitterly againſt Rivetus, upon account of the paſſage abovementioned. The former aſſerted, perhaps with truth, that the Catholicks diſcovered the impoſture before the Proteſtants hinted any thing of it; however, this Father ſhould not have writ with ſo much rancour: theſe are his words (3). Haſce quiſquilias ab otioſo fabulatore, qui merito jure pſeudo-Abdias dicitur, confictas interpolataſve nullius fidei atque auctoritatis eſſe apud eruditos docuerunt jampridem Catholici tractatores, Sixtus Senenſis, Joannes Heſſelius, Joannes Molanus, Cardin. Baronius, Poſſevinus, Salmero, Miræus, aliique, ut ſileam Voſſium, Cocum, Rivetum, ſimileſque hetorodoxos criticos, in alienis ab eccleſia Catholicâ caſtris militantes, atque ex Catholicorum duntaxat ſcriptis & obſervationibus ſuffarcinatos. Mentitur enim pro more Andreas Rivetus, qui libri I. cap. 6. effutire auſus eſt, oculatiores pontificios ex ſuorum, hoc eſt, hæreticorum hominum animadverſionibus edoctos, nugas & mendacia illius operis deprehendiſſe, ita ut eos tam putidi commenti pudeat. Sed amabo, quis Calvini catulus hoc commentum ſubodoratus eſt ante Heſſelium, Molanum, Sixtum, ipſumque adeo Paulum IV, Romanum Pontificem, qui inter ſcripta à ſe damnata rejicit. That is, "Several Ca- "tholic writers, as Sixtus Senenſis, Heſſelius, Mo- "lanus, Baronius, Poſſevinus, Salmero, Miræus, and "others, have ſhewn long ſince, that the traſh of "the idle Romancer, who is ſo juſtly called the falſe "Abdias, is forged, interpolated, and of no authority "with the learned. Not to mention Voſſius, Cocus, "Rivetus, and ſuch heterodox critics, of the Pro- "teſtant party. Rivetus lies, as is his cuſtom, "when he fooliſhly preſumes to tell us, that the "more clear-ſighted Catholics have been ſo inſtructed "by his (heretical he ſhould have ſaid) animadverſi- "ons, that they are aſhamed of Abdias's trifling, rank "falſhoods. But I would fain know, which of Cal- "vin's puppies ſmelt this lie, before Heſſelius, Mola- "nus, Sixtus, and even Pope Paul IV, who rejected "that work as ſpurious?" I believe this work was condemned at Rome after Paul the IVth; for I don't think Claudius Eſpencæus hints at the cenſure it met with under this Pope, when he ſays, Qualiſcunque autor ſit Abdias, ſuperiore certè quam hæc ſcriberemus anno, à Romanis inquiſitoribus proſcriptus eſt. i. e. "Whoever this Abdias be, 'tis certain he was con- "demn'd by the inquiſition at Rome, a year ſince." Theſe words are in the fifth chapter of book V, Of Continence; but the continuator of Magirus was wrong to conclude from thence (4), that the year 1568 is there referr'd to, ſince the Treatiſe Of Continence was printed in 1565 (5). Petrus Paulus Vergerius, a Proteſtant writer who died in 1565, had called Abdias an impoſtor, in his Idolum Lauretanum, firſt written in Italian, afterwards tranſlated into Latin, and printed in 4°, anno 1554.

(3) Phil. Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 3.

(4) Eponymol. Critic. p. 2.
(5) See Launoi Hiſt. Colleg. Navarr. p. 710.

ABDISSI [A], Patriarch of Muzal in Aſſyria, beyond the Euphrates, came to Rome in 1562; and after paying obeiſſance to Pope Pius IV, received the Pallium or Pall from him. As the council of Trent was then met, Cardinal da Mula, protector of the eaſtern Chriſtians, wrote to that aſſembly upon this affair. His letters were read in the XXIId Seſſion, importing, that the nations ſubject to this Patriarch, had been inſtructed in [A] Abdiſſi.] Onuphrius Panvinius calls him Abdyſu, which, he ſays, ſignifies Servus Jeſu, i. e. The Servant of Jeſus (1). Surius and Spondanus give him the ſame name; but Thuanus calls him Abiſius; and adds, that he was ſon to John de domo Marcia, in the city of Gezira on the Tigris (2). I confeſs, I don't underſtand the words Domus Marcia well enough to tranſlate them to my mind, and therefore cannot approve of Moreri's verſion, Maiſon de Marc, (houſe of Marc.) Aubertus Miræus calls this Patriarch, Abdieſu, of whom he relates the following particulars. He was a Monk of S. Pachomius's order (3), and ſucceſſor to Simon Sulacha the Patriarch (4), a very learned Monk of the ſame order, who paid obeiſſance in perſon to Pope Julius the IIId. Abdieſu was a very great ſcholar, underſtood a great many languages, and had a profound knowledge in the Scriptures. Thuanus ſays, this Patriarch underſtood Chaldee, Arabic and Syriac, and anſwered pertinently the very difficult queſtions that were put to him; which Panvinius, Surius and Spondanus alſo declare, with ſeveral other circumſtances. In the confeſſion of faith mentioned by thoſe writers, we find, he had been a Monk of St. Anthony, in the monaſtery of the brothers S. Rochas and St. John. If Aubertus Miræus ſays true, he had ſpread the Romiſh faith very conſiderably, which his ſucceſſors neglected, inſomuch that Leonard Abel Biſhop of Sidon, the Pope's Nuncio in thoſe countries in 1583, found that Donha Simon the Patriarch, the ſecond ſince Abdieſu, was gone towards the confines of Perſia. The Pope's affairs were in no better condition, when Peter Strozza, Secretary to Pope Paul V, publiſhed in 1617, at Rome and Colen, his diſpute De Chaldæorum Dogmatibus (5). i. e. The tenets of the Chaldæans.

(1) Panvin. in Vitâ Pii IV.

(2) Thuani Hiſtor. lib. 32.

(3) Aub. Miræus, Politiæ Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 5. p. 217.

(4) Thuanus calls him Salaka: Spondanus Sulaka. Vide the remark [A] of the article HEBED-JESU.

(5) Aubertus Miræus, Politiæ Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 5. p. 219.

in the faith by the Apoſtles St. Thomas and St. Thaddæus, and by one of their diſciples called Mark; that their belief agreed entirely with the Romiſh church; that they had the ſame Sacraments and Ceremonies, as appeared by their books written in the Apoſtolic times; that this Patriarchate extended very far in India, and included ſeveral nations, ſome whereof were ſubject to the Grand Signior, ſome to the Sophi of Perſia, and others to the King of Portugal. Upon this the Embaſſador of the laſt Monarch declared, that the eaſtern Biſhops in the dominions of his Sovereign, did not recognize any Patriarch. Abdiſſi's confeſſion of faith, dated March the 7th 1562, was afterwards read (a), by which he promiſed to obſerve, and to inculcate into his inferiors, a perfect and perpetual conformity of ſentiments with the church of Rome. Laſtly, they read his letters to the council, excuſing his not attending it [B], and intreating the Fathers to ſend him their decrees, promiſing they ſhould be punctually obeyed. Theſe ſeveral pieces had been read before in one congregation, or aſſembly, without occaſioning any particular reflections; but upon the Portugueze Embaſſador's proteſtation, notice was taken of the abſurdity of his relation; immediately a murmuring aroſe; the Portugueze Biſhops were going to ſpeak, but were ſtopt by the Promoter or Proctor, in the name of the Legates. Thus Father Paul relates this incident (b), which we ſhall examine in another place (c).

(a) 'Tis inſerted in Onuphrius, in Vita Pii IV; in Surius, Commentar. p. 754, &c. in Spondanus, Contin. Annal. ad an. 1562.

(b) Hiſt. of the Council of Trent, lib. 6.

(c) In the article HEBED-JESU.

[B] Excuſing his not attending it.] This ſhews that Moreri miſtook greatly in affirming, that Abdiſſi was at the council of Trent, and preſented his confeſſion of faith there, in the 22d ſeſſion. Aubertus Miræus has committed the ſame error, Qui (Abdieſu, as he calls him) & Tridentino concilio interfuit, i. e. "Who was at "the council of Trent." But the moſt ſurprizing circumſtance is, that Moreri ſhould cite Thuanus and Spondanus, when the former does not mention a word of this Patriarch's pretended journey to the council; and the latter ſays expreſly, that Abdiſſi's letters, to excuſe his not going to Trent, were read. I ſhall take notice by the way, of an error which has certainly crept into Thuanus. He ſays, this Patriarch came, Ad Apoſtolorum limina pontificem ſalutaturus, ut ab eo confirmatus partem de corpore Sancti Petri acciperet; i. e. "He came to Rome to ſalute the "Pope, and be confirmed by him, in order to receive "a part of St. Peter's body." Now would not one conclude from hence, that he was come to beg an arm, or ſome other part of St. Peter's body? For it is a proper way of paying one's court at Rome, to declare, that he is come thither for ſuch gifts. But I am perſuaded, we ſhould read pallium for partem, as it is in Spondanus, who, except in that word, uſes the ſame expreſſions as Thuanus, as we find in the continuation of Baronius's Annals by the former, anno 1562.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 217.
(7) Thuani Hiſt. lib. 32. p. 640, col. 2. Edit. Francof. anni 1625.

☞ABDOLONYMUS [A] was of the royal family of Sidon (a), being deſcended from King Cinyras [B]. Strato (b) was in poſſeſſion of the crown of Sidon, and in great favour with Darius; whilſt Abdolonymus was contented to live in obſcurity, and get his living by cultivating a garden. When the city was ſurrendred to Alexander the Great, the conqueror depos'd Strato, and enquir'd whether any one of the race of Cinyras was living [C], that he might ſet him on the throne. It was generally ſuppos'd that the whole race was extinct, but at laſt this Abdolonymus was thought of, and mention'd to Alexander [D], who immediately ſent ſome of his ſoldiers to bring him. They found the good man at work in a garden, happy in his poverty, and entirely a ſtranger to the noiſe of arms, with which all Aſia was at that time ſhaken. It was with ſome difficulty that they could perſuade him they were in earneſt. Alexander was ſatisfy'd of his high deſcent by the dignity that appear'd in his perſon; but was deſirous alſo of being inform'd by him, in what manner he bore his poverty. I wiſh, ſays Abdolonymus, I may bear my new condition as well. Theſe hands have ſupply'd my neceſſities: I have had nothing, and I have wanted nothing. Alexander was ſo pleas'd with this anſwer, that he gave him not only all that was Strato's, but added likewiſe a large preſent out of the Perſian ſpoils, and augmented his dominions. Cowley has made ſome fine reflexions [E] on the pleaſures of a country life, drawn from this ſtory of

(a) Quint. Curt. lib. 4.
(b) Diodor. Sic. lib. 17. Quint. Curt. lib. 4.

[A] Abdolonymus.] Some call him Abdalonymus; Diodorus Siculus (1) calls him Ballonymus, and Plutarch (2) Alynomus.

(1) Lib. xvii.
(2) De Fort. Alex. p. 340.

[B] Deſcended from King Cinyras.] We learn this from Plutarch (3), who ſeems to differ from all the other writers, in making Abdolonymus, or, as he calls him Alynomus, to be promoted to the crown of Paphos, a city in the Iſland of Cyprus. This Iſland was formerly governed by a King named Cinyras, famous for the inceſtuous embrace of his daughter Myrrha (4). Ovid (5) feigns him to be the ſon of Pygmalion by his ſtatue, which Venus, at his intreaty, turned into a woman. Heſychius mentions a Cinyras ſon of Apollo and Pharnace, and King of Cyprus; Κινύρας, Ἀπόλλωνος καὶ Φαρνακῆς παῖς, Βασιλεὺς Κύπρου. Strabo (6) mentions a Cinyras who kept his court at Byblus; ἦ μὲν ἐν Βύβλος τὸ τῦ Κινύρα Βασίλειον. Diodorus Siculus (7) makes Ballonymus to be advanced to the Kingdom of Tyre. It is very poſſible, that the Iſland of Cyprus and Phœnicia might be under the government of the ſame King, which being ſuppoſed, our different Cinyras's might be but one. But if the Cyprian and Phœnician Cinyras's were different, it was eaſy for Plutarch to miſtake the one for the other, and remembring that Alynomus was deſcended from Cinyras, to ſay he was promoted to be King of Paphos or Cyprus, inſtead of Sidon or Phœnicia.

(3) Ibid.
(4) Ovid. Metam. lib. x.
(5) Ibid.
(6) Lib. xvi.
(7) Lib. xvii.

[C] Alexander ... enquired whether any one of the race of Cinyras was living.] Juſtin differs from the reſt in this particular, and tells us, that Alexander overlooked thoſe of high deſcent, having a mind the King ſhould think he owed his kingdom not to the greatneſs of his birth, but to the generoſity of his benefactor. Quem Alexander, cum operam oblocare ad puteos exhauriendos, hortoſque irrigandos ſolitus eſſet, miſerè vitam exhibentem, regem fecerat, ſpretis nobilibus, ne generis id non dantis beneficium putarent (8).

(8) Juſtin. lib. xi. cap. 10.

[D] Abdolonymus was .... mentioned to Alexander.] Diodorus Siculus and Quintus Curtius inform us, that Alexander committed the placing of a King on the throne of Sidon to Hephæſtion, who offered it to a friend of his, a Sidonian. The young man declined this offer and recommended Abdolonymus, as being of the Royal Family.

[E] Cowley has made ſome fine reflexions.] His words are as follow:

"Bleſt be the man (and bleſt he is) whom e're
"(Plac'd far out of the roads of hope or fear)
"A little field, and little garden feeds;
"The field gives all that frugal nature needs;
"The wealthy garden lib'rally beſtows
"All ſhe can ask when ſhe luxurious grows.
"The ſpecious inconveniences that wait
"Upon a life of buſineſs and of ſtate,

(c) Edit. in folio, 1672, p. 113.

of Abdolonymus (c): but he ſeems to be miſtaken, in ſuppoſing he liv'd in an agreeable retirement, cultivating a garden of his own [F], which he unwillingly exchang'd for a crown.

" He ſees (nor does the ſight diſturb his reſt)
" By fools deſir'd, by wicked men poſſeſt.
" Thus, thus (and this deſerv'd great Virgil's praiſe)
" The old Corycian yeoman paſt his days,
" Thus his wiſe life Abdolonimus ſpent:
" Th' Ambaſſadors which the great Emp'ror ſent
" To offer him a crown, with wonder found
" The rev'rend gard'ner howing of his ground.
" Unwillingly ſlow and diſcontent,
" From his lov'd cottage, to a throne he went.
" And oft he ſtopt, in his triumphant way,
" And oft lookt back, and oft was heard to ſay,
" Not without ſighs, alas I there forſake
" A happier kingdom than I go to take.

[F] Cultivating a garden of his own.] Diodorus Siculus (9) ſays he liv'd in extreme poverty, πένητα καθ' ὑπερβολήν; and that he was at work in a garden, drawing water for hire; κατέλαβεν αὐτὸν ἔν τινι κήπῳ μισθῷ μὴν ἀντλοῦντα. Quintus Curtius ſays (10), he work'd in a garden, for ſmall wages, and was found picking out the weeds; ob inopiam ſuburbanum hortum exigua colentem ſtipe . . . . quem ſteriles herbas eligens Abdolonymus repurgabat. Plutarch ſays (11), he was poor, ſupported by others, and was found in a garden, watering the beds; πένητα καὶ ἄδοξον ἄνθρωπον ἐν κήπῳ τινὶ παρημελημένῳ διατριφόμενον· ἐπὶ τοῦτον οἱ πεμφθέντες ἦκον, εὑρέθη δὲ πρασιαῖς ὕδωρ ἐπάντλων. Juſtin ſays (12), he lived miſerably, and worked in drawing water for gardens.

(9) Lib. xvii.

(10) Lib. iv.

(11) De Fortuna Alex. pag. 340.

(12) Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

☞ABDON is, according to ſeveral authors, the name of that Man of God or Prophet, who went to Bethel to reprove Jeroboam, for offering incenſe to the Calves he had ſet up at that place. The Prophet cried againſt the Altar, and ſaid, O Altar, Altar, thus ſaith the Lord; behold a child ſhall be born unto the houſe of David, Joſiah by name, and upon thee ſhall he offer the Prieſts of the high places that burn incenſe upon thee, and men's bones ſhall be burnt upon thee (a) [A]. This prophecy exaſperated the King to ſuch a degree, that he ſtretched out his hand againſt the Prophet, and ordered him to be ſeiz'd; but he was ſoon puniſhed for his raſhneſs; his hand dried up ſo that he could not pull it in again to him (b); and in the mean time there happened another miracle, which the Man of God had foretold to confirm the truth of his prophecy [B]; the Altar was rent, and the aſhes poured out from the Altar (c). Jeroboam aſtoniſhed at this, altered his mind, appeas'd his anger, and deſired the Prophet to pray for him, that his hand might be reſtored. The King's requeſt was granted, his hand was healed as he had deſired. Upon this he invited the Prophet to his palace, to refreſh himſelf, and offered to give him a reward. But the Man of God would not accept the King's invitation, and refuſed to receive any preſent from him; and he ſaid, the Lord ordered him not to eat bread, nor to drink water, in that place; nor to return home by the ſame way that he came (d); ſo he went another way. There was an old Prophet, who happened at that time to live at Bethel, and having been told by his ſons what the Man of God had done that day, he went after him, and finding him ſitting under an oak, he invited him to come to his houſe to eat a bit of bread: Abdon refuſed it, becauſe God had ſtrictly forbidden him to return to Bethel, or to eat or drink any thing there. But the other making freſh inſtances, ſaid he was alſo a Prophet, and that an Angel had ſpoken to him, and commanded him in the word of the Lord to bring Abdon home with him, that he might take ſome refreſhment (e), but he lied unto him. Abdon not ſuſpecting the fraud, and being tired with his journey, was prevailed upon to go to the Prophet's houſe, where he did eat bread and drank water; but whilſt they ſat at the table the word of the Lord came unto the Prophet that brought him back, who cried to him, thus ſaith the Lord, Foraſmuch as thou haſt diſobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and haſt not kept the commandment which the Lord thy God commanded thee,—thy carcaſe ſhall not come unto the ſepulchre [C] of thy Fathers (f). Accordingly when Abdon was gone away upon an aſs,

(a) 1 Kings, xiii. 2.

(b) Ibid. ver. 4.

(c) Ibid. ver. 5.

(d) Ibid. ver. 9.

(e) Ibid. ver. 8.

(f) Ibid. ver. 20, 21, 22.

[A] Burnt upon thee.] This is one of the plaineſt prophecies, that is in the whole Bible. The King, who was to perform the thing foretold, is expreſly named, and the fact (1) is related with the clearneſs of hiſtory, without being hid under any allegory or metaphorical way of ſpeaking, though it was not to be fulfilled till above three hundred and fifty years after (2). It is true the Books of Kings were written after the captivity of Babylon; this the learned are agreed in (3), and unbelievers might ſuſpect that the prophecies were written after the event; but it muſt be obſerved, that the materials of theſe books were taken from ancient records, written long before the captivity, as appears from ſeveral paſſages, and eſpecially by what is ſaid 1 Kings viii. 8, that the Ark was unto this day in the place, where Solomon ordered it to be plac'd: this could not be ſaid but by an author, who lived before the temple was deſtroyed. See alſo ch. ix. 21. and xii. 19. Some writers pretend, that Jeremiah is the author of the books of Kings; others think they were written by Ezra; but all this, ſays Mr. le Clerc (4), is mere conjecture, which has no ſolid foundation.

(1) See 2 Kings, xxiii. 15.

(2) Clericus, in 1 Reg. xiii. 2.

(3) Id. Diſſert. de Auctor. Lib. Hiſtor. ſect. 6.

(4) Loc. cit.

[B] To confirm the truth of his prophecy.] To foretell an event long before it happens, is undoubtedly a very good proof that a man is ſent by God; but then it can be a proof only when the thing foretold is come to paſs. In the caſe before us, the prediction of Abdon could be no argument to Jeroboam of his being divinely inſpired, becauſe the prophecy could not then be compared with the event, which was to happen three hundred and fifty years after. Therefore it was proper this prophecy ſhould be confirmed by a miracle, that no body might doubt of the truth of it. God indeed had forewarned the Iſraelites, not to hearken to every Prophet, though he ſhould work miracles (5); but then it was only with regard to ſuch Prophets as ſhould endeavour to intice them to idolatry; whereas Abdon would diſſuade them from ſerving the falſe Gods, and bring them back to the worſhip of the Lord; the miracle therefore which attended his prophecy, was an unqueſtionable argument, that the prophecy would really be accompliſhed.

(5) Deuter. xiii. 1, 2, &c.

[C] Unto the ſepulchre of thy Fathers.] Every family uſed anciently to have their own burying place, which was often within the houſe; as appears with regard to the Greeks, by theſe words of Plato (6). Οἱ δὲ ἔξω ἐκείνων πρότεροι τὸν ἐθαπτον ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ τοὺς ἀποθανόντας, ἡμεῖς δὲ τούτων οὐδὲν ποιοῦμεν. The ancient (Greeks) buried the dead in their houſes, but we do not do the ſame. And with regard to the Romans, Servius (7) ſays, Apud majores omnes in domibus ſepeliebantur, unde ortum eſt ut Lares colerentur in domibus. i. e. " In the time of our fore-fathers the " dead were buried within the houſe, whence it came aſs the Prophet had lent him, a lion met him by … was caſt in the way, and the aſs and lion ſtood b… ing heard of this, went to take the corps, and … his ſons, that when he died, they ſhould put h… ſaid he, The ſayings which he cried by the word … againſt all the houſes of the high places, which are … to paſs (g). The Scriptures mention ſome othe… Locis Hebr.

(6) In Minoe.

(7) Ad ſextum Æneid. v. 152.

" that the Lares or Family-Gods were worſhipp'd at " home." To this purpoſe every family had its ſepulchre, in which no ſtranger was permitted to be buried. Ἔθαψε τούτους, ſays Demoſthenes (8), εἰς τὰ πατρῷα μνήματα ὧν ὅσοι πέρ εἰσι τοῦ γένους κοινωνοῦσι. That is, He buried them in the family-ſepulchre, which belongs to all that are of the ſame family: nor were ſtrangers permitted to be buried in thoſe ſepulchres, τὶς ἂν ἐφῖ, ὅστις εἰς τὰ πατρῷα μνήματα τοὺς μηδὲν ἐν γένει τεθέντας ἐάσαι (9); who would permit that a ſtranger be buried in his family-ſepulchre? It ſeems that the love of the children for their parents induced them at firſt to keep their dead bodies (uſually embalm'd) at home, the ſame fondneſs made them deſire to be buried near thoſe to whom they ow'd their birth; and it was looked upon as a great misfortune, nay as very diſhonourable, to be buried in a ſtrange place: therefore if any perſon happened to die abroad, his corps was anointed with honey, or waxed over, that it might not corrupt till it could be brought home (10). Since therefore the Jews did alſo think it a great misfortune not to be buried in their anceſtors ſepulchre, God, to keep them in awe, uſed to threaten them, that if they diſobeyed him, they ſhould not be laid in the ſepulchre of their fathers. But in the caſe of Abdon, this threatning implied a heavier puniſhment, as appeared by the event, namely, that the Prophet ſhould be killed before he was come to the place of his abode (11).

(8) In Eubol. n. 38.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) See Roſini Antiq. Rom. lib. 5. c. 39. p. 448.

(11) Cler. in 1 Reg. 13. 22.

[D] A lion——ſlew him.] It may appear very ſtrange that Abdon ſhould be thus ſuddenly and ſeverely puniſhed, for a crime he committed, it ſeems, out of ignorance, and to which he was inticed by the artful lye of another Prophet, and that the Scripture ſhould not ſo much as hint, that the liar ſhould be puniſhed for his impoſture. Abdon out of a ſenſe of his duty to God could not be prevailed upon to enter the King's palace, nor to receive any thing from him; but when a Prophet like himſelf, entreated him to take ſome refreſhment, and did it in the name of the Lord, it ſeems Abdon might think God was ſatisfied with his readineſs to obey, and would not require of him a greater ſelf-denial; it may ſeem at leaſt that his crime was not very odious. But the Prophet that tempted Abdon, pretending the Lord had ſent an Angel to him, who commanded him to bring Abdon back to Bethel, was guilty of a double crime; the enſnaring of his Brother-Prophet, and employing the holy name of God to give credit to a lie. But we muſt not paſs a raſh judgment, eſpecially when the queſtion is about the ways of the Almighty. Abdon could not but know what ſtrict orders he had received from God; and he was not to depart from them, without a revelation full as clear as the firſt; the bare word of another Prophet was not ſufficient to excuſe his diſobedience; he ſhould have ſuſpected, that the idolatrous Prieſt

ABEL, ſecond ſon of Adam and Eve, wa… the firſtlings of his flock, at the ſame time that … God was pleaſed with Abel's oblation, but diſſa… latter, that he roſe up againſt his brother, and k… Moſes relates of him (a); but were we to take … rioſity has given birth to on this occaſion, the … this is not our deſign; nor ſhall we venture ou… at the time he was killed. 'Tis impoſſible to … we don't know how long the ſtate of innocenc…

[A] How long the ſtate of innocence laſted.] Authors differ very much on this head. Some think Adam ſinn'd the very day he was created, and did not continue in paradiſe above ſix, ſeven, or ten hours (1); others affirm he was ſix, eight, or ten days there, and others thirty four years. Moſt of theſe ground their conjectures, on the relation or ion met him by the way and ſlew him [D], and his carcaſe nd lion ſtood by the carcaſe [E]. The old Prophet hav-ıe corps, and buried it in his own grave, and ordered ſhould put his bones beſide thoſe of Abdon, becauſe, l by the word of the Lord againſt the altar in Bethel, and ces, which are in the cities of Samaria, ſhall ſurely come ion ſome other perſons called Abdon [F]. Hieron. de (g) Ibid. ver. 32.

(1) Pererius in Geneſim, lib. 6. Quæſt. 1.

worſhipp'd at y had its ſe-nitted to be ies (8), εἰς τὰ εἰς κοινωνοῦσι. lchre, which ; nor were e ſepulchres, τοῦς μηδὲν ἐν rmit that a ? It ſeems ents induced (uſually em-them deſire ow'd their t misfortune, in a ſtrange o die abroad, waxed over, be brought id alſo think n their anceſ-we, uſed to , they ſhould ners. But in led a heavier namely, that vas come to appear very denly and ſe-ted, it ſeems, as inticed by hat the Scrip-he liar ſhould out of a ſenſe iled upon to ny thing from entreated him e name of the d was ſatisfied ot require of leaſt that his Prophet that d ſent an An-g Abdon back the enſnaring he holy name uſt not paſs a tion is about not but know m God; and t a revelation rd of another diſobedience; latrous Prieſt might have bribed a man to inſnare him, and to make him act againſt what he himſelf had told the King, to the end that the people, looking upon him as a falſe Prophet, ſhould not be affected by his reproof, and might perſevere in their idolatry. If we conſider Abdon's crime in this view, it will appear of a very dangerous conſequence, being capable to render ineffectual the meſſage which he delivered to Jeroboam in the name of the Lord. As to the Prophet who deceived Abdon, we are not to ſuppoſe that he eſcaped unpuniſhed, though the Scripture is ſilent about it: the ſacred hiſtorians often relate the moſt evil actions of men, without any mark of diſlike, or cenſure; but it does not follow from thence that they approve thoſe actions, or propoſe them as an example to be imitated by us. We may obſerve, by the way, that ſome Prophets, though inſpired by God to foretell future events, were not always very honeſt men, as appears particularly by what our Saviour ſays, ſpeaking of the laſt day, Many will ſay to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not propheſied in thy name? and in thy name have caſt out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profeſs unto them, I never knew you; depart from me ye that work iniquity (12).

(12) Matt. vii. 22, 23.

[E] The aſs and lion ſtood by the carcaſe.] One would think it ſtrange, that ſuch a fierce animal as a lion is, ſhould ſtand quietly by the aſs and the dead corps, without devouring them; but as Mr. Le Clerc obſerves upon this paſſage, it appears by this, that the lion was ſent providentially by God himſelf, to puniſh the Prophet, that every body might know, his untimely death did not happen by chance, but was occaſioned by the crime he committed in diſobeying God's command.

[F] Some other perſons call'd Abdon.] We find in the Scripture three other perſons of that name. The firſt is Abdon the ſon of Hillel, a Pirathonite, who ſucceeded Elon, and judged Iſrael eight years (13). In his time, as Joſephus tells us (14), the Jews enjoyed ſuch a happy peace, that Abdon had no opportunity to acquire a reputation by warlike expeditions. The only thing that rendered him famous, was his having forty ſons and thirty grandſons, that rode on threeſcore and ten aſs-colts. He died, according to Joſephus (15), in a good old age, and was buried in a very magnificent manner at Pirathon in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites (16). The ſecond Abdon mentioned in the Scripture was the ſon of Jehiel and Maachah (17); but that is all we know of him. The third Abdon was the ſon of Micah; he was ſent by Joſiah with four other perſons to Haldah the Propheteſs to ask her advice about the book of the law, that had lately been found in the temple (14).

(13) Judges xii. 12, 13, 14.
(14) Ant. lib. 5. c. 7.
(15) Ibid.
(16) Judg. xii. 15.
(17) 1 Chron. viii. 29. & ix. 36.
(18) 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20.

and Eve, was a ſhepherd. He offered to God ſome of ame time that his brother Cain offered fruits of the earth. tion, but diſſatisfied with Cain's, which ſo exaſperated the brother, and killed him. Theſe are the only circumſtances ere we to take notice of the ſeveral particulars which cu-occaſion, they would run to a very great length. But ve venture our own conjectures, with regard to Abel's age impoſſible to come to any certainty on this head, ſince e of innocence laſted [A]; how much Abel was younger than laſted.] Au-Some think ated, and did ſeven, or ten eight, or ten rs. Moſt of e relation or ſimilitude they ſuppoſe between Adam and Chriſt: as for inſtance, ſuch as ſay Adam was forty days, or thirty four years, in the terreſtrial paradiſe; ſuppoſe this to be a type of the forty days Chriſt continued without ſuſtenance, or the thirty four years he lived upon earth (2). 'Twere needleſs to inform perſons of ſenſe, that ſuch kind of reaſons are no proof. Pretty about religion; and others that they quarrelled [E] about a woman [F]. Authors are as much divided on the manner in which this horrid murther was committed [G], but don't differ so much, as to the manner, whereby they knew God preferred Abel's sacrifice. The most general opinion is, that fire came down from heaven on Abel's victim [H], and that nothing of this kind fell on Cain's offering. But as men are but too fond of starting a numberless multitude of hypotheses, purely to shew the marvellous in every thing, some affirm (b), that the figure of a lion appeared in the midst of the fire, which fell on Abel's sacrifice; and this, they tell us, was a type of the lion of the tribe of Judah, whose coming had been promised. I have collected in the Remarks a pretty

(a) Gen. iv.

(2) Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſim, cap. 3. ver. 23.

(b) Apud Salianum, tom. 1. p. 190. & apud Bisselium, Ruinar. Illustr. decade 1. p. 221, 273.

Priest and a Martyr; for which three qualities, it has been said that the church began in him. These fine qualities are ascribed to him by another author (21). But were Eutychius's tradition, which we shall relate hereafter, true, it would then be certain, that Abel never knew woman, since that tradition declares, that he died before the marriage of the two brothers.

(21) Autor. Mirab. Sacræ Script. apud August. tom. 3. lib. 1. cap. 3. citante Saliano, Annalium. tom. 1. p. 184.

[E] His anger arose from a dispute about religion.] 'Tis related in the Targum of Jerusalem, that Cain and Abel being together in the fields, the former maintained there would be no judgment, no judge, no eternal life, no reward for the good, nor punishment for the wicked; and that the world was neither created, nor governed, by God's mercy; Since, says he to his brother, your offering was accepted, and mine was not. Abel answered him in his own words, except that he said yes for the other's no: and as to Cain's principal grievance, he replied, that his offering was grateful and his brother's was not so, because his works were better than those of Cain. The dispute growing warmer, Cain fell upon his brother and slew him (22). This was a fatal beginning of religious disputes, and a melancholy omen of the dreadful calamities they would afterwards occasion. It is likewise an instance of man's ridiculous vanity, who is always most inclined to doubt a Providence, when matters don't succeed to his wishes, but do they favour him, his doubts vanish; the reason of which is, he imagines himself so considerable in the scale of Beings, that an equitable and judicious dispenser of blessings and evils cannot contemn him. Estis io superi, ait Statius, cum convaluisset à periculoso morbo, vir eximiæ probitatis Rutilius Gallicus. At contra, ubi quid contigerat contra quam æquum esse censerent, Deos aut nullos esse, aut crudeles, aut injustos esse dicebant..... Itaque in morte Tibulli Ovidius,

Cum rapiant mala fata bonos, ignoscite fasso,
Sollicitor nullos esse putare Deos.

That is,

" Statius cried, after Rutilius Gallicus, a man of " distinguished probity, was recovered from a dan" gerous sickness, there certainly are Gods. But on " the contrary, when any thing befel them which " they thought unjust, they would say, there were " no Gods; or they were unjust and cruel..... Thus " Ovid on the death of Tibullus.
" Pardon—but when the good are snatch'd from " earth,
" I'm tempted to conclude, there are no Gods.

(22) Paraph. Hierosolym. apud Fagium, citante Saliano, tom. 1. p. 188. See the several rhetorical flourishes of John Bisselius, a German Jesuit, on this subject. Illustr. Ruinar. decad. 1. p. 228 & seq.

Thus says one of the most celebrated orators of the sixteenth Century (23).

(23) Muretus, Orat. 3. vol. 2.

[F] They quarrell'd about a woman.] Eutychius Patriarch of Alexandria, relates in his Annals (24), that Eve brought forth a daughter called Azrun, with Cain; and Owain, another daughter, at the same birth with Abel. That the time for marrying the two sons being come, Adam designed Owain for Cain, and Azrun for Abel; but Cain insisting he would marry his twin-sister, she being the handsomest, his father used him ill. Eutychius adds, that while the two brothers were going to present their offerings on a mountain by Adam's command, who would oblige them to perform this religious act before their marriage, declaring that the success of their sacrifice shou'd determine their dispute, Satan secretly prompted Cain to kill Abel, for the love of Azrun; and as this made his oblation unacceptable to God, it so exasperated Cain against his brother, that the moment they were come down from the mountain he flung a stone at Abel's head, which killed him. The beautiful Azrun, whom Cain married after this murther (25), and carried with him into banishment, was therefore the cause of his guilt. She indeed was the innocent cause of it; however, this verifies what a Latin Poet has observed, with regard to the antiquity of the wars raised upon the account of women;

(24) Eutychii Annales. I follow Pocock's translation. The Printer of Historia Patriarch. Heidegg. tom. 1. p. 192, writes Præcipius.

(25) Eutychius. Vide Hottinger. Historiam Orient. p. 27.

Nam fuit ante Helenam cunnus teterrima belli Causa.

That is,

" For long e'er Helen's time a thousand dy'd,
" Ten thousand fought to get a beauteous bride.
Creech.

(26) Horat. Satyr. 3. lib. 1. v. 107.

The Archonticks (27) and Cabbalists (28) agree with this tradition of Eutychius. Father Mersenne says in his Commentary on Genesis, p. 1415 and 1431, that some Rabbis relate, Abel had two twin-sisters, and that Cain would marry both, which, they say, occasioned the contest; at this rate a fondness for Polygamy must have been very antient. To conclude, according to the Targum and this Alexandrian Patriarch, Abel was killed a little after God had approv'd his sacrifice. This chronology is infinitely more probable than the vulgar, according to which Cain killed his brother thirty years after they had made their offerings.

(27) Heretics mention'd by St. Epiphanius, Hæres. XL.

(28) In Heidegger Historia Orient. p. 191. See also Selden de Jure Nat. & Gent. lib. 3. cap. 2. who cites Rabbi Eliezer, in Pirke, cap. 21.

[G] The manner in which this horrid murther was committed.] We before observed, that some declare it was with a stone. Others, that Cain tore Abel to pieces with his teeth, Hebræorum nonnulli tradunt eum fuisse morsibus à Cain dilaceratum (29). Others, that he fell'd him with the jaw-bone of an ass, and thus Painters have represented this catastrophe. Others, that he murthered him with a pitchfork. St. Chrysostom declares 'twas a sword; St. Irenæus a scythe, and Prudentius a kind of hedging bill.

(29) Perer. in Genes. lib. 7. ad ver. 8 & 9. cap. 4.

Frater probatæ sanctitatis æmulus
Germana curvo colla frangit sarculo (30).

Thus English'd,

" Envious of sanctity approv'd, a brother,
" His brother murthers with a crooked bill.

(30) Prudent. in Hamartig. præf. 15.

See Salian's Annals, vol. 1. p. 189. and Bisselius p. 234 and 257, vol. 1. of Illustrium ruinarum. However 'tis certain, says a writer (31), Abel was neither drowned nor strangled, since the Scripture says, his blood was spilt. Some think, Abel at first defended himself bravely, and got the better of his brother; that he threw him, and did not hurt him, but that Cain rose up and killed him. Father Mersenne relates this chimera in the 1431st page of his Commentary on Genesis.

(31) Perer. in Genes. cap. 4. v. 8, 9.

[H] That fire came from heaven.] St. Jerom relates this tradition (32), and confirms it from Theodotion, who follows it in his version of the Scriptures. Nisi illa interpretatio vera esset, quam Theodotion posuit, & inflammavit Dominus super Abel, & super sacrificium ejus; supra Cain verò & sacrificium ejus non inflammavit (33). i. e. " Unless Theo-
" dotion's interpretation were true; and God sent " down fire on Abel and on his sacrifice; but not on " Cain, nor on his sacrifice." Most Fathers of the church approve this version. What makes the supposition probable, is, that fire has often come down from heaven, to shew that a sacrifice was agreeable to the Almighty. This mark of the Divine approbation was exhibited at Aaron's consecration (34), and was also indulged at some of the sacrifices of Gideon, David, and Solomon, to whom some add Nehemiah (35). Cornelius à Lapide, tells us, that Calvin and Luther ridiculed this descent of the heavenly fire on Abel's victim, as being a Jewish fiction (36); but Heidegger quotes a passage from Luther, which evidently proves the contrary. Etsi Moses illud signum, quo Deus ostendit sibi Abel munera grata esse, non ostendit; tamen veri-simile est fuisse ignem cælo demissum, quo oblatio hausta & consumpta in oculis omnium (37). i. e. " Though
" Moses does not mention the sign, by which God disco" vered,

(32) Hieron. Tradition. Hebraic.

(33) Hieron. Quæst. Hebraic.

(34) Levit. ix.

(35) See chap. 6. of the Book of Judges, the first Book of Kings, chap. 18. the first Book of Chronicles, chap. 21. the second Book of Chronicles, chap. 7. the second Book of the Maccabees, chap. 1.

(36) Cornel. à Lapide in Genes. cap. 4. ver. 4. p. 97.

(37) Lutherus ad Genes. cap. 4. ver. 3. apud Heideg. Hist. Patriarch. tom. 1. p. 184.

pretty large number of different opinions, relating to Abel, moſt of theſe are falſities and errors; but as this Dictionary was compiled chiefly in that view, the reader muſt not form a judgment on this rhapſody, without calling to mind that circumſtance. This is mentioned once for all.

" vered, that he approved of Abel's ſacrifice; it is " yet probable, it was fire from heaven which con- " ſumed the offering before the people." A multitude of Proteſtant Divines have given into this opinion (38), and ſome of them confirm it from a paſſage of the Pſalms (39), which Clement Marot tranſlates as follows.

De tes offertes & ſervices
Se veuille ſouvenir
Et faire tous tes ſacrifices
En cendre devenir.

That is,

" May the Almighty
" Thy offerings and thy ſervices remember,
" And bid his fire thy ſacrifice conſume.

The heathens boaſted their being favoured in ſome places with theſe extraordinary marks of the celeſtial approbation, as we ſhall ſhew in the article EGNATIA. 'Tis well known the Devil apes the true God.

(38) See Seldeni Otia Theol. p. 337.
(39) 'Tis the 20th.

☞ABEL the ſon of Adam. Mr. Bayle ſuppoſes, with moſt Commentators, that God ſent a fire from heaven to manifeſt his acceptance of Abel's offering; but a very learned and judicious Divine was of another opinion. It's true, ſays he (a), that there are in the ſacred hiſtory ſeveral inſtances of ſacrifices burnt by a miraculous fire, but when that happened, the Scripture mentions it in expreſs terms; whereas in the inſtance before us, there is no mention made of any ſuch fire, and we are not to ſuppoſe miracles where there is no occaſion for them. We may alſo think that Cain, impious as he was, would not much care whether his offering was conſumed by fire or not; it is therefore proper to look for another token of God's approbation and regard, a token capable of affecting Cain's heart and provoking his reſentment. Moſes indeed ſpeaks of God's regard to Abel's offering, and of his diſregard to that of Cain, immediately after he has related, that they offered; but it muſt not be infer'd from thence, that the marks of approbation inſtantly followed their offerings; it is very probable that in time only [A] they came to know, Abel that he was regarded, Cain that he was not. Abel proſpered, his flock increaſed; Cain on the contrary did not proſper, the earth did not yield him a plentiful harveſt; theſe were the means by which God manifeſted his approbation of Abel's offering, and his diſregard for that of Cain; this it was that imbitter'd the covetous Cain againſt his brother; ſeeing him bleſſed in a particular manner, far beyond what he was himſelf, he reſolved at laſt to kill him. According to this hypotheſis, it is eaſy to underſtand, why God had a reſpect for the offering of Abel, and not for that of Cain, viz. becauſe Abel was virtuous and made his offering with a ſenſe of religion [B], according to what is ſaid of him, that through faith he offered unto God a more excellent ſacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witneſs that he was righteous (b); whereas Cain being vicious, the ceremonial part of his religion could not be acceptable to God (c). It is ſaid in the Scripture that Abel brought of the firſtlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof (d). Commentators are not agreed about the meaning of theſe words. Some think that Abel killed and made a burnt-offering of the firſtlings of his flock. Others maintain that he only offered milk or cream; we ſhall inſert in the notes the grounds and reaſons of both theſe opinions [C]. It is remarkable

(a) This is taken from a manuſcript, written by a late Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Leyden in Holland.
(b) Heb. xi. 4.
(c) All this is from the ſame manuſcript.
(d) Gen. iv. 4.

[A] That in time only they came to know, &c.] There is no reaſon to believe that Abel was killed the very firſt year he poſſeſſed a flock of his own; the manner in which this hiſtory is related hints to us, that Abel and Cain lived ſeveral years, the firſt a ſhepherd, the other a husband-man; and we may ſuppoſe, without ſtraining the text, that the firſt time they reaped any profit from their employment, they offered the fruits of it to God, and that they continued to do it for ſeveral years together. Abel ſays, the ſacred Writer was a keeper of ſheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground, and in proceſs of time it came to paſs, &c. Theſe words in proceſs of time, in Hebrew מקץ ימים [mikketz jamim] ſignify ſometimes after ſeveral or ſome years, as may be ſeen in Deuteronomy ch. xiv. verſ. 28. at the end of three years, where the word three determines the number of years; but no number being put in the place before us, it may be rendered, as it is in our tranſlation, in proceſs of time, or, after ſome years.

(1) Antiq. lib. 1. c. 2. Havere.

[B] With a ſenſe of religion.] This is hinted by Joſephus (1), "Αβελος δικαιοσύνης ἐπιμελεῖτο, καὶ πᾶσιν τοῖς ὑπ' αὐτοῦ πραττομένοις πάρειναι τὸν Θεὸν νομίζων ἀρετῆς προενόει. That is, " Abel was righteous, and " being perſuaded that God was preſent to all his ac- " tions, he ſtudied to practiſe virtue." But the Jewiſh hiſtorian gives another reaſon why God was better pleaſed with Abel's oblation than with that of Cain, viz. that God is honoured with what grows naturally and in a ſpontaneous manner, and not with what the covetouſneſs of men forces the earth to produce. Θεὸς τοῖς αὐτομάτοις καὶ κατὰ φύσιν γιγνομένοις τιμώμενος, ἀλλ' οὐχὶ τοῖς κατ' ἐπίνοιαν ἀνθρώπου πλεονέκτου κατὰ βίαν πεφυκόσιν (2). This is no good reaſon, for ſince the earth had been curſed, and man was doom'd to till the ground, how could God, a good and benevolent Being, be diſpleaſed at Cain's oblation, who offered the firſt-fruits of his labour, and as it were the very ſweat of his brows?

(2) Joſeph. ibid.

[C] The grounds and reaſons of both theſe opinions.] Thoſe, who maintain the firſt opinion, ſay, firſt that God himſelf inſtituted ſacrifices at firſt; he entered into a covenant with Adam immediately after the fall, and promiſed him a Redeemer; now all covenants were ratified by burnt offerings. Secondly, In thoſe times men were clothed with skins; this God himſelf taught them (3), and there is no reaſon to believe, that they uſed the skins of ſuch animals only as died a natural death, or that they killed them on purpoſe to have their skin; and as they did not eat then the fleſh of any living creature, it follows that they offered them up a ſacrifice or burnt-offering, and kept the skin for their clothing. It is objected againſt this opinion, that the flocks being at that time very ſmall, it is not to be ſuppoſed God would require of men to leſſen them, by offering part of them; but it appears that all ſorts of animals had already had time enough to multiply, ſince Abel and Cain were pretty much advanced in years, when they made their firſt offering. The Jewiſh Rabbis are of opinion that theſe offerings were burnt offerings; they pretend theſe were the only ſacrifices in uſe before the law of Moſes, that they were permitted to every private perſon, and that the Jews allowed the heathens to offer them in the temple of Jeruſalem. But ſeveral authors, and among them the celebrated Grotius, are of another remarkable that the Greek churches, who celebrate the feaſt of every Patriarch and Prophet, have not done the ſame honour to Abel; his name is not to be found in any catalogue of Saints or Martyrs before the tenth Century, nor even in the new Roman Martyrology. However he is prayed to, with ſome other Saints in ſeveral Roman Litanies, which are ſaid for perſons that lye at the point of death.

(3) Gen. iii. 21.

opinion; they maintain, that Abel's offering was only of the milk of his flock, or of cream. They obſerve, that nothing was offered to God but what ſerved for food to men; and as men did not feed upon fleſh before the flood, ſo they did not ſacrifice any living creature; and to ſupport what we mentioned before, viz. That cattle was not very numerous in the firſt world, they quote theſe ancient laws of Triptolemus, Ζῶα μὴ σίτεσθαι, Animals muſt not be hurt, Θεοὺς καρποῖς ἀγάλλειν, The Gods muſt be honoured with fruit offerings (4). Draco made afterwards the ſame law, as may be ſeen in the author quoted in the margin (5). It was a capital crime amongſt Athenians and Lacedæmonians to kill a bull (6). But all theſe quotations are to no purpoſe, becauſe the queſtion is about the number of animals before and not after the flood; though we muſt confeſs the firſt reaſon is very ſtrong, if it be certain that men did not then feed upon fleſh. It is ſaid in our tranſlation that Abel brought of the firſtlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. Grotius and Mr. Le Clerc obſerve, that by the firſtlings is meant the beſt, and that the word בכור [behor] often ſignifies any thing that excels in its kind. They further obſerve that the word חלב [khalab], which is rendered fat, ſignifies alſo milk, or the fat of milk, that is, cream, and that is often thus tranſlated by the Septuagint, and eſpecially in Gen. xviii. 8. where our Engliſh tranſlation has alſo milk. Laſtly, Mr. Le Clerc obſerves, that the ancient Egyptians offered milk to their Gods, and he quotes Diodorus Siculus, who ſays (7), that the inhabitants of the Iſle Meroe, ἐξήκοντα καὶ τριακόσιας χοὰς καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν γάλακτος ἐπλήρουν ἀνακαλούμενοι τὰ τῶν Θεῶν ὀνόματα, "uſed to "fill every day three hundred and ſixty veſſels with "milk, calling upon the names of the Gods. Thus we have laid before the reader the reaſons on both ſides; but on which ſide the truth is, we ſhall not determine; and by what we have ſaid, it will perhaps be thought, that neither of the opinions, we have mentioned, can be proved to the ſatisfaction of an impartial judge.

(4) Clericus in Gen. cap. iv. 4.
(5) Porphyr. de Abſtin. lib. 4. ſect. 22.
(6) Varro de Re Ruſt. lib. 2 cap. 5. See alſo Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 5. c. 14.
(7) Lib. 1. p. 19.

The queſtion concerning the original of ſacrifices, and whether they were of Divine or human inſtitution, with ſeveral other points, which are connected with it, has been the ſubject of various diſputes amongſt Chriſtians. The moſt eminent writers of the Arminians maintain, that as the religion of nature, or that ſyſtem of duties, which reſults from our ſeveral relations in the world, was the primitive religion; ſo all the external acts of worſhip, and particularly ſacrifices, were only expreſſions of that reverence, which the light of nature ſhews to be due to the Deity. They attempt to evince this from the caſe of Abel, who by faith alone, without any poſitive precept of God, that is, by the dictates of reaſon only, diſcovered that God was to be worſhipp'd with the moſt valuable of our poſſeſſions; and in conſequence of that principle, brought the firſtlings of his flocks, and the fat thereof. Whereas Cain only offered the meaneſt of the fruits of the earth, and therefore his offering was rejected by God as unworthy of him, who deſerves a ſupreme regard from his creatures, and ought to be worſhipp'd with the nobleſt of their poſſeſſions.

And in order to prove further their opinion, that the primitive religion was the religion of nature, they obſerve that the manner, in which God addreſſes himſelf to Cain, ſhews that he did not give him a new law upon that occaſion, but only directed him to attend to the dictates of his reaſon, which would prompt him to reſtrain the exorbitance of his paſſion, and calm his reſentments againſt his brother. If thou doſt well, ſays God, ſhalt thou not be accepted? that is, feel the ſatisfaction, which ariſes from the conſciouſneſs of having acted virtuouſly. And if thou doſt not well, ſin lieth at thy door; that is, the puniſhment of ſin, the remorſe and terror of a guilty conſcience. As if he had ſaid; Thy own reaſon ſuggeſts this to thee in the moſt convincing manner. And with regard to the words, which immediately follow, and which our tranſlation renders thus; And unto thee ſhall be his deſire, and thou ſhalt rule over him; the judicious Epiſcopius (8), who defends the ſcheme abovementioned, has given a quite different turn to them; his words are theſe. Quare ad te ſit appetitus (ſic enim lego) ejus, peccati ſcilicet, id eſt, ſi remedium vis, cura ut peccatum ſub tuâ poteſtate ſit; & domineris ei, id eſt, fac ut ei domineris. From this paſſage it appears, that by the words, which in our verſion are rendered his deſire, he underſtands ſin; and intimates that God commanded Cain to be very watchful, leſt ſin ſhould gain the aſcendant over him.

(8) Inſtitut. Theologic. lib. 1. cap. 8.

Philo (9) makes the defect of Cain's ſacrifice to conſiſt in two things. 1ſt, That he did not offer it ſoon enough, but μετ' ἡμέρας, after certain days; and 2dly, That he did not offer of the firſt fruits of the earth, as Abel did of the firſt fruits of his ſheep, but only of the fruits. But this opinion does not ſeem the leaſt favoured by that paſſage in the epiſtle to the Hebrews (10), where the caſe of Abel is mentioned; but we have a plain intimation there, that the thing which gave the preference to Abel's ſacrifice above that of Cain's was faith, that faith which is the ſubſtance, or firm expectation [ὑπόστασις], of things hoped for (11), or a perſuaſion, that God will reward the virtuous either in this or a future ſtate of being. And agreeable to this notion is what Mr. Bayle has quoted above (12), from the Targum of Jeruſalem, and what Jonathan B. Uziel upon the place tells us, that Cain denied a future judgment, or rewards for the juſt; while Abel maintained that there would be a future recompence for the righteous.

(9) De Sacrif. Cain & Abel. p. 107.
(10) c. xi. ver. 4.
(11) v. 1.
(12) Note [A].

ABELARD (Peter) in Latin Abælardus, one of the moſt famous Doctors of the twelfth Century, was born in the village of Palais [A], four leagues from Nantz in Britany; and having a very acute and penetrating genius, he made greater advances in Logic

[A] He was born in the village of Palais.] His father, after making a little progreſs in his ſtudies, embraced a military life, and took great care to have all his children well educated, particularly his eldeſt ſon. It is not well known whether this was Abelard, he ſpeaking of it in ſuch a manner as has occaſioned two different opinions. Theſe are his words: Primogenitum ſuum quanto chariorem habebat, tanto diligentiùs erudire curavit. Ego verò, quanto ampliùs in ſtudio literarum profeci, tanto ardentiùs in eis inhæſi, & in tanto earum amore illectus ſum, ut militaris gloriæ pompam cum hæreditate & prærogativa primogenitorum meorum fratribus derelinquens, Martis curiæ penitus abdicarem ut Minervæ gremio educarer. That is, "He had a great tenderneſs for his "eldeſt ſon, and therefore took the utmoſt care of "his education. As to my ſelf, the greater progreſs "I made in my ſtudies, the more pains I took, and "at laſt I lov'd them ſo much, that I left the glory "which is acquired in the field, and the patrimony, "and prerogatives (primogenitorum meorum) to my "brothers, purpoſely to devote my ſelf to the Muſes." Pâquier is perſuaded from theſe words, that he was the eldeſt (1), but others declare expreſly, he was a younger ſon. Natalis Alexander is of this opinion, Militaris gloriæ pompam cum hæreditate primogenitis fratribus derelinquens. That is, "Reſigning the glories of "the field, and my inheritance to my elder brothers", ſays he, (2) ſpeaking of Abelard; while others again make him the youngeſt of all (3). In my opinion, the laſt explication is not ſo good as the firſt. We are not to doubt but Abelard was ſirnamed Palatinus, from the Latin word Palatium, the name of his village. He was ſo well known by the name Peripateticus Palatinus, that John of Salisbury never calls him by any other (4). Some think he was called Palatinus, from a magnificent palace in which he read his lectures (5); but they are miſtaken.

(1) Pâquier, Recherches de la France, book 6. chap. 17.
(2) Natal. Alexander, Sæcul. XI & XII, part 3. p. 2.
(3) Du Pin, Biblioth. vol. 9. p. 108.
(4) See his Policraticus, p. 111. and his Metalogicus, p. 745, 802, 814, &c. edition of Leyden in 8°, printed 1639.
(5) Jac. Thomaſius, in Vita Abælardi. See the 13th citation hereunder.

Logic than in any other ſtudy. He travelled into ſeveral Provinces, purpoſely to exerciſe himſelf in that ſcience; diſputing wherever he came; darting his ſyllogiſms on all ſides; and ſeeking ſo eagerly to ſignalize himſelf in diſputation, that no knight-errant ever ſought more induſtriouſly for opportunities to break a lance in honour of the Ladies. Abelard made Paris the end of his excurſions, having met with a celebrated profeſſor of Philoſophy, William des Champeaux in that city (a). He was at firſt his favourite diſciple, but did not continue ſo long; for the Profeſſor had a prodigious hard taſk to anſwer his pupil's ſubtle objections, and therefore grew very uneaſy and began to hate him. This ſoon gave birth to factions. The oldeſt pupils ſeconded their maſter's averſion, merely out of envy to Abelard; but this only heightened the latter's preſumption; who tho' very young, thought himſelf compleatly qualified to inſtruct others. Upon this, he reſolved to fix on a place, where he might diſplay his talents to advantage; and for that purpoſe made Melun [B], where the French court then reſided, the ſcene of his inſtructions. Champeaux ſet every engine at work, to prevent the ſetting up of this ſchool; but as ſome perſons in great power were his enemies, this oppoſition was the chief cauſe of his rival's ſucceſs (b). The fame of our new logical profeſſor ſpread wonderfully, and eclipſed that of Champeaux, which puffed up Abelard ſo much, that he removed his ſchool to Corbeil, that he might perplex his enemy by frequent diſputations; but his intenſe application to his ſtudies threw him into an illneſs, which forced him to remove to his native air. He continued ſome years in Britany, and afterwards returned to Paris, where Champeaux, though he had reſigned his chair, and was entred among the Canons regular, yet taught among theſe. Abelard diſputed ſo ſtrongly with him on the nature of Univerſals, that he forced him to give up his opinion, the foundation of which was the ſame doctrine as Spinoza's, but unexplained [C]. This brought the Monk into ſuch contempt, and gained his adverſary ſo much applauſe, that Champeaux's logical lectures were wholly neglected; and the Profeſſor himſelf, in whoſe favour Champeaux had reſigned, deſired to be Abelard's pupil. The latter was no ſooner raiſed to this chair, but he became ſtill more obnoxious to envy; and the Canon-regular ordered matters ſo, that the Profeſſor, who had left the chair for Abelard, was diſcarded, upon pretence of his having committed crimes of a very obſcene nature, and an enemy to Abelard was appointed to ſucceed the former. Upon this Abelard left Paris, and went to Melun, intending to teach Logic there as before; however, he did not continue long in that city, for the inſtant he heard that Champeaux, and his whole community, were retired to a village, he went and poſted himſelf on mount St. Genevieve, and there raiſed his ſchool, like a kind of battery [D], againſt the Profeſſor who taught in Paris. Champeaux finding his creature thus

(a) Gvillelmus Campellenſis. He was Archdeacon of Paris.

(b) Quoniam de potentibus terræ nonnullos ibidem habebat æmulos, fretus eorum auxilio voti mei compos extiti, & plurimorum mihi aſſenſum ipſius invidia manifeſta conquiſivit. Abælardi Epiſt. p. 5.

[B] Made choice of Melun .... for the ſcene of his inſtructions.] I have collated Abelard's relation with Pâquier's epitome of it, and don't find the latter very accurate. The incidents which relate to Abelard, ſtand as follows in the epitome. Abelard ſettled at Corbeil, after his firſt leaving Paris, but returned to this city upon Champeaux's embracing a monaſtic life; he was forced to leave Paris a ſecond time, and then he withdrew to Melun, but upon hearing that Champeaux was going to reſide in his dioceſe of Chalons, he returned to Paris. Champeaux hearing Abelard was come again to that city, returned thither alſo, to traverſe Abelard's deſigns, who at laſt being forced to quit the field, went and ſtudied under Anſelm, a reader of Divinity Lectures in Paris. Abelard afterwards read the ſame kind of lectures, when a Canon deſiring him, To give his niece an hour's inſtruction every day, he gladly accepted the propoſal, but after having taught her ſome time, Cupid inſinuated himſelf into their company. There are ſeveral errors in this relation. Firſt, Abelard did not ſettle in Corbeil, till he had been in Melun. The ſecond time that he left Melun, Champeaux was retired to a village near Paris, and not to his dioceſe of Chalons, he being then only a Canon-regular. I am ſurpris'd that Pâquier did not conſider it was abſurd, to ſuppoſe a Biſhop would leave his dioceſe and go to Paris merely to diſpute with a teacher of Philoſophy there. 3dly, Abelard was not vanquiſhed on this occaſion, and left Paris for no other reaſon, but to viſit his mother, who was going to take the veil. 4thly, Anſelm taught Divinity in Laon, not in Paris. 5thly, The Canon did not ask Abelard to teach his niece, the latter deſiring the Canon (by a friend) to let him lodge in his houſe. 6thly, Abelard wanted to enjoy Heloiſe before he taught her. How juſtly may we ſuſpect a numberleſs multitude of books, ſince Pâquier commits ſo many miſtakes, when he might ſo eaſily have avoided them?

[C] The ſame doctrine as Spinoza's, but unexplain'd.] Let thoſe who underſtand what follows, judge whether 'tis ſo or not. Erat in ea ſententia de communitate univerſalium; ut eamdem eſſentialiter rem totam ſimul ſingulis ſuis ineſſe aſtrueret individuis, quorum quidem nulla eſſet in eſſentia diverſitas, ſed ſola multitudine accidentium varietas (6). That is, "Such was his opinion concerning the community "of Univerſals; that he aſſerted the ſame whole is "eſſentially inherent in its ſeveral individuals, of "which there is no diverſity as to eſſence, but only a "variety ariſing from the multitude of accidents." The Scotiſts univerſale formale à parti rei, or their unitas formalis à parte rei, are much the ſame with this opinion. Now I affirm, that Spinoziſm is only this tenet enlarged; for, according to Scotus's followers, univerſal natures are indiviſibly the ſame in each of their individuals; Peter's human nature is indiviſibly the ſame with that of Paul ... They ground their aſſertion on this, that the ſame attribute of man, which agrees with Peter, agrees alſo with Paul, which is directly the error of Spinoza's followers. The attribute, ſay they, does not differ from the ſubſtance to which it agrees; therefore, wherever the ſame attribute is, the ſame ſubſtance muſt be found; and conſequently ſince the ſame attribute is in all ſubſtances, they are but one ſubſtance. There is then but one ſubſtance in the univerſe, and all the diverſity we ſee, is only different modifications of the ſame ſubſtance. Abelard's antagoniſts could not have found any good arguments againſt this; and I can't perceive what anſwer Fraſſen the Franciſcan Friar (7), who notwithſtanding the great light which Philoſophy has diffus'd over this age, adheres ſtrictly to the doctrine of Scotus, could make Spinoza. However, the reſt of the ſchoolmen might deſtroy this falſe ſyſtem entirely, by only diſtinguiſhing between idem numero, and idem ſpecie, or ſimilitudine. Peter and Paul have not the ſame nature, nor the ſame attribute; if by the word ſame, we mean a different thing from like.

(6) Abælardi Epiſt. 1. p. 5.

(7) See Caſimire de Toulouſe the Capuchin, in Atom. Peripatet. tom. 5. p. 130.

[D] By way of battery.] We muſt give his own words Sed quia ... locum noſtrum ab æmulo noſtro fecerat occupari, extra civitatem in monte S. Genovefæ, Scholarum noſtrarum caſtra poſui, quaſi eum obſeſſurus qui locum occupaverat noſtrum. Quo audito magiſter noſter ſtatim ad urbem impudenter rediens, Scholas quas tunc

thus beſieged, as it were, in his ſchool, brought back the Canons-regular to their convent, but inſtead of diſengaging his friend, he was the occaſion that all his pupils forſook him; a little after which this poor Philoſopher embraced a monaſtic life. And now Abelard and Champeaux were the only combatants; they alone diſputed the ground, but the eldeſt had not the advantage. The ſkirmiſhes were not ended when Abelard was obliged to viſit his mother, who, after her huſband's example, would retire to a cloiſter. At his return to Paris, he found his rival had been made Biſhop of Châlons, ſo that as he could now throw up his ſchool, without its being ſuſpected that he had run from the field, he reſolved to apply himſelf wholly to Divinity, and for that purpoſe went to Laon [E], where * Anſelm read Theological Lectures with great applauſe. Abelard however did not think he had much capacity [F], and therefore inſtead of hearing his lectures, reſolved to read Divinity to his fellow-pupils. He did ſo, and explained Ezekiel's prophecies to ſo much advantage, that he ſoon had a crouded audience. This preſently rais'd Anſelm's jealouſy, ſo that he ordered Abelard to diſcontinue his lectures, who obeying, returned to Paris, and there interpreted Ezekiel in public, with ſo much ſucceſs, that, in a little time, he was as famous for Divinity as for Philoſophy, and got a great deal of money. Abelard, to make life more agreeable, thought a miſtreſs neceſſary, and therefore fixed his choice on Heloiſe, a Canon's niece, preferable to an hundred other maidens or married women, into whoſe favour he might eaſily have inſinuated himſelf [G]. This Canon, whoſe name was Fulbert, loved money,

* The original has it, l'écolâtre Anſelme; écolâtre is properly a Canon who holds a Prebend in a Cathedral, by which he is obliged to teach Philoſophy and the Belles Lettres to his brethren, and the poor children of the dioceſe; and to keep a ſchool for that purpoſe.

Abelard did, whoſe character will appear better from his own words. Acceſſi ad hunc ſenem, cui magis longævus uſus quàm ingenium vel memoria nomen comparaverat; ad quem ſi quis de aliqua quæſtione pulſandum accederet incertus, redibat incertior. Mirabilis quidem erat in oculis auſcultantium, ſed nullus in conſpectu quæſtionantium. Verborum uſum habebat mirabilem, ſed ſenſu contemptibilem & ratione vacuum. Cùm ignem accenderet, domum ſuam fumo implebat, non luce illuſtrabat. Arbor ejus tota in foliis aſpicientibus à longè conſpicua videbatur, ſed propinquantibus & diligentius intuentibus infructuoſa reperiebatur. Ad hanc itaque cum acceſſiſſem, ut fructum inde colligerem, deprehendi illam eſſe ficulneam cui maledixit dominus, ſeu illam veterem quercum cui Pompeium Lucanus comparat dicens, Abelærdi Opera, p. 7.

——Stat magni nominis umbra
Qualis frugifero quercus ſublimis in agro.

That is,

" I went to this old man, to whom long cuſtom, ra" ther than genius or memory, had given reputation.
" Any one who conſulted him on a difficulty, was " ſure to go away more dubious and perplexed than " he came. He appeared wonderful in the eyes of his " auditors, but made a deſpicable figure when a que-
" ſtion was put to him. He had a wonderful flow
" of words, which form'd a ſilly and contemptible
" ſenſe. Whenever he attempted to kindle a fire, he ne" ver enlightened his houſe, but clouded it with ſmoak.
" His tree, which conſiſted wholly of leaves, looked " beautiful at a diſtance; but thoſe who ſurveyed it " carefully near at hand, found it unfruitful. When " I went up to pluck off its fruit, it appeared as the
" fig-tree which the Lord curſed, or that old oak to " which Lucan compares Pompey thus,

" Still ſeem'd he to poſſeſs, and fill his place;
" But ſtood the ſhadow of what once he was.
" So in the field with Ceres' bounty ſpread,
" Uprears ſome ancient oak his rev'rend head *.

* Rowe's Lucan, book 1. ver. 256, &c.

This paſſage deſerved to be tranſcribed, as it ſhews the turn of Abelard's genius, and is a picture of great numbers of people.

[G] Into whoſe favour he might eaſily have inſinuated himſelf.] Abelard was naturally vain; then, being handſome, in the bloom of life, having a genius for poetry, and a great reputation, and being flush of money; it is no wonder he flattered himſelf, every woman he addreſt would receive him favourably. Tanti quippe tunc nominis eram, & juventutis & formæ gratiâ præminebam, ut quamcumque fæminarum noſtro dignarer amore nullam vererer repulſam (16). As Abelard was a Philoſopher who had never frequented the Fair (17), he argued pertinently enough, in imagining he could more eaſily make a conqueſt of Heloiſe's heart than that of another woman; as her learning would give them an opportunity of correſponding regularly by letter, in which lovers expreſs themſelves with greater freedom than in converſation. Tanto facilius hanc mihi puellam conſenſuram credidi, quanto amplius eam literarum ſcientiam & habere & diligere

(16) Abælardi Opera, p. 10.

(17) Fræna libidini cæpi laxare, qui antèa vixeram, continentiſſimè; i. e. " I, " who till now " had liv'd chaſtly, began to " give a looſe to " incontinence. Abælardi Opera, p. 9.

(8) Abælardi Epiſt. p. 6.

(9) He was ſon of James Thomaſius, Profeſſor in Leipſic, author of this Life of Abelard, printed at Hall in 1693. See the 13th citation hereafter.

(10) Jo. Sarisber. Metalog. lib. 11. cap. 8. p. 802.

(11) That is, Abelard, as the author himſelf explains it, p. 814. In hac opinione, ſays he, deprehenſus eſt peripateticus Palatinus Abelardus noſter. That is, " Our Abelard " was found to " be of that o- " pinion.

tunc habere poterat, & conventiculum fratrum ad priſtinum reduxit monaſterium, quaſi militem ſuum, quem deſeruerat ab obſidione noſtra liberaturus (8). I find one particular in Thomaſius's (9) Life of Abelard publiſhed in Germany, which neither Andrew du Chene, Francis d'Amboiſe, nor perhaps all who mention Abelard, ever heard of, viz. that in the midſt of his turmoils and perſecutions, after he had ſettled Heloiſe in the Paraclete, he returned to mount S. Genevieve, and there read public lectures, of which John of Salisbury, his pupil in that place, leaves no room to doubt. Cum primum, ſays he, (10), adoleſcens admodum, ſtudiorum cauſâ migraſſem in Gallias anno altero poſtquam illuſtris Rex Anglorum Henricus, Leo Juſtitiæ, rebus exceſſit humanis, contuli me ad Peripateticum Palatinum (11), qui tunc in monte Sanctæ Genovefæ clarus doctor & admirabilis omnibus præſidebat. Ibi ad pedes ejus prima artis hujus rudimenta accepi, & pro modulo ingenioli mei quicquid excidebat ab ore ejus tota mentis aviditate excipiebam. Deinde poſt diſceſſum ejus, qui mihi præproperus viſus eſt, adhæſi magiſtro Alberico, qui inter cæteros opinatiſſimus dialecticus enitebat, & erat re vera Nominalis ſectæ acerrimus impugnator. That is, " Going to France, when but a youth, for " the ſake of my ſtudies, the year after the death of " Henry of England (the Lion of Juſtice) I immedi- " ately applied my ſelf to Palatinus the Peripatetic, a " moſt celebrated Doctor, excelling in all things, " who then taught on mount St. Genevieve. Under " him I learnt the rudiments of this art, and ſtrongly " imbibed, ſo far as I was capable, his inſtructions. " After his departure, much too ſoon for me, I devo- " ted my ſelf to Alberic a moſt poſitive Logician, who " ſtrongly oppoſed the Nominaliſts." This is manifeſtly the year 1136. Abelard therefore returned to Paris, long after the council of Soiſſons, and left it a few years before that of Sens.

[E] Went to Laon.] Otho Friſingenſis is miſtaken, in ſaying, that Abelard ſtudied firſt under Rozelinus, and afterwards under Anſelm of Laon, and William des Champeaux, Biſhop of Châlons (12). The order of time is not obſerved here; nor was this William a Biſhop, when he taught Abelard. I juſt now caſt my eye on a book (13), whoſe author conjectures, that Abelard ſucceeded this William as Profeſſor of Divinity in 1119. But firſt, we don't find that this ſuppoſed predeceſſor ever taught Theology. Farther, 'tis very certain that Abelard read Divinity lectures in Paris before 1119; ſince 'tis impoſſible ſo many things as occurred to him from his firſt lectures to the council of Soiſſons, could have happened in two years; now we have very good proofs that this council was called in 1121; to which add, that William des Champeaux was made Biſhop of Châlons in 1113 (14); and that, as after this promotion he had no buſineſs with the ſchools of Paris, Abelard removed to Laon and ſtudied Divinity there. I can't tell why ſome aſſert, that it was to Châlons that he went to ſtudy it (15).

[F] Did not think he had much capacity.] Anſelm was advanced in years, and had very little genius, ſo that he was ſoon foil'd, when put out of his road. He always made the moſt trifling and frothy anſwers, to thoſe who puſhed him home, as the ſubtle caviller

(12) Otho Friſing. de Geſtis Frider. I. lib. 1. cap. 47.

(13) Hiſtoria Sapientiæ & Stultitiæ, collecta à Chriſtiano Thomaſio, tom. 1. p. 81. We there have the abovemention'd Life of Abelard, viz. that written by Jacobus Thomaſius.

(14) See Du Chene's Notes on Abelard's Relation, p. 1147.

(15) Du Pin, Bibliath tom. 9. p 109. Dutch edition.

money, and ardently wiſhed to ſee Heloiſe make a figure in the Sciences. Abelard made theſe two paſſions ſubſervient to his deſign, and addreſt Fulbert in theſe words. Let me, ſays he, board with you, and ſet your own price. The unſuſpecting uncle thinking his niece would now have an able preceptor, who ſo far from being gratified for his trouble, would pay very largely for his board, fell blindly into the ſnare (c), and thereupon deſired Abelard to inſtruct her both day and night, and to uſe compulſion if ſhe were negligent. Our ſham preceptor did no ways anſwer Fulbert's expectations, for he ſoon made love to his ſcholar, and employed much more time in kiſſing and toying with her [H], than in explaining authors. Having never taſted ſuch joys before, they abandoned themſelves to them with the leſs reſerve, inſomuch that Abelard now performed his publick functions very careleſly, and wrote nothing but amorous verſes [I]. His pupils ſoon obſerved, that his lectures were much changed for the worſe, and preſently gueſs'd the cauſe; but the blinded Fulbert, at whoſe houſe the farce was acting, was the laſt perſon that heard of the intrigue. He would not believe it for ſome time, but at laſt his eyes being opened, he made his boarder quit the houſe. Some time after his niece finding her ſelf with child, wrote word of it to her gallant, who adviſed her to leave Fulbert. Heloiſe did ſo, and Abelard ſent her to a ſiſter of his in Britany, where ſhe was delivered of a ſon (d); and to ſoften the Canon's reſentments, he offered to marry Heloiſe privately. Fulbert was much better pleaſed with the propoſal than his niece, who, from a ſingular exceſs of paſſion, choſe to be his miſtreſs rather than his wife, as we ſhall obſerve hereafter (e). However, ſhe at laſt conſented, and was married privately, but would, upon occaſion, proteſt with an oath that ſhe was ſtill ſingle. Fulbert being more deſirous of publiſhing their marriage, to wipe away the ſcandal which had been brought upon the family, than to keep his promiſe with Abelard, never to divulge it, would often uſe his niece ill, whenever ſhe obſtinately denied her being Abelard's wife. Upon this the latter ſent her to the monaſtery of Argenteuil, where, at his requeſt, ſhe put on a religious habit, but did not take the veil. Heloiſe's relations conſidering this

(c) Eam totam noſtro magiſterio committens, ut quoties mihi à ſcholis reverſo vacaret, tam in die quam in nocte ei docendæ operam darem, & eam ſi negligentem ſentirem vehementer conſtringerem. Abælardi Epiſt. p. 11.

(d) His name was Aſtrolabius.

(e) In the article HELOISE.

(18) Abælardi Opera, p. 10. diligere noveram, noſque etiam abſentes ſcriptis internuntiis invicem liceret præſentare, & pleraque audaciùs ſcribere, quàm colloqui (18). Love letters and verſes writ in a tender ſtrain, are far from being weak incentives, eſpecially when the poet has a good voice, and ſings his own paſſionate ſongs. Abelard ſo inchanted Heloiſe's heart, and his admirable pen and fine voice blew up ſo fierce a flame in this fond creature's boſom, that ſhe could never after extinguiſh it. Duo, ſays ſhe to him, fateor, tibi ſpecialiter inerant, quibus feminarum quarumlibet animos ſtatim allicere poteras, (19) Ibid. p. 46. dictandi videlicet & cantandi gratia (19). See the Note [F] of the article Heloiſe, where more of this paſſage being quoted, ſhews how great an aſcendant thoſe things have over the ſoft ſex.

[H] In kiſſing and toying with her.] The better to hide their amorous intercourſe from Heloiſe's uncle, Abelard ſometimes pretended to uſe the liberty allowed him of chaſtiſing her. He declares, that love, and not magiſterial anger, prompted him now and then to whip Heloiſe, but that no ſtrokes were ever more gentle. Here follows his method of teaching his fair pupil. Sub occaſione diſciplinæ amori penitùs vacabamus, & ſecretos receſſus, quos amor optabat, ſtudium lectionis offerebat. Apertis itaque libris plura de amore quàm de lectione verba ſe ingerebant, plura erant oſcula quàm ſententiæ. Sæpiùs ad ſinus quam ad libros reducebantur manus; crebriùs oculos amor in ſe reflectabat, quàm lectio in ſcripturam dirigebat. Quoque minus ſuſpicionis haberemus, verbera quandoque dabat amor non furor, gratia non ira, quæ omnium unguentorum ſuavitatem tranſcenderent. That is, "Under "the pretence of learning we devoted ourſelves wholly "to love, and our ſtudies afforded us the privacy which "our paſſion panted after. We then would open our "books, but talked more of love than of learning; "exchanged more kiſſes, than we explained maxims; "I put my hand oftner to her boſom, than to the "volume; we gazed more frequently on one an-"other than on the leſſon; and that we might be "leſs ſuſpected, I ſometimes ſtruck her, not out of an-"ger but love; and the ſtripes were ſweeter than the (20) Ibid. p. 11. "moſt fragrant ointments" (20). But on ſome occaſions he was for whipping her in earneſt, as when ſhe was not in humour, or was aw'd by the ſolemnity of ſome feſtival. See the note [E] on the article HELOISE. We muſt not omit the reflection Abelard made on the Canon's ſimplicity. Quanta ejus ſimplicitas eſſet vehementer admiratus, non minus apud me obſtupui quàm ſi agnam teneram famelico lupo committeret. Qui cùm eam mihi non ſolum docendam, verùm etiam vehementer conſtringendam traderet, quid aliud agebat quàm ut votis meis licentiam penitùs daret, & occaſionem etiamſi nollemus offerret, ut quam videlicet blanditiis non poſſem, minis & verberibus facilius flecterem. That is, "I was greatly ſurprized at his ſim-"plicity, and at his delivering up, as it were, a tender "lamb to a famiſhed wolf. And as he did not only "deſire me to teach her, but to uſe the ſtrongeſt "compulſion, what was this but abandoning her "entirely to my wiſhes, and giving us an opportunity "whether we would or no; ſince he impowered me "to employ menaces and ſtripes, if gentleneſs fail'd? As he quotes the ancient poets pretty often, I am ſurprized his young lamb given up to a famiſh'd wolf, did not make him recollect theſe lines of Virgil,

Eheu, quid volui miſero mihi? floribus auſtrum
Perditus, & liquidis immiſi fontibus apros (21).

(21) Virgil, Eclog. 2: v. 58. Vide Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, p. 41.

Engliſhed,

"The boar amidſt my cryſtal ſtreams I bring;
"And ſouthern winds to blaſt my flow'ry ſpring.
Dryden.

[I] Wrote nothing but verſes.] After he had taſted the ſweets of enjoyment, he took no pleaſure in his lectures, but diſmiſs'd his pupils as ſoon as he could. He never ſtudied in the night (22), but employed thoſe hours of ſilence to a very different purpoſe, and therefore would willingly have ſpent the whole day in ſtudy. Hence the ſchool was very diſtaſteful, which made him only repeat his former lectures, and if ever he ſtruck out a thought, it always turned on love, and not on an abſtruſe point in Philoſophy; and theſe thoughts he worked up into ſongs, which were ſung for many years in ſeveral Provinces. Ita negligentem & tepidum lectio tunc habebat, ut jam nihil ex ingenio, ſed ex uſu cuncta proferrem, nec jam niſi recitator priſtinorum eſſem inventorum; & ſi qua invenire liceret carmina eſſent amatoria, non philoſophiæ ſecreta. Quorum etiam carminum pleraque adhuc in multis, ſicut & ipſe noſti, frequentantur & decantantur regionibus, ab his maximè quos vita ſimilis oblectat (23). Hence it is manifeſt that he had a poetical vein; but I cannot believe he wrote the celebrated Romance of the Roſe, and there drew his Heloiſe, under the name of Beauty, as is aſſerted in a little book reprinted in Holland (24). Methinks the (25) author who took ſo much pains to collect and collate Abelard's manuſcripts, is more worthy of credit than the writer of that little piece. Now the former declares poſitively, that the Romance of the Roſe, the concluſion excepted, which is John de Meun's, was writ by William de Loris; and in this ſeveral authors, who have very good authority for what they ſay, agree. The hiſtory of Abelard and Heloiſe is inſerted in this romance.

(22) Tædioſum mihi vehementer erat ad ſcholas procedere, vel in eis morari pariter & laborioſum, cum nocturnas amori vigilias & diurnas ſtudio conſecrarem. Abælardi Opera, p. 12.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Hiſt. of Eloiſa and Abelard in 12°, printed in 1693.

(25) François D'Amboiſe. See his Apologetical Preface to Abelard's Works, printed at Paris in 1616, 4°.

as a ſecond piece of treachery in Abelard, were ſo exaſperated, that they hired ruffians, who forcing into his chamber in the dead of night, cut off what had been chiefly inſtrumental in diſhonouring the Canon's family. This infamous treatment made Abelard fly to the gloom of a cloyſter, there to conceal his confuſion. Shame, not devotion, prompted him to aſſume the monaſtic habit in the abbey of St. Denis (f); but the diſorders of that houſe, whoſe Abbot exceeded his Monks in laſciviouſneſs as much as in dignity, ſoon drove Abelard from thence; for he daring to cenſure them, grew thereby ſo obnoxious, that his brethren were overjoyed to get rid of him. He then withdrew to the territories of the Count of Champagne [K], and there ſet up ſchool, where his fame drew ſo great a crowd of auditors to him [L], that the other maſters, whoſe pupils forſook them and went to Abelard, were enflamed with envy and began to moleſt him. Abelard had two formidable enemies in Laon (g), who perceiving his great reputation was prejudicial to their ſchools in Rheims, ſought an occaſion to ruin him, and found one in the Treatiſe he dictated on the myſtery of the Trinity [M], wherein they pretended to diſcover a moſt dreadful hereſy, and thereupon prevailed with their Archbiſhop to aſſemble a council in Soiſſons about the year 1121 [N]. This

(f) In tàm miſera me contritione poſitum confuſio, fatcor, pudoris potius quam devotio converſionis ad monaſticorum latibula clauſtrorum compulit. Abælardi Epiſt. p. 18.

(g) Alberitus Remenſis & Lotulphus Lombardus; Otho of Friſingen calls the latter Leutaldus Novarienſis.

[K] To the territories of the Count of Champagne.] This we find by comparing two paſſages, the firſt whereof is as follows. Ad cellam quandam receſſi, ſcholis more ſolito vacaturus (26). The ſecond runs thus: Noctu latenter aufugi, atque ad terram Comitis Theobaldi proximam, ubi antea in cella moratus fueram, abſceſſi (27). i. e. "I fled privately in the "night, and retired to the neighbouring territories "of the Count of Champagne, where I had before taken "ſanctuary." Pâquier did not underſtand the former ſince he tranſlates it; Retiring to a remote corner of the monaſtery, he read lectures alternately in Philoſophy and Divinity (28). But Abelard did not raiſe a ſchool within the abbey of St. Denis, ſince, there, he would have been as troubleſome as ever to the Monks, whoſe diſorderly lives he reproved, which was the only reaſon they wanted to get rid of him. Mr. du Cange explains with his uſual erudition the meaning of the word Cella. See the note [A] of the article PARACLET, where the courſe of Abelard's ſeveral journies are mentioned.

(26) Abælardi Opera, p. 19.

(27) Ibid. p. 26.

(28) Pâquier, Recherches de la France, lib. 6. chap. 17.

[L] So great a number of auditors to him.] With regard to the multitude of his pupils, ſee the note [A] of the article FULCO Prior of Deuil.

[M] On the myſtery of the Trinity.] The occaſion of Abelard's writing on this ſubject, was, his ſcholars required him to demonſtrate it philoſophically. Theſe, not ſatisfied with mere words, would have ideas; and declared publickly, that it was impoſſible any man could believe what he did not underſtand, and an impoſition to preach on a ſubject, unintelligible both to the orator and the auditors. *Humanas & philoſophicas rationes requirebant, & plus quæ intelligi, quàm quæ dici poſſent, efflagitabant; dicentes quidem verborum ſuperfluam eſſe prolationem quam intelligentia non ſequeretur, nec credi poſſe aliquid niſi primitùs intellectum; & ridiculoſum eſſe aliquem aliis prædicare, quod nec ipſi nec illi quos doceret intellectu capere poſſent, * Domino ipſo arguente quod cæci eſſent duces cæcorum* (29). Upon this, he began to explain to them the unity of God, by compariſons drawn from human things. Pâquier accuſes Abelard of maintaining, That no one ought to believe, what he cannot give a reaſon for; which, ſays he, to ſpeak plain, was expreſly deſtroying the general foundation of our faith (30). I ſhan't ask Pâquier where he heard, that a profeſſor approves all the whims and chimeras of his pupils, when he has the indulgence to prevent, ſo far as in him lies, their pernicious conſequences; for 'tis probable, Abelard thought the abovementioned maxims of his auditors juſt and rational enough: however, we muſt not ground this probability on the paſſage mentioned by Pâquier, but rather on the following words of St. Bernard. Quid magis contra fidem, quam credere nolle quicquid non poſſis ratione attingere? Denique exponere volens (Abælardus) illud ſapientis, qui credit cito, levis eſt corde; cito credere eſt, inquit, adhibere fidem ante rationem (31). That is, "What can be more repugnant to faith, than to re- "fuſe our aſſent to what is above reaſon? Abelard "expounding the following words of Solomon, He "who believeth ſuddenly is light of heart, ſays, that "man believes lightly, who believes before he has a "reaſon for ſo doing." The work Abelard wrote on this ſubject was highly applauded by all, thoſe of his own trade excepted; I mean profeſſors of divinity. Exaſperated that another had ſtruck out lights and expoſitions they could never have found, they cried out, heretick! and raiſed ſuch an outcry, that Abelard very narrowly eſcaped being ſtoned. Duo illi prædicti æmuli noſtri ità me in clero & populo diffamaverunt, ut penè me populus paucoſque qui advenerant ex diſcipulis noſtris prima die noſtri adventus lapidarent, dicentes me tres Deos prædicare & ſcripſiſſe, ſicut ipſis perſuaſum fuerat (32). Theſe, by their all-powerful faction, extorted from the Pope's Legate (33) the ſentence inſerted in the text of this article. They had unjuſtly inſinuated a perſuaſion, that Abelard admitted three Gods, though 'tis certain he was truly orthodox with regard to the myſtery of the Trinity; and that all their proſecutions on that head, were ſo many unjuſt cavils, the effect of malice or ignorance. The compariſon he drew from Logic, in which he excell'd, tends rather to make the Divine Perſons one, than to multiply the eſſence of God to three; and yet he is not accuſed of Sabellianiſm (34), but of Tritheiſm. This is his compariſon, as the three propoſitions of a ſyllogiſm are but one and the ſame truth; ſo the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, are one and the ſame eſſence. Sicut eadem oratio eſt propoſitio, aſſumptio, & concluſio; ita eadem eſſentia eſt Pater, & Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus (35). The difficulties which may ariſe from ſuch a parallel, are not ſo great, at leaſt not greater, than thoſe reſulting from the compariſon of the three dimenſions of a ſolid. Since therefore the orthodoxy of the famous Dr. Wallis, though he laid ſuch great ſtreſs on the parallel of the three dimenſions, was never queſtioned; ſhall Abelard be ſaid to maintain hetorodox principles, becauſe he compared the Trinity to a ſyllogiſm? Be this as it will, it is certain, if the compariſon of the Trinity held good with the ſyllogiſm and the three dimenſions, it muſt be very different from what it is repreſented. We are to obſerve, that a * French Miniſter employed the compariſon of the three dimenſions in 1685, as appears from the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July article 3, for Auguſt article 10, and September article 12; but he was refuted by another Miniſter in 1694. See Saurin's Examen de la Théologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 831.

(32) Abælardi Opera, p. 10.

(33) Conan, Biſhop of Præneſte. He preſided in this council of Soiſſons.

(34) Otho Friſingenſ. de Geſt. Frederic. lib. 1. cap. 47. ſays however, that he was accus'd of Sabellianiſm in the council of Soiſſons.

(35) Abælardi Opera, p. 10.

* M. Jurieu, Miniſter at Rotterdam.

[N] About the year 1121.] Natalis Alexander (36) proves this very ſtrongly, both againſt John Picard, Canon of S. Victor, who fixed this council to 1116, and John Binius, who is for 1136. The chronological errors of Binius, and ſome other writers, had been cenſured before in the Preface to Abelard's works. Some had aſſerted, that Platina placed the ſynod which paſt ſentence on Abelard, under Pope Lucius the Second; that Binius copied this error of Platina, and had himſelf committed another, in fixing the councils of Soiſſons and Sens to 1140; and that Genebrand declares, theſe councils met within a year of one another. To prove theſe were errors, it was ſaid that the Pontificate of this Lucius, which did not continue quite a year, fell under 1145, and that there was an interval of twenty years between the councils of Soiſſons and Sens. It is declared, that the Biſhop of Preneſte who preſided in the former council in quality of the Pope's Legate, left France about 1120, and returned thither no more. The critics might have obſerved above one error in the following words of Platina. Qui (Abælardus) præſente etiam Lodovico Rege, (36) Nat. Alexander. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sæc. 11 & 12. part 3. p. 43 & ſeq.

* "The Lord "himſelf declaring, that "they were "blind leaders of "the blind.

(29) Abælardi Opera, p. 20.

(30) Pâquier, Recherches de la France, liv. 6. chap. 17.

(31) Bernard. Epiſt. 190.

This council did not permit Abelard to make his defence, but ſentenced him to throw his book into the flames, and confine himſelf in the cloyſter of St. Medard. A little after, he was ordered to return to the monaſtery of St. Denis, whoſe Abbot and Monks hated him, becauſe he had ſo freely cenſured their corrupt lives. Happening to ſay inadvertently, that he did not believe their St. Denis was Dionyſius the Areopagite mentioned in Scripture, his words were immediately catched up, and repeated to the Abbot, who was overjoyed, becauſe it gave him an opportunity of blending ſtate crimes with a charge of falſe doctrine [O] ; a circumſtance theſe Gentlemen never forget, to make their vengeance ſure. The Abbot immediately called a chapter, and declared, that he was going to deliver up to the juſtice of their Sovereign, a man who had audaciouſly trampled on the glory and diadem of the kingdom. Abelard believing theſe menaces might be fatal, fled by night into Champagne, but after the Abbot's death, got leave to retire whitherſoever he pleaſed, provided he led a monaſtic life. The political reaſons which conſpired to this are curious enough [P]. Leave being thus granted him, he withdrew to a ſolitude in the dioceſe of Troies, where he built an oratory, and called it the Paraclet (b). There a multitude of pupils reſorted to him, which again revived the envy that had ſo often perſecuted him; but on this occaſion he could not poſſibly have fallen into more dangerous hands, he being expoſed to the fury of two that call'd themſelves reſtorers of the ancient diſcipline; zealots, whom the vulgar rever'd

(b) We ſhall relate in the article PARACLET, why he call'd his oratory by this name, and the troubles he met with on that account.

Rege, rationibus victus, non modo ſententiam mutavit, ſed etiam monaſticam vitam & religionem induit, ac deinceps unà cum diſcipulis quibuſdam in loco deſerto ſanctiſſimè vixit. That is, "Abelard, in preſence of "King Lewis, being overcome by arguments, not "only changed his opinion but embraced the mo- "naſtic profeſſion, and afterwards lived very piouſly "in a deſart place with ſome of his Diſciples. Firſt, 'tis certain, that Abelard turned Monk before any council was held againſt him. Secondly, It was at the council of Sens that Lewis the VIIth aſſiſted, to hear how matters would go in the proſecution of this heretick. Now it is falſe to ſay, that Abelard yielded to the arguments of his adverſaries, and abjured his opinions in this council; he appealing to the Pope the moment he came into it. Thirdly, It is as falſe to affirm, that he lived after this in a deſart place with ſome pupils, he ſpending the remainder of his days with the Monks of Clugni. It is plain that Platina has blended together the ſeveral incidents relating to the two councils which met againſt Abelard. Moſt of theſe miſtakes are objected to Belleforet in the Preface abovementioned, where, by the way, he is likewiſe juſtly cenſured for inſinuating that the extravagant encomiums we read in Abelard's epitaph, prove his imprudence and inſupportable pride; when it is certain that the Abbot of Clugni writ this epitaph after Abelard's death. Several hiſtorians have not juſtly diſtinguiſhed the two councils which aſſembled to judge this great man. PaulusÆmilius ſays that his cauſe was firſt heard in the council of Sens (37), which du Haillan alſo aſſerts with many other falſities (38); as that Abelard was afraid to appear; that all his writings were condemned to the flames; and that the ſecond time he was ſummoned, the Prelates held long diſputes before they paſt ſentence on him. Philippus Bergamenſis declares, that the heretick (39) having been brought over in the King's preſence by the powerful arguments of thoſe learned Catholick Prelates, abjured his falſe doctrines, turned Monk, and paſt very piouſly the reſt of his days in a deſart with ſome of his pupils: a thouſand chroniclers have tranſcribed the ſame falſities from one another. The writer of a little book (40) already cited, makes Heloiſe ſay, What did not thoſe two falſe prophets (St. Bernard and St. Norbert) advance, who declaimed ſo ſtrongly againſt you in the council of Rheims? Now Heloiſe does not ſay they exclaimed in any council, at leaſt, it was not in that of Rheims.

(37) Pauli Æmilii Hiſt. Franc. in Ludovico VII.

(38) Du Haillan Hiſt. de France ſous Louis VII.

(39) He calls him Baliardus, in Supplem. Chron. ad an. 1135.

(40) Hiſt. of Eloiſe and Abelard, with the paſſionate letter ſhe wrote to him. Printed at the Hague in 12°, 1693.

[O] Of blending ſtate-crimes, with his charge of falſe doctrine.] This artifice has been ſo often uſed ſince the Jews employed it againſt our Saviour (41), that it is ſurprizing people dare practiſe it in theſe times; for ſhould not thoſe perſons be afraid, that ſo baſe, ſo threadbare a ſtratagem would take no longer? To this I anſwer, there is no reaſon they ſhould entertain ſuch fears, mankind being ſo ungovernable, as never to be warned by the weakneſs of paſt times. Every age acts as though it were the firſt; and as perſecution and revenge have hitherto endeavoured to engage ſovereign powers in their particular feuds, they will continue this practice to the end of the world. We may therefore juſtly apply Solomon's words on this occaſion; The thing that hath been, it is that which ſhall be; and that which is done, is that which ſhall be done (42). Poſterity will ſay, as we do,

(41) Luke xxiii. 2.

Qui mepriſe Cotin n'eſtime point ſon roi,
Et n'a, ſelon Cotin, ni Dieu, ni foi, ni loi (43).

Thus imitated,

"Who Cotin mocks, he calls a traiterous clod;
"And ſwears he has no faith, nor owns a God.

(42) Eccleſ. i. 9.

(43) Boileau, Satyr. 9. ver. 305, 306.

[P] Are curious enough.] As the Abbot of St. Denis would not ſuffer Abelard to leave his monaſtery, the latter had recourſe to politicks. He was ſenſible, the more diſſolute thoſe Monks were, the greater authority the court would have over, and draw larger profits from them. He therefore inſinuated to the King and Council, that it was not for his Majeſty's intereſt to ſuffer a Monk of his character, who was ever cenſuring the deprav'd lives of his brethren, to continue long among them. The court immediately took the hint, and ordered a perſon of great quality (the chief butler) to enquire of the Abbot and his confidents, why they forcibly detained a Monk, whoſe conduct and behaviour differed ſo widely from theirs, and conſequently could be of no ſervice, but might eaſily bring them to ſhame. The reſult was, Abelard quitted the monaſtery. To this purpoſe I remember, that asking a perſon who told me numberleſs profligate actions of the Venetian Clergy, what could prompt the Senate to wink at them, when they reflected ſo much diſhonour both on religion and government? he anſwered, that it was neceſſary thoſe things ſhould be connived at for the publick good; and to explain the ænigma, he added, that the Senate were never better pleas'd than when the common people had the Prieſts and Friars in the utmoſt contempt, ſince thoſe were then leſs able to ſpirit them up to rebellion. One of the reaſons, ſays he, why the government of Venice does not care for the Jeſuits, is, becauſe thoſe Fathers obſerve a better decorum; and as the vulgar venerates them, becauſe of their apparent ſanctity, they therefore have a greater opportunity of raiſing ſeditions. I can hardly believe ſo horrid a circumſtance is true. At what a wretched paſs would things be, was the ſupreme authority forced to ſupport itſelf by ſuch expedients; or did a virtuous behaviour render the Clergy more formidable, than diſſoluteneſs? Such an enormity would be infinitely more deplorable than that mentioned by Tacitus, who ſays, under a wicked adminiſtration it is as dangerous to have a great reputation as a bad one. Intravit animum militaris gloriæ cupido, ingrata temporibus, quibus ſiniſtra erga eminentes interpretatio, nec minus periculum ex magna fama, quam ex malâ (44). That is, "There ſeiz'd his ſoul a paſſion for military glory, "a ſpirit diſguſtful to the times, when of men ſig- "nally eminent a malignant opinion was entertain'd, "and when as much peril aroſe from a great character "as from a bad." Gordon's Tacitus, vol. 2. p. 356. But let us hear Abelard. Intervenientibus amicis quibuſdam noſtris regem & conſilium ejus ſuper hoc compellavi, & ſic quod volebam impetravi. Stephanus quippe regis tunc dapifer, vocato in partem abbate & familiaribus ejus, quæſivit ab eis cur invitum retinere vellent, ex quo incurrere faciliùs ſcandalum poſſent, & nullam utilitatem habere; cùm nullatenus vita mea & ipſorum convenire poſſent. Sciebam autem in hoc regii conſilii ſententiam eſſe, ut quo minus regularis abbatia illa eſſet, magis regi eſſet ſubjecta atque utilis, quantum videlicet rever'd like new Apoſtles [Q]. Theſe ſlandered him to ſuch degree that he loſt the favour of his principal friends; thoſe who ſtill had a love for him, were afraid to ſhew it, ſo that life was now a burthen, and he was going to fly to ſome country where Chriſtianity was not profeſs'd (i); but fate would not indulge him ſuch an aſylum, and placed him again among Chriſtians and Monks, who were worſe than infidels (k). The Monks of the abbey of Ruis in the dioceſe of Vannes, elected him their Superior [R], when he hoped he was got into a quiet harbour, but found he had only changed one evil for another. The incorrigible behaviour of the Monks, and the oppreſſion of a Nobleman who deprived them of the greateſt part of their revenues, ſo that they were obliged to maintain their concubines and children (l) at their own expence, filled him with perpetual anxiety, and expoſed him to the greateſt perils [S]. During this, the Abbot of St. Denis expelled the Nuns from Argenteuil, upon which Abelard, in pity to Heloiſe their Prioreſs, gave her the Oratory of the Paraclet where ſhe ſettled with ſome of her ſiſter Nuns. After this he went frequently from Britany into Champagne upon Heloiſe's affairs, and to divert the uneaſineſs he met with in his abbey; for the unhappy Abelard, notwithſtanding his mutilation [T], was ſtill the object of their malice. Thus far he himſelf writes the hiſtory of his own life, in a letter which is ſtill extant; but for the remaining part of it, relating chiefly to his being again try'd for hereſy before the Archbiſhop of Sens, we muſt have recourſe to other authors. On this occaſion, he deſired liberty to juſtify his doctrine in a publick aſſembly, which was granted, and a council was ſummoned at Sens in 1140. King Lewis the Seventh reſolved to aſſiſt at it in perſon, and St. Bernard was ſummoned to appear as accuſer. The firſt things read in the aſſembly, were ſeveral propoſitions extracted from Abelard's works, which terrified him ſo much that he appealed to the Pope. The council however condemned the propoſitions (m), but did not paſs ſentence with regard to his perſon, and ſent Pope Innocent II. an account of the whole proceedings, praying him to ratify their decree. This the Pope did (n), and ordered Abelard to be impriſon'd, his books burnt, and forbid him ever to teach again. However, his Holineſs was ſoften'd ſome time after, at the ſolicitation of Peter the Venerable, who had not only received this Heretic with the utmoſt humanity in his abbey of Clugni, but reconcil'd him to S. Bernard (o), who promoted the oppreſſion [U] under which his

(44) Tacitus, in Vita Agricolæ, cap. 5.

(i) See the Note [E] of the remark ALCIAT (JOHN PAUL.)

(k) Incidi in Chriſtianos atque Monachos, gentibus longè fæviores atque pejores. Abælardi Epiſt. p. 32.

(l) Unuſquiſque de propriis olim marſupiis ſe & concubinas ſuas cum filiis & filiabus ſuſtentaret. Abælardi Epiſt. p. 33.

(m) See St. Bernard's Life, by Geoffroi Monk of Clairvaux, book 3. chap. 5. and St. Bernard's 189th epiſtle. 'Tis inſerted in Abelard's Works, p. 272.

(n) See St. Bernard's 194th Epiſtle, and Abelard's Works, p. 301.

(o) Vide this Abbot's Letter to Innocent II, in Abelard's Works, p. 335.

videlicet ad lucra temporalia. Unde me facile regis & ſuorum aſſenſum conſequi credideram, ſicque actum eſt (45). Some pages after, Abelard tells us, that a Nobleman of Britany made the licentiouſneſs of the Monks of Ruis, a handle to ſeize on their eſtates (46). To deprive perſons, whoſe piety has gain'd them the veneration of the people, of the poſſeſſions which good Chriſtians had bequeathed them, is a bold attempt; but few think it criminal to plunder thoſe, whoſe ill lives are a publick ſcandal.

(45) Abælardi Opera, p. 27.

(46) Ex inordinatione ſcilicet ipſius monaſterii nactus occaſionem. Abælardi Opera, p. 33.

[Q] And theſe, ... as tho' they had been like new Apoſtles.] Read what follows, Quoſdam adverſum me novos Apoſtolos quibus mundus plurimum credebat excitaverant. Quorum alter (S. Norbert) regularium canonicorum vitam: alter (S. Bernard) monachorum ſe reſuſcitaſſe gloriabatur (47). That is, "They ſpirited "up againſt me two new Apoſtles, who were in "mighty vogue with the people; one of whom "(St. Norbert) boaſted he had reſtored the diſcipline "of the Canons regular; the other, (St. Bernard) "that of the Monks." Heloiſe, pag. 42. calls them falſe Apoſtles. See the cloſe of the remark [N] above, where the author of the little hiſtory of Heloiſe and Abelard is refuted.

(47) Abælardi Opera, p. 31.

[R] The Monks of the abbey of Ruis... elected him their Superior.] The Benedictine who wrote ſo much on the antiquities of Paris, cenſures Belleforet unjuſtly, for ſaying that Abelard had an abbey in Britany. It is falſe to aſſert, that he was an Abbot in Britany, for upon his leaving the Paraclet, he withdrew to Cluny, and continued in that community till his death (48). This author was greatly miſinformed, not to know that Abelard poſſeſs'd an abbey in Britany, before and after he reſigned the Paraclet. Had he perus'd attentively the letter (49), ſome paſſages of which he quotes, he would have found this proved indiſputably.

(48) Du Breuil, Antiquitez de Paris, p. 388. in 4°. printed 1639.

(49) That of Abelard, where he writes his own Life.

[S] And even expoſed him to the greateſt perils.] The Monks attempted ſeveral times to poiſon him, but not being able to effect that by his ordinary food, for he was aware of them, they tried to poiſon him with the ſacramental bread and wine. One day he abſtained from a diſh which was prepared for him; but his companion who eat of it, died preſently after. Abelard excommunicated the moſt rebellious of his Monks, but to no purpoſe, ſo that at laſt he was more afraid of a dagger than of poiſon, and compared himſelf to the man, whom the Sicilian tyrant obliged to ſit at table with him under a drawn ſword, which hung only by a thread (50).

(50) Abælardi Opera, p. 39 & 40.

[T] Notwithſtanding his mutilation.] This unhappy man was ſtill calumniated with ſo much virulence, that though his enemies knew he was incapable of ſatisfying a woman, they yet affirmed, that ſome remains of ſenſual delight ſtill bound him to his beloved Heloiſe. Quod me facere ſincera charitas compellabat, ſolita derogantium pravitas impudentiſſimè accuſabat, dicens me adhuc quadam carnalis concupiſcentiæ oblectatione teneri, qui priſtinæ dilectæ ſubſtinere abſentiam vix aut nunquam paterer. Thus he complains, in p. 35. of the account he gives of his misfortunes. However, he comforted himſelf with the example of St. Jerom, whoſe friendſhip for Paula afforded an ample field for detraction; and thought he refuted unanſwerably the calumny of his enemies, by obſerving that the moſt jealous husbands commit their wives to the guard of eunuchs; but Father Theophilus Raynaud laughs at this reaſon, for he had read of ſeveral men, who tho' mutilated, did yet engage in an impure commerce with women. Ex quibus omnibus liquet quam frigida fuerit Petri Abelardi apologia, cum redargutus de nimia familiaritate cum amicâ quadem ſuâ Heloiſa, & aliis monialibus Paracletenſibus repoſuit, eunuchos, qualis ipſe factus erat, tuto & abſque omni periculo poſſe verſari cum fœminis (51). That is, "From all which it ap- "pears, how trifling an apology Abelard made, when "being accuſed of too much familiarity with Heloiſe, "a miſtreſs of his, and other Nuns of the Paraclet, he "anſwered, that eunuchs, like himſelf, might fre- "quent the Fair without the leaſt danger." I ſhall take ſome notice of this in the article COMBABUS. Heloiſe had ſo violent a paſſion for Abelard, altho' he was emaſculated; that his virtue would have been expoſed to great danger in her company. See our remarks on Heloiſe's article. The following words of Virgil,

(51) Th. Raynaud de Eunuchis, p. 148.

Notumque furens quid fœmina poſſit
Triſte per augurium Teucrorum pectora ducunt (52).

(52) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 5. ver. 6.

In Engliſh,

"He knew the ſtormy ſouls of woman-kind:
"What ſecret ſprings their eager paſſions move, &c.
Dryden's Virgil.

repreſent in ſome meaſure the conduct of thoſe, who ſhould be afraid, that Heloiſe's paſſion had too powerful an aſcendant over Abelard's chaſtity.

[U] Who had promoted the oppreſſion.] We ſhall ſpeak of this in the article BERENGER of Poitiers.

his innocence labour'd in that council. This ſanctuary of Clugni was the laſt that Abelard wanted. Here he was indulg'd in all the tender offices of charity; here he read lectures to the Monks, and was equally humble and laborious. At laſt, infirmities coming upon him, and being incommoded with the itch (p), and ſeveral other diſeaſes, he was ſent to the Priory of S. Marcellus, a very agreeable place, on the Saone, near Châlons, where he died the 21ſt of April 1142 [X], aged ſixty three years. His corpſe was ſent to Heloiſe [Y], who bury'd it in the Paraclet (q). We ſhall ſpeak of his writings in the article † FRANCIS D'AMBOISE; and as to his erroneous tenets and the proſecutions he ſuffer'd from councils, ſome mention will be made of them in the article BERENGER DE POITIERS. 'Tis remarkable, that tho' he was an Eccleſiaſtic, and enjoy'd a canonry (r), his marriage did not raiſe the leaſt ſcruple in his mind. I am ſurpriz'd he never ſpeaks of his maſter (ſ) Roſcelin [Z], who in that age paſt for a very ſubtle Logician, and is look'd upon as the founder of the Nominaliſts. Abelard himſelf was inclin'd to the principles of this ſect, conſidering them as adapted to the vivacity of his penetrating, acute, and inventive genius (t). By this ſcience he terrify'd people, and ſo fulminated his numberleſs cavils and ſyllogiſms, as not only aſtoniſh'd, but confounded them. I don't think he ever explain'd the civil law [AA], as ſome aſſert. In the laſt note, we ſhall give a liſt

† See AMBOISE (FRANCIS D')

(p) Plus ſolito ſcabie & quibuſdam corporis incommoditatibus gravabatur. Abælardi Opera, p. 341.

(q) See Peter the Venerable's Letter to Heloiſe, in Abelard's Works, p. 337.

(r) Quid te Clericum atque Canonicum facere oportet. Abælardi Epiſt. 1. p. 16.

(ſ) Otho Friſing. de Geſt. Frederi. lib. 1. cap. 47. Aventini Annales Bojorum, lib. 6.

(t) Naudé, Additions à l'Hiſt. de Louis XI. p. 160.

[X] The 21ſt of Ap. 1142.] This ſhews that Abelard was not living in 1170, as is aſſerted by the author of a little book printed at the Hague, in 1693; in which, beſides The Compendious Hiſtory of Eloiſa and Abelard, three other ſmall pieces are inſerted.

[Y] His body was ſent to Heloiſe.] Pâquier aſſures, that Abelard deſired by his laſt will, to be buried in the monaſtery of the Paraclet (53). Francis d'Amboiſe ſays the ſame (54), but merely on Pâquier's teſtimony. However, this I can't believe, becauſe Peter the Venerable does not mention any thing like it in his letter to Heloiſe, concerning Abelard's laſt moments (55). Beſides, it is declared in Abelard's abſolution, that his body was ſent to the Paraclet purely to gratify Heloiſe, which manifeſtly ſhews that ſhe had requeſted it as a favour. Now how could the Abbot of Clugni make that a favour, which was the effect of a perſon's laſt will? All this is ſtrongly confirmed by the calendar of the abbey of the Paraclet, which ſays as follows. VIII. Kal. Januar. obiit Petrus Cluniacenſis abbas, cujus conceſſu habet eccleſia noſtra corpus magiſtri noſtri Petri (56). That is, "The eighth "of the calends of * January died Peter, Abbot of "Clugni, by whoſe grant, our church poſſeſſes "the body of our maſter Peter." Andrew du Cheſne's ſilence, in his Notes on Abelard's epiſtolary relation of his misfortunes, appears to me a ſtrong argument againſt Pâquier. Some writers, without mentioning the laſt will, relate, that Abelard's body was ſent to Heloiſe, as he had deſired in his letters (57); but they neither quote the letters, nor the perſons who cited them. However, I found this paſſage, in pag. 53. of his works; (he was then at the abbey of Ruis, and was perpetually afraid of being aſſaſſinated.) Quod ſi me dominus in manibus inimicorum tradiderit (ſays he to Heloiſe) ſcilicet ut ipſi prævalentes me interficiant, aut quocunque caſu viam univerſæ carnis abſens à vobis ingrediar; cadaver obſecro noſtrum ubicunque vel ſepultum, vel expoſitum jacuerit, ad cimiterium veſtrum deferri faciatis, ubi filiæ noſtræ, imò in Chriſto ſorores, ſepulchrum noſtrum ſæpius videntes, ad preces pro me Domino fundendas ampliùs invitentur. That is, "If heaven ſhould think fit to "deliver me up to my enemies, and they ſhould ſo "far prevail as to kill me; in a word, what kind of "death, or in what place ſoever I may die, (abſent "from you) it is my requeſt, that you would get "my corps (whether buried or expos'd) removed to "your church-yard, in order that our daughters, "or rather ſiſters in Chriſt, by the frequent ſight "of my monument, may be more ſtrongly induced, "to offer up their prayers to God for me." Here follows Abelard's abſolution, that was to be engraved on his tomb, for which purpoſe Heloiſe had deſired it of Peter the Venerable (58). Ego Petrus, Cluniacenſis abbas, qui Petrum Abælardum in monachum Cluniacenſem recepi, & corpus ejus furtim delatum Heloiſſæ Abbatiſſæ, & monialibus Paracleti conceſſi, authoritate omnipotentis Dei & omnium ſanctorum abſolvo eum pro officio ab omnibus peccatis ſuis (59). That is, "I Peter Abbot of Clugni (who received "Peter Abelard among my Religious, and permit-"ted his corps to be privately conveyed to He-"loiſe Abbeſs of the Paraclet and to her Nuns;) by "the authority of Almighty God and all his Saints, "abſolve the ſaid Abelard from all his ſins." Belleforêt advanced an arrant falſhood, in ſaying that Abelard's bones were dug up and burnt (60); which F. d'Amboiſe refutes invincibly in his prefatory apology.

(53) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, book 6. chap. 17.

(54) Præfat. Apologet. Opera Abælardi.

(55) In Operibus Abælardi, p. 337.

(56) Apud Andr. Quercetanum (ſive du Cheſne) in Notis ad Hiſtor. calamit. Abælardi, in ejus operibus.

* That is the 25th of December preceeding.

(57) Cave, Hiſt. Liter. Script. Eccleſ. p. 652.

(58) See Abelard's Works, p. 343.

(59) In Operibus Abælardi, p. 345.

(60) Belleforeſt's Chroniq. de France.

[Z] His maſter Roſcelin.] Salabert, Prieſt of * Agen, in his diſſertation on the ſect of the Nominaliſts (61), very much queſtions whether Roſcelin was Abelard's maſter. We ſhall examine his reaſons in the article ROSCELIN.

* A city of Guienne in France.

(61) 'Tis entitled, Philoſophia Nominalium vindicata, in 8°. printed at Paris, 1651.

[AA] To expound the civil law.] I believe Francis d'Amboiſe is miſtaken, in thinking that Accurſius ſpeaks of our Abelard, in his illuſtrations of the law, Quinque pedum præſcriptione. Accurſius's words are theſe: Sed Petrus Bailardus, qui ſe jactavit quod ex qualibet quantumcunque difficili litera traheret ſanum intellectum, hic dixit neſcio (62). That is, "Peter Bailardus, who "boaſted he could find the meaning of any difficult "word, here own'd himſelf nonplus'd." Alciat applauds the modeſty of this Peter Bailard, for ſo ingenuouſly owning his ignorance in that matter. Magnus ille Andreas Alciatus in illo quem de quinque pedum præſcriptione ſcripſit tractatu, poſtquam Petrum Bailardum celebrem ſua tempeſtate profeſſorem laudavit, quod ingenuè faſſus eſſet eam legem à ſe non intelligi &c. That is, "The celebrated Andrew Alciat in his work where he "treats de quinque pedum præſcriptione, after he "had applauded Peter Bailard, a celebrated pro-"feſſor in his age, becauſe he confeſt ingenu-"ouſly that he did not underſtand that law, &c. (63)." Theſe are Francis d'Amboiſe's words, which alone are ſufficient to refute him; for we muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe, to make Alciat reaſon juſtly, that the celebrated Profeſſor he applauds, was a law-profeſſor. Now what wonder would it be, ſhould a profeſſor of Logic own, he did not underſtand a difficult paſſage in the Code? And indeed we find this Bailard is mentioned as a law-profeſſor by Petrus Crinitus, who calls him Joannes Bajalardus. We may therefore conclude, that our Abelard is not meant here, and that when Pâquier applies Accurſius's words to him, as thinking this an eſſential remark (64), he had better have ſaid nothing; at leaſt he ſhould have obſerved, that it is Petrus Baylardus in Accurſius, and not Petrus Abellardus, as he aſſerts. But had this Gloſſographer really ſpoke of our Abelard, we ſhould, methinks, conclude, that he miſtook, ſince there is no reaſon to believe that Abelard ever profeſs'd the law. Theſe are Crinitus's words: Quæſitum eſt ſuperiore ætate à viris doctioribus quidnam in jure noſtro civili præſcriptio quinque pedum ſignaret, qualiſque foret in ea intellectus. Quam rem Laurentius Valla & alii complures cùm non ſatis perciperent hac una ſe ratione defendebant, quod Joannes Bajalardus, inter eos qui jus civile profitentur vir conſultiſſimus ingenuè affirmavit, ſe illud ignorare (65). That is, "There was, in the laſt age, a queſtion "among the learned, what was ſignified (in the "civil law) by the law Præſcriptio quinque pedum, "and how it was to be underſtood: this, Lau-"rentius Valla and many others not being able "to explain, they defended themſelves only with "this reaſon, that Joannes Bajalardus, a very skilful "profeſſor of the civil law, frankly owned, that he "did not know what to make of it." Thomaſius ſhould not have concluded from this paſſage, that Peter Abelard was ſometimes called Baialard (66).

(62) Apud Francis d'Amboiſe Præf. Apol. Operum Abælardi.

(63) Alciatus's words are, Adeò autem exiſtimata eſt difficilis, ut Petrus Baylardus, non incelebris tempeſtate ſua profeſſor, ingenuè faſſus ſit eam a ſe non intelligi. That is, "'Twas thought "ſo difficult, "that Peter "Baylardus, a "celebrated pro-"feſſor in that "age, confeſt "ingenuouſly he "did not under-"ſtand it.

(64) Pâquier, Recherches de la France, lib. 6. cap. 17.

(65) Crinitus de Honeſtâ diſciplinâ. lib. 25. cap. 4.

(66) Jacob. Thomaſ. in Vita Petri Abælardi, num. 3.

Here follows an obſervation Mr. de la Monnoie ſent me, after reading my remark [AA]. I am certain the reader will be better able to form a judgment on this matter, after he has compared that Gentleman's liſt of Moreri's errors [BB]. In a work written by father Jacob (u), we meet with a long catalogue of authors, who mention Abelard.

(u) 'Tis entitled, De Claris Scriptoribus Cabilonenſibus, p. 142.

reflections with mine, and therefore am perſuaded he will not take it amiſs if I quote his words. I am perſuaded, ſays he, that Accurſius hints at Abelard on the law quinque pedum. Abelard was not a civilian by profeſſion, but then he paſt for an univerſal ſcholar, and as one who was reſolved no branch of ſcience ſhould eſcape his reſearches; qui totum ſcibile ſciebat, as is ſaid in his epitaph. Accurſius conſiders him as ſuch in the abovecited paſſage; and thoſe who from the Gloſſographer's words imagined that Petrus Baylardus, or Bailardus, was a celebrated law-profeſſor, were miſtaken, for there never was any of that name. Bailardus is the ſame with Abelard, his name having been writ ten or twelve different ways. The Italians, who frequently contract words, writ Bailardus for Abailardus, as Ragona for Aragona; Naldo for Arnaldo; Berto for Alberto, or Lamberto; at leaſt it will not be denied, that Jacobus Philippus Bergamenſis, an Auſtin Friar, called our Abelard, Baliardus (67). So far Mr. de la Monnoie... I ſhall now make an obſervation, which did not occur to me in the firſt edition of this Dictionary, which is, that Abelard, or I am miſtaken, was dead, before the ſtudy of the Roman or Civil Law was known in France. It had been revived in Italy ſome years before (68); and we may preſume, that the infancy of its revival laſted ſome years, conſequently it is not probable that our French Logician ſhould be deſired to explain a private law, which was inexpreſſibly difficult, and of very little uſe. People ſeldom amuſe themſelves with clearing up ſuch points, till they think they have illuſtrated the moſt neceſſary and important; or when they attempt to improve on the firſt interpreters; now it is ſome years before they get thus far. Were it allowed to employ Menage's rules, it would, perhaps, be ſaid, that the Bailardus of Accurſius, is a corruption of Bulgarus, Balgarus, Bailgarus, Bailgardus, Bailardus. Thoſe who copy proper names erroneouſly, or pronounce them wrong, may inſenſibly diſguiſe them very much. Poſſibly thoſe particulars had been ſpoke of Bulgarus the lawyer, which Accurſius, miſled by the corruption of that name, aſcribed to Petrus Bailardus.

(67) See the citation above (39.)

(68) See the article IRNERIUS.

[BB] Moreri's ſeveral miſtakes.] 1. Abelard never taught Divinity in Corbeil or Melun. 2dly, To ſay that all authors own, Heloiſe was Fulbert the Canon's niece, is no proof againſt Papirius Maſſo, who declares that ſhe was a Canon's natural daughter; for Fulbert might have had a ſiſter who did not behave ſo well as ſhe ought to have done; a ſiſter, I ſay, he being Heloiſe's uncle by the mother's ſide, Avunculus. I am ſurpriz'd that Andrew du Chêne (69) ſhould fancy he could refute Papirius Maſſo, by the ſame proof as Moreri made uſe of. 3. It does not appear, that Abelard introduced himſelf at the Canon's, upon pretence of inſtructing Heloiſe in divinity: Why then ſhould writers deſcend to particulars, when the authors they ought to follow expreſs themſelves only in generals.

(69) Notæ ad Hiſt. Calamit. Abælardi.

Erat cupidus ille valdè, atque erga neptim ſuam ut ampliùs ſemper in doctrinam profi ceret literatoriam plurimùm ſtudioſus (70). That is, "He was very covetous, "and vaſtly deſirous his niece ſhould improve daily in "learning;" Theſe words don't hint at Divinity more than any other ſcience. 4thly, We don't find that Heloiſe had much eſteem for Abelard, till they liv'd together. 5thly, 'Tis falſe to ſay, that Abelard convey'd her into Britany, when ſhe elop'd from her uncle's; he indeed ſent her into that province, but he himſelf continu'd in Paris, (guarding as well as he could againſt Fulbert's machinations) till the promiſe he made to marry his niece, had ſoften'd the old man's reſentments; and 'twas then he went to her in Britany, as is plain from the relation of his misfortunes. The compendious Hiſtory of Eloiſa and Abelard, is not very accurate on this head (71). 'Tis there ſuppos'd, that Abelard went from Paris, when he quitted the Canon's houſe; and upon hearing that his pupil was with child, return'd thither; and carry'd her off in the night, with a deſign of marrying her, firſt clandeſtinely, and afterwards publickly, when her relations ſhould conſent to it. But Abelard had no thoughts of making Heloiſe his wife, when he carry'd her off, nor intended ever to publiſh their nuptials. 6thly, Heloiſe does not ingenuouſly tell him, that ſhe did not deſign by their marriage to deprive the church of a Divine, who, ſhe hop'd, would ſoon be an illuſtrious Prelate. Nothing like this is found in the long train of arguments which Abelard ſays Heloiſe us'd to diſſuade him from marrying her (72). See the article HELOISE. 7thly, He does not declare that he marry'd her, to diſburthen his conſcience. How could Moreri know the motives which induc'd them to tie the nuptial knot better than Abelard himſelf? 8thly, The ſame date ſhould not have been fix'd to their marriage, and her going to the convent of Argenteuil, ſeveral incidents being intermediate to theſe. The only reaſon why Heloiſe was ſent to this convent, was, becauſe her uncle us'd her ill, exaſperated at her denying their marriage. 9thly, 'Tis therefore a ſtrange falſity to aſſert, that their wedding, tho' kept very ſecret, came to Fulbert's ear; he being in the church when the nuptial bleſſing was pronounc'd. Poſt paucos dies, nocte ſecretis orationum vigiliis in quadam eccleſia celebratis, ibidem ſummo mane avunculo ejus atque quibuſdam noſtris vel ipſius amicis aſſiſtentibus, nuptiali benedictione confœderamur (73). That is, "A few days "after, prayers being ſaid privately in a certain church, "in the night; her uncle, and ſeveral of our "friends came thither very early the next morning, "when the nuptial benediction was pronounc'd over "us." 10thly, Abelard did not read lectures to a great number of pupils in Champagne, after the diſſolute lives of the Monks of Ruis had forc'd him to return to that province; and when Abbot Suger expell'd the Nuns from the convent of Argenteuil. Father l'Enfant copy'd ſome of theſe errors (74).

(70) Abælardi Opera, p. 11.

(71) At the Hague, in 12°, anno 1693.

(72) The remark [X].

(73) Abælardi Opera, p. 16.

(74) L'Enfant, (a religious Dominican) Hiſt. generale de tous les Siecles, to the 21ſt of April, in 6 volumes in 12°, divided according to the days of the year, and printed in Paris, 1684.

ABELIANS, or ABELONIANS, a ſect of heretics, took its riſe in the plains near Hippo, and was extinct in St. Auſtin's time. Some of its principles were very extraordinary, and no ways calculated to make the ſect laſting [A]. Theſe ordain'd, that every male ſhould have his female; and did not think it fitting, nor would allow man to be alone, who was appointed by its ſtatutes to have an aſſiſtant or ſupport like to himſelf; but was not ſuffer'd to lean upon this ſupport, or in other words, to unite corporally

[A] Not at all calculated to make it laſting.] Such a ſtate of continence which a man and a woman were obliged to live in, who had every thing in common, and whoſe ſociety was conſidered as a real marriage, was too ſevere to be long liv'd, nullum violentum durabile. i. e. "Nothing violent is laſting." The Abelians, were a leſs ſevere ſort of Encratitæ and Novatians; for the two laſt abſolutely condemn'd marriage, but the firſt applauded, and obſerved the inſtitution. However, it was ſcarce otherwiſe than nominally; they had the form, but denied the power thereof, 2 Tim. iii. 5. Hi nomen quidem conjugii & nuptiarum retinuerunt, vim autem & effectum earum prorſus ſuſtulerunt (1). Had theſe hereticks conſidered marriage as a ſacrament, their opinion on this article would have been like that of the Zuinglians with regard to the Euchariſt; they would have admitted of the figure, but not of the reality, which muſt have contributed to the extinction of their ſect. We find in Furetiere's Dictionary (2), that

(1) Danæus in Libr. Auguſtini de Hæreſ. cap. 87.

(2) Furetiere, under the word Marriage.

Boire & manger, coucher enſemble,
C'eſt mariage, ce me ſemble.
Thus Engliſhed,
"Meat, drink and bed in concert taken,
"Is marriage, or I'm much miſtaken.

This is the natural idea we form to our ſelves of that ſtate, purſuant to which, the laſt of the three attributes is looked upon as the principal and ſpecific difference. 'Tis that which, in marriage, is called conſummation, and without it, the moſt ſolemn contract, betrothings, and the nuptial bleſſing, are conſidered coporally with his wife; ſhe being to him as the tree of knowledge of good and evil, whoſe fruit was forbidden him on the ſevereſt penalties. Theſe ſectariſts copy'd their marriage from that of Adam and Eve in the terreſtrial paradiſe, who were united by no other tye than that of the heart; or rather, they imitated Abel, whom, they declar'd, was marry'd, but dy'd without knowing woman. This ſect receiv'd its name from Abel (a). After a man and a woman had engag'd in this kind of ſociety, they adopted two children, a boy and a girl, who inherited their poſſeſſions, and afterwards marry'd on the ſame conditions, viz. not to procreate, but adopt two children of different ſexes. The poor in their neighbourhood ſupply'd them with children enough for that purpoſe. So far St. Auſtin (b); and as he is almoſt the only writer who mentions this ſect, we may preſume it neither ſpread far, nor was long-liv'd. 'Tis thought it began under the Emperor Arcadius, and ended in the reign of Theodoſius the younger. The whole ſect was at laſt reduc'd to the inhabitants of a ſingle village, who all return'd to the Catholic Church.

(a) See Bochart. Geograph. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 16. who thinks theſe Heretics had their name from the fiction of Adam's living in a ſtate of continence a hundred and thirty years after Abel's death.

(b) Auguſtin. de Hær. cap. 87. Vide ibi Lambert. Danæum.

only as ſo many preliminaries, from which the parties may eaſily be diſengaged. It is this that ties the knot, and renders it indiſſoluble; it is the end, the aim and crown of the work; it is the ne plus ultra. 'Twas not therefore very likely that many perſons, even after the novelty of the tenet ſhould be over, would join in wedlock; be called husband and wife, and deprive themſelves of the high regard which was then paid to celibacy, without taſting the delights of conjugal ſociety. When I therefore obſerved, that the principles of this ſect were not calculated to make it laſt, it was not neceſſary I ſhould allude to the ſmart ſaying aſcribed to Sixtus Quintus; Non ſi chiava in queſta religione, non durara (3). i. e. "There is no "embracing (ſocially) in this religion; it cannot laſt." For adoption was to them inſtead of generation; conſequently, what Florus obſerves of the firſt inhabitants of Rome, Res erat unius ætatis populus virorum. (4), i. e. "The people conſiſting wholly of men, this "ſtate could laſt but one generation," could not be applied to the Abelians, who, had not other cauſes interfer'd, might have exiſted for ever. Per ſæculorum millia (incredibile dictu) gens æterna eſt in qua nemo naſcitur. That is, "It is incredible, that there ſhould be a people "who have exiſted for thouſands of ages, though no "one was ever born among them." Pliny ſays this of the Eſſenes or Eſſeans (5), and the ſame obſervation is daily made of the Monks.

(3) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, book 1. chap. 1.

(4) Florus, lib. 1. cap. 1.

(5) Plinius, lib. 5. cap. 17.

ABELLI (Anthony) Doctor of Divinity, a Jacobin or Dominican, Abbot of Nôtre-Dame de Livri, in l'Aulnoi; firſt, Preacher to the Queen-mother, and afterwards her confeſſor; publiſh'd at Paris in 1582, his Sermons on the Lamentations of Jeremiah. This is copy'd from La Croix du Maine, & du Verdier Vau-Privas; and if I cannot correct their miſtakes, I however will propoſe my doubts [A]. Had Moreri done thus, we poſſibly ſhould by this time have known the truth; for nothing is a greater inducement to the curious to publiſh their hints and illuſtrations, than when authors confeſs their ignorance in certain matters; and therefore I ſhall often propoſe my doubts. Moreri had ſo many opportunities which I have not, of conſulting perſons, who could have rectified ſuch particulars, that he ought to have done more than barely tranſcribe from la Croix du Maine.

[A] I however will propoſe my doubts.] It is methinks a little ſtrange, that a Jacobin ſhould poſſeſs an abbey, and have his title from it. I never heard of a part of France called l'Aulnoi. If le Laonois was meant, it is a different thing, but then I don't meet with an abbey of Livri in the dioceſe of Laon (1); for the abbey ſo named is in the dioceſe of Paris. Laſtly, In the inſtrument containing the oath of fidelity which the univerſity of Paris took to Henry IV. the 22d of April 1594; among others who ſign'd it, is one Francis Abely, Abbot of Livri, Preacher and Almoner to the King (2). Let thoſe who have an eaſy opportunity of enquiring, ſee whether many particulars have not been aſcribed to one perſon, which relate to ſeveral (3). The doubts I propoſed, procured me the valuable remark following from Mr. de la Monnoie.

"L'Aunoi or l'Aulnoi is very right. It is the "abbey of Notre-Dame de Livri in l'Aunoi, in Al-"neto (4), of St. Auſtin's order, in the Deanry of "Chelles within the dioceſe of Paris. We muſt "ſuppoſe, that before Anthony Abelli could poſſeſs "this abbey, he was obliged to leave the Dominicans, "and enter among the Auſtin Friars, which he might "eaſily do, it being practis'd daily. I believe that "Francis Abely, who in all probability ſucceeded "Anthony, ſhould not have been entitled Abbot of "Ivri, but of Livri, there being no abbey in France "called Ivri." Abbé Baudrand informs me, That the abbey of Livri is three leagues from Paris in the way to Meaux, in a little diſtrict called l'Aulnoy, conſiſting of ten or twelve villages, the confines whereof are now unknown. Theſe two illuſtrations ſufficiently clear up my difficulties.

(1) Vide l'Etat de la France, printed in 1680, vol. 2. p. 311, 312.

(2) See Launoi, Hiſt. du College de Navarre, p. 372.

(3) This is too often the fault of many Biographers.

(4) Claud. Robertus, in Nomenclatura Abbatiarum Galliæ.

ABELLY (Lewis) Biſhop and Count of Rhodez, who dy'd the 4th of Oct. 1691, aged fourſcore and eight years (a), was born in Paris, and Rector of Joſſe in that city. He compos'd ſeveral works, and among the reſt a treatiſe of Divinity, entitled Medulla Theologica (b), Theological Marrow, (whence Boileau call'd him the Marrowy Abelly* [A], the

(a) Mercure Gallant for Oct. 1691.

(b) 'Twas firſt printed at Paris, in 1651; and the ſixth edition of it is in 2 vol. 12°, in the ſame city, anno 1659.

* Or as we might ſay, the Pithy Abelly.

[A] Call'd him the Marrowy Abelly.] I ſhall not ſcruple to trace matters farther back, by quoting the following paſſage, the length of which I am perſuaded will not diſpleaſe; not to mention that it will ſerve to corroborate what I ſhall ſay in the following remark.

Alain touſſe & ſe leve, Alain (1), ce ſavant homme,
Qui de Bauni vingt fois a lu toute la ſomme,
Qui poſſede Abelli, qui ſait tout Raconis,
Et même entend, dit-on, le Latin d'A Kempis.
N'en doutez point, leur dit ce ſavant canoniſte,
Ce coup part, j'en ſuis ſur, d'une main Janſeniſte:
Mes yeux en ſont temoins: j'ai vu moi-même hier.
Entrer chez le prélat le chapelain Garnier.
Arnaud, cet hérétique ardent à nous détruire,
Par ce miniſtre adroit tente de le ſéduire.
Sans doute il aura lu dans ſon Saint Auguſtin Qu'autrefois Saint Louis érigea ce Lutrin.
Il va nous inonder des torrens de ſa plume,
Il faut, pour lui répondre, ouvrir plus d'un volume.
Conſultons ſur ce point quelque autheur ſignalé:
Voions, ſi des Lutrins Bauni n'a point parlé.
Etudions enfin, il en eſt temps encore,
Et, pour ce grand projet, tantôt, dès que l'Aurore
Rallumera le jour dans l'onde enſéveli,
Que chacun prenne en main le Moelleux Abeli (2).

Imitated

(1) The perſon here hinted at, is l'Abbé Auberi, Canon of the holy Chapel, and a famous Moliniſt, brother to Mr. Auberi, author of The Hiſtory of Cardinal Mazarine. Suite de Menagiana, Dutch edition, p. 8.

(2) Oeuvres de Deſpreaux; Lutrin, chant. 4. ver. 169, &c.

the maxims of which differ widely from thoſe of the Janſeniſts [B]. He alſo writ * The Life of Vincent de Paul, founder, and firſt Superior-General of the congregation of the miſſion; a book on the Principles of Chriſtian Morality; one on Hereſies, and another on the Tradition of the Church, with regard to the worſhip of the Bleſſed Virgin, &c. This work, the ſecond edition whereof was printed at Paris in 1675, gave great pleaſure to the Proteſtants, becauſe it furniſh'd them with weapons againſt theſe convert-makers, who would perſuade them, that if any thing was overſtrain'd in this kind of worſhip, it aroſe wholly from the thoughts and reflections of Monks, or from certain abuſes which the Biſhops were daily reforming. The Proteſtants alſo employ'd this work againſt that of the Biſhop of Condom (c); and indeed Mr. Abelly became the protector, as it were, of the moſt extravagant notions, relating to the devotion of the Virgin Mary; by which he quite defeated the effort of the other Biſhop, and the views of thoſe who publiſh'd or approv'd The Bleſſed Virgin's ſalutary Advice to her indiſcreet Devotees. Mr. Abelly was a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris; made Biſhop of Rhodez when Mr. de Péréfixe, the King's preceptor, was rais'd to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Paris; and reſign'd his biſhoprick, when his advanc'd age no longer permitted him to exerciſe the paſtoral functions, and

* The French titles of theſe ſeveral works are as follow: La Vie de Vincent de Paul; Principes ſur la Morale Chrétienne; Tradition de l'Egliſe touchant le culte de la Sainte Vierge.

(c) Entitled, Expoſition de la doctrine de l'Egliſe Catholique.

† Avis Salutaires de la Ste Vierge à ſes devots indiſcrets.

Imitated.

" Then Allen roſe, collected and prepar'd,
" He regularly hemm'd, then ſtroak'd his beard,
" And claim'd, as prolocutor, to be heard.
" The learned ſeer attention might demand;
" The only ſcholar in this reverend band!
" For copious Baxter he had often read,
" And with old Bunyan cramm'd his muddy head.
" Yes, great A Kempis he could conſtrue too,
" And all his knotty paſſages undo.
" Whence cou'd this ſtroke, ſaid he, but from the " Womb,
" Some younger ſprig of old Socinus, come?
" It muſt be ſo, We're in the Prelate's ſnare;
" Theſe eyes ſaw Deiſt Toland viſit there;
" Satan endeavours, by that ſubtle fiend,
" The Prelate to his purpoſes to bend.
" Sirs, he moſt certainly has ſomewhere heard,
" That this litigious desk St. Lewis rear'd;
" Thus, grown polemical, he'll proudly think
" To drown us all with deluges of ink;
" Vaſt ſubſidies of paper-force he'll raiſe,
" And make his partizans find means and ways.
" Now 'tis our duty timely to prepare,
" And ſtand a reſolute defenſive war;
" Conſult antiquity, the ſcholiaſts ſcan,
" Let every text be bolted to the bran:
" Conſider; Does Aquinas nothing ſay
" Of desks? None of the Fathers lean that way?
" I find this argument will waſte much oil,
" Cloſe reading, indefatigable toil.
" Then when Aurora kindles up the day,
" And lights her lamp extinguiſh'd in the ſea;
" Let every man by lots his portion take,
" And what our learned doctors dictate, ſpeak."

OZELL, &c.

Had theſe verſes related only this junction of Bauni and Abelli, they would ſufficiently ſhew the Anti-Janſeniſm of the latter; but they include ſeveral other ſatyrical darts, which all fly to the ſame mark, and ſtrike home. The Poet has explain'd the epithet Marrowy in a marginal note, for which he is to be commended. When I reflect on the conjectures which the critics would ſtart, in caſe the French tongue ſhould have the ſame fate with the Latin, and Boileau's works ſhould ſurvive in diſtant ages, a thouſand whimſical notions occur to me. For ſuppoſe Abelli's Medulla Theologica were loſt; that ſcarce one author who had mention'd it ſhould then be extant; and there was no note on the word Moelleux (Marrowy) in the Lutrin: how would the Critics toil and ſweat to find out the meaning of this epithet, and what a multitude of falſities would they advance (3)? Methinks one of theſe, little ſatisfy'd with the conjectures of all his predeceſſors in criticiſm, would at laſt declare, that Abelli had been diſtinguiſh'd by the epithet Marrowy, in alluſion to Abel's offerings, which were not dry like thoſe of Cain, but a real ſacrifice of beaſts: to which purpoſe he would cite the words Sacrum pingue dabo, nec macrum ſacrificabo: That is, " I will offer up a fat, and not a lean ſacrifice". He would declare, that ſome parts of victims were more efficacious than others; and that the fat, under which the marrow muſt be included, was of a very ſingular uſe. The deeper his learning, the greater whimſies, the more frantic chimæra's he would raiſe; and on this occaſion, as on ſeveral others, the hope would be verify'd which Boileau mentions in his 9th Satyr.

* Et déjà vous croiez dans vos rimes obſcures,
Aux Saumaiſes futurs preparer des tortures.

Thus Engliſhed,

" Ev'n now you think in your myſterious rhymes,
" To torture critiques in ſucceeding times.

Boileau's Works.

* Theſe lines are not juſtly tranſlated in the Engliſh Boileau; they running thus,
" For future
" Rhymers
" crabbed work
" prepare,
" And raiſe another Boyle
" and Bentley
" war."

A perſon hinted, that we wanted a commentary on the Satyrs of this poet (4). It is certain that a great many particulars, in pieces of this kind, ſoon become obſcure, of which the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, and the Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, are a proof. The publick is greatly indebted to the author, who publiſhed Notes on the latter of thoſe Satyrs in 1693, and on the former in 1696: He has an inquiſitive penetrating genius, and is very equal to the performance.

(4) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Oct. 1684. artic. 5. [Since Mr. Bayle's death, Mr. Broſſette, a friend of Boileau, has publiſhed a commentary on all his works.]

[B] The maxims of which differ widely from thoſe of the Janſeniſts.] One of theſe made heavy complaints againſt Mr. de la Berchere, Archbiſhop of Aix, for ordering the Director of his Seminary, to follow Abelly, and quite lay aſide the moral Theology (5) of Grenoble. The perſon abovementioned declares, that there are three pernicious principles in Abelly's Medulla Theologica; the firſt, whereof takes away the moſt certain mark of a good conſcience, acknowledged by the very heathens, who did not think it lawful to do a thing, when one is in doubt whether it be juſt or unjuſt. The ſecond, deſtroys the greateſt of the commandments, viz. that which enjoins us to love God above all things. The third, claſhes directly with Cardinal Grimaldi's care, in cauſing St. Charles's * inſtitutions in the ſacrament of penance to be obſerved, by pointing out a great number of caſes, in which confeſſors ought to refuſe or delay abſolution. Mr. Abelly is therefore accuſed of teaching, 1ſt, That it is lawful to follow a leſs probable and leſs ſafe opinion, in committing what is conſidered as ſin according to the contrary opinion, which appears to us more probable. 2dly, That we are not ſure, the precept of loving God above all things is ever binding in itſelf, but only ſo by accident. 3dly, That the Clergy may always abſolve, without the leaſt ſcruple, perſons, whoſe lives have been a perpetual viciſſitude of confeſſions and crimes, See Advice to the Jeſuits of Aix in Provence, with regard to a piece entitled, Ballet danſé à la reception de Monſeigneur l'Archeveque d'Aix. That is, The maſque or interlude danced at the reception of the Archbiſhop of Aix. This advice was publiſhed in 12°, anno 1687. It is plain Abelly's work is hinted at in the following paſſage of the Menagiana, " Mention being made of A's .... marrow, Abbé le " Camus, now a Cardinal, ſaid, The moon was in the " wane when he writ that piece" (6). A freſh inſtance of the contempt which the Janſeniſts have for that work.

(5) Written by Mr. Genet, whom Cardinal Grimaldi, Mr. Berchere's predeceſſor, plac'd in his ſeminary, purpoſely that he might teach his ſyſtem of morality there. Genet was afterwards made Biſhop of Vaiſon.

(6) Menagiana, p. 65. 1ſt Dutch Edit.

* Borromeo.

(3) Compare this with what Bouhours ſays, in dialogue IV, of his La Maniere de bien penſer, &c. p. 399, on the following words of Boileau, Profès dans l'ordre des Coteaux. * This name Coteaux was given to ſome Gentlemen who refin'd on good cheer. Mr. St. Evremond was one of them. See his Life by Mr. Des Maizeaux.

and retir'd to the Houſe of S. Lazare. A ſecret he diſclos'd in the life of Vincent gave great ſatisfaction to multitudes of people [C].

[C] A ſecret .... gave great ſatisfaction to multitudes of people.] He informed the publick, that Vincent de Paul was reſolved to break off all correſpondence with the Abbot of St. Cyran, upon hearing him declare, that the council of Trent was a mere cabal, and an aſſembly of Schoolmen and the Pope (7). No man who believed this, could be a Roman Catholick.

(7) Abelly's Life of Vincent de Paul, book 2. chap. 12. of Prejugés legitimes contre le Janſeniſme,. That is, "Juſt (or "well-grounded) "Prejudices a-"gainſt Janſeniſm, p. 134.

ABERDEEN, or ABERDON an epiſcopal city in Scotland, ſubject to the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, with an univerſity. It may be conſidered as divided into two parts, viz. Aberdeen at the mouth of the Done, and Aberdeen at that of the Dee. The former is called Old, and the latter, New-Aberdeen, both which are not above a mile one from the other. Old Aberdeen is a Biſhop's See and an Univerſity; but New-Aberdeen is richer, and has more trade. The Univerſity was founded in 1480. Aberdeen was made an Epiſcopal See in 1100, whither it was tranſlated from Murtlac, as Hector Boetius the Scotch hiſtorian informs us (a). This city is called indifferently by the Latin names following, Abredonia, Aberdonium, and Aberdona: Moreri endeavoured to refine on this article [A], but with no great ſucceſs.

(a) Apud Baudrand, Lexicl Geograph. p. 4.

[A] Moreri endeavoured to refine on this article.] He cenſured thoſe who tell us of a city called Aberdonne, or Aberdoen, Aberdonia, Aberdona, or Devana; and proceeds thus. No city in Scotland goes by theſe names; but there are two cities, one of which is called Neu (New)-Aberdon, and the other Old-Aberdon; and the name Aberdon is never found but in ſome incorrect books and maps... It would be needleſs to prove, that the diſtinction of Old and New Aberdeen, ſo far from being uſed in converſation, is ſeldom obſerved in books. For what author ever ſaid, the Biſhoprick of Old-Aberdeen; the Univerſity of Old-Aberdeen? Or what hiſtorian, who mentions that epiſcopal city, adds any epithet to Aberdeen? It is probable, Moreri did not remember his own animadverſion, when he ſays in the article of Scotland, that there is an Univerſity in St. Andrew's, and another in Aberdeen; for otherwiſe, according to his own diſtinction, he ſhould have ſaid Old-Aberdon.

☞ ABGARUS, or ABGAR. A name given to divers of the Kings of Edeſſa in Syria. Mr. Herbelot (a) truly obſerves, that the name is of Syriac extraction, and ſignifies Bright or Beautiful, and that thoſe are deceived who write it Agbar, or think it derived from the Arabic word Akbar, which imports Greatneſs. The tradition of the Orientals, as well Muſulmans as Chriſtians, is, that a King of Edeſſa of this name wrote a letter to Jeſus Chriſt [A], and that Jeſus return'd him an anſwer thereto, and at the ſame time ſent him a hand-

(a) Herbelot, p. 11.

[A] That a King of Edeſſa of this name wrote a letter to Jeſus Chriſt.] Abgarus made Thaddæus Biſhop of Edeſſa, which he was twelve years and more; but that Abgarus's ſon and ſucceſſor being an idolater, Thaddæus was by him put to death. Aſſemanus in his third tome, pag. 212. ſays, That in the reign of this Abgarus the Scriptures were firſt tranſlated into Syriac, and cites two hundred and eighty ſix divers authors touching the life of this Abgarus. See alſo tome 1. p. 514, 515. where divers authorities are cited and examined touching the genuineneſs and authority of theſe epiſtles. And the ſame thing is alſo conſidered by Dr. Grabe in his Notes on the firſt tome of the Spicilegium abovementioned. Beſides which we have the cenſure of the tranſlator of Euſebius both of the letters and the holy face, who ſays, That though Euſebius and St. Jerom thought thoſe letters genuine, yet Iſidore and Gelatius Biſhop of Rome, about anno 494. together with ſeventy other Biſhops decreed, that the church ſhould receive them for no other than Apocrypha; and then he deſires the reader to obſerve, that late writers, as Damaſcenus, and that known fabulous hiſtoriographer Nicephorus have added divers fabulous particulars to the ſtory, viz. How Abgarus at the ſame time he ſent his letter, ſent alſo a painter to Jeſus in order to view him well, and to take his picture after the life; but that the painter was hindred of his purpoſe by the glorious brightneſs that appeared in the countenance of Jeſus, whereupon Jeſus himſelf taking a handkerchief impreſſes it on his face, and on his taking it thence, there appeared imprinted on the handkerchief the expreſs repreſentation of his divine countenance, which he ſent to Abgarus. To this account Nicephorus hath alſo added other fables; for he ſays, The King of Perſia ſent a painter to Jeſus, who brought him back the pictures both of Jeſus and his mother Mary. Alſo, That the Edeſſæans in the time of Juſtinian the Emperor, being beſieged and reduced to great extremity, ſo that there remained no hopes of deliverance, but a preſent deſtruction was expected; they in the midſt of their deſpair happened to bethink themſelves of the picture, and ran to it for a refuge, from whence it is ſaid they received a ſafe deliverance, and ſure protection. But certainly Euſebius, had ſuch an incident happened, would have inſerted it in his hiſtory. The firſt that mentions any thing like it was one who lived above a hundred years after Euſebius. Indeed Procopius (9) tells a ſtory to this effect; that Choſroes King of Perſia had a deſire to take Edeſſa, becauſe there was a confident tradition that this city could never be taken, being protected by the Holy Face. Our Abgarus, whom he names Augar, being then King and one of the wiſeſt men of that time, and deſirous to be one of the Roman confederates, went to Rome, where conferring with Auguſtus, he ſo amazed him with his wiſdom and charmed him with his converſation, that Auguſtus would not part with him, though he earneſtly deſired to return home; whereupon Abgarus one day took occaſion to go a hunting near Rome, and having taken divers wild beaſts alive, he alſo took a quantity of the earth of the ſeveral places where the beaſts were taken, and carried all back to Rome, where Auguſtus then was ſitting in the Circus. Abgarus goes to him, and ſhews him the beaſts and the ſeveral parcels of earth, and what earth belonged to each beaſt, and then cauſed the earth to be laid in ſeveral heaps in ſeveral parts of the Circus, and the beaſts to be let into the Circus from one place, when every beaſt ran directly to that parcel of earth which belonged to the place where he had been bred. Auguſtus beheld this with wonder, to ſee nature untaught inſtruct even beaſts, to deſire their native earth, whereupon Abgarus proſtrating himſelf ſaid, Oh! Sir! What ſtrong deſires do you think I muſt have, who have a wife and children, and a kingdom, though a ſmall one, to return to my native country? Auguſtus being moved with the ſpectacle, and Abgarus's intreaties, unwillingly permitted him to depart, and bid him ask ſomething that might evidence his eſteem for him. Whereupon Abgarus deſired him to build a Circus at Edeſſa, which being granted, he took his leave, and being returned to Edeſſa, his ſubjects asked him, What good he had brought them from the Emperor? he anſwers, I have brought you a grief without damage, and a joy without gain; meaning the folly of ſhews and plays. After this, ſays Procopius, Abgarus growing old, was tortured with a handkerchief, whereon was impreſs'd the figure of his divine face. This ſtory we have in Euſebius (b), which he relates thus: "The fame of Chriſt's miracles in "curing diſeaſes had drawn to Judæa vaſt numbers of people from far diſtant coun- "tries, to be cured of their diſtempers: and Abgarus, a certain King that then reign'd "beyond the Euphrates, labouring under a diſtemper in the feet, hearing of Jeſus's "miraculous cures, requeſted him by letters to come and cure him. Jeſus, tho' not "then yielding to his requeſt, yet wrote him an anſwer; wherein he promis'd, That "he would ſhortly ſend him one of his diſciples, who ſhould not only cure his diſ- "temper, but alſo the diſeaſes of all thoſe that belong'd to him: which promiſe he "perform'd after his aſcenſion; when Thomas the apoſtle, mov'd by a divine im- "pulſe, ſent his brother Thaddæus (whom ſome name Addæus) one of the ſeventy "diſciples, to the city Edeſſa to preach the goſpel, &c. There is, ſays Euſebius, "an evident teſtimony of theſe things, taken from the records of the city Edeſſa, "made in the time of that King's reign; wherein are regiſter'd, not only the "acts of former times, but alſo thoſe of King Abgarus, and which are preſerv'd to this "day: therefore, ſays he, I think it fit here to inſert the letters themſelves [B), copy'd "from their Syriac annals," viz. Abgarus Prince of Edeſſa to Jeſus the holy Saviour who hath appear'd in the fleſh in the confines of Jeruſalem, greeting. I have heard of thee, and with a violent gout, and having in vain tried the art of phyſicians, and hearing at length of the fame of Jeſus and his miracles, he wrote to him; and Jeſus anſwered his letter, &c. as above. They alſo maintain, ſays Procopius, that Jeſus added a poſtſcript to his letter, That the City Edeſſa ſhould never be conquered or taken by the Barbarians; which poſtſcript the writers of the hiſtory of thoſe times knew nothing of. But the Edeſſens afterwards affirm'd it to be found in the epiſtle, and therefore hung up the whole engraven in a table over their gates, eſteeming it as a preſervative and defence to their city; and yet it came not long afterwards under the power of the Perſians, but, ſay they, not conquered; for Abgarus, after his receiving Chriſt's letter, believed and grew well: but dying ſome time after, his ſon who was a very impious man, ſucceeded, and grievouſly oppreſſed his ſubjects; for which, fearing the chaſtiſement of the Romans, he revolted to the Perſians, and received a garriſon from them. But ſome conſiderable time afterwards the Edeſſens deſtroyed that garriſon, and again yielded their city to the Romans, &c. After which Procopius mentions a remarkable conceit, which he, and perhaps ſome other perſons of thoſe times, had, viz.; That if our Saviour did not write that poſtſcript, yet ſeeing men entertained that opinion, he was willing they ſhould believe he would thereby keep the city from being taken, that ſo he might give them no excuſe for wavering in their faith; which is in other words, That Jeſus Chriſt was willing they ſhould believe a lye, that thereby he might confirm their faith.

(9) Hiſtory of the Perſian Wars, book 2. chap. 9.

(b) Euſeb. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. lib. 1. c. 13.

[B] The letters themſelves.] It ſeems ſomewhat ſtrange, that theſe letters, which by the candid writers of the church of Rome are acknowledged to be ſpurious, ſhould be maintained as genuine by Proteſtant authors; this nevertheleſs is matter of fact. Father Simon (1), and Mr. Du Pin (2) don't ſcruple to own, that theſe epiſtles are forged, whilſt Dr. Parker (3), Dr. Cave (4), and Dr. Grabe (5) pretend they ought not to be rejected; the laſt mentioned author indeed does not ſeem ſo poſitive. I don't own, ſays he, that they are undoubtedly genuine (6); but he urges ſeveral arguments for the epiſtle of Chriſt, and propoſes to anſwer all that is ſaid againſt it. We will propoſe candidly the arguments on both ſides, and leave the reader to form a judgment. Dr. Grabe, who maintains theſe letters are genuine, quotes the teſtimony of Ephraim Syrus, and that of Procopius (7); the former lived in the latter end of the fourth Century, the latter wrote about the year of Chriſt 530. See the paſſage of Procopius in the Note [A]. The teſtimony of Procopius, ſays Dr. Grabe, is ſo much the more to be credited, that he was not addicted to ſuperſtition or idle ſtories; that he was no party-writer, and that he declares in his Prefaces that he is acted upon by nothing but the love of truth; this appears throughout his whole work; and in this very hiſtory of Abgarus he has made uſe of the judgment that becomes an hiſtorian, ſince he doubts of the pretended promiſe of Chriſt, that the city of Edeſſa ſhould never be taken, and knows very well how to diſtinguiſh this addition from the reſt of the epiſtles. That there was in Syria a King of Edeſſa, called Abgarus, is manifeſt by the concurrent teſtimony of all hiſtorians; that the fame of Chriſt's miracles was ſpread abroad, even as far as Syria, appears by the expreſs words of St. Matthew (ch. iv. ver. 24.) Why then could not Abgarus, labouring under a great infirmity, have recourſe by letters to the help of our Saviour (8)? The authority of Euſebius is another argument, and indeed the chief, which is brought to maintain the genuineneſs of the letters of Chriſt and Abgarus. Euſebius was a very careful and exact hiſtorian; he ſearched ancient records and conſulted originals; he is a very ancient author, and he poſitively aſſerts, That he himſelf received theſe letters out of the Archives of Edeſſa. Τῶν ἐπιſολῶν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀρχείων ἡμῖν ἀναληφθεισῶν (9). Theſe are, as much as we could find, the moſt ſubſtantial arguments, that are brought to maintain that theſe letters are genuine; let us hear now thoſe that pretend they are ſpurious; but we ſhall alledge theſe arguments only, that are the leaſt exceptionable, or if any material objection is raiſed againſt them, we ſhall mention that alſo.

1. It is always preſumed that Euſebius was at Edeſſa, and there tranſcribed thoſe letters, and that he tranſlated them out of Syriac into Greek; but that does not evidently appear; they who believe it, have been led into the miſtake, by following the Latin tranſlation of Valeſius, without paying due regard to the original of Euſebius (10). Euſebius ſays, Οὐδὲν δὲ οἷον κἀ αὐτῶν ἐπακοῦσαι τῶν ἐπιſολῶν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀρχείων ἡμῖν ἀναληφθεισῶν, κἀ τόνδε αὐτοῖς ῥήμασιν ἐκ τῶν Σύρων φωνῆς μεταβληθεισῶν τὸν τρόπον. Valeſius tranſlates, Opera pretium igitur fuerit, ipſas epiſtolas audire, quas ex Archivis depromptas, e Syrorum lingua fideliter tranſtulimus in hunc modum. That is, "It is worth while "to hear the epiſtles themſelves, which being taken "out of the Archives, we have faithfully tranſlated "them out of Syriac after this manner." Whereas the ſenſe of the Greek words is, which being taken or received out of the Archives are tranſlated out of Syriac. That which is moſt probable is, that Euſebius himſelf never was at Edeſſa, becauſe he does not aſſert it, which he would very probably have done, had he really been there (11).

2. The epiſtles and hiſtory of our Saviour and Abgarus, are not referred to, or mentioned either in the new received goſpels, or by any writer or writers of the three firſt Centuries after Chriſt. It is true indeed, there were many tranſactions in the life of Chriſt, not mentioned in our preſent Goſpels; nor was it the intention of the authors to publiſh every thing he ſaid and did; but it is on the other hand as diſagreeable to their deſign to omit a hiſtory ſo very remarkable as this; nay, there was the moſt urgent neceſſity for the Apoſtles to have publiſhed it, becauſe a controverſy aroſe not only between them and the believing Jews, but even between themſelves, whether the goſpel was to be preached to the Gentiles at all, or whether it was to be confined only to the Jews. Now if this hiſtory were true and known to the Apoſtles, as there could not have been any foundation for this controverſy, ſo if it had aroſe, this epiſtle of Chriſt muſt ſoon have ended it, ſeeing he there expreſly appoints the preaching of the goſpel to this Gentile King and his city (12). I don't find that

(8) All this from Dr. Grabe's Preface quoted above.

(9) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. c. 13. p. 37. Ed. Reading.

(10) Mr. Jones, ubi ſupra, vol. 2. p. 13.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid See alſo Clerici Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sæc. 1. Ann. xxix §. 13. p. 332.

(1) Crit. Hiſt. of the N. T. p. 1. c. 3.

(2) Hiſt of the Canon. vol. 2. c. 6. §. 1.

(3) Demonſtr. of the Law of Nature and the Chriſt. Rel. Pref. p. 34, &c. and Part II. p. 135, &c.

(4) Hiſt. Liter. in Chriſt. vol. 1. p. 2, 3.

(5) Spicileg. Patr. t. 1. p. 4. and in notis p. 319.

(6) Ibid.

(7) See Grabe ubi ſupra, p. 1, 2. and the Rev. Mr. Jeremiah Jones's New Method of ſettling the Canonical Authority of the New Teſtament, vol. 2. p. 7, 8.

and of the cures thou haſt wrought without medicines or herbs. For 'tis reported, thou makeſt the blind to ſee, the lame to walk, lepers to be clean, Devils and unclean Spirits to be expell'd, ſuch as have been long diſeas'd to be heal'd, and the dead to be rais'd; all which when I heard concerning thee, I concluded with myſelf, That either thou waſt a God come down from heaven, or the Son of God ſent to do theſe things. I have therefore written to thee, beſeeching thee to vouchſafe to come unto me and cure my diſeaſe. For I have alſo heard, that the Jews uſe thee ill, and lay ſnares to deſtroy thee. I have here a little city, pleaſantly ſituated, and ſufficient for us both. Abgarus (d). To this Letter, 'tis ſaid, Jeſus return'd an anſwer by Ananias (e) the courier, thus: Bleſſed art thou, O Abgarus! who haſt believ'd in me whom thou haſt not ſeen; for the Scriptures ſay of me, They who have ſeen me have not believ'd in me, that they who have not ſeen, may, by believing, have life. But whereas thou writeſt to have me come to thee, 'tis of neceſſity that I muſt fulfill all things here for which I am ſent; and having finiſhed them, to return to him that ſent me: but when I am return'd to him, I will then ſend one of my diſciples to thee, who ſhall cure thy malady, and give Life to thee and thine. Jeſus [C]. The ſtory (which they ſay was recorded in the Edeſſin archives) goes on thus: "After Jeſus was "aſcended, Judas, who is alſo nam'd Thomas, ſent to Abgarus, Thaddæus, or Ad-"dæus, one of the ſeventy, who on his arrival went and lodged with Toby the ſon of "Tobias, and when the fame of his arrival and the miracles he wrought became pub-"lick, it was told Abgarus, that the Apoſtle was come which Jeſus had promiſed by "his letters; and Abgarus hearing of the miracles he wrought, and that he cured diſ-"eaſes in the name and power of Jeſus, preſently concluded he was the perſon whom Jeſus "had promiſed in his letters, and therefore ſent for Toby, Thaddæus's hoſt, who on "inquiry informed him, &c. In ſhort, next day Toby conducts Thaddæus to court, "and on his entrance Abgarus ſpies him, and ſeeing a great light or glory in his coun-"tenance, made him a profound reverence which amaz'd all preſent, who had never "ſeen any thing like it. Then Abgarus queſtion'd him thus, Art thou indeed a diſciple of "Jeſus the Son of God, who made me this promiſe; I will ſend one of my diſciples to thee? "&c.

(d) See Dr. Grabe's Spicilegium Patrum, tom. 1. p. 6. ευτήρι ἀγαθῷ ἀναφανέντι.

(e) Euſebius ſays, 'twas by the ſame meſſenger that brought Agbar's Letter.

that the latter part of this argument has ever been anſwered by any of thoſe authors, who maintain the letters are genuine. Mr. Le Clerc is the firſt, as far I know, that made uſe of that argument, and his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory was printed after the ſecond edition of Dr. Grabe's Spicilegium (13). But to the firſt part of the argument, viz. The ſilence of all the writers of the three firſt Centuries, Dr. Grabe anſwers, That Chriſt's epiſtle was not mention'd, becauſe it did not relate either to the doctrine or precepts of the Chriſtian religion; and beſides, the original of that letter being kept in the Archives of Edeſſa, the Chriſtians could not eaſily have a ſight of it; nor could it be known whether it was written in our Saviour's own hand, becauſe there were few people left, if any, that knew his hand writing (14). Mr. Reading, who has publiſh'd a new and beautiful edition of Euſebius, with Valeſius's tranſlation and notes, and ſome additional remarks, ſays, that the Greek fathers did not ſpeak of theſe letters, becauſe they did not underſtand the Syriac language (15), but he does not mention Mr. Le Clerc's objection, though one would think he could not be ignorant of it.

(13) This ſecond edition was printed 1714, and Mr. Le Clerc's Hiſtory in 1716.

(14) Grabe Spicilegium, vol. 1. in notis, p. 321.

(15) Ad Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 13. in notis varior. not. 6. col. 2.

3. The epiſtle under the name of Chriſt, makes him defer the curing of Abgarus, till after his aſcenſion one of his Apoſtles ſhould come and perform it; but Chriſt always cured thoſe who made applications (with belief) here to him, as Abgarus is ſaid to do; and would it be much ſatisfaction to him, to be told of a cure, to be wrought in an uncertain time to come? This muſt ſhock the faith he is ſuppoſed to have, and Chriſt would not write after this manner, when he could with one word ſpeaking have performed the cure (16). To this Dr. Grabe anſwers, The œconomy of Chriſt's office was ſuch, that he was ſent only to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael (17), which is the reaſon why before his reſurrection he always expreſly charged his Apoſtles not to go into the way of the Gentiles (18). But one might inſiſt, that as he cured the daughter of the Cananean, or Syrophœnician woman (19), he could alſo cure the King of Edeſſa.

(16) Mr. Jones, ubi ſupra, p. 17. See alſo Natal. Alexander in Hiſt. Sæculi 1.

(17) Matth. xv. 24.

(18) Ibid. ver. 28.

(19) Ibid. x. 5.

4. It is highly improbable that a heathen Prince ſhould ſo readily acknowledge the Divinity of our Saviour, as Abgarus is made to do in his letter. The Greek words, Ὅτι σὺ εἶ ὁ Θεὸς,—ἢ υἱὸς εἶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, do not ſeem to proceed from a heathen, the article ὁ ſhews that by ὁ Θεὸς is here meant the Father by way of eminence; this way of ſpeaking is peculiar to them that acknowledge but one God; a heathen would have ſaid Θεὸς τὶς, Deus quiſpiam, that is, If you are a God, or the Son of a God (20).

(20) Clericus, ubi ſupra, and Jerem. Jones, loc. cit. p. 20.

5. We ſhall offer but one argument more, which will be an anſwer to what is ſaid above in behalf of Euſebius. Whatever opinion ſome people may entertain of him, judicious criticks look upon him as an author who is very credulous and careleſs, and not much to be depended upon. No one, ſays Scaliger, has contributed more to the Chriſtian hiſtory, and no one is guilty of more miſtakes (21). And in another place (22), If a perſon's learning is to be judged of by his reading, no body can deny Euſebius the character of a learned man; but if he is to be eſteemed learned, who has ſhewn judgment together with reading, Euſebius is not ſuch. It is certain, notwithſtanding all that can be ſaid in his favour, there are too many inſtances in his works, both of partiality and credulity, to ſay no worſe, beſides that he frequently truſts too much to his memory (23). It appears by this, how much he may be credited, in what he relates concerning Jeſus Chriſt, and Abgarus. But after all, the author (24) from whom we have borrowed moſt of theſe remarks, thinks this hiſtory is interpolated. It could eaſily be done, ſays he, becauſe it was the end of the book; and what renders this ſuppoſition very probable, is, according to the ſame author, that when Euſebius is relating in the next book, ch. i. what happened to, and was done by the Apoſtles, after our Saviour's aſcenſion, he relates this hiſtory very ſuccinctly, but without ſo much as one of thoſe circumſtances, by which we have proved the hiſtory to be ſpurious and ſuppoſititious. It is true indeed, he is made to refer to the former place; but it was neceſſary this ſhould be interpolated, upon the ſuppoſition of the former being ſo.

(21) Elench. Trihæreſ. c. 29. apud Jeremiah Jones, loc. cit. p. 25.

(22) In Chron. Euſeb. p. 8. apud eund. ibid.

(23) Jerem. Jones, loc. cit.

(24) Jeremiah Jones, loc. cit.

[C] And give life to thee and thine. JESUS] Cedrenus and ſome others have not only repreſented this letter, as ſigned with the name Jeſus, but have alſo given us an inſcription of the ſeal, wherewith it was ſealed, which they ſay was in Hebrew characters, and bore in Greek this interpretation, Θεοῦ Θαυμαστὸν Θαῦμα Θεῖον. That is, A wonderful and divine ſight of God. Alſo Lambecius lib. 5. N° II. referring to the Greek Code, p. 207. has given us the figure of the ſeal to Chriſt's letter, but with a different inſcription. But as neither Euſebius nor any of the ancients mention any thing of this particular, we may well conclude thoſe forgeries to be of later invention. Nor can I ſee any good ground to believe either of the two letters to have been genuine, notwithſtanding the elaborate arguments of Dr. Cave in his Hiſtoria Literaria, and others to ſupport them, eſpecially that of Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe writings would juſtly have been held of more Divine authority than thoſe of an Apoſtle or Evangeliſt, and conſequently have been at leaſt mentioned, if not recorded by the penmen of the New Teſtament.

(12) See Grabe's Spicilegium, vol. 1. p. 326.

" &c. Whereto Thaddæus anſwer'd; Becauſe thou haſt had great faith in the Lord
" Jeſus who ſent me, therefore I am ſent to thee: and if thou wilt yet believe more, thou
" ſhalt obtain all thou deſireſt, according to the meaſure of thy faith. Abgarus replies; I
" have had ſo great faith in him, that I would have made war on the Jews who crucify'd
" him, and would have utterly deſtroy'd them, had not the fear of the Roman Empire re-
" ſtrain'd my purpoſe. Then ſays Thaddæus, Our Lord and God Jeſus Chriſt fulfill'd
" all that had been commanded him by his Father, and then aſcended to his Father.
" Abgarus anſwers; I have believ'd in him and in his Father. Then ſays Thaddæus,
" In the name of our Lord Jeſus I lay my hands upon thee: which when he had done,
" Abgarus was preſently cur'd of his diſtemper; but the manner of the cure ſur-
" priz'd him, for Thaddæus, as well as Jeſus, cur'd without drugs or plaiſ-
" ters. And not only Abgarus, but alſo Abdus the ſon of Abdus was cur'd by him
" of the gout in the ſame manner. After which Abgarus prays him to expound
" unto him the coming of Jeſus, his being made Man, &c. To which Thad-
" dæus replies, Though I am expreſsly ſent to preach theſe things to thee, I will be " ſilent now; but to-morrow call all thy people and citizens together, and then I will " deliver to them the meſſage of God, the Word of Life; and teach the manner of his " coming; how he was made Man, and of his meſſage, and to what end he came; and
" alſo of his miracles, parables, and power over diſeaſes [Devils]; how baſe and mean he
" appear'd; how he humbled himſelf, and dy'd, and diveſted himſelf of his Divinity; what he
" ſuffer'd, &c. and how he deſcended into hell, and rent aſunder that veil and midwall
" never disjoin'd before; and rais'd the dead that had long time ſlept; how he deſcended alone
" into the regions of death, but aſcended to the Father accompany'd with many; how he ſits in
" glory at the right hand of the Father; and how he ſhall come again with glory and power to
" judge both the quick and the dead, &c. Theſe things were done, ſays Euſebius,
" Anno Chriſti 43; which we, ſays he, have tranſlated word for word out of the " Syriac, &c.

ABGILLUS (JOHN) ſon to a King of the Friſii, led ſo exemplary a life, that he was ſirnamed the Prieſt. He accompanied Charlemagne in his expedition to Paleſtine, and inſtead of returning to Europe as that Monarch did after the taking of Jeruſalem; he advanced as far as the Indies, where he gained mighty conqueſts and founded the Empire of the Abyſſines, which, from his name, was called the Empire of Preſter-John. He wrote two hiſtories, the one of Charlemagne's journey into the Holy-Land; and the other of his own expedition into the Indies, the latter whereof deſcribes the country, and the various nations who inhabit it. If Suffridus Petri (a) had the weakneſs to believe, that theſe hiſtories ought not to be ranked among the trifling romances written in the ages of ignorance, in which Charlemagne was boldly introduced with all the air of an imaginary hero, ſuch as Palmerin d'Olive, Hugh of Bourdeaux, Geoffry à la grand' dent, or great Grinders? if Suffridus Petri, I ſay, was ſilly enough to give credit to all this, he very juſtly deſerves the ſatyrical laſhes which Voſſius gives him (b); for nothing can be more fabulous, than Charlemagne's conqueſt of Jeruſalem.

(a) He mentions this author and his two works, in his treatiſe de Scriptor. Friſiæ.

(b) O hominem valdè ſimplicem, ac propè dixerim inſipientem, qui vanis adeo ac ſtultis commentis habuerit fidem! Voſſius de Hiſtor. Latin. p. 300. That is, " What " a ſimple, and " I had almoſt " ſaid, fooliſh " man, was he, " (Suffridus Pe- " tri) to give " credit to ſuch " idle, witleſs " fictions?

☞ABIATHAR, High-prieſt of the Jews, was ſon to Ahimelech, who had borne the ſame office, and received David in his houſe [A]. This ſo enraged Saul who hated David, that he put to death Ahimelech and eighty five Prieſts; Abiathar only eſcaping this dreadful maſſacre. He afterwards was High-prieſt, as was before obſerved, and often gave King David teſtimonies of his fidelity, particularly during Abſalom's conſpiracy, at which time, Abiathar followed David and bore away the ark. But after this, Abiathar conſpiring with Adonijah in order to raiſe him to the throne of King David his father; this ſo exaſperated Solomon againſt Abiathar, that he diveſted him of the Prieſthood, and baniſhed him A. M. 3021, 1014 years before Chriſt. Thus was fulfilled in his perſon, what God had foretold to Eli, viz. That his poſterity ſhould be deſtroyed, becauſe of the crimes of his two ſons, 1 Sam. xxii. 1 Kings. Joſeph. Antiq. l. 7 and 8. Uſſer. Annal.

☞ABIGAIL

[A] Son to Ahimelech, who received David in his houſe.] Father Berruyer (1) the Jeſuit, relates this incident, between David and Ahimelech, as follows. " You don't know, ſays David to Ahimelech, that the " King's order for my departure was ſo ſudden, that " neither my ſelf, nor my few companions, had time " to take a morſel; and I am bound to ſuch inviolable " ſecrecy, that I cannot appear before any perſon " but you. If you therefore have got any thing " ready, were it only five or ſix loaves; in a word, " whatever you have at hand, be ſo good as to in- " dulge it me; in order to ſatisfy my appetite. I " would do it with all my heart, replied Ahimelech, " but I have none of the common bread which the " Laity is allowed to eat of, having nothing but holy " bread to offer you; and beſides, it is requiſite that " you and your companions ſhould have purified your " ſelves, and above all, that none of you ſhould have " had the leaſt commerce with women. Don't trou- " ble your ſelf about that, ſays David immediately to " the High-prieſt, if the commerce with women be " the only obſtacle, you may ſafely do us the good " office we require at your hands; for we have not " come near one ſince our firſt ſetting out, which is " three days. I anſwer for my companions in this " particular, and you may depend upon my word; " beſides, all the baggage they have brought with " them is pure, according to the law. Poſſibly they " may have contracted ſome legal pollution in the " journey, but they ſhall all purify themſelves to day, " and I'll take upon my ſelf to ſee that every thing " be done in a proper manner. Ahimelech, upon " David's making this promiſe, having no other " loaves but the bread, which had been taken from " before the face of the Lord, or from before the " ark, thought a diſpenſation might be allowed " on ſo ſingular an occaſion, and thereupon gave, " without the leaſt ſcruple, the hallowed bread to " David." Thus this interview which is related in Scripture with the utmoſt ſimplicity, is told by our reverend Father with all the eaſe and vivacity of modern dialogue.

(1) Hiſtoire du Peuple de Dieu, tom. 4. Paris, chez Caillcau, &c. 1728, 4°.

☞ ABIGAIL was the wife of Nabal [A], an avaritious, churliſh, miſchievous man, who inhabited the deſart or wilderneſs of Maon, and whoſe poſſeſſions were in Carmel. David, when purſued by Saul, had always been very careful not to injure any thing belonging to Nabal. Happening once to be in great diſtreſs, he ſent very courteouſly to Nabal [B], deſiring he would favour him and his attendants with proviſions. The latter returned a very rude anſwer [C], which ſo exaſperated David, that to revenge the inſult, he formed a reſolution to extirpate him and all his houſe, but Abigail advancing to meet him with proviſions calmed his juſt reſentments. David was charmed with Abigail [D], and ſoon gave her a proof of his being ſo; for Nabal dying ten days after, David ſent her word that he intended to make her his wife. Abigail declared at firſt that ſhe did not deſerve ſo great an honour; however, ſhe afterwards went and met David, who married her the year Samuel died, viz. A. M. 2975 and 1060 before Chriſt. 1 Sam. xxv. There was alſo another Abigail, daughter of Nahaſh, ſiſter to Zeruiah, and mother of Joab, 2 Sam. xvii. 25.

[A] Abigail was the wife of Nabal.] Father Berruyer the Jeſuit has been an excellent painter on this occaſion. "Nabal's riches, ſays he, conſiſted "in vines and corn, but eſpecially in paſture grounds, "in which a thouſand goats and three thouſand ſheep "graz'd. However, theſe large poſſeſſions were no- "thing in compariſon of the treaſure he poſſeſs'd in "the chaſte Abigail his wife, the moſt accompliſhed "woman of her tribe, with reſpect to all thoſe qua- "lities both of body and mind which form the "amiable woman. Nabal, unhappily for Abigail, "was not worthy of poſſeſſing her, and never couple "were worſe matched. The wife was beautiful, "well-ſhap'd, careful, prudent, a good houſewife, "vaſtly good-natur'd, and indefatigably vigilant; but "as for the husband, he was diſſolute, capricious, "head-ſtrong, contemptuous; always exaſperated at "good advice, and never failing to make a bad uſe of "it; in a word, a man whoſe riotous intemperance "the virtuous Abigail was perpetually obliged to "bear with, to atone for his extravagant ſallies, or "diſſemble his follies; beſides, he was an infidel "and as deprav'd an Iſraelite as his wife was regular "and fervent (1).

(1) Hiſtoire du Peuple de Dieu, vol. 4. p. 202, 203.

[B] David ſent very courteouſly to Nabal.] Mr. Henry explains the meſſage in the modern way thus (2). "Tell Nabal, I ſent you to preſent my ſervice to "him, and to enquire how he does and his family." But this author afterwards cenſures David for his too great, as he thinks, condeſcenſion. "David, ſays he, "methinks paſt too high a compliment upon Nabal, "when he call'd him the man that liveth; David "knew better things, that in God's favour is life, "not in the world's ſmiles. And by Nabal's rough "anſwer he was well enough ſerved, for the too "ſmooth addreſs to ſuch a muck-worm.

(2) An Expoſition of the Books of the Old Teſtament, by Matt. Henry, Vol. 2. on 1 Sam. xxv. London Folio 1728.

[C] Nabal returned a very rude anſwer.] It appears from the foregoing verſes of the chapter whence theſe particulars are extracted, that David had ſent a very courteous meſſage to Nabal; having ordered his ſervants to greet him in his name, to wiſh peace to himſelf, his houſe and all things belonging to him. But what a queſtion did Nabal ask? This contemptuous one, Who is David? and who is the ſon of Jeſſe? However, he made a worſe compliment to the meſſengers; There be many ſervants now a-days that break away every man from his maſter (3). Or in other words, that they were a pack of runaways, who, like ſo many drones, were come to prey upon his ſubſtance. But David reſented the affront, and ordering four hundred of his men to gird on their ſwords; he ſet out at the head of them, and vowed he would not leave of all that pertained to Nabal, by the morning light, any that piſſeth againſt the wall (4). However, Abigail coming to meet David unknown to her husband, her beauty, wit and great obſequiouſneſs ſoon won David's heart.

(3) Idem ibid.

(4) 1 Sam. xxv. 10.

When beauty in diſtreſs appears
An irreſiſtleſs charm it wears.
Horace tranſlated by ſeveral hands.

[D] David was charmed with Abigail.] The above-mentioned author of the Hiſtory of the people of God, relates the riſing affection which David had for Abigail, and the progreſs of it as follows. "David, during "the little time he had ſtayed with Abigail, had ob- "ſerved that ſhe was very beautiful, but ſtill more "conſpicuous for her modeſty; that ſhe was very "mild, vaſtly prudent, and above all informed with "the deepeſt ſenſe of religion. He pitied her when "he reflected that ſo perfect a woman was married "to ſo wicked a man, but then he could only pity "her. He did more when he heard of Nabal's death; "he thought the widow deſerved better; he wiſhed "to engage her love; and believed her merit was "ſuch, that he might offer himſelf to her as a huſ- "band, though God had deſtin'd him to be her ſo- "vereign. He already had two wives ... but as the "law allowed of a plurality, he thought he could "not uſe this privilege more à propos than on this "occaſion. He let ſome time, for decorum ſake, "paſs, before he made freſh propoſals to Abigail; "but at the end of it, he ſent ſome of his officers, "to offer her, in his perſon, a husband worthy of "her, whoſe tenderneſs ſhould make her forget the "injurious treatment ſhe had met with from Nabal. "This treaty of marriage was carried on by David's "deputies on mount Carmel. We come, ſaid they "to Abigail, from a hero who is not unknown to "you, to aſſure you that his heart is at your devo- "tion, and that he deſires to make you his wife; "David will be Abigail's husband; you are to con- "ſider whether it will be proper for you to reject "this offer. Conſult your religion, your wiſdom, "your intereſt, and give us a direct anſwer as ſoon as "poſſible. How I! replied Abigail, proſtrating her "ſelf humbly to the ground; I! become the ſpouſe "of David my Lord and my King? Tell your maſter "that I am the humbleſt of his ſervants; that I pre- "tend to no other honour than that of waſhing the "feet of his ſervants, and ſhall think my ſelf too "happy, if he will let that be my employment. This "was ſaying enough, and though a modeſt, was not "an equivocal anſwer. The deputies took her mean- "ing, and overjoyed at the ſucceſs of their commiſ- "ſion, they ſet out, in order to carry the agreable "news to their maſter; but firſt made Abigail pro- "miſe that ſhe would follow them immediately, and "not delay the ſolemnizing of a marriage, concluded "in heaven before it was thought of upon earth. "Abigail prepared her ſelf for it with all the diligence "which the diſpoſition of Providence required from "her. She cauſed five maidens who had been long "in her ſervice to attend upon her; then mounting "her aſs, ſhe arrived ſoon after David's Envoys into "the deſert of Paran. The nuptials were there ce- "lebrated with leſs magnificence than ſuited the dig- "nity of the husband, but with an abundance of "celeſtial bleſſings, infinitely preferable to the tran- "ſient pomp of kingly marriages (5).

(5) Hiſtoire du Peuple de Dieu, vol. 4. p. 213, 214, 215.

☞ ABIHU, was brother to Nadab, and ſon to Aaron. The two former had the happineſs to aſcend Mount Sinai with their father, and there to behold the glory of God, which is deſcribed in a very ſublime manner in Scripture (a) [A]: but afterwards, putting ſtrange fire

(a) Exod. xxiv.

[A] And there beheld the glory of God.] The deſcription which the Scripture gives us of this, is very auguſt. And they ſaw the glory of God; and there was under his feet, as it were .... the body of heaven in his clearneſs.

fire into their cenſers, inſtead of the ſacred fire which the Lord had commanded to be employ'd on thoſe occaſions, they were ſoon puniſh'd for their diſobedience; for fire ruſhing upon them, ſeiz'd on their faces and breaſts, ſo that they were kill'd before any ſuccour could be brought them. This happen'd in the tabernacle near Mount Sinai, Anno Mundi 2545, and before Chriſt 1490 (b). Moſes caus'd their bodies to be carry'd out of the camp, in order that they might be honourably interr'd. But tho' all the people bewail'd this ſurprizing cataſtrophe, Moſes forbid Aaron and his two ſons Eleazar and Ithamar to join in the lamentation, to evince, that as they were honour'd with the dignity of the Prieſthood, they were more ſenſible of the glory of God, than of their own private affliction. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 3. c. 9.

(b) Levitic. x.

neſs.... and a cloud covered the mount. And the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it ſix days: and the ſeventh day he called unto Moſes out of the midſt of the cloud. And the ſight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire, on the top of the mount (1). Our inſpired Milton always preſents us with the moſt ſublime images on theſe occaſions.

(1) Exod. xxiv.

About him all the ſanctities of heav'n
Stood thick as ſtars, and from his ſight receiv'd
Beatitude paſt utterance; on his right
The radiant image of his glory ſat,
His only Son (2).

(2) Paradiſe loſt, B. 3. ver. 60. & ſeq.

The Father infinite,
By whom in bliſs emboſom'd ſat the Son
Amidſt, as from a flaming mount, whoſe top,
Brightneſs had made inviſible (3).

(3) Ibid. B. 5. ver. 595, & ſeq.

The ſolemnity of theſe images raiſes the ſoul above every thing terreſtrial, and bears it on the wings of rapture to heaven. There are a great number of places in Scripture, which are infinitely more auguſt than any thing in Milton. "The excellent ſong of "Moſes (Exod. xv.) ſays the learned and ingenious "Mr. Rollin (4), may very juſtly be conſidered as one "of the moſt eloquent pieces of antiquity. The turn "of it is great, the thoughts noble, the ſtyle ſublime "and magnificent, the expreſſions ſtrong, and the "figures bold: the whole abounds with particulars "which ſtrike the mind and ſeize the imagination. "This piece, which ſome think was written by Moſes "in Hebrew verſe, excells all that the antients have "in this kind; and Virgil and Horace, the moſt per"fect models of profane eloquence, have nothing "comparable to it. No one, ſays Mr. Rollin, has a "greater eſteem for thoſe two celebrated writers "than I have, and I ſtudied them with the moſt in"tenſe application, and the greateſt pleaſure for ſeve"ral years. Nevertheleſs, when I read Virgil's com"pliment to Auguſtus in the third book of the "Georgicks (5), and at the concluſion of the eighth "Æneid (6); and the lines which Evander the "Prieſt ſpeaks in honour of Hercules (7) in the ſame "book; though they are all very fine, they yet ap"pear to me groveling, when compared to the ſong "of Moſes. Virgil methinks is all ice, and Moſes "all fire. The ſame may be affirmed of Ode 14 and "15 of book 4, and of the laſt of the Epodes of "Horace.... A circumſtance which ſeems to favour "theſe two poets and the profane writers, is, that "they boaſt a harmony and elegance of ſtyle which "is not found in the Scriptures: but then it muſt be "conſidered, that we generally read the ſacred books "in a tranſlation; and it is well known that the "beſt French tranſlations of Cicero, Virgil and Ho"race diſfigure thoſe authors very much. Now the "original language of the Scriptures muſt be vaſtly "eloquent, ſince there is more eloquence in the co"pies of it, than in all the Latin pieces of antient "Rome, or the Greek works of Athens. The elo"quence of the Scriptures is cloſe, conciſe, devoid "of foreign ornaments, which would only deaden its "impetuoſity and fire; an enemy to long perambula"tions, it goes to its mark by the ſhorteſt path. It "loves to include a great many thoughts in a few "words;.... and to make ſuch objects ſenſible as "are fartheſt removed from the ſenſes, by the lively "and natural images it forms of them. In a word, "it is great, ſtrong, energetic, and boaſts a majeſtic "ſimplicity which raiſes it above heathen eloquence. "Any one need only compare the abovecited paſ"ſages of Virgil and Horace, with the Song of "Moſes, to be convinced of the truth of what "is here aſſerted." Another ingenious author (8) ſpeaks in the nobleſt manner of the ſtyle and language of the Scriptures. "We have no inſtance, ſays he, "to produce of any writers, that riſe at all to the "majeſty and dignity of the Divine attributes, except "the ſacred pen-men. No leſs than Divine inſpiration "could enable men to write worthily of God, and "none but the Spirit of God knew how to expreſs "his greatneſs, and diſplay his glory: in compariſon "of theſe divine writers, the greateſt genius's and "nobleſt wits of the heathen world are low and dull. "The ſublime majeſty and royal magnificence of the "Scripture poems are above the reach, and beyond "the power of all mortal wit. Take the beſt and "livelieſt poems of antiquity, and read them as we "do the Scriptures in a proſe tranſlation, and they "are flat and poor. Horace, Virgil and Homer loſe "their ſpirit and ſtrength in the tranſuſion to that "degree, that we have hardly patience to read "them (9). But the ſacred writings, even in our "tranſlation, preſerve their majeſty and their glory, "and very far ſurpaſs the brighteſt and nobleſt com"poſitions of Greece and Rome.

(4) De la Maniere d'enſeigner & d'etudier les belles Lettres, &c. tom 2. in Paris 1730. 3 Edit. p. 608. 12°.

(5) Ver. 16. 39.
(6) Ver. 675. 728.
(7) Ver. 287.

(8) A Diſſertation on reading the Claſſics and forming a juſt ſtyle, p. 127. London printed for J. Bowyer 1713. 12°.

(9) Here the learned writer ſeems to go a little too far.

ABIMELECH, King of Gerar, a country of the Philiſtines, was cotemporary with Abraham. This Patriarch and his family being there, his wife Sarah, though fourſcore and ten years of age (a), was not ſafe in it, for Abimelech carried her off, and was ſo ſmit with her beauty, that he reſolved to marry her. Abraham might have prevented this unlucky accident, had he declared himſelf Sarah's huſband; but as he was afraid of being murthered, he thought proper to give out that ſhe was his ſiſter, and intreated her to ſay he was her brother (b). He had once before employed this expedient (c), which certainly does not merit the elogiums St. Chryſoſtom beſtows upon it [A]. It is thought the King of the Philiſtines was afflicted with a diſeaſe which rendered

(a) See the laſt remarks of the article SARAH.

(b) Geneſis xx.

(c) Geneſis xii.

[A] Is far from meriting the elogiums which St. Chryſoſtom beſtows upon it.] We ſhall take notice, on another occaſion (1), how far Abraham's diſſimulation merited cenſure. Every one may form what judgment he pleaſes, on his relapſing into this fault. As Sarah's honour had been expoſed to ſo much danger once before, Abraham's repetition of the lie ſeems, at firſt ſight, leſs venial; but on the other ſide, does not a perſon ſeem more excuſable who employs an expedient which has ſucceeded, than when he firſt attempts it? And is it not certain, that Abraham's firſt attempt had a wiſh'd for ſucceſs? For not only his life was ſpared, but rich preſents were made him, and his wife was reſtored un-injured, which, perhaps, he did not expect. I uſe the word perhaps, not daring to write what St. Chryſoſtom preached. You are ſenſible, ſays he to his auditors, that nothing exaſperates a husband more, than for his wife to be ſuſpected of having been in the power of another; and yet this juſt man does his utmoſt to have the act of adultery compleated (2). It was natural, after this, to ſuppoſe the preacher would cenſure the Patriarch; but ſo far from it, he beſtows the higheſt encomiums

(1) In the remarks of the article SARAH.

(2) Ὁ μὲν τοι δίκαιος καὶ σπουδάζει καὶ πάντα ποιεῖ, ὥστε εἰς ἔργον τὴν μοιχείαν ἐκβῆναι. Chryſoſt. Homil. 33. in Geneſ.

rendered him impotent [B] : but however this be, it is certain that providence would not ſuffer him to ſatiate his paſſion for Sarah, he being admoniſhed in a dream, that ſhe was married to a Prophet, and that he ſhould die, in caſe he did not reſtore her to Abraham. The King then gave her back to him, but at the ſame time reproached them with their falſe aſſeverations. Abraham made his excuſes, and among other reaſons told him, that Sarah indeed was his ſiſter, but by a different mother; this we are told in Scripture. Moreri ſubſtitutes very improperly, inſtead of the ſacred text, the words of Joſephus, who falſely ſuppoſes, that Abraham declared Sarah was his brother's daughter (d). He has followed the ſame author in a circumſtance which is not once mentioned in Scripture, viz. That Abimelech and Abraham made a covenant when Sarah was reſtored to her husband: for the Scripture ſays no more, than that Abimelech made this Patriarch very conſiderable preſents, and permitted him to reſide in any part of his dominions. 'Tis true indeed, that a covenant (that of Beer-ſheba) was made between them; but eomiums on his courage and prudence; on his courage, for its having ſo far ſuppreſs'd all emotions of jealouſy as made him cool enough to give the advice he did; and on his prudence, for its ſuggeſting an expedient, ſo happily calculated to extricate him from the troubles and perils which then ſurrounded him. St. Chryſoſtom did not forget to diſplay, in the ſtrongeſt colours, the dreadful force of jealouſy, the better to manifeſt the prodigious courage of him who had triumph'd over it; but on the other ſide, he heightned the merit of Abraham's prudence, by obſerving, that when this Patriarch conſidered that Sarah was too beautiful to eſcape the laſcivious Egyptians, whether ſhe paſſed for his wife or ſiſter, he reſolved ſhe ſhould go under the latter character, becauſe he hoped to ſave his own life by this artifice. Behold, ſays St. Chryſoſtom, with what prudence this juſt man finds out an expedient, which ſecures him from all the ſnares of the Egyptians? He then makes the following excuſe, for his having conſented to his wife's adultery, viz. that as Death was not yet diſpoſſeſſed of his tyranny, he filled the mind with great terror. Ὅτι ὕπω ἦν καταλυθεῖσα τοῦ θανάτου ἡ τυραννὶς διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τῇ μοιχείᾳ τῆς γυναικὸς αἱρεῖται κοινωνῆσαι ὁ δίκαιος, καὶ μονονυχὶ ὑπηρετήσασθαι τῷ μοιχῷ εἰς τὴν τῆς γυναικὸς ὕβριν ἵνα τὸν θάνατον διαφύγῃ (3). Quia nondum mortis erat ſoluta tyrannis propterea in adulterium uxoris conſentit juſtus, & quaſi ſervit adulterio in mulieris contumeliam ut mortem effugiat. Having thus applauded the husband, he proceeds to praiſe the wife, who, he tells us, accepted the propoſal very chearfully, and topp'd her part in this farce (4); and then exhorting all women to imitate Sarah, he breaks into the following exclamation. Who would not admire this ready obedience? What man could enough applaud Sarah's conduct, who after living ſo chaſtly, and though in ſo advanced an age, did yet venture being made an adultereſs, and delivered up her body to barbarians, purely to ſave her husband's life (5). I don't believe any preacher in this age would dare treat ſo delicate a ſubject as this is after St. Chryſoſtom's manner; for it would infallibly expoſe him to the raillery of the profane; and I very much queſtion whether the inhabitants of Antioch, who were naturally inclined to ſlander, could forbear making malicious reflections, on hearing ſuch a ſermon. St. Ambroſe is as laviſh of his applauſe on Sarah's tenderneſs for her husband (6); and we ſhall ſhew, in the article ACINDYNUS (Septimius) that St. Auſtin was, very near, as much miſtaken. It is ſurprizing, that theſe great luminaries of the church, ſo fam'd for their virtue and zeal, ſhould not know that it is unlawful for a man to commit a crime to ſave his own or another's life.

(d) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 11.

(3) Chryſoſt. Homil. 32. in Geneſ.

(4) Πάντα ποιῆ ὥστε τὸ δρᾶμα λαθεῖν. Omnia facit ita ut fabula & fictio illa lateant. "She did "every thing "that was ne- "ceſſary, to keep "the farce ſe- "cret. Id. ib.

(5) Τίς κατ' ἀξίαν ταύτην ἐπαινέσειεν, ἥτις μετὰ τοσαύτην, σωφροσύνην καὶ ἐν ἡλικίᾳ τοιαύτῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ τὸν δίκαιον διασῶσαι, ἔσον εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν γνώμην καὶ εἰς μοιχείαν ἑαυτὴν ἐξέδωκεν, καὶ συνουσίας ἠνέσχετο βαρβαρικῆς. Id. ibid.

(6) Ambr de Abram. lib. 1. cap. 2.

[B] Which rendered him impotent.] God, to extinguiſh his concupiſcence, afflicted him with a grievous diſtemper, which eluded the skill of his phyſicians, and admoniſhed him in a dream, not to touch the ſtranger's wife. Abimelech being a little recovered ſome time after, told his friends the cauſe of his diſtemper, and reſtored Sarah to Abraham. Thus Joſephus relates this incident (7), not regarding, as is uſual with him, how far he diſagreed with Moſes's relation, or rather, bold enough to contradict him. For does not Moſes tell us, that Abimelech, after his dream, roſe up early, and called all his ſervants about him, purpoſely to acquaint them with what had been revealed to him in his ſleep (8)? But how could he have done this, had the phyſicians given him over? Joſephus was ſenſible of the difficulty, and to remove it, boldly ſuppoſes, in oppoſition to the Scriptures, that this King did not reveal his dream to his friends, till he was a little recovered from his illneſs, which was ſome time after the dream. Some writers are of opinion, that Abimelech's wives, and not himſelf, were afflicted (9); and that where mention is made in Scripture of God's healing him, it means only that God had taken off the ſeals which he had put on the wombs of all the women in Abimelech's palace (10). I could almoſt approve of this expoſition, for I don't ſee the leaſt grounds, throughout the whole 20th chap. of Geneſis, to ſuppoſe that Abimelech was diſeaſed, except in the 17th verſe, where it is ſaid, God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maid-ſervants, and they bare children; but as the following verſe ſpeaks only of the indiſpoſition of thoſe women; it is probable enough, that God afflicted Abimelech with no other evil. I ſhall anſwer elſewhere (11), the queſtion which may be put to me, viz. Why this King, if he was well, did not ſatisfy the paſſion which prompted him to carry off Sarah? I am not ſurprized, that the Jews have publiſhed ſo many chimeras on this occaſion, and ſhould be much more ſo, had they not invented an hundred wild whims, concerning our Abimelech. They relate, that all the conduits of the ſeveral animated bodies, in his houſe, not only thoſe of all the men and women, but of the beaſts both male and female, were ſtopt in ſuch a manner, that nothing could paſs in or out (12). They could neither eat nor drink; nor would any thing go through their bellies, &c. Beſides, the men were ſeized with ſo exceſſive a chill, that Abimelech was unable to exerciſe his maſculine faculties, either with Sarah or any other woman. A famous Proteſtant Divine (13) thinks the latter part of this tradition genuine, but rejects the reſt as ridiculous or ſuperfluous. He ſays, That as the Devil ſometimes employs ligatures or charms (14) to prevent married perſons from performing their conjugal duties, it is not altogether improbable, but that God might afflict Abimelech's family in that manner, in a good and holy view, viz. to preſerve Sarah's chaſtity, and to manifeſt undeniably, that ſhe had not received the leaſt injury in his houſe. He therefore is of opinion, that all Abimelech's male domeſticks were ſtruck with impotency, like that which is occaſioned by witchcraft; and that the gates of life were either ſhut, or ſo contracted, in all his women ſervants, that it was impoſſible for them to conceive. This, will it be ſaid, was too much by half; ſince, had the men only been bewitched, it would have ſufficiently anſwered the purpoſes of God; but it muſt be replied, that as Moſes expreſly mentions the cloſing of the female parts, we cannot look upon it as ſuperfluous. Here follow two explications of this affair, which, however, don't wholly remove all difficulties. Some think Moſes underſtood by theſe words, that Abimelech's wives and maid-ſervants could not be delivered when their time was up; they indeed had violent pangs and throws, but it was with them, as with thoſe mentioned by Eſaiah the Prophet, Venerunt filii uſque ad os matricis & vis non eſt ad partum (15). That is, "The "children are come to the birth, and there is not "ſtrength to bring forth." Others ſay, he meant it of their ceaſing to bear children. The firſt explication cannot agree with Geneſis, unleſs we take it for granted, that all Abimelech's women were big with child, when Sarah was carried off (16), which is not probable. The ſecond would ſuppoſe that Sarah continued longer in that King's houſe than ſhe really did; for a conſiderable time muſt paſs before it can be known that a great number of women will not conceive any more. The difficulty of this paſſage, obli-

(7) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 11.

(8) Gen. xx. 8.

(9) Sallus. Annales, tom. 1. p. 469.

(10) Gen. xx. 18.

(11) In the remark [C] of the article SARAH.

(12) Apud Mercerum. Vide Riveti Exercit. in Geneſ. Operum, tom. 1. p. 395.

(13) Rivet, loc. cit. Heidegger follows him cloſe. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 2. p. 165.

(14) This is vulgarly call'd Nouër l'éguilette; that is, "To bewitch "the pudenda, ſo "as to prevent "conſummation.

(15) Iſa. xxxvii. 3. For the Lord had faſt cloſed up all the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech.

(16) Gen. xx. 18.

ged

(e) Gen. xxi. 31, 32.

but this was ſome years after (e). Joſephus, as though he had better materials than Moſes [C], preſumes to make this covenant prior to Iſaac's birth; whereas the Scriptures fix it after Iſhmael's being caſt out, which was not till after Iſaac was weaned. Moreri tranſcribed from the ſame writer, when he tells us, that the abovementioned Abimelech ſhewed great favour to Iſaac, who was come into the country of Gerar. It is not impoſſible that this might have been the ſame Abimelech; but it is very likely he was ſucceſſor to him who carried off Sarah [D]. The truth is, that a famine happening to rage, Iſaac withdrew into Gerar which was then governed by a King called Abimelech. Here Rebekah's beauty forced her huſband to employ Abraham's artifice; ged a very learned interpreter to declare, that the puniſhment which God inflicted on Abimelech's family, was known in ſuch a manner as is unknown to us (17). To conclude, the Rabbins tell us, that the diſeaſe with which Abimelech was perſonally afflicted, was very near the ſame with that of Sarah's firſt raviſher (18); for theſe ſay, he had the diſeaſe called Ratan, which is the moſt troubleſome ſpecies of ulcers, and the greateſt enemy to amorous toils (19). Solomon Jarchi is of opinion, that the plague of this King of Egypt was a head-ach, cauſed by a worm which bred in his brain: Morbus perturbati cerebri ob innatum ipſi vermiculum, quo qui laborant iis concubitus gravis fit, & liberi gignuntur ulceroſi (20). That is, "That the "ſocial embrace is grievous to thoſe afflicted with it, "and they beget ſcabby children." Some think theſe laſt words ſpoil all; imagining, it was neceſſary for Sarah's honour, that Pharoah's plague ſhould have reduced him to abſolute impotency. See our remarks on the article of this holy woman.

(17) Mercerus apud Rivetum Oper. tom. 1. p. 395.

(18) Pharoah King of Egypt.

(19) Apud Mercerum, in Riveti Oper. tom. 1. p. 395.

(20) Apud Heidegg. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 2. p. 154.

[C] Furniſhed with better materials than Moſes.] I have long had Joſephus, and thoſe who ſpare him on this head, in great indignation. A man who publickly profeſſed the Jewiſh religion, and whoſe faith was founded on the Divinity of the Scriptures, preſumes to deſcribe things otherwiſe than they are related in Geneſis; he changes, he adds, he ſuppreſſes circumſtances; in a word, he claſhes ſo much with Moſes, that one of them muſt have advanced falſities. But is this to be ſuffered? And muſt we not conclude from thence, that he either did not value how much he offended his own nation; or was perſuaded his own private opinion with regard to the fallibility of Moſes, (and conſequently that he was not inſpired) prevailed univerſally with the Jews? He therefore juſtly deſerved to be treated in the following manner by Beza: Hoc ego ſemel pronuncio, quod tu nunquam falſum eſſe oſtendes, ſi verus eſt multis locis Joſephus, mentitum eſſe multis locis Moſem & ſacros omnes Scriptores. Sed nos potiùs iſtos pro veris ipſius Dei interpretibus, illum vero pro ſacerdote rerum ſacrarum valde imperito, atque etiam negligente & prophano Scriptore habebimus (21). That is, "I declare this "once for all, which you can never prove to be "falſe, viz. That if Joſephus be true in a great many "places, then Moſes and all the ſacred writers have "told a conſiderable number of untruths. But let "us rather eſteem theſe as the true interpreters of "God himſelf; and Joſephus, not only as a Prieſt "very ignorant in religious matters, but even as a "negligent and profane writer." I believe that all the ancient hiſtorians made as free with the old memoirs which they conſulted: they tack'd ſupplements to them, and the ſeveral incidents not being illuſtrated and embelliſhed to their fancies, they enlarged, and gave them what dreſs they thought proper; and this is what we now call hiſtory.

(21) Th. Beza. Reſp. ad Balduinum, Oper. tom. 2. p. 220.

[D] Was ſucceſſor to him who carried off Sarah.] I don't ground my opinion on the great age to which we muſt ſuppoſe Abimelech had attained, in caſe he were living when Iſaac went into Gerar, for he journeyed thither after Jacob had purchas'd his brother's birth-right. We may therefore preſume that Iſaac was then fourſcore, he being ſixty, when Eſau and Jacob were born; and the former was a mighty hunter before he ſold his birth-right. On the other ſide, the Abimelech who carried off Sarah, was both a King and married, before Iſaac's birth; conſequently he muſt have been an hundred years old, at leaſt, when Iſaac went to Gerar. But what difficulty can there be in this, ſince mankind, in thoſe times, lived to upwards of 150 years (22)? It was hardly credible, that ſome perſons of abilities (23) ſhould have objected to this argument the following words of Eccleſiaſticus, Omnis potentatus vita brevis (24); as though (admitting this book to be canonical) the affirming that a King had reign'd upwards of an hundred years, contradicts the word of God. Is it not plain, that ſhould this text be taken in ſuch a ſignification, we then muſt look upon all thoſe hiſtorians as publiſhing falſities, who tell us, that ſome Monarchs reigned upwards of fifty or threeſcore years? Now the reaſon which induces us to think, that Abimelech who carried off Sarah, is not the ſame with him who made the covenant with Iſaac, is this. The latter Abimelech was credulous enough to believe, on Iſaac's bare aſſeveration, that Rebekah was no more than his ſiſter; and after he knew otherwiſe, (not by Iſaac's words but by his actions) he only gave him a gentle reprimand, but did not cry out to him; You're a chip of the old block; your father Abraham had already played me the ſame trick. Now is it probable, that had Abraham impoſed upon him, he would have been catched a ſecond time? Or ſuppoſing this, that he would not then have reproached Iſaac in the ſevereſt terms, both for his father's lies and his own likewiſe? Thoſe of Abraham, eſpecially, could not have ſlipt his memory, ſince he had ſuffered ſo much by them. St. Chryſoſtom thought this ſo probable, that he aſſerted boldly from the pulpit, that Abimelech reproached Iſaac for his father's fraud. Rex adhuc habens recentem memoriam eorum quæ tempore Patriarchæ rapta Sara tulerat, increpabat eum reumque arguens dicebat, cur hoc feciſti? Hanc deceptionem & olim ſuſtinuimus à patre tuo (25). That is, "The King having freſh in his "mind the ſufferings he had undergone in the time "of the Patriarch, after he had carried off his wife "Sarah; finding Iſaac guilty, he reproved him, ſay-"ing; Why did you do this? juſt ſo your father im-"poſed upon me." But all this has no other foundation than the licenſes of rhetoric, which are ſometimes extended very near as far as thoſe of poets and painters,

(25) Chryſoſt. Homil. 51 & 52.

Pictoribus atque poetis
Quidlibet audendi ſemper fuit æqua poteſtas (26).
In Engliſh,
"Poets and painters equally may dare;
"In bold attempts they claim an equal ſhare,
"And may do any thing. Creech.

(26) Horat. de Arte Poet. v. 9.

Two things ſeem to favour the opinion which Moreri followed. 1ſt, The King of Gerar, in Abraham's time, is called by the ſame name as in that of Iſaac; and there was one Phichol, a General, when both father and ſon were in that country. 2dly, Rebekah, though ſo great a beauty, was not carried off as Sarah had been; and this, becauſe Abimelech was in a very advanced age, and remember'd the ill conſequences of his carrying off Sarah. To theſe I anſwer, Firſt, That ſince ſome names have been common to all the Kings of a country, as that of Pharoah to thoſe of Egypt, why may not that of Abimelech have been ſo with reſpect to the Kings of Gerar? and as for Phichol, it poſſibly might have been the name of an employment or poſt; or, perhaps, this employment had devolved from a Phichol, to his ſon of the ſame name. Secondly, I anſwer, That Iſaac's Abimelech might probably not be young at that time, though he were different from the King who carried off Sarah. Now, my real opinion is, that he was a good harmleſs old man, ſince he was not captivated by Rebekah's charms, though he thought her unmarried; nor told Iſaac, that ſhe had been expos'd to any danger from him, but only from his ſubjects. And as theſe had ſo furious a paſſion for women, that the virtue of every beautiful female ſtranger, who had no husband, was put to a very great trial; methinks we cannot better account for Abimelech's continence with regard to Rebekah, than to ſuppoſe him old. The gay, libertine part of youth have this ſaying; The time will come when we ſhall live but too regularly.

(22) Abraham liv'd an hundred and ſeventy five years, and Iſaac an hundred and eighty.

(23) Pererius in Gen. xxvi. Præf. Saliani Annal. tom. 1. p. 520.

(24) The Geneva Verſion has it thus: Toute tyrannie eſt de petite durée: i. e. "All tyranny is "of ſhort dura-"ration. chap xl. ver. 11.

artifice; for Iſaac fearing he ſhould be murthered, if it were known that the beautiful Rebekah was his wife, made her paſs for his ſiſter. Abimelech diſcovering by a certain ſport [E], at which he ſpied them both, as he was looking through his window, that they were nearer related; he ſent for Iſaac, and ſaid thus to him: Behold, of a ſurety, ſhe is thy wife; and how ſaidſt thou, ſhe is my ſiſter? ... What is this thou haſt done unto us? One of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife [F], and thou ſhouldeſt have brought guiltineſs upon us (f); at the ſame time he forbid all his ſubjects, upon pain of death, to do the leaſt injury to Iſaac or Rebekah. Such a remonſtrance and injunction, muſt neceſſarily have proceeded from good nature, and therefore the moderns ſhould not have made ſo free with Abimelech's character (g). Iſaac's proſperity loſt him the King's friendſhip, and this Patriarch growing vaſtly rich, he was deſired, without the leaſt ceremony, to go from among them. He obeyed; and his affairs ſtill flouriſhing, though the Philiſtines moleſted him in ſeveral places, on occaſion of the wells his people were digging; Abimelech again deſired to enter into a covenant with Iſaac, to which he conſented [b].

(f) Gen. xxvi. 9, 10.

(g) Turſellin: in his Epitome of Hiſtory, p. 10. edit. of Franeker, anno 1692, is very much miſtaken in the following words: Iſaacus Geraras annonæ cauſa profectus, Dei numine conjugis pudicitiam ab Abimelechi regis libidine intactam ſervat. That is, "Iſaac being arriv'd in Gerar "to get corn, "preſerves, by "the aſſiſtance "of Heaven, "his wife's "chaſtity from "King Abimelech's luſt.

(b) Taken from Gen. xxvi.

[E] By a certain ſport.] Some fancy, that under the word ſporting, which is uſed in Scripture, the conjugal duty is modeſtly ſhadowed, in which Iſaac and Rebekah were by chance employed, when Abimelech ſpied them, as he happened to look accidentally through his window, Putant quidam honeſtè ſignificari eo vocabulo copulam carnalem. Sed non fit veriſimile Iſaac prudentiſſimum & ſanctiſſimum virum tam incautè rem habuiſſe cum uxore, ut id per feneſtram proſpicere, ut ſcriptura inquit, Rex poſſet Abimeleth. Credibilius igitur eſt eo vocabulo ſignificatos eſſe tales jocos & blanditias in amplexando & oſculando, quales inter conjuges agitari turpe non eſt; extra conjugium verò nefas eſt (27). That is, "Some think, by theſe "words the conjugal embrace is modeſtly ſignified: "but it is not probable that a perſon of Iſaac's great "wiſdom and piety would have dallied ſo heedleſly "with his wife, that King Abimelech could ſee them "from his window, as the Scripture tells us. It is "therefore more probable, that by this word is meant, "that they were kiſſing and toying in ſuch a manner as "married perſons are allowed to do, tho' it is a crime in "ſuch as are ſingle." Others won't allow any ſuch interpretation, but aſſert, that Iſaac was more prudent, and a greater friend to decorum, than to expoſe himſelf ſo; and that on theſe occaſions, he was never in any place, where his neighbours could overſee him. We muſt therefore, ſay they, underſtand by the word ſporting, certain paſtimes, which though not the laſt act of the play, are yet of too wanton a nature for perſons who are not man and wife to exerciſe themſelves in, how nearly ſoever they may otherwiſe be related. Theſe paſtimes muſt ſignify ſomething more than tatling, joking or laughing together; ſince a brother and ſiſter may do all this very innocently, without its being concluded that they are married, as Abimelech ſuppoſed Iſaac and Rebekah to be. This interpretation, methinks, is infinitely more natural than the former: and yet we muſt own, that conjugal fondneſs made Iſaac, on ſome occaſions, a little more unguarded than our rigid moraliſts would allow a Patriarch to be; for it cannot be denied, but that as Abimelech looked through his window, he ſpy'd him and Rebekah at a certain ſport, whence he might very juſtly conclude, they were husband and wife. It is to be particularly remembered, that they had been married forty years; Iſaac therefore was fourſcore. St. Auſtin, in his books againſt Fauſtus the Manichee, who was for ever inveighing againſt the Patriarchs, apologizes for Iſaac, in a juſt and ſolid manner (28); and to ſay the truth, thoſe are too ſevere who won't allow a married Patriarch or Prelate, to take ſome little recreation with his wife, till he has firſt made all the window-ſhutters faſt; for we ought to ſuppoſe, that perſons of this character, whenever nature prompts them (after toying with one another) to indulge the utmoſt of their wiſhes, have preſence of mind enough, in this ſlippery way, to order matters ſo as not to be overſeen by any of their neighbours. Cornelius à Lapide makes a random refutation, when he inveighs ſo much againſt the authors of the firſt explication. Judæi impuri, ſays he (29), jocum hunc intelligunt copulam conjugalem: ſed apage hos cynicos. Quis credat Iſaac publicè, & ſpectante rege, tam inverecundum, lubricum, & cynicum fuiſſe? That is, "The impure Jews, by this "ſport, underſtand the conjugal embrace. But away "with thoſe Cynicks! for who can believe that Iſaac "would have been ſo ſhameleſs, diſſolute and cynical, "publickly and in the King's ſight?" But this is not the affair; no one pretends to ſay, that Iſaac was then in the middle of the ſtreet: He was in his chamber, and had not ſhut the window cloſe; that's all; and if this action be found blame-worthy, we then muſt be obliged to condemn the Patriarch, and act the Cato towards him. It is well known, that Cato the Cenſor expell'd one Manlius (who probably would have been choſe Conſul next election) the Senate, for having given his wife a kiſs, his daughter being preſent, in the day-time (30). Some writers ſearch for ſuch allegorical myſteries (31) in Iſaac and Rebekah's ſporting, as, I am perſuaded, neither they, nor the ſacred hiſtorian ever dreamt on. I don't include this kind of errors among thoſe I am in queſt of, for that would be endleſs. It would be happy, had moſt of theſe myſtical chimeras been concealed from the world.

(27) Pererius in Gen. xxvi.

(28) Auguſt. contra Fauſt. lib. 22. cap. 46. Thiers cites part of this paſſage, in his Traité des Jeux & des Divertiſſement. p. 4.

(29) Cornel. à Lapide in Gen. xxvi. 8.

(30) Plutarch. in Cato. Majore, p. 346.

(31) See Pererius in Gen. xxvi.

[F] One of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife.] Theſe Philiſtines muſt have been furious myrmidons in love matters, ſince Abimelech their King wonders that no one had enjoyed Rebekah, ſince ſhe paſt only for Iſaac's ſiſter. This ſhews however that the people in queſtion had a veneration for marriage; but as for the maidens, they were almoſt thought the tranſient property of any man ſhould addreſs them, of which Dinah, Jacob's daughter, is a proof; for as this girl was taking the air, love was immediately whiſpered; ſhe liſtened to the flatterer, was enjoyed, and then marriage was propoſed to her (32).

(32) Gen. xxxiv.

☞ABIMELECH, the natural ſon of Gideon [A], by (a) Druma his concubine. His father being dead, he went to Shechem the place of his mother's birth. Abimelech's relations,

(a) Joſephus B. v. ch. 9. of Antiq. gives us this name, but the Scripture is ſilent as to that particular.

[A] The natural ſon of Gideon.] The plain and unaffected Mr. Matthew Henry (1) ſays, "Abimelech "was baſe ſon to Gideon; ſo we muſt call him, "and not more modiſhly, his natural ſon, he was ſo "unlike him." Our author afterwards adds this curious political reflection, "Of this meteor, this ignis "fatuus of a Prince (Abimelech) that was not a pro"tector, but plague to his country, we may ſay, as "once was ſaid of a great Tyrant, that he came in "like a fox, ruled like a lion, and died like a "dog (2)." The reader may perhaps be not diſpleaſed to hear ſome farther reflections of this witty and judicious Divine on our Abimelech. "We are here "told (Judges ix.) by what arts Abimelech got into "the ſaddle and made himſelf great.... None would "have dreamed of making ſuch a fellow as he King, "if he had not dreamed of it himſelf. And ſee how "here he wheedled them into the choice.... How "unfit was he to reign over Iſrael, becauſe unlikely "to defend them, who inſtead of reſtraining and "puniſhing idolatry thus early, made himſelf a penſioner to an idol? What ſoldiers did he enliſt? he "hired into his ſervice vain and light perſons, the "ſcum and ſcoundrels of the country, men of broken "fortunes, giddy heads and profligate lives; none "but ſuch would own him, and they were fitteſt to "ſerve his purpoſe. Like leaders, like followers.... "(3) Jotham's ſpeech which is here (Judg. ix.) re-

(1) An Expoſition of the Hiſtorical Books of the Old Teſtament, vol. 2. on Judges the 9th. London 1708. Folio.

(2) Idem ibid.

(3) Idem ibid.

relations, that he might be enabled to aſcend the throne, gave him a ſum of money, with which he hired a band of wicked [B] men, and heading them, returned to his father's houſe, and there ſlew ſeventy of Gideon's legitimate ſons, whom ſeveral wives had brought him. However Jotham, Gideon's youngeſt ſon, hid himſelf and eſcaped. Immediately after this Abimelech uſurped the ſovereign power, when he exerciſed every kind of tyranny; but a few days after, Jotham hearing that the men of Shechem were aſſembled near mount Gerizim, he went on the top of it, and thence reproached them for their ingratitude; employing for that purpoſe the parable of the trees, which being deſirous to elect themſelves a King, addreſſed the olive-tree, the fig-tree and the vine, for that purpoſe; but all theſe refuſing, they ſpoke to the bramble [C], which accepting the offer, promiſed to cover them with its ſhade. He concluded his ſpeech, which the Shechemites heard with a deep ſilence, with wiſhing, that if God did not approve their choice, a fire might then go out from them and devour Abimelech; and from Abimelech, a fire which might devour the inhabitants of Shechem, and the houſe of Millo (b). The Lord heard his prayers, for three years after the men of Shechem, being reſolved to ſubmit no longer to Abimelech's cruelties, and repenting that they had murthered Gideon's ſons, they drove him from their city, and thought to be ſecure from his reſentments, by putting themſelves under the protection of a Prince called Gaal. However, Abimelech came unawares upon Gaal, and putting his army to flight, ſlew all the inhabitants of Shechem with the ſword, and razing it, ſowed the ground on which it had ſtood with ſalt. This being done, Abimelech burnt the tower of the Shechemites, and the houſe or temple of their God Berith, in which upwards of a thouſand perſons of both ſexes were conſumed. He afterwards beſieged a city called Thebez or Thebes, when going to ſet fire to a tower of it, to which a multitude of people had fled for refuge, a woman caſt a piece of a mill-ſtone at him, which broke his ſkull [D]. Abimelech judging the wound mortal, and being unwilling that it ſhould be ſaid he had fallen by a woman, he commanded his armour-bearer to put an end to his life, who accordingly thruſt his ſword through him, when he died A. M. 2081, before Chriſt 1234. Judges ix. Joſeph. Antiq. B. V. ch. 9.

(b) Joſephus relates the Wiſh otherwiſe. B. V. ch. 9.

" corded, ſhews him to be a man of ſuch great inge" nuity and wiſdom, and really ſuch an accompliſhed
" Gentleman, that we cannot but the more lament the " fall of Gideon's ſons....

[B] Hired a band of wicked men.] A ſett of Divines in their commentary on the Scriptures (4), thus illuſtrate theſe words. " A deſperate, beggarly, and " raſcally crew, ſons of Belial, who had no fear of " God.

(4) Annotat. upon all the Books of the Old and New Teſtament, Vol. I. on Judges 9. London 1651. Fol.

[C] They ſpoke to the bramble.] Mr. Henry's reflections on the bramble are ſomething peculiar. " The bramble, ſays he, a worthleſs plant, not to be " numbered among the trees, uſeleſs and fruitleſs, nay " hurtful and vexatious, ſcratching and tearing, and " doing miſchief; it began with the curſe, and its " end is to be burned; ſuch a one was Abimelech, " and yet choſen to the government by the trees, by " all the trees.... The bramble being choſen to the " government, he takes no time to conſider whether " he ſhould accept it or no, but preſently, as if he " had been born and bred to dominion, hectors, and " aſſures them they ſhould find him as he found them. " See what great ſwelling words of vanity he ſpeaks, " ver. 15.? what promiſes he makes to his faithful " ſubjects, let them come and truſt in his ſhadow? a " goodly ſhadow to truſt in!.... more likely to be " ſcratched if they came near him.... If ye be not " faithful, let fire come out of the bramble (a very " unlikely thing to ſpit fire) and devour the cedars of " Lebanon, more likely to catch fire and be itſelf de- " voured..... The Sechemites that ſet Abimelech " up, were the firſt that deſerted him, and endeavour- " ed to kick him off." Mr. Henry afterwards goes on thus. " The Sechemites did eat and drink and curſed " Abimelech; not only ſaid all the ill they could of " him in their table-talk, and the ſongs of their " drunkards, but wiſhed all the ill they could of " him.... They drank healths to his confuſion, and " with as loud huzzas as ever they had drank them " to his proſperity..... Well, Gaal's intereſt in " Shechem is ſoon at an end, and he that had talked " of removing Abimelech, is himſelf removed, nor " do we ever hear of him any more; Exit Gaal (5)." How farcical is all this!

(5) Henry's Expoſition of the Hiſtorical Books, &c. ubi ſupra.

[D] Caſt a piece of a mill-ſtone which broke his ſkull.] " Three circumſtances, ſays Mr. Matthew " Henry (6), are obſervable in the death of Abime- " lech. 1ſt, That he was ſlain with a ſtone, as he " had ſlain his brethren, all upon one ſtone. 2dly, " That he had his skull broke; vengeance aimed at " that guilty head which had worne the uſurped " crown. 3dly, That the ſtone was caſt upon him " by a woman, verſ. 53. See firſt his fooliſh pride " in laying ſo much to heart this little circumſtance " of his diſgrace! (his being killed by a woman.) " There was no care taken about his precious ſoul, no " prayer to God for his mercy, but very ſollicitous " he is to patch up his ſhatter'd credit, when there is " no patching his ſhatter'd ſkull.

(6) Idem ibid.

☞ABIRAM, a ſeditious Levite, rebell'd in concert with Korah and Dathan, againſt Moſes and Aaron. Theſe wanted to ſhare in the government of the People; but God puniſh'd them for their pride and murmuring: for Moſes bidding them come before the altar with their cenſers, in order to know whether God would make choice of them; the earth open'd on a ſudden under their feet, and ſwallow'd them, their houſes, and all their goods [A]; and at the ſame time fire came from heaven, and conſum'd two hundred and fifty of their followers. This happen'd in the Wilderneſs, at the ſtation of Kadeſh-Barnea, Anno Mundi 2546, before Chriſt 1489. Num. xvi. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 2.

[A] The earth opened.... and ſwallowed them, &c.] Joſephus deſcribes this terrible cataſtrophe as follows. " The earth trembled horribly on a ſudden, " and the ſurface of it being covered with water, " like as the ſea toſt about by the winds, all the people " were terrified; and a dreadful ſound iſſuing from " that part whither the rebellious were going, the " ground ſunk in, and ſwallowed them all that in- " ſtant. The prophane being thus devoured, the " earth immediately cloſed in ſuch a manner, that not " the leaſt mark of the chaſm appeared (1).

(1) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 2.

☞ ABISARES [A], King of that part of India beyond the river Hydaſpes [B]. When Alexander the Great was carrying on his expedition into India, Abiſares had determin'd to join his forces with thoſe of Porus [C] his ally, in order to oppoſe Alexander; but Porus engaging the latter ſingly, and being defeated, Abiſares ſent his brother, and other [D] Embaſſadors, to the Grecian Monarch, with money (a) and forty elephants, who, in Abiſares's name, offer'd his perſon and dominions to Alexander. The Conqueror commanded Abiſares to come immediately to him, threatning, in caſe of a refuſal, to ſet out againſt him with a great army. Abiſares ſeems to have ſent another deputation, conſiſting of Arſaces his brother, and other friends, to Alexander. Theſe declar'd, that Abiſares was ill in bed, and therefore could not wait upon him; which being confirm'd by the Embaſſadors whom Alexander had ſent to the Indian King, the Grecian was ſatisfy'd with the excuſe, and not only left him in the quiet poſſeſſion of his dominions, but enlarg'd them (b). Quintus Curtius relates a noble anſwer of this Monarch to Alexander [E]. Abiſares afterwards dy'd of ſickneſs. The expedition abovemention'd happen'd about the ſecond year of the 113th Olympiad, and three hundred and twenty ſeven years before Chriſt.

(a) So Arrian tells us, B. v. p. 115. but p. 122, he mentions only 30 elephants, ſo that perhaps this was another embaſſy. ΑΡΡΙΑΝΟΥ &c. Henric. Steph. Anno 1575. Folio.

(b) Poſtero die legati Abiſaræ adiere regem, omnia ditioni ejus; ita ut mandatum erat, permittebant; fœdaque invicem fide remittuntur ad regem. Quint. Curt lib. 8. cap. 13. Delphis &c. Edit. Snakenburg 1724, 4°. That is, "The "next day the "Embaſſadors of "Abiſares came "to Alexander, "and gave up to "him the domi-"nions of their "Sovereign; and "after they had "mutually "plighted their "faith, they "were ſent back.

[A] Abiſares.] He is called by Diodorus Siculus, Embiſarus; by Arrian and Quintus Curtius, Abiſares; and by Strabo, Abiſarus.

[B] King of part of India beyond the Hydaſpes.] "In the mountains of this country, ſays Strabo (1), "is a prodigious multitude (κερκοπιθήκων) of apes "or monkies with tails; ſo that when the Macedo-"nians (the forces of Alexander the Great) ſaw many "of theſe on open hills, ſtanding in battle array (for "theſe animals as well as elephants have ſome under-"ſtanding) they took them for an army, and marched "quick towards them, as tho' they had been ſo many "enemies. However, Taxillus who was then with A-"lexander undeceived his ſoldiers. Thoſe apes are ta-"ken two ways: Firſt, as they imitate whatever they "ſee, and climb up trees; whenever the hunters ſpy "them ſitting on branches, they bring a diſh full of "water, and laying it in their ſight, rub their eyes "with this water. The men then lay glue in the "diſh inſtead of water, and hide themſelves at ſome "diſtance, when the apes coming down from the "trees, ſmear themſelves with glue, which faſtning "their eye-lids together, they by that means are ta-"ken alive. This is one way. The other is, men "put on little kind of ſacks made in the ſhape of a "rug or mantle, and leaving others that are hairy "within and daubed with glue, they go away, when "the apes cloathing themſelves with theſe mantles, "are by that means eaſily taken.... "Though ſome of the antients are not over famous for their veracity in things of this kind, yet the pranks which ſuch monkies as are brought over into Europe play, and the whimſical account which travellers of great credit give of them, makes the above relation of Strabo not ſo improbable. Among the pleaſant ſtories which are told us of theſe animals, father Labat has the following. "An ape "in the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, whoſe dam was "ſhot, by which means he was taken, had been "brought up by father Cabaſſon, The little creature "was ſo fond of his venerable maſter, that he would "never leave him, ſo that whenever the father went "to church, he was obliged to confine him cloſe, he "having no chain. However, the ape happened to "eſcape one day, and hiding himſelf over the pulpit, "did not appear till his maſter aſcended it. He then "got upon the top of it, and obſerving the preach-"er's geſtures, he inſtantly mimicked them (height-"ening the whole with poſtures and grimaces) ſo "that all the congregation fell a laughing. Father "Cabaſſon not being able to account for this inde-"cency, firſt gave them a gentle reprimand, but "finding them laugh louder, he was ſeized with a "holy rage, and began to cenſure them very ſeverely, "for paying ſo little regard to the word of God. "The ape obſerving the unuſual violent motions of "his maſter, made much ſtronger grimaces, which "made all the people laugh much louder. At laſt, "ſome perſon deſired the father to look over his "head. The preacher no ſooner ſaw the ape's mi-"mickry, but he himſelf fell a laughing alſo; and as "there was no poſſibility of taking him, he choſe "rather to diſcontinue his diſcourſe, as he was not "in a humour to continue, nor his congregation to "hear it.

(1) ΣΤΡΑΒΩΝΟΣ &c. Amſtelædami apud Joannem Walters 1707. fol. lib. 15. pag. 1023.
(2) Nouveau Voyage aux Iles de l'Amerique. Tom. II. p. 184. a la Haye, Chez P. Goſſe, &c. 1724. 4°.

[C] Abiſares had determined to join his forces with thoſe of King Porus.] According to Diodorus Siculus (3), "Alexander having ſtruck a terror into Abi-"ſares, who was come too late to join his forces with "thoſe of Porus, the conqueror forced Abiſares to "ſubmit to his obedience, and to comply with what-"ever he ſhould enjoin.

(3) Book xvii. cap. 20.

[D] But Porus ... being defeated ... ſent his brother and other embaſſadors.] According to Quintus Curtius (4), Abiſares ſent Embaſſadors to Alexander before the latter engaged Porus; Abiſares, qui prius quam cum Poro dimicaretur, legatos ad Alexandrum miſerat.

(4) Lib. 9. cap. 1. Edit. ut ſupra.

[E] Quintus Curtius relates a noble anſwer of this Monarch to Alexander.] Rurſus alios (legatos) * miſit, pollicentes omnia facturum quæ imperaſſet, modo nè cogeretur corpus ſuum dedere; neque enim aut ſine regio imperio victurum: aut regnaturum eſſe captivum. Cui Alexander nuntiari juſſit; ſi graveretur ad ſe venire, ipſum ad eum eſſe venturum (5). That is, "Abi-"ſares again ſent Embaſſadors to Alexander, promiſ-"ing that he would obey whatever he ſhould com-"mand, provided he ſhould not be obliged to ſurren-"der up his perſon; for that he could not live with-"out reigning, and could not reign if he were in "captivity. Alexander anſwered, That in caſe Abi-"ſares did not care to come, he would go to him." Alexander indeed had very juſt reaſon to invade the dominions of this Monarch, who had never done him the leaſt injury. But what was the pretence? To civilize mankind: as laudable a motive, as that religious one of murthering people for the good of their ſouls. What havock did not the Spaniards make among the inoffenſive Americans!

* Abiſarea.

(5) Idem ibid

☞ ABISHAG, a young Shunamite virgin of great beauty, was choſen to attend upon and warm, or, as the Scripture ſays, to heat David [A] in his old age. She ſlept

[A] Abiſhag .... was choſen to .... heat David.] Joſephus relates this incident thus. "This King "being oppreſſed with the weight of years, his body "was ſo benum'd, that though ever ſo many bed-"clothes were laid upon him he could not get any "warmth. Upon which the phyſicians being con-"ſulted, they were unanimouſly of opinion, that the "moſt beautiful virgin in all the country ſhould be "ſought for, and put into the King's bed; that ſhe "ſhould cheriſh him, and thereby drive away his "coldneſs. Now there was found in the city one "Abiſhag, the moſt lovely woman of the age, who "being put to bed to the King, ſhe only warmed "him (1)." The elegant father Berruyer deſcribes this as follows. "The King (David) though he had "been ſo robuſt in his youth, ſeemed to decay daily, "and it was believed he could not live much longer. "His afflictions, his labours, his fatigues, his ſick-"neſſes, his perpetual wars, had exhauſted him "ſo much, that entering now his ſeventieth year, "his ſlept by the King's ſide, who did not attempt to violate her chaſtity (a). Afterwards, Adonijah, one of David's ſons, deſir'd Bathſheba the mother of Solomon, to intercede with her ſon, that he might be permitted to marry Abiſhag, ſhe being ſtill a virgin. But Solomon, knowing Adonijah's intent in making this requeſt, was only to get an opportunity of uſurping the crown, put him to death, A. M. 3021, before Chriſt 1014 years. 1 Kings, i. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 8. & 9.

(1) Joſeph. Antiq. B. 7. c. 11.

(a) Joſeph. B. 8. c. 1. of his Antiq. ſays, that David was too old to attempt any thing injurious to her modeſty.

" his natural heat ſeemed upon the point of being ex-
" tinguiſhed; and though the utmoſt endeavours were
" uſed, it was impoſſible to adminiſter any warmth to " him. However, his mind was as vigorous as " ever, and he ſtill governed with ſo much wiſdom
" and authority, as made his life precious. His " phyſicians, in order to prolong it, hit upon an " expedient which ſucceeded, at leaſt for ſome time.
" We muſt, ſaid they to him, Sir, ſeek for the King
" our Lord, a beautiful, well-ſhap'd virgin, who en" joys a ſtrong fluſh of health. Such an one ſhall be " employed in ſerving the King, ſhe ſhall lie with " him, ſhe ſhall warm him; and the vigour of her
" youth ſhall contribute to reſtore his decayed facul-
" ties. The King conſented to the propoſal, firſt ob-
" ſerving the ſeveral precautions which his prudence
" and religion ſuggeſted. All Iſrael was ſought thro'
" in order to find out a proper perſon, and the choice
" fell on a Shunamite, Abiſhag by name, a young,
" beautiful, virtuous woman. He made her his wife,
" and ſhe was with him both night and day; but " though he had married her, they always lived to" gether in a ſtate of continence. Thus aſſiſted, the " infirm Monarch continued to live, but was not ca" pable to act in perſon, nor ever went out of the " palace (2)." Mr. Matt. Henry cenſures the phyſicians for preſcribing as they did. " They ordered
" him (David) ſays this author, a young bed-fellow.
" A fooliſh project it was, to preſcribe nuptials to one " that ſhould have been preparing for his funeral;
" but they knew what would gratify their own cor-
" ruptions, and perhaps were too willing to gratify
" his, under colour of conſulting his health; his Pro" phets ſhould have been conſulted as well as his Phy-" ſicians in an affair of this nature. However, this " might be excuſed them, when even good men ig-
" norantly allowed themſelves in the having ſo many " wives.

(2) Hiſt. du Peuple de Dieu. Tom. 4. p. 508. Paris &c. 1728. 4°.

☞ ABISHAI, ſon of Zeruiah and brother to Joab, is ranked among the celebrated warriors who flouriſh'd in the reign of King David. The Scripture acquaints us, that Abiſhai himſelf ſlew three hundred men with his ſpear. He always continu'd firm to David's intereſt, and would have puniſh'd Shimei for his injurious treatment of that Monarch, and have kill'd Saul [A]. He was preſent in the combat which was fought againſt the adherents of Iſhboſheth, and ſignaliz'd himſelf greatly in it. Abiſhai afterwards kill'd eighteen thouſand Idumeans in battle, and oblig'd them to become tributary. In a battle fought againſt the Philiſtines, he ſlew a giant call'd Iſhbi-benob, deſcended from Rapha, the iron of whoſe ſpear weigh'd three hundred ſhekels, and who was girded with a new ſword, with which he intended to kill King David. 1 Sam. xxvi. 2 Sam. xxiii. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 7. c. 1, 7 & 10.

[A] And would have killed Saul.] This incident is thus deſcribed by the author of the Hiſtory of the People of God (1). " The couragious David, hearing
" that Saul was in the camp, and being ſuddenly
" inſpired by God, he took his reſolution, and com" manding two of his braveſt ſoldiers to follow him,
" there being ſtill light enough to perceive objects,
" he advanced ſecretly by covered ways to Saul's
" camp. He there viewed the royal tent at leiſure,
" where the King was ſleeping, with Abner ſon of " Ner by him. He ſaw the ſoldiers lying round
" the tent, oppreſſed with wearineſs, and diſſolv-
" ved in ſleep. He took notice, that from the place
" where he ſtood to the center of the camp, there
" was not any advanced guard, nor watchful centinel.
" Whilſt he was attentively examining theſe things,
" the day fell, and there remained only light enough
" to ſee one's way. Well! ſays David gaily to his
" two officers Ahimelech and Abiſhai; which of you
" has a mind to follow me to Saul's camp? Both " would have done it with equal ardour, though they " had thereby expoſed themſelves to the greateſt dan-
" gers, but Ahimelech yielded the glory to Abiſhai,
" David's nephew, who inſtantly anſwered; I, if you
" pleaſe, will have the honour of accompanying you."
The following deſcription is a fine one. " David attend" ed only by Abiſhai, pierced, in the night-time, into
" the midſt of the enemy's camp: He went as far as " Saul's tent, and ſtealing ſoftly into it, he gaz'd at" tentively on the King who was buried in a deep
" ſleep, his lance fixed on the ground lying near his " head, and Abner at a little diſtance from him, in a
" ſound ſleep. The reſt of the ſoldiers were alſo
" ſleeping, and not a ſoul was awake, ſo little did
" they diſtruſt David or his band. This, ſaid Abiſhai,
" is a very propitious opportunity; and I am of opi" nion, that you will hardly let it ſlip: The Lord
" himſelf delivers up Saul into your hands, will you
" therefore ſuffer him to eſcape, and won't you, at
" laſt, conclude that you abuſe imprudently the mer-
" cies of heaven, if you ſtill liſten to your delicacies
" and ſcruples? Permit me only to act, and I anſwer
" that every thing ſhall go right. With one thruſt
" I'll drive the lance through his body, and I'll rivet
" him to the earth: be perſuaded, I ſhall have no
" occaſion to give a ſecond thruſt, and he won't have " time to call for help. What's that you ſay, Abi-
" ſhai? cries David (trembling when he conſidered
" the danger his enemy was in) God keep you from " attempting any ſuch action. What man ſhall dare
" to ſtretch forth his hand on the Lord's anointed,
" and not be a ſacrilegious wretch? As the Lord liveth,
" continued he, if the Lord himſelf does not ſtrike
" Saul, if he does not die a natural death or in battle,
" he ſhall not die; at leaſt his blood ſhall not be ſhed
" by me; and I again call the Lord to witneſs, that, in " contempt of the ſacred unction, I have not attempt" ed any thing againſt the life of my Sovereign. Let " us dare an action that may be more generous and " more worthy of us: Do you only take away the " lance that ſtands at the King's head, and the veſſel
" of water which was left by him; leave the reſt to " me, and you ſhall ſee the work of God.... Abiſhai
" could ſcarce be prevailed with to give his conſent,
" and ſtill continued to exclaim againſt David's im-
" prudence. However, the hero put an end to the " diſpute, by taking away the veſſel and the lance,
" and immediately bid his nephew follow him. They " then returned back, unperceived by any of the " officers or ſoldiers who never waked, ſo that no
" one had the leaſt ſuſpicion of what had been done
" in the King's tent. Every one was faſt aſleep, and
" this kind of lethargy in three thouſand ſoldiers ap" peared ſo ſingular and uncommon to Abiſhai, that
" he truly judged the finger of the Lord was there.

(1) Tom. 4. p. 218, &c.

ABLANCOURT. NICHOLAS PERROT, SIEUR D') See PERROT.

☞ ABLAVIUS (a) or ABLABIUS, whom ſome declare, but without foundation, to have been an Egyptian [A], was Præfectus Prætorio under Conſtantine the Great [B],

(a) Fleury calls him Ablavius or Elaphius. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. 3. p. 37. Bruſſels 1723.

[A] Whom ſome declare, but without foundation, to have been an Egyptian.] " Eunapius is the only writer who Great [B], from A. D. 326 to 337 [C]. Ablavius was in great credit at that Emperor's court, and got rid of Sopater his competitor. He poſſeſs'd ſome employments (b) in Africa ſo early as the year 314, in caſe Conſtantine's letter, by which the African Biſhops were ordered to come and aſſiſt at the council of Arles, was addreſs'd to Ablavius; but in the manuſcript of it we find the name Ælaphius (c), by which it is more probable that Ælianus, at that time Proconſul of Africa, was meant; than Ablavius, who was Conſul in 331, and had a magnificent houſe in Conſtantinople, which afterwards was the palace of Placidia, daughter to Theodoſius the Great. Conſtantine on his death-bed declared him one of Conſtance's council, but the latter diſpoſſeſs'd him immediately of his employment, upon pretence that he was forced to it by the ſoldiery. Ablavius being thus turned out, withdrew to a country ſeat of his in Bithynia, but was not long quiet there; for Conſtance diſpatched ſome affairs of the army to Ablavius who gave him a letter, by which he ſeemed to appoint him his ſucceſſor in the Empire; at leaſt Ablavius imagining this to be the purport of it, enquired for the inſignia of the Empire, which he ſuppoſed was ſent him, when immediately ſome other officers ruſhed in, and killed him [D].

(b) He was deputy or lieutenant of Africa. Ibid. Hiſtoire de Conſtantin, p. 148.

(c) His name was Ablavius, according to Tillemont. Fleury.

" who treats pretty much at large of Ablavius, and " all that we can gather from him is, that he was " not born in Egypt; for he gives us a long and ſilly " ſtory of his birth in a city where an Egyptian, who " had left his country, was then in an inn (1).

(1) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, Vol. 9. p. 608. 1709. 12°.

[B] Ablavius .... was Præfectus Prætorio under Conſtantine the Great.] Father Varenne (2) gives the following account of Ablavius. " He was, ſays this " author, ſo obſcurely born, that his country is ſtill " unknown. He was raiſed to the dignity of Grand " Maſter of the Empire, but whether for his merit, " or meerly by good fortune, I cannot ſay. He was " a Chriſtian if it is to him, as no one doubts, that " Conſtantine wrote concerning the council of Arles " with reſpect to the Donatiſts. Nevertheleſs he is " accuſed of avarice and cruelty; and the too great " humanity of the Emperor is reproached with be- " ing the cauſe of theſe crimes, as well as of Ablavi- " us's riſe; but was not this owing to the jealouſy " of courtiers who envied his fortune? What is cer- " tain is, that Eunapius and Zozimus, both Heathens, " are his only accuſers. Theſe exclaim againſt him " as having been the occaſion of Sopater's death, " which they aſcribe to Ablavius's jealouſy at that " Philoſopher's having ſuch great credit with Con- " ſtantine. But is it ſurprizing that after they had " ſo often ſlandered the reputation of their So- " vereign, they ſhould defame that of his favourite! " The exalted pitch of grandeur to which Ablavius " was riſen, and above all the religion he profeſs'd, " to which he chiefly owed his good fortune; theſe " were his real crimes in the eyes of thoſe whom envy " and the illuſion of Paganiſm prejudiced againſt his " memory. He indeed loſt his life under Conſtance; " but what can be inferred from thence? only this, " that the too great favour which that Emperor in- " dulged him, and not that of Conſtantine the Great, " ſwelled him with a pride which proved fatal; and " as he was an ambitious man, made him at laſt fall " a victim to the public hatred.

(2) Idem, p. 332.

[C] From 326 to 337.] Tillemont (3) gives this account of his employments, " He poſſeſs'd ſome " poſt in Africa in 314, he likewiſe enjoyed an em- " ployment in Italy the year after, and was Conſul " in 331. It appears from the Code, that he was " Præfectus Prætorio in 326, and the following years " till 337. He was not even diſpoſſeſs'd of it till " 337 by Conſtance.

(3) Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 9. p. 347. Bruxelles 1709, 12°.

[D] Some other officers ruſhed in and killed him.] Eunapius (4) gives us the following account of his death. " Conſtance ſent ſeveral officers of the army " from Conſtantinople to him, the firſt of whom " were commanded to preſent him letters in his " name, with the ſame reſpect and ceremony as was " uſed to Emperors. Ablavius being firmly per- " ſuaded that he ſhould be raiſed to the Empire, re- " ceived the letters with an air of ſuch haughtineſs " and diſdain as diſguſted every one; and asked with " no leſs pride for the inſignia of the Empire, which " he ſuppoſed were ſent him. The officers anſwer- " ed, that letters only had been given them, but that " ſome other officers, who were at the door, were " entruſted with the other part of the commiſſion. " Ablavius thinking all was ſafe, gave orders for their " being admitted; but theſe coming in, inſtead of " cloathing him with purple, fell upon him and tore " him to pieces.

(4) Cap. 4. p. 40.

☞ ABLE or ABEL (Thomas) was admitted Batchelor of Arts at Oxford, July 4, 1513 (a), and took his degree of Maſter of Arts, June 27, 1516 (b): to what degrees of Divinity he was advanc'd is unknown. He was afterwards (c) chaplain to Queen Katharine, conſort of King Henry VIII, and is ſaid by a certain author (d) to be, Vir longe doctiſſimus, qui reginæ aliquando in muſicarum tactu & linguis operam ſuam navaret. That is, " One of the moſt learned men, who uſed ſometimes to teach the Queen " muſic and the languages." In 1529 and 30, he ſhew'd himſelf a zealous advocate againſt the divorce [A] of the Queen, and a paſſionate enemy againſt the unlawful proceedings

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. Vol. 1. p. 19.

(b) Id. ibid. p. 24.

(c) Heylin's Hiſtor. of the Reform.

(d) Tho. Bouchier, Hiſtor. Eccleſ. de Martyr. Fratr. ord. min. Divi Franciſci. Ingolſ. 1583. 12°. p. 2. fol. 42. b.

[A] A zealous advocate againſt the divorce.] He was made Chaplain to the Queen; and we don't queſtion but Able was perſuaded in his conſcience of the unlawfulneſs of the divorce. But whether he was in the right, and whether the circumſtances the King was then in, did not juſtify the diſſolving of his marriage, is another queſtion, not eaſily to be ſolved. It ſeems indeed that a divorce is not allowed to Chriſtians in any caſe, but that of adultery. If this was a moral precept, grounded on the nature of things, there could be no diſpute; but that it is not ſo, appears by the permiſſion God gave to the Jews, of diſmiſſing their wives and marrying again (1); for no diſpenſation can be granted for breaking a moral duty. Since therefore the law againſt divorce is but a poſitive law, it muſt, like all other poſitive laws, give way to moral duties, when there is a conflict between them. The queſtion then will be, whether or not King Henry was in ſuch circumſtances, that he could not but break ſome moral duty without being divorced from his Queen: The lawfulneſs of his divorce has been maintained by ſeveral eminent perſons, whoſe opinions are ſo fully related in Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, and in ſeveral other books, that we need not inſiſt upon it. But ſince we have an occaſion here to ſpeak of divorce, the reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find a curious paſſage from a very ingenious author. " Divorce, ſays he, permitted " among the Heathens, was forbid the Chriſtians: " This alteration, which at firſt ſeemed of very little " moment, has been ſince attended with terrible " conſequences: it did not only deſtroy all the ſweets " of wedlock, but did alſo affect the very end of it: " what was intended to make the tie ſtronger, did only " looſen it; and the hearts, inſtead of being cloſer " united, were thereby ſeparated for ever. No re- " gard was had for the diſtaſte which married people " often have againſt one another, nor for their ill " humours, or inſociable tempers: love, the moſt un- " controlable and inconſtant paſſion, was to be un-proceedings of the King. At that time he wrote Tract. de non dissolvendo Henrici & Catharinæ matrimonio. That is, "A Treatise to shew that the marriage of Henry and Ka- "tharine ought not to be dissolv'd." In the year 1534 he was attainted of misprision, (by the name of Tho. Able) for taking part and being active in the affair of Elisabeth Barton (e) the holy maid of Kent. Afterwards denying the King's supremacy over the Church [B], he was hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd in Smithfield, July 30, 1540, having before, as it is thought, written other things, but they are lost. While in prison, he was kept so closely, that on May 27, 32 Hen. VIII, the keeper of Newgate was sent to the Marshalsea, for giving liberty to Dr. Powell and Dr. Able his prisoners, to go under bail (f). I find another Tho. Able, who has written against the Gangranæ of Tho. Edwards; but he being a hundred years later than the former, (for he liv'd in 1646) he cannot be the same person. Wood, Athenæ Oxonienses, Vol. 1. p. 54.

(1) Deut. xxiv. 1, &c.

(e) See the article of that Holy Maid.

(f) See Stow's Annals, in an. 1534.

" alterably settled; and like the antient tyrants, they " caused men to be fasten'd alive to dead bodies; thus " two persons, often ill matched, and weary of one an- " other, were joined irretrievably and for ever. Nothing " did formerly more effectually contribute to the " mutual affection of man and wife, than the liberty " they had to leave one another when they pleased; " this made them patiently undergo all the domestick " toils and uneasinesses. It is not so with Christians; " their present sorrows make them desperate when they " consider they will never cease; hence mutual aver- " sion, domestick broils, and constant scorn. Posterity " suffers by all this; scarce is the honey-moon past, " but the most essential part of marriage is neglected, " and man and wife live twenty or thirty years in a " domestick divorce, which is as pernicious, if not " more, than a publick separation. Of two persons " joined in wedlock, if one, either by an ill consti- " tution or by old age be not proper for the design " of nature, the other is in a manner buried with " him, and made equally useless for the propagation " of mankind. It is not easy to say what induced " Christians to abolish divorce. Among all the nati- " ons of the world marriage is a contract, that admits " of all possible conditions, and those only should be " disallowed that are inconsistent with the end of it: " Christians don't consider it in this view; but then " they are at a loss to say what it is. According to " them it does not consist in sensual pleasures, so far " from it, one would think, they endeavour to banish " them from the marriage state as much as they can; " but it is a type, a figure, and something mysterious, " which I don't understand (2)." The author of these observations pretends, that the abolishing divorce is one of the reasons, why Europe is much less peopled at present, than it was formerly. But that ingenious Gentleman, though he pleads for allowing married people the liberty of divorcing, would not, I am sure, admit of all the reasons, for which some Jews pretend a man may send away his wife. Rabbi Hillel maintained, that if a wife let the meat be too much roasted, it was a sufficient reason for a husband to divorce her. Akiba went farther still; he said, that if a man found a woman more beautiful, or of a more easy temper than his wife, he might leave this to take the former (3).

(2) Lettres Persanes, tom. 2. let. 102. p. 169, &c.

(3) Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, t. 3. liv. 5. c. 20.

[B] Denying the King's supremacy over the Church.] It is no wonder that a man, educated in all the prejudices of the Church of Rome, should deny the King's supremacy in Church-affairs; and if he follow'd the dictates of his conscience in so doing, his fate was very hard, and to be pity'd: but if he did it out of a spirit of faction and party, as might be suspected from his being very active in the matter of the holy Maid of Kent, he fully deserv'd the punishment he suffer'd. For notwithstanding the opinion of those crafty Clergymen, who would have the Church to be independent from the State, all learned politicians maintain, that the Civil Power must be supreme over all affairs ecclesiastical as well as civil. Nulla in re, says Grotius (4), magis eluceſcit vis ſummi imperii, quam quod in ejus arbitrio eſt, quænam religio publicè exerceatur, idque præcipuum inter majeſtatis jura ponant omnes, qui politica ſcripſerunt. That is, "The "power of the supreme magistrate appears in nothing "more than this, that they have the authority to "appoint what religion shall be publickly professed; "and this, all Civilians agree, is one of the principal "prerogatives of the Sovereign." If you ask, why the religion of England was the Romish under Queen Mary, and the Protestant under Queen Elisabeth; the answer is, because this was the will and pleasure of these Queens, or of the Queens and Parliament (5). It appears, that when the Emperors turn'd Christians, they order'd and regulated all Church-affairs, Ἀφ' ὧν Χριστιανίζειν ἤρξαντο (οἱ Βασιλεῖς) τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας πράγματα ὥρισαν (6): which is but reasonable; for, as Optatus says (7), the State is not in the Church, but the Church in the State: Non enim Reſpublica eſt in Eccleſia, ſed Eccleſia in Republica. Accordingly our Articles declare, that the prerogative which we ſee to have been given always to godly Princes in Holy Scripture by God himſelf, that is, that they ſhould rule all eſtates and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be eccleſiaſtical or civil, belong to the King's Majeſty (8). The most material objection that can be made against the supremacy of the Sovereign in matters of Religion and Church-affairs, is, that the state of Religion will be uncertain, and depend upon the will and pleasure of those that govern. This is true indeed, and relates not only to Religion, but to all state-affairs in general. But must the Sovereign be depriv'd of his right, because he can make a wrong use of it? And is not the same danger to be fear'd, tho' the power of ordering religious affairs be in other hands than those of the Civil Magistrate? Has not the Religion of the Jews been alter'd several times, and restor'd by their Kings? And for all that, has the right of these Kings been ever call'd in question (9)? The Sovereign must then certainly have the power of establishing what Religion he thinks best; but then it seems Reason, as well as Christianity teaches us also, that every private person should be allow'd to follow the dictates of his conscience; and that nonconformity to an established Religion, should never deprive them of any natural or civil right; except we will maintain with Hobbes, that the State being a Person by itself, the Religion and Worship of the State must be uniform; because whatever a man does according to his own private reason, cannot be the action, nor consequently the worship of the civil society. For whatever is done by the civil society is understood to be done by him or those that govern, and therefore by the consent of all the subjects together, that is, uniformity. Totis (10) civitatibus, quarum unaquæque eſt perſona, ratio naturalis imperat Cultus publici uniformitatem; nam quæ actiones fiunt a ſingulis, ſecundum privatas rationes, eæ civitatis actiones non ſunt, neque ergo civitatis cultus; quod autem fit a civitate, fieri intelligitur ejus, vel eorum qui ſummum habent imperium, ideoque conſenſu civium ſimul omnium, id eſt uniformiter. According to this system, private persons would not be answerable for whatever they do, to conform to the establish'd Religion, and to obey the Civil Magistrate in matters of public worship.

(4) De imperio ſummarum poteſtatum circa ſacra. cap. 8. §. 2. p. 120.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Socr. H. E. lib. 5. in Proem.

(7) Optatus Milevetanus, lib. 3. ap. Grotium, De Imp. Sum. Pot. cap. 1. §. 7. p. 8.

(8) Artic. of Rel. art. 57.

(9) All this is borrow'd from Grotius, De Imp. Sum. Poteſt. cap. 8. §. 2. but the paſſage is too long to be here inſerted.

(10) Hobbes, De Cive, cap. 15. §. 15. verſus finem, p. 275.

ABNER, the son of Ner, father-in-law to Saul, and General of his armies, serv'd him on all occasions with the greatest fidelity and courage. After the death of that Prince, Abner set Ishbosheth, King Saul's son, on the throne. This King reign'd peaceably two years over Israel; but at the end of that time, a war breaking out between Israel and the tribe of Judah, who had elected David King, Abner march'd againſt that Prince with the flower of his troops; but was defeated. Abner's valour and prudence were Iſhboſheth's chief reſſource; but the former being diſguſted [A], went over to David, whoſe wife Michal he caus'd to be reſtor'd to him. After this, Abner aſſembled the Chiefs of the army [B] and the Elders of Iſrael, to whom he repreſented, that ſince God had caus'd David to be anointed King, it would be in vain to reſiſt his will; and by that means diſpos'd them to declare for the latter: and Abner going immediately to David, was receiv'd by him with the utmoſt teſtimonies of affection. Joab, fearing that his merit would be eclipſed by that of Abner [C], who by that means would diſpoſſeſs him of the command of the army, follow'd him as he was returning to aſſemble the people of Iſrael, in order that they might elect David King; and Joab drawing Abner aſide, upon pretence of ſpeaking privately to him, he kill'd him treacherouſly, the year of the world 2987, and before Chriſt 1048. David was extremely griev'd when news was brought him of this horrid action, and proteſted aloud before the Almighty, that he had no hand in it [D]: and vented imprecations againſt Joab and his houſe [E]. He then order'd that Abner ſhould be publickly interr'd, which was perform'd in a very ſolemn manner, David himſelf following the corpſe. This King afterwards erected to his memory in Hebron a ſplendid monument, on which an epitaph was engrav'd, compos'd by David in his praiſe. Some authors even think that the 139th Pſalm, O Lord, thou haſt ſearch'd me and known me, &c. was written by David on this occaſion, as a teſtimony before God and men, that the barbarous deed abovemention'd had not been perpetrated by his command. 2 Sam. iii. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 7. ch. 1.

[A] Abner being diſguſted.] The occaſion of this quarrel with Iſhboſheth was this: "Iſhboſheth ſuppos'd Abner had debauch'd one of his father Saul's "concubines; Wherefore, ſays he, haſt thou gone in "unto my father's concubine? (2 Sam. iii. 7.) that is, "haſt lain with and defiled her; with which fault "he charges him, either becauſe it was ſo reported "to him by others, or, out of his own groundleſs "ſuſpicion and jealouſy, ſeeing it appeareth not whether it was ſo or no; Abner, in his anſwer, neither confeſſing or denying it. But however it "were, true or falſe, it ſeemeth that Iſhboſheth's "diſcontent did ariſe, not only from this, that he had "diſhonour'd his father, who was his King and Sovereign, in lying with his concubine, being his "ſubject; but chiefly by obſerving into what great "ſtrength he was grown, being General of the army, and in great favour with the people, he ſuſpected that out of his ambition he aſpir'd to the "kingdom, and made way thereto, by making uſe "of the King's concubine, who had two ſons, which "might give ſome colour to his claim, when Iſhboſheth was taken out of the way (1)." Some perhaps would imagine, that Iſhboſheth himſelf had a paſſion for this concubine, and therefore could not bear to have Abner for a rival. 'Tis well known that moſt princes in all ages have aſſumed liberties, particularly in their amours, above the reſt of mankind: they fancy that their birth gives them a right to indulge every wiſh, which is no wonder when we conſider their education.

(1) Annotat. on the books of the Old and New Teſtament, Vol. 1. on 2 Sam. iii. 7. London 1651. folio.

[B] Abner aſſembled the Chiefs of the army, &c.] It is plain that Abner was no bad politician. Being diſguſted at Iſhboſheth's treatment, he reſolves to abandon him, and go over to his enemy. Abner very poſſibly was glad of this opportunity, when he found that Iſhboſheth was not likely to proſper, and that David's affairs flouriſhed more and more every day. This ſhews that Abner had the true ſpirit of a courtier, who is always for veering about to the fortunate ſide. To ingratiate himſelf the more with David, Abner gets this King's wife Michal reſtored to him, judiciouſly conſidering that ſhe might very much influence that Monarch in his favour; not to mention that his obliging David in ſuch a requeſt, muſt naturally pave the way to his future advancement. It is indeed obſerved by ſome, that Abner did no more than his duty in abandoning Iſhboſheth, knowing that the crown was not his but David's; but then the manner in which Abner left him does not ſeem to argue in his favour. Iſhboſheth ſhould not have put the affront upon him as he did, but then Abner ought not to have carried his reſentments ſo far. But true courtiers are fond of any handle, and where a proper one does not preſent itſelf, are glad to make one themſelves. His only hopes now lay in a revolution, and therefore he was reſolved to uſe all his endeavours to bring it about. For this purpoſe he firſt ſounds the tribes, and finding all things ſafe from that quarter, he gets a private (in all probability) interview with David, who, as was very natural, gave him the kindeſt reception; and Abner finding every thing ſafe alſo on that ſide, reſolved, now matters were ripe for a revolt, to throw off the mask and declare himſelf, but was prevented by Joab.

[C] Joab fearing that his merit would be eclipſed by that of Abner.] Here we have another courtier. Joab concluding that Abner's military glory would throw a ſhade over his, was reſolved to take him off. Ambitious men ſtop at nothing, but will wade thro' ſeas of blood to gratify their darling paſſions, but Joab ſatisfies his in the baſeſt and moſt ungenerous manner. Had he been a truly brave man he would have engaged his future rival openly and more generouſly; but his ſoul was incapable of any thing heroic, and therefore he reſolves to aſſaſſinate him in the moſt cowardly manner. Abner's politicks failed him on this occaſion, but Joab in all probability employed the moſt ſoothing, inſidious words, (which are but too apt to take men of the greateſt ſenſe off their guard) and under the ſpecious veil of complacency and friendſhip murthers him in cold blood.

[D] David proteſted . . . . . that he had no hand in it.] David himſelf ſeems to have acted the politician on this occaſion. As he was King, he ought undoubtedly to have brought Joab immediately to juſtice; but he was not firmly ſettled on the throne, and Joab was powerful; for which reaſon David did not dare to proceed againſt him. Mr. Henry ſays on this occaſion, "Who would be fond of power, when a man "may have the name of it, and muſt be accountable for "it, and yet be hamper'd in the uſe of it (2)?"

(2) An Hiſtor. Expoſit. of the Books of the Old Teſtament, Vol. 2. on 2 Sam. iii. London 1708. folio.

[E] And vented imprecations againſt Joab and his houſe.] I and my kingdom, ſaid David, are guiltleſs before the Lord for ever, from the blood of Abner the ſon of Ner. Let it reſt on the head of Joab, and on all his father's houſe, and let there not fail from the houſe of Joab one that hath an iſſue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a ſtaff, or that falleth on the ſword, or that lacketh bread (3). Surely David was not after God's own heart when he made theſe imprecations. But he was a mere man; and tho' ſo good a man, he yet was obnoxious to frailty. Humanum eſt errare.

(3) 2 Sam. iii. 28, 29.

ABRABANEL (a) (ISAAC) a famous Rabbi, was born in Liſbon [A], anno 1437, of (a) He is alſo call'd Abrabaniel, Abarbanel, Abarbinel, Abravanel, Auravanel, Abarbenel.

[A] Born in Lisbon.] His anceſtors were of Caſtile, E majoribus Caſtellam Hiſpaniæ, ex parentibus Olyſſiponem Luſitaniæ agnovit patriam *, as the Leipſic Journal informs us (1). Nicholas Antonio relates, that Abrabanel's family lived for ſeveral Centuries in Seville (2); a circumſtance he had from Bartolocci

(1) Acta Lipſienſ. Menſ. Nov. 1686. p. 529.

(2) (3) N. Ant. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 627. & tom. 2. p. 686.

* That is, "He "declar'd Caſtile "to be the coun- "try of his an- "ceſtors, and "Lisbon that of "his parents.

of a family which boaſted its deſcent from King David [B]. He advanced himſelf very conſiderably in the court of Alphonſo the Vth King of Portugal, where he was honoured with the higheſt employments, and enjoyed them till that Prince's death, but met with a ſtrange reverſe of fortune under the new King. Abrabanel was forty five years of age [C], when John the ſecond ſucceeded his father Alphonſo. Then all thoſe who had had any ſhare in the adminiſtration under the preceding Monarch, were turned out; and if our Rabbi may be believed, their death was ſecretly reſolved, upon pretence that they deſigned to deliver up Portugal to the King of Spain. Abrabanel knew nothing of all this, when, in compliance with the orders ſent him to attend his Majeſty, he was haſting to Liſbon; but hearing by the way, what was plotting againſt his life, he fled immediately into the King of Caſtile's dominions. Upon the return of the ſoldiers who were commanded to bring him dead or alive, all his poſſeſſions were confiſcated; on which occaſion he loſt not only all his books, but the beginning of A Commentary on the book of Deuteronomy, which he very much regretted. Some Chriſtian writers [D] declare, that the cauſe of his diſgrace was more juſtly founded on his miſconduct than he pretends it to have been; and think the ſame of the other troubles in which he was involved [E]: but be this as it will, upon his ſettling in Caſtile, he began to teach and write. In 1484, he drew up his Commentary on the books of Joſhua, Judges, and Samuel; and being afterwards ſent for to the court of Ferdinand and Iſabella, employments were given him there, which he enjoyed eight years, that is, till 1492, when the Jews were drove out of the Catholic King's dominions. He endeavoured by his wailings and intreaties [F] to divert this dreadful ſtorm, but to no purpoſe; ſo that himſelf, his wife and children, were forced to quit the kingdom with the reſt of the Jews. He then withdrew to Naples, and there wrote his Commentary on the books of the Kings in 1493. Being a courtier, the knowledge he had of the courts of Portugal and Arragon gave Abrabanel an opportunity of inſinuating himſelf into the favour of Ferdinand King of Naples, and afterwards into that of Alphonſo. He followed the fortune of the latter, when Charles the VIIIth King of France drove him from Naples, for he went with him into Sicily [G]. Alphonſo being dead, he retired to the iſland tolocci (3); and he quotes Rabbi Solomon ben Virga, who ſays much to the ſame purpoſe in his Hiſtory of the Jews (4), tranſlated into Latin by Gentius and cited hereunder.

(4) Schevetb Jebuda.

[B] Which boaſted its deſcent from King David.] Abrabanel ſays ſomewhere (5), that when the firſt temple was deſtroyed, two families which ſprung from David went into Spain, the one whereof ſettled in Lucena, and the other in Seville, and there left poſterity. He elſewhere (6) gives an account of that migration. Rabbi Solomon ben Virga introduces one Thomas, relating the migration abovementioned at length to Alphonſo King of Spain; and telling him, that the Abrabanel family boaſted its deſcent from the Kings of Judah. Alphonſo on the other ſide, won't believe a word he ſays, and raiſes unanſwerable difficulties againſt theſe genealogies (7). The Jews, to remove them, ſuppoſe that Abrabanel loſt his genealogical books, in the hurry and confuſion of his ſeveral removals (8). According to Huetius (9), Manaſſeh ben Iſrael aſſerts in his Conciliator, that theſe two families which ſprung from David, withdrew into Spain, after the deſtruction of the ſecond temple; but this Rabbi has a particular view in publiſhing this ridiculous ſtory, his wife being of the Abrabanel family (10). By the way, it is not eaſy to find who this Alphonſo is, that diſcourſed ſo long with Thomas in Solomon ben Virga's book. Some give him the title of King of Portugal (11); and as theſe declare that the Abrabanel, whoſe hiſtory Thomas relates, is our Rabbi; 'tis not to be doubted but they ſuppoſe that Monarch to be Alphonſo the fifth. According to Nicholas Antonio, a very different Abrabanel is there ſpoken of; and this Alphonſo is the laſt King of Caſtile of that name (12). So far Nicholas may be right; but he is wrong to ſuppoſe almoſt two hundred years, between this King and our Rabbi; the latter being born in 1437, and the former dying in 1350, aged thirty eight years.

(5) (6) Comment. in Zachar. cap. 11. fol. 293. & in 2 Reg. cap. 25. fol. 305. apud Acta Lipſ. Nov. 1686. p. 528.

(7) In Schevetb Jebuda, f. 11 & ſeq. apud Acta Lipſ. Nov. 1686. p. 528.

(8) Acta Lipſ. Nov. 1686. p. 529.

(9) Huetii Demonſt. Evangel. p. 708. Edit. Lipſ. an. 1694. in 4°.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Acta Lipſ. 1686. p. 529.

(12) Nichol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 627.

[C] Forty five years of age.] Nicholas Antonio inſerted in his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, the particulars which father Bartolocci told him concerning Iſaac Abrabanel, whereby he corrected ſome miſtakes that had already been printed in the article of this Rabbi; but methinks he does not expreſs himſelf accurately, in ſaying, Juvenis adhuc, ſed benè doctus in Caſtellæ regnum tranſiit, cùm Joanni II. Portugalliæ Regi, parum eſſet gratus (13). i. e. "Being then young, "but a good ſcholar, he withdrew into the king- "dom of Caſtile, when he found himſelf not very "acceptable to John II. of Portugal." Few perſons at the age there hinted, have made a conſiderable progreſs in learning, but it is otherwiſe with men of five and forty. Conſequently the author of the Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, ſuppoſed our Rabbi much younger when he fled to Caſtile, and therefore was miſtaken.

(13) Idem, tom. 2. p. 686.

[D] Some Chriſtian writers &c.] According to theſe Abrabanel juſtly merited the treatment he met with, and would have been uſed with greater ſeverity, after his miſchievous diſpoſition was known, had not King John, out of his great clemency, contented himſelf with baniſhing him. They relate farther, that remorſe of conſcience prompted this Rabbi to leave Portugal, and fly in the night with all imaginable ſpeed, into Caſtile (14).

[E] Think the ſame of the troubles in which he was involved.] They ſay, that by negotiating bills of exchange (which buſineſs he followed in Caſtile) he got acceſs to the court of Ferdinand and Iſabella; that he amaſs'd prodigious ſums, by artfully practiſing the ſeveral frauds of the Jewiſh people; and that he alſo tyranniz'd over the poor, whilſt his uſury made every thing its prey; that he had the vanity to aſpire to the moſt illuſtrious titles, and ſuch as belong'd only to the nobleſt houſes of Spain; and that being a ſworn enemy to the Chriſtian religion, he contributed more than any other to the ſtorm which afterwards oppreſs'd himſelf, and the reſt of the Jews (15).

(14) Ex Actis Lipſienſ. Nov. 1686. p. 529. See alſo Father Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 874.

(15) Act. Lipſ. Nov. 1686. p. 530. Bartolocci Biblioth. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 874.

[F] By his wailings and entreaties.] He tells us in one of his books (16), what he did on this occaſion. Solomon ben Virga relates the particulars of it in his hiſtory of the Jews (17), with the dreadful calamities which befel the three hundred thouſand Jews who were forced to leave the Catholic King's dominions in one day.

(16) Comment. in libros Regum, init. apud Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 627.

(17) Apud Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 627.

[G] He went with him into Sicily.] Nicholas Antonio correcting his article of Abrabanel, from the hints which father Bartolocci gave him in converſation, ſays, that our Rabbi followed King Ferdinand into Sicily, when the French had dethroned that Monarch, and that Abrabanel withdrew to * Corfou (18) after his death. Ferdinand is certainly miſtaken for Alphonſo, Abrabanel having attended the latter (19), and not Ferdinand, as father Bartolocci obſerves (20). Abrabanel continued in Meſſina till Alphonſo's death, which happened in the beginning of the year 1495, and then retired to Corfou (21), where he began his Commentary on Eſaiah, anno 1495. If he did not go into that iſland till after Ferdinand's death, we may ſafely aſſert, he could not poſſibly be here in 1495; ſo that there wants an Appendix to correct that of Nicholas Antonio.

* The Corcyra of the ancients.

(18) Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 2. p. 689.

(19) The ſecond of that name. He ſucceeded Ferdinand the Baſtard; and Ferdinand the ſecond reign'd after him.

(20) Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 875.

(21) Idem. ibid.

iſland of Corfou, and there began his Commentary on Eſaiah in 1495, when he had the ſatisfaction to recover, but how I know not, what he had written on the book of Deuteronomy. The next year he returned to Italy, and went to Monopoli in Apulia (b), where purſuing his ſtudies very cloſe, he wrote ſeveral books. Abrabanel compleated his Commentary on Deuteronomy, and drew up his Sevach Peſach (c), and his Nachalath Avoth (d) in 1496. The year following, he compoſed his Majene Hajeſchua (e), and in 1498, his Maſchmia Jeſchua (f), and his Commentary on Iſaiah. Some time after he went to Venice, to ſettle the diſputes between the Venetians and Portugueze, concerning the Spice-trade; and diſcovered ſo much prudence and capacity on this occaſion, that he gain'd the favour and eſteem of thoſe powers. He compoſed his Commentary on Jeremiah in Venice, anno 1504; and, according to ſome writers, his Commentary on Ezekiel and the twelve minor Prophets. In 1506, he wrote a Commentary on Exodus, and died at Venice anno 1508 [H], aged threeſcore and eleven years, leaving three ſons, Judah, Joſeph and Samuel [I]. The eldeſt was a phyſician and a great poet, and compoſed ſeveral poetical pieces in honour of his father. It is ſaid that Samuel turned Chriſtian in Ferrara, and was called Alphonſo, after the Duke's name. Abrabanel compoſed ſeveral other books [K], the dates of which we cannot ſettle, and ſome are ſtill in manuſcript. Several noble Venetians and the Chiefs among the Jews, ſolemniz'd his funeral with conſiderable pomp. His body was interr'd at Padua, in a burying place without the city; and a little after, Rabbi Judah Menz, who had been principal of the univerſity, was buried there; but in the ſiege of that city, in 1509, ſuch havock was made in the places adjacent to it, that there are no footſteps of this burying-ground now remaining. Abrabanel poſſeſſed ſuch great talents, that he is conſidered in the ſame light with the celebrated Maimonides, and by ſome in a greater. The Jews aſſert, that he has entirely deſtroyed all the arguments and objections of the Chriſtians; but the latter, juſtly deſpiſing whatever he has writ on our controverſies

(b) He liv'd there about ſeven years. Bartolocci Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 875.

(c) That is, The ſacrifice of the paſſover.

(d) i. e. The inheritance of the fathers.

(e) That is, The fountain of ſalvation.

(f) i. e. The preacher of ſalvation.

[H] Anno 1508.] Father Bartolocci rectified the error of Don Nicholas Antonio, who had before declared in print, that our Rabbi was Hebrew Profeſſor in Padua about the year 1510. This plainly proves Moreri's negligence; ſince, though he had the Bibliotheca Hiſpanica by him, he yet would not take the pains to conſult the appendixes, which not only form a very conſiderable part of the work, but illuſtrate and correct ſeveral paſſages in it. Hence he inſerted the miſtake relating to Abrabanel's being profeſſor at Padua, not knowing that Don Nicholas Antonio had himſelf corrected it at the end of the book, and apologized for it, by ſaying he had followed Buxtorf. Venetias inde profectus memoratur, ex qua urbe in Germaniam aut in profeſſionem Patavinam Hebraicæ linguæ, quod Buxtorfium & alios ſequuti nos literis in Bibliothecâ noſtrâ mandavimus potuit conferre ſe. Conſtat autem Venetiis eum ſeptuaginta (22) annos natum ſuperioris ſæculi anno octavo diem ſuum obiiſſe. Quocum non bene convenit quod circa annum decimum profeſſorem, ut ibidem diximus Patavinum egerit (23). That is, "It is related that he went from thence to "Venice, from which city, as we had declared, after "Buxtorf and others, in our Bibliotheque, he might "go to Germany or to his profeſſorſhip in Padua. "It is certain he died at Venice aged ſeventy years "(71) in 1508, and conſequently could not be a "profeſſor in Padua anno 1510, as we had obſerved "there. Theſe are Nicholas Antonio's words. He does not abſolutely deny that our Jew was profeſſor at Padua, but only ſays he had not fixed the date of it exactly, Moreri therefore ſhould not declare, that Abrabanel taught the Hebrew tongue at Padua in 1510.

(22) It ſhould be 71.

(23) Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 2. p. 686.

[I] Leaving three ſons behind him, Judah, Joſeph, and Samuel.] One would at firſt ſight conclude he had left four, as ſuppoſing Nicholas Antonio's aſſertion to be true, viz. that Leo, who wrote the Dialogues of Love, was Abrabanel's ſon. But we muſt obſerve, that the author of theſe Dialogues might be the ſame with Judah, Abrabanel's eldeſt ſon. This Judah was commonly called Meſſer Leone (25). His book on love is very well known, and was tranſlated into French by Denis Sauvage and Pontus de Tiard. The author is generally quoted by the name Leo Hebræus; and in the Spaniſh tranſlation printed at Venice anno 1568, in 4°, he is called Meſtre Leon Abarbanel Medico Hebreo.

(24) N. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 2. p. 630.

(25) Bartolocci Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 880.

Judah Abrabanel left his father, when the French conquered the kingdom of Naples, and withdrew to Genoa to practiſe phyſick in that city (26). Samuel Abrabanel was living in the pontificate of Julius the IIId, as appears by the petition he preſented to Cardinal Sirlet protector of the neophytes or new converts (27). He went from Naples in 1540, and carried thence the value of two hundred thouſand crowns (28). His father dedicated to him his Commentary in Pirke Avoth, written anno 1496 (29).

(26) Ibid. p. 881.

(27) Idem. ibid. 28.

(28) Id. ibid. p. 688. ex R. Davide Ganzo.

(29) Idem. ibid. p. 881.

[K] Abrabanel wrote ſeveral other books.] The two following are mentioned in the Leipſic Journal (30) viz. Commentaries on Geneſis, Leviticus and Numbers; Raſeh Amana (31); Sepher Jeſchuoth Meſchicho, a work on the traditions concerning the Meſſiah; Zedek Olammim, relating to the rewards and puniſhments in the life to come; Sepher Jemoth Olam, which is a hiſtory from Adam; Maamar Machaſe Schaddai, viz. a treatiſe on prophecy, and the viſion of Ezekiel, againſt Rabbi Maimonides; Sepher Atereth Sekenim; Mipbaloth Elohim (32); Sepher Schamaim Chadaſchim; Labakath Nebbiim. Theophilus Spizelius tells us, that John Buxtorf junior, ſhewed him a great number of diſſertations taken from Abrabanel's works, which the latter had tranſlated into Latin (33); but they muſt be like thoſe of the ſame Rabbi, which the abovementioned Buxtorf tranſlated and publiſhed with the book Coſri. He likewiſe ſhewed him other verſions which he had made of ſome works of that Rabbi. The Commentary on Haggai was tranſlated into Latin by Adam Scherzerus, and inſerted in the Trifolium Orientale, publiſhed at Leipſic in 1663. In the ſame city was publiſhed anno 1686, in folio, the Commentary on Joſhua, Judges and Samuel. See the account which is given of that edition in the Leipſic Journal, whence this article is extracted. In the ſame year, viz. 1686, was printed at Leyden, the Commentary on Hoſea, with a preface on the twelve minor Prophets, the whole tranſlated into French, and illuſtrated with Notes, by Francis ab Huſen. Mr. de Veil a converted Jew, publiſhed at London in 1683, Abrabanel's Preface to Leviticus. See the Leipſic Journal for January 1684. Nicholas Antonio gives the titles of ſome other works of this Rabbi, and ſometimes mentions from Plantavit's Bibliotheque Rabinique, the time when, and place where they were printed. Moreri ſhould not have declared, that Abrabanel wrote a Commentary on the Talmud, he having written only that part of the Talmud, entitled, Pirke Avoth. Nicholas Antonio, to whom only Moreri had recourſe, ſets this in ſo clear a light, that he ought not to have made ſuch a miſtake. Father Simon who relates many curious particulars concerning Abrabanel's works, obſerves, that the book which this Rabbi wrote, entitled, Nahalat Avoth, Confeſſion of the Fathers, is a Commentary on the Pirke Avoth; and that both were printed at Venice in quarto, anno 1545; that this author wrote a very learned Preface to his work, entitled, Nahalat Avoth, in which he explains the ſucceſſion or hiſtory of tradition (a very confuſed ſubject) (34) among the Jews.

(30) Acta Lipſ. Nov. 1686. p. 531.

(31) That is, Caput Fidei. It was tranſlated into Latin by Gulielmus Vorſtius, and with his Notes printed in Amſterdam, anno 1638. Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 629.

(32) i. e. Works of God. He there treats in a learned manner of the creation of the world; and enquires whence Moſes borrow'd the ſeveral incidents which are related in Geneſis. Simon, Crit. on the Old Teſtament, p. 537.

(33) Spizelii Specimen Bibl. Univerſal.

(34) Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament. p. 637.

with the Jews, ſet a high value on his other expoſitions, and declare him a penetrating genius, clear, learned and ſincere. He does not idolize the opinions of his ſuperiors, but cenſures their miſtakes, and literary theſts with pretty great freedom. Abrabanel's great fault was his being too ſtrongly affected with the perſecutions of the Jews, under which he himſelf had been a very great ſufferer. The remembrance of this, made the Chriſtians ſo odious to him, that he inveighed againſt them in the bitterest terms. In moſt of his books we meet with ſome reflections, which prove his indignation, and his violent thirſt after revenge; and let the ſubject be what it would on which he was writing, he never failed to force in, by one means or other, the diſtreſſed condition of the Jews. He thereby hoped to reinvigorate the expiring ſynagogue (g), and it is my opinion this was a great eaſe to him; and that had he not breathed his reſentments upon paper, he probably had burſt; but he would not have been the only man who had found a remedy in this. We know ſome who wanted it very much, although acquainted with the precepts of the goſpel, which Abrabanel was not. I don't find that he was profeſſor in Padua [L], or travelled into the Eaſt (Levant) [M]; Moreri has been groſly miſtaken in theſe particulars, among which his journey into Germany may be included [N]. Abrabanel was indefatigable in his ſtudies, in which he would ſpend whole nights, and would faſt many hours together. He had a great facility in writing; and though he diſcovered an implacable hatred to the Chriſtians in his compoſitions [O]; he yet treated them perſonally with civility and mildneſs, and would be very facetious and agreeable in their converſation (b).

(g) Ex Actis eruditor. Leipſ. Menſ. Novem. 1686. p. 528 & ſeq.

(b) Bartol. Bibl. Rabb. tom. 2. p. 875.

[L] I don't find he had a profeſſorſhip in Padua.] See the remark [H] above. The learned Gentlemen who obliged the publick (35) with an hiſtorical epitome of Abrabanel's life, and who traced it almoſt from year to year, from the time of his leaving Spain to his death, would not have omitted ſo conſiderable a circumſtance: I therefore conclude, that ſince theſe writers are ſilent on this head, the author himſelf did not mention it. Now ſince Abrabanel related ſo many particulars, which are not ſo much to his honour as a profeſſorſhip in Padua would have been, we can ſcarce ſuppoſe he would have forgot to ſpeak of this employment, had he really poſſeſs'd it. And had others aſſerted it with any foundation, I believe it would not have eſcaped the knowledge of the authors of the Leipſic Journal, nor have been omitted by them; conſequently this matter is a little dubious, to ſay no worſe of it; not to mention father Bartolocci, who has given an exact ſeries of whatever relates to this Rabbi, takes no notice of any ſuch.

(35) In the Acta Leipſienſ. Nov. 1686. p. 528 & ſeq.

[M] ... Or that he travelled into the Eaſt.] I look upon this as a miſtake, for the reaſon abovementioned, viz. the ſilence of thoſe writers; but had Abrabanel really taken ſuch a journey, Moreri would yet have told a great untruth; for firſt, he ſuppoſes Abrabanel taught the Hebrew tongue at Padua in 1510; and ſecondly, that the deſire he had to vent publickly his hatred againſt the Chriſtians, made him travel into the Eaſt, in order to reſide among thoſe of his own religion, and that he then writ the great number of volumes which are extant. We have ſhewn that he died in 1508, whence we may conclude, that what is aſſerted above is mere fiction.

[N] .... Moreri has been groſly miſtaken in theſe particulars, among which his journey into Germany may be included.] I did not dare to pronounce this a falſity, ſo long as I was perſuaded Don Nicholas Antonio had cited Buxtorf faithfully; for this being ſuppoſed, we muſt preſume that Abrabanel mentions his journey into Germany, in his Commentary on Pirke Avoth. Profugus ergo in Germaniam venit, quod ipſe ait in Commentariis ad librum Talmudicum Pirke Avoth ... Buxtorfio teſte in tractatu de Abbreviaturis Hebræorum, pag. 100, (36). I therefore went ſo far only in this ſuppoſition, as to declare, that it was at leaſt certain Abrabanel did not go into Germany, immediately after he was baniſhed out of Spain; ſince he then ſet out for Naples, where he arrived ſome time after. I conſequently found Moreri again in an error, he ſaying, that Abarbinel was one of thoſe who were ſent into baniſhment. He withdrew into Germany and afterwards into Italy; and what made me the more ſurprized at this miſtake, was, my knowing that Don Antonio had corrected it, after father Bartolocci had informed him better; but having conſulted the above cited book, I found that the author does not in any manner ſay, that Abrabanel mentions his journey into Germany. Theſe are Buxtorf's words: Hic titulus (Morenu, id eſt, Doctor noſter) novus eſt, infra ducentos annos natus, in Germaniâ, inde in Italiam traductus, quòd valdè miratus fuit Don Iſaac Abarbinel ex Hiſpania in has terras veniens, ut ipſemet ſcribit in commentario Pirke Abhoth. That is, "This title (Morenu or "our Doctor) is of late date, being firſt uſed in Ger- "many within theſe two hundred years, and from "thence carried into Italy, at which Don Iſaac Abar- "banel wondered very much, upon his coming into "this country from Spain, as he himſelf declares in "his commentary Pirke Avoth (37)." I now no longer doubt, but that Don Antonio miſunderſtood Buxtorf; and he has not retracted this error in the place where he relates the particulars which father Bartolocci told him concerning Abrabanel. I am not to omit, that this father proves undeniably, that there was no ſuch journey into Germany, which, ſays he (38), ſome writers mention, citing Buxtorf for that purpoſe. I don't doubt but what is here ſaid will ſtop the currency of this falſe citation.

(36) Nic. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 628.

(37) Buxtorf. de Abbreviat. Hebræor. p. 115. edit. ſecundæ.

(38) Bartolocc. Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 688.

[O] An implacable hatred to the Chriſtians in his compoſitions.] His commentaries on the Scriptures, particularly thoſe on the Prophets, are filled with ſo much rancour againſt Chriſt, the Church, the Pope, the Cardinals, the whole Clergy, and all Chriſtians in general, but more particularly againſt the Roman Catholicks, that father Bartolocci would have had the Jews prohibited the peruſal of them (39); and indeed he tells us, they are not allowed to read, or keep in their houſes Abrabanel's commentaries on the latter Prophets. In his etiam pluribus in locis canino dente Chriſtianam religionem mordet & lacerat, ideoque meritò illorum lectio & retentio Judæis interdicta eſt, nec eos apud ſe retinere audent, publicè ſaltem & palam, propter metum Chriſtianorum (40).

(39) Bartolocci, Biblioth. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 876, 879.

(40) Idem. ibid. p. 878.

☞ABRADATES King of Suſa in the Perſian Empire. His wife Panthea [A] being taken priſoner by Cyrus the Great in a battle fought againſt the Aſſyrians, was deſigned by thoſe who took her for the embraces of Cyrus; but this Monarch, tho' ſhe was exquiſitely beautiful, did not once offer to violate her chaſtity, but on the contrary

[A] His wife Panthea.] She was taken priſoner by Cyrus, and the deſcription which (1) Xenophon gives of her beauty and diſtreſs is very fine. "Cyrus, "ſays Xenophon, commanded Araſpes to keep the "woman (Panthea) and the fineſt tent for him: now "this woman was wife to Abradates King of Suſa, "whoſe husband was not then in the field..... "Cyrus therefore commanded Araſpes to ſecure her, "till he ſhould take her to himſelf. Araſpes upon "receiving this order, ſaid to Cyrus, have you ſeen "this woman whom you command me to ſecure? I "have not, replied Cyrus. But I ſaw her, ſaid "Araſpes, contrary, gave her the moſt honourable treatment. This charmed Panthea ſo much, that ſhe prevailed with her huſband to come over with his troops to Cyrus. Abradates aſking his conſort, what return he ſhould make Cyrus for his great humanity and kindneſs to her, ſhe replied, only endeavour to behave as generouſly towards him, as he has done towards you. Abradates after this being admitted into Cyrus's preſence, offered his ſervice to that Monarch, who accepted of it. Panthea then equipped her huſband for the fight [B], exhorted him to behave courageouſly [C], and took a moſt tender farewel [D]. Abradates upon this went and joined Cyrus, and coming to an engagement, he fought with the utmoſt intrepidity, but preſſing the Egyptian ſquadrons very cloſe, Abradates was thrown out of his chariot, and being afterwards deſerted by his friends, he periſhed in the field. Panthea his wife found his corps, and laying it into her own ſedan, ſhe brought it to the river Pactolus. Her eunuchs and ſlaves dug a grave for the deceaſed Abradates upon a little hillock, whilſt ſhe herſelf was ſitting on the ground, and with his head in her lap, dreſſed him with all the ornaments ſhe had about her. Cyrus hearing this ſad news, came to the place where Panthea was ſitting by the corps, and the mournful ſpectacle drew tears from his eyes. Afterwards ſpeaking in the moſt tender terms, he took hold of Abradates's hand, which came off into his, it having been cut through with an Egyptian ſpear. This greatly increaſed the grief of Cyrus; but as for Panthea ſhe was inconſolable, and taking the hand from Cyrus, kiſſed it, and fixed it on again as well as ſhe could, crying out; The reſt, O Cyrus! is as this. Panthea continued her tender wailings (E], and Cyrus having wept ſilently for ſome time, endeavoured to conſole her by declaring that due honours ſhould be paid him at his funeral, and that ſhe her ſelf ſhould be conveyed whitherſoever ſhe pleaſed. Panthea deſired Cyrus not to give himſelf any pain about the latter, ſaying, that he ſhould certainly know whom ſhe intended to go to. The King then leaving her, ſhe commanded her eunuchs to withdraw, in order that ſhe might give way to her tears, and reſolving to die, bid the only attendant ſhe would ſuffer to ſtay with her, to cover her, after ſhe was dead, and her huſband with the ſame cloth. The woman begged her not to think of laying violent hands on her ſelf; but Panthea was inexorable, and taking out a Perſian ſcymitar ſhe had provided for that purpoſe, plung'd it into her ſide, and reclining her head on her huſband's breaſt, expired; upon which her three eunuchs ſtabbed themſelves alſo. Cyrus hearing the mournful news came running " Araſpes, when I choſe her for you; and indeed " we did not know her, upon our firſt going into " her tent, ſhe being ſeated on the ground, with all " her female attendants round her, and cloathed in " the very ſame kind of habit as they were. But " after we had ſurveyed them all, in order to diſcover " which was the miſtreſs, ſhe immediately ſeem'd to " excel all the reſt, though ſhe was ſitting veil'd, " and her eyes fixed on the ground. When we bid " them riſe, all her waiting women roſe up with her, " but then it was evident how much ſhe excelled " them all, in ſtature, in ſtrength, in grace and " beauty, although meanly attired. Then her tears " were ſeen to trickle down, ſome on her clothes, " and ſome down to her feet. Upon this the eldeſt " of our company ſaid to her; Woman be not de- " jected, for though we have heard that you have an " excellent husband, we yet have now deſigned you " another, who is not inferior to Abradates, in per- " ſon, underſtanding or power; and this is Cyrus, " whom we declare, (if any man living) is worthy of " admiration, and he ſhall poſſeſs you. The moment " Panthea heard this, ſhe tore her upper garment, " and began to bewail her ſelf, and her attendants " made no leſs moan. And then it was that moſt of " her face, her neck and her hands were ſeen; and " know, Cyrus, ſays Araſpes, that my ſelf and all " who ſaw her were of opinion, that there never " was known or born of mortals ſo beautiful a wo- " man in all Aſia." Araſpes was very urgent with Cyrus to go and ſee her, which he refuſed to do, fearing her charms would have ſo ſtrong an influence over him, as to retard the progreſs of his glory.

(1) Ξενοφῶντος Κύρου Παιδείας. Thom. Hutchinſon. lib. 5. p. 314 to 317 incl. 4°. Oxonii 1727.

[B] Panthea then equipp'd her husband for the fight.] " As Abradates was going to put on a linen " breaſt-plate, after the faſhion of his country, Panthea " brought him a golden helmet, gauntlets, a ſcarlet " coat that reached down to his feet, the extremities " of it hanging in folds, and a purple coloured creſt. " Theſe ſhe cauſed to be made privately, according " to the ſize and proportion of his other armour. " Abradates was very much affected at the ſight, and " hereupon ſaid to Panthea, did you, my dear wife, " cut up your perſonal ornaments, in order to make " them into armour for me? Panthea replied, not " thoſe ornaments which I value moſt; for if you " appear as lovely in the eyes of others as you do in " mine, you will be my greateſt ornament. Saying " this, ſhe cloathed him with his armour, the tears " ſtealing down her cheeks, though ſhe did her utmoſt " to ſuppreſs them (2).

(2) Id. ibid. lib. 6. p. 463, 464.

[C] Exhorted him to behave courageouſly.] " Abradates being cloathed in his armour, Panthea, " after deſiring all who were preſent to withdraw, " my Abradates, ſays ſhe, if ever any woman valued " her husband more than her own ſoul, I believe you " will own I am one of them. What need I deſcend " to particulars? For I believe the actions I have " done for you, will find more credit with you, than " the words I now ſpeak. But though I love you " thus paſſionately, as you are ſenſible I do, I yet " ſwear by your love and mine, that I had rather be " buried with you in caſe you behave with magnani- " mity, than to lead a life of infamy with you; ſo " much regard have I both to your own honour and " mine, &c. (3)." What a noble ſtruggle is here " between love and honour?

(3) Ibid. lib. 6. p. 464, 465.

[D] Panthea took a moſt tender farewel.] We have ſeen in the Remark C. how ſtrongly ſhe exhorted her husband to fight couragiouſly; after which Xenophon tells us, " Abradates being wonderfully delighted " with theſe words, touching his head, and turning " up his eyes to heaven, cried, Grant, O Jupiter! " that I may ſhew my ſelf a worthy husband to " Panthea, and a worthy friend to Cyrus, who has " treated us thus honourably. Saying theſe words, " he went up into his chariot, ... and when the " coachman had ſhut the ſeat, Panthea having no " other way to embrace him, ſhe kiſs'd the ſeat. " But now the chariot drove on, and ſhe followed " it privately, till Abradates looking back and ſeeing " her, cry'd, Be cheer'd, my Panthea, and go your " ways (4).

(4) Ibid. lib. 6, p. 466.

[E] Panthea continued her tender wailings.] " Alas! " cried ſhe to Cyrus, I am ſenſible that I am the chief " cauſe of this cataſtrophe, and yet, Cyrus, it is per- " haps as much owing to you. For I was ſilly enough " to exhort him ſtrenuouſly to perform ſome action, " by which he might prove how much he was your " friend; and I know but too well, that he did not " value what might befal him, provided he could " but gratify you by ſome ſignal ſervice. So now he " is dead, without leaving the leaſt ſtain of diſhonour " behind him, whilſt I who excited him to theſe " attempts, ſit here alive (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 506, 507.

running in a great fright in order to ſuccour her, but it was too late. This Monarch afterwards erected a very ſtately Mauſolæum to their memory, on that ſpot which was the ſcene of this ſad cataſtrophe. This happened the firſt year of the 68th Olympiad, 548 before Chriſt. Xenophon Cyropæd. lib. 5, 6 and 7.

(a) Herbelot, p. 92. Khondemir. Hoſein Waëz.

☞ ABRAHAH, was called likewiſe (a) Abû Yacſûm, ſurnam'd Al Aſhram, (which ſignifies in Arabic, one who is cut or ſlaſht in the face) and Dhû 'l Fil, i. e. the maſter of the elephant. He was Governor or Prince of Yaman, i. e. Arabia Felix, under the Neguſhi or Najâſhi, Emperor of the Abyſſins in the time of Abd al Motalleb, grandfather of Mahomet. In the 105th chapter of the Koran, entitled Sûrat alfil, i. e. the chapter of the elephant, mention is made of the puniſhment of this Prince, who having many elephants in his army, preſum'd to lay ſiege to the city of Mecca [A]; the hiſtory of which expedition, as related by the beſt interpreters of that chapter, was thus: Abrahah, who commanded in Sanaa the capital of Yaman, obſerving that at a certain ſeaſon of the year, great numbers of the Arabians took a journey to the province of al Hejaz, which joins to Arabia Deſerta, to viſit the Cába, or Square Houſe, in the temple at Mecca; he imagin'd it neceſſary to make his ſubjects leave a devotion which he eſteem'd ſuperſtitious, by ſubſtituting another houſe and place of worſhip, which ſhould attract both the curioſity and devotion of the people. In purſuance of this thought, he erected in the city Sanaa a temple, the ſtructure and ornaments of which ſurpaſſed by far that at Mecca. This temple was a magnificent Chriſtian Church, (for the Abyſſins then, as at this time, profeſſed the Chriſtian Religion, which they had extended throughout all that neighbourhood in Arabia.) But notwithſtanding this, Abrahah could not ſucceed in his deſign, without employing force, becauſe that ſuch Arabians as had not embraced the Chriſtian Religion, had a ſtrong propenſion to idolatry, and found even in the ſtones of the territory, as well as temple at Mecca, ſubjects to increaſe their ſuperſtition. However, Abrahah by various methods prevail'd inſenſibly on many to turn Chriſtians. On the other ſide, the tribe of Koraiſh, who had the cuſtody and ſuperintendance of the temple at Mecca, obſerving that the concourſe and devotion of the people was not ſo great, and conſequently that the profits and advantages of their office leſſen'd, defam'd as much

[A] Laid ſiege to . . . Mecca.] We have a brief detail of this ſtory of Abrahah in Marracci's Notes on the 105th chapter of the Koran; as alſo in the ſecond part of the learned Gagnier's Introduction to the Life of Mahomet, p. 69, 70. where he alſo remarks from the 105th chapter of the ſame book, that this accident happened the very year of Mahomet's birth, i. e. according to common computation Anno Chriſti 569, as though he were ſent by God to effect ſuch a miraculous deliverance for his holy temple. Mr. Gagnier obſerves farther, That the Abyſſins had before this time poſſeſs'd themſelves of all the ſouthern part of Arabia, having expelled or ſubjected the Hemyarites, after they had vanquiſhed Dhu-Nowâs the laſt of their Kings about ſeventy years before Mahomet's birth; for that unhappy Prince having embraced the Jewiſh religion, exerciſed ſuch barbarous cruelty on the Chriſtians, as to cauſe them to be thrown alive into a deep trench filled with fire, where they periſhed miſerably in the flames (1). This barbarity induced the then Chriſtian King of the Abyſſins to ſend a powerful army againſt him, when being defeated, Dhu-Nowâs was ſo far preſſed, that in deſpair he forced his horſe into the ſea and was drowned. Some time after this, our Abrahah was made Viceroy or Governor of Arabia for the Ethiopian King. But Mr. Gagnier (2) has given us the following circumſtances omitted by Herbelot, viz. When Abrahah was arrived at Tâyeſ, about a day's journey from Mecca, he ſent one of his officers named Al Aſwad the ſon of Makſûd to ſeize on the cattle and effects of its inhabitants, and gave him a letter containing theſe words. I have no deſign to make war, but come only to deſtroy the temple of the Cába. To which Abd al Motalleb, Mahomet's grandfather and Prince of the Koraiſh, returned this anſwer. As for us, God never gave us leave, and ſo we can't conſent to the deſtruction of his houſe, we will leave its defence to God the owner, ſo that therefore the whole diſpute is between God and your King, for as to us, we are not able to oppoſe you; and thereupon he went with the meſſenger to Abrahah's camp, who received him very reſpectfully by deſcending from his throne; and after ſeating him near himſelf, he inquired the cauſe of his coming. Abd al Motalleb told him, it was to demand reſtitution of the cattle and goods, which had been taken away; and the King replying, I thought you were come to intreat me not to deſtroy the Cába, being the place of your religious worſhip. Sir, ſays Abd al Motalleb, the cattle and goods belong to me, and therefore I demand them, but as to the houſe of God he is the owner, and is able to defend it. Whereupon the King reſtored the cattle, &c. and Abd al Motalleb returned back. From ſome circumſtances in the original ſtory of Abrahah and chronology, he ſeems to be the ſame with him whom Procopius in his Hiſtory of the Perſian war (3) calls Abramus, and there informs us, that during the war with Perſia, Helliſthæus a devout Chriſtian King of Æthiopia, or Abyſſins, hearing how the Homerites, called by Mr. Gagnier Hemyarites of the oppoſite continent in Arabia, were many of them Jews and many Heathens, and that they laid exceſſive burthens on the Chriſtians in that country, ſent out a navy and army againſt them, and engaging with them ſlew their King, and a great number of the people; and making Eſimiphæus a Homerite and a Chriſtian, King there, impoſed a tribute on them and returned home. However, there were many diſorderly perſons in the Ethiopian army who would not return back with the King, but ſtaid and aſſociated with the Homerites, being invited by the beauty of the country, the ſoil of which is very good. But ſome time after the people impriſoned Eſimiphæus, and made one Abramus, who alſo was a (4) Chriſtian, King. This man had been a ſlave to a Roman merchant, who reſided for the ſake of traffick at Adulis an Ethiopian city. Helliſthæus, in order to puniſh Abramus and his accomplices for the injury done to Eſimiphæus, ſent three thouſand men againſt him under the command of his kinſman. But thoſe ſoldiers deſiring alſo to remain in that delightful country, held a ſecret correſpondence with Abramus, and thereupon killed their own commander in the battle, and joined with the enemies. Helliſthæus exaſperated at this, ſent afterwards another army, which engaging, returned with much loſs, and being then afraid to attack Abramus any more, he forbore all hoſtilities. But that Prince dying, Abramus conſented to pay a tribute to his ſucceſſor the Neguſhi, and thereby confirmed himſelf in his government, as Viceroy. However, theſe things, ſays Procopius, happened afterwards, that is, as I take it, after Juſtinian's death, who died aged eighty three, in the year of Chriſt 565, which was but four years before Mahomet's birth. Thus chronology concurs to make Abramus and Abrahah one and the ſame perſon, as either King or Viceroy of the Homerites or Hemyarites, who were Arabian Chriſtians at that time.

(1) This fact is hinted at in the 85th chapter of the Koran.

(2) Ib. p. 70.

(3) Lib. 1. c. 16.

(4) Note, the Chriſtians at this time were very numerous in Arabia; and it appears that many of 'em join'd with Mahomet.

much as poſſible the temple at Saná, and at laſt practiſed a notorious piece of villany in order to extinguiſh the zeal of the Arabians for this new temple. To this end they ſent one of the tribe or family of Kenâna to Saná, who by his artifices getting admittance into an (b) office about that temple, took occaſion one night preceding a very ſacred and ſolemn feſtival, when all things in the church ought to have appeared in purity and ſplendor, abominably to defile both the church and its ornaments with human excrements, and having done ſo, fled, and publiſhed, wherever he came, the news of this profanation. Abrahah being informed of what had paſſed vowed revenge againſt the Koraiſh for this ſcandalous abuſe, and reſolved to beſiege Mecca, and demoliſh their Temple and Cába. For this purpoſe he marched his army (the greateſt ſtrength of which conſiſted in the elephants) (c) towards the province of Hejaz, himſelf conducting it, being mounted on one of thoſe animals, named Mahmûd. This elephant being the moſt remarkable, both for its ſize and whiteneſs, had acquired the title of chief or captain of the reſt. The Koraiſh being informed of the march of this Prince, and that he brought againſt them theſe terrible beaſts, which, they ſay, had never been ſeen in Arabia till that time, they utterly deſpaired of being able to defend their city and territory, and reſolved to abandon it, and retire with their moſt valuable effects to the neighbouring mountains. Abrahah met with no oppoſition in his march, plundering and ravaging all places till he came in view of the city of Mecca, when the (d) elephant on which he rode no ſooner beheld the city walls, but he ſuddenly turned his head and ran furiouſly back, and all the reſt of thoſe animals following him as their leader, it put the whole army into a general diſorder, and all fled. The Koraiſh, who were entrenched on the tops of the mountains ſaw this confuſion with aſtoniſhment, not knowing the cauſe of it, when on a ſudden they beheld a prodigious flight of (e) birds, ariſing like a cloud from the ſea-coaſts, come and hover over Abrahah's army. Their feathers were green and beaks green, and they were followed by another flight, whoſe feathers were black but their beaks yellow. Every one of theſe birds carried three ſtones (f), viz. one in its beak, and two in its claws, and on every ſtone was written the name of him it was to ſtrike; all which ſtones they threw down with ſo great a force on the heads of the Abyſſins, that they killed them all on the ſpot, Abrahah excepted, who only was left alive to carry the news of this terrible defeat into Ethiopia. Abrahah having ſeen his whole army deſtroyed by this ſtrange accident immediately repaſſed the Red-Sea, and went to inform the Najâſhi of his diſaſter. However, ſay the hiſtorians, Divine Juſtice which had determined to leave to poſterity a memorable example of the puniſhment of ſuch as ſhould dare to attempt the ruin of that holy-houſe built by Abraham, would not permit that unhappy Prince to eſcape unpuniſhed. And accordingly one of thoſe executioners of heaven's vengeance followed him from place to place with a ſtone in its beak till he came before the Abyſſin Emperor, and had told him the ſtory of this lamentable adventure, when the Emperor aſking him what kind of birds they were? Abrahah pointed to that which then hovered over his head, the bird inſtantly flung down his ſtone, which ſtriking Abrahah he fell dead at the foot of the Imperial throne.

(b) I don't know whence d'Herbelot had the circumſtance of this fellow's getting into an office. He ſeems only to have ſlipped in by ſtealth, and hid himſelf in the church.

(c) Authors doubt whether he had any more than one elephant, viz. that named Mahmûd, tho' ſome ſay he had thirteen.

(d) This elephant whenever he was directed towards Mecca, knelt down, and would not ſtir, though he got up and went on briskly if he was directed towards Yaman, or to any other quarter than Mecca. I don't find any author mentions Mahmûd's putting the other elephants and the army into diſorder. We muſt allow Mr. d'Herbelot to embroider a little.

(e) It muſt be obſerved, that the Orientals ſay theſe ſtones were not quite ſo big as vetches; tho' they fell with ſuch force, as to pierce the man's helmet, head and whole body (ſome ſay the elephant's alſo) and ſo falling to the ground.

(f) Theſe ſtones did not kill all on the ſpot, but only all they ſtruck; ſeveral eſcaped thence, and fled with Abrahah, towards Yaman; though they all died by the way, Abrahah excepted. Abulfeda (and the other writers I have ſeen) do not ſay that Abrahah was killed by a ſtone, nor that he went into Ethiopia; but on the contrary, that he was ſtruck with a ſort of plague or putrefaction, ſo that his limbs rotted off piecemeal, and he died at Saná his capital. The only perſon who eſcaped into Ethiopia they ſay, was one Abu Yackſum; and they tell us the ſame ſtory of his being killed by a ſtone in the Abyſſin Emperor's preſence, as d'Herbelot tells us of Abrahah. The occaſion of the miſtake ſeems to be, that Abrahah was alſo ſurnamed Abu-Yackſum, and ſo two different perſons were taken for one and the ſame.

ABRAHAM, the Father and Stock whence the Faithful ſprung, was ſon to Terah. He was deſcended from Noah by Shem, being nine degrees diſtant from the latter. The opinion which fixes his birth to the hundred and thirtieth year of Terah (a), appears to me more probable, than that which ſettles it in the ſeventieth year of his ſaid father. There is great reaſon to believe that Abraham was born in the city of Ur in Chaldea, which the Scriptures inform us he left, when he went into the land of Canaan (b). Abraham quitted that city with his father, and went to Haran, where they reſided till Terah's death, after which Abraham reſum'd his firſt deſign of going into Paleſtine. The Scriptures relate the ſeveral places he ſtopt at in the land of Canaan, and his journey into Egypt, where Sarah his wife, who was his ſiſter by the father's ſide (c), was taken from him; his journey into Gerar, where Sarah was again carried off, and reſtored to him, as before; his victory over the four Kings who had plundered Sodom; his complaiſance with regard to his wife, who would oblige him to make uſe of their maid Hagar, in order to get children (d); the covenant which God made with him, ſealed with the ſign of circumciſion; his compliance with the decree of God, who commanded him to ſacrifice his eldeſt ſon, and the manner how this was prevented; his marriage with Keturah; his death, at the age of an hundred threeſcore and fifteen; and his being interr'd near the body of Sarah his firſt wife in the cave of Machpelah. It would be needleſs to expatiate on theſe particulars, ſince the Proteſtants have them by heart, they learning them from the Scriptures in their infant years; and the Roman Catholicks need not be told of them here, father Simon and Moreri having treated of them ſufficiently in their Dictionaries. It would be more ſuitable to the genius of the preſent work, to examine the falſities and doubtful traditions relating to Abraham; but theſe are ſo numerous, that the moſt indefatigable writer would ſcarce have courage to ſet about ſuch a taſk; for, have not the moſt ſtrange particulars been told concerning the motives of his converſion [A]? and are not the moſt odd circumſtances related of his exploits

(a) This, according to the Hebrews, is the 352d after the deluge, and the 2008th from the creation.

(b) Gen. xi. 31.

(c) See the article SARAH.

(d) See the article HAGAR.

[A] Concerning the motives of Abraham's converſion.] It is a pretty general opinion, that Abraham ſuck'd in the poiſon of idolatry with his milk; and that Terah his father made ſtatues, and taught that they were to be worſhipped as Gods (1). Some Jews relate, that Abraham followed, for a conſiderable time, the ſame exploits againſt idolatry [B], both in Chaldea and the city of Haran [C]? How many ſame trade as Terah (2) viz. that he made and ſold idols. Others declare, that Abraham was a long time immers'd in the impiety which prevailed in that country, viz. the worſhip of the ſun and ſtars. Ipſum longo tempore Chaldæorum delirio de aſtrorum divinitate innutritum fuiſſe. (3) Maimonides relates as fact, that Abraham was educated in the religion of the Sabæans, who acknowledged no other God but the ſtars (4). His reflections on the nature of the planets, diſcovered to him the erroneouſneſs of that worſhip, and prevailed with him to abandon it. He admired their motions, their beauty and order; but at the ſame time, he diſcovered ſeveral imperfections in them, whence he concluded, that there muſt be a Being, ſuperior to the whole machine of the univerſe; a Being who created and governed it. Suidas indeed cites Philo, to prove that Abraham, by theſe reflections, raiſed his ideas to the knowledge of God; but as he relates, on the credit of the abovementioned author, that Abraham had attained to this exalted degree of underſtanding, when but fourteen years old; and had the courage to ſay to Terah, Leave this pernicious trade of idolatry, by which you impoſe on the world; this accuſation, viz. Abraham's long continuance in idolatry, is not very conſiſtent. It is certain that Joſephus, though he does not own that the mind of this Patriarch was for ſome time infected with idolatry, aſſerts, that he attained to a knowledge of the unity of God, and a providence, merely by the ſtrength of his genius, and his contemplation of the univerſe, and was the firſt who dared to combat vulgar error on that head (5), but met with ſuch ſtrong oppoſition, that he reſolved to leave his native country. This, perhaps, is the firſt inſtance of a man's going a voluntary exile for the ſake of religion. Abraham, conſidered in this light, would be, with regard to this kind of puniſhment under the law of nature, what St. Stephen was, with reſpect to capital puniſhment under the law of grace; he would be as much the Patriarch of the Refugees, as the Father of the Faithful. I don't ſee how it can be denied that his father was an idolater, ſince the Scripture mentions him expreſly as ſuch (6); but all that could be inferred from this, would be, that Abraham embraced his father's religion, before he was capable of making uſe of his reaſon. It is the unavoidable lot of children, to adhere ſtrictly to the religious principles of thoſe under whom they are educated. Suidas relates, that at fourteen years of age Abraham was able to judge for himſelf: he was ſenſible of the abyſs into which his father was plunged, and he drew him out of it, inſomuch, that when God commanded him to leave his country, Terah reſolved to go along with him. S. Epiphanius relates, that idolatry having taken its riſe under Serug, great grandfather to the Patriarch Abraham, idols were repreſented only in painting, but that Terah was the firſt who made them in clay (7).

(1) Suidas in Σαρούχ.

[B] The moſt odd account related of his exploits with regard to idolatry] I would not accuſe Philo of contradicting himſelf, though we juſt now found, that he relates in one of his works, how Abraham, for many years, gave into the extravagant notions of the Chaldeans (8); and from Suidas's Lexicon, that Abraham, at the age of fourteen, knew all the abſurdities of idolatry; for how can we rely, with regard to the numerical accounts and citations, on an author, ſo maimed and corrupted as Suidas now is? Poſſibly he did not write fourteen, but fifty years, that being the age of Abraham when he abandoned the errors of Paganiſm, according to an old tradition. 'Tis related that (9) his father being gone on a journey, left the buſineſs of ſelling ſtatues to him, when it happened that a man who pretended to be a purchaſer, asked him how old he was? Abraham anſwered, fifty .... Wretch that thou art, ſays the other, for adoring at that age a Being who is but one day old! which words quite confounded Abraham. Some time after a woman brought ſome flour to him, in order that he might preſent it by way of offering to the ſtatues; but Abraham, inſtead of doing ſo, took up an ax or hatchet, and broke them all to pieces, and after this he put the ax into the hand of the largeſt ſtatue. Terah being returned home, asked the meaning of this havock? Abraham replied, that all the ſtatues had quarrelled about who ſhould firſt eat of the oblation which a woman had brought; upon which, ſays he, the God you ſee there, being larger than the reſt, broke them to pieces with that ax. Terah told him, he bantered, ſince thoſe idols had not the ſenſe to do that. Say you ſo, ſays Abraham? and thereupon immediately retorted thoſe words of his father upon him, to ſhew the abſurdity in this worſhip of the falſe Gods. However, Terah could not take a jeſt, but delivered up his ſon into the hands of the inquiſition. Nimrod the chief inquiſitor and conqueror of the country, immediately exhorted Abraham to worſhip the fire; and after ſome queſtions and anſwers had paſt between them, he commanded him to be thrown into the midſt of the flames, ſaying theſe words at the ſame time, Now let your God come and take you out. Haran, Abraham's brother, obſerving the whole ſcene with the deepeſt attention, firmly reſolved to declare for the victorious party; that is, to be of Nimrod's religion in caſe the fire conſumed Abraham; and of the religion of Abraham if he came out unhurt. Abraham came ſafe and ſound out of the midſt of the flames, when Nimrod asking Haran who he believed in? he anſwered, in the God of Abraham; upon which the Monarch commanded him to be thrown into a furnace, where he was ſo ſeverely ſcorch'd, that he expired a little after in his father's preſence (10). The reaſon why the fire had ſo much power over him, was, becauſe his faith was not ſo lively as that of Abraham, and that Haran was not, like his brother, predeſtinated to great matters (11). This tradition is not of modern date, ſince it is told by St. Jerom (12), who ſeems to look upon that circumſtance of it as genuine, which relates to Abraham's miraculous preſervation in the midſt of the flames; but he does not ſay that Terah was ſo ſuperſtitiouſly cruel, as to act the part of an informer of the inquiſition againſt his own ſon. St. Epiphanius, who alſo is ſilent on this article, aſſerts on the contrary that Terah ſurvived his ſon Haran, as a puniſhment upon him for his boldneſs in making Gods of clay; and that he was the firſt father who ever ſaw his children die a natural death (13). Perhaps the antiquity of the word Ur (14) might have given occaſion to theſe fictions. Such as lay ſtreſs on the following words which God ſays to Abraham, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Caldees (15), imagine that he ſaved him from a great perſecution, ſince he employed the very ſame words in the beginning of the decalogue, to denote the deliverance from Egypt (16); but this is ſearching for myſteries without any manner of cauſe: for we don't find the leaſt mention of any ſuch perſecution in Scripture; ſo that we may juſtly, in a proportional degree, conſider likewiſe as mere chimeras, the fire which did not hurt Abraham; as alſo the ſtory which Maimonides borrowed from a certain work (17), on the husbandry of the Egyptians. In this it was related, that Abraham, after having maintained in a publick diſputation againſt the idolaters, that fire was not worthy of divine honours, he thereupon was thrown into priſon; all his poſſeſſions were confiſcated, and himſelf was ſentenced to baniſhment. The King was afraid that his great authority and eloquence would prevail on the people to abandon the worſhip of fire. According to Cedrenus, Haran died for a very bad cauſe, for that he, by endeavouring to ſnatch Terah's idols out of the fire into which Abraham had thrown them, was himſelf caught by the flames, and burnt to death.

[C] Or in the city of Haran.] It is pretended that Abraham ſet up for a convert-maker; that whilſt he was endeavouring to gain over male proſelytes, Sarah acted in the ſame character, with regard to the women (18), and that it is in this ſenſe we are to underſtand the following words of Geneſis; Abraham departed out of Haran ... took Sarah his wife; Lot his brother's ſon; all their ſubſtance that they had gathered, and the ſouls they had gotten (19). Theſe writers will not have the laſt mentioned words allude to an increaſe of children, but to the propagation of the faith; and confirm (20) this explication by the metaphor which the Apoſtle St. Paul employs in the 19th verſe of the ivth chapter of his Epiſtle to the Galatians: My little children of whom I travel in birth again, until Chriſt be formed in you. Now it is more probable,

(2) Apud Genebrard. in Chron.

(3) Philo apud Salian. tom. 1. p. 387.

(4) Maimonides, More Nevoch. cap. 29. p. 3.

(5) Joſeph. Antiquit lib. 1. cap. 7. See alſo Recognit. Clement. lib. 1.

(6) Your fathers dwelt on the other ſide of the flood in old time, even Terah the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor; and they ſerved other Gods. Joſhua xxiv. 2.

(7) Epiph. adverſ. Hæreſ. lib. 1. p. 7, 8.

(8) Χαλδαίους μακρόν τινα χρόνον. Per longum tempus Chaldaico imbutus delirio. Philo, de Abrahamo, p. 361.

(9) R. Moſes Haddarſchan in Beriſchit Rabba apud Heidegger. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 2. p. 36.

(10) They ground this circumſtance on Geneſis xi. 28.

(11) Judæi apud Lyranum & Toſtatum, citante Saliano Annal. tom. 1. p. 402.

(12) Hierom. Tradit. Hebraic. in Geneſin.

(13) Epiph. de Hæreſ. lib. 1. p. 8.

(14) 'Tis the proper name of a city, and it alſo ſignified fire. The Latin verſion, Eſdras, chap. ix. has it thus: Qui elegiſti eum de igne Chaldæorum.

(15) Geneſis xv. 7.

(16) Paulus Burgenſis, in Addit. ad Poſtillam Lyrani in Geneſ. cap. xi.

(17) Apud Paulum Burgenſ. in Addit. ad Lyrani Poſtill. in Geneſ. cap. xi. See his Moreh Nevochim, Part 3. cap. 29.

(18) See Onkelos the Chaldee paraphraſt, and Fagius his tranſlator.

(19) Chap. xii. ver. 5.

(20) See Salian. Annal. tom. 1. 406.

many ſciences [D] is he ſaid to have been verſed in, and what a number of books [E] are we told he writ? The Jews aſcribe to him the prerogative of being born circumciſed (e); and declare, that Adam and he were informed with the ſame ſoul (f). Theſe believe, that this ſoul animated David, and will hereafter animate the Meſſiah, as Bartolocci has obſerved in his Bibliotheca Rabbinica, or Rabbinical Library. The Mahometans have likewiſe related ſeveral fictions concerning this Patriarch, as appears from the Alcoran, and from Keſſæus, one of their moſt conſiderable authors. Theſe declare, that he tooke a journey to Mecca, and began to build the temple in that city [F].

(e) Apud Hottingeri Hiſtoriam Oriental. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(f) This is to be underſtood of ſuch Jews as believ'd tranſmigration.

Conſult

probable, that thoſe ſouls Abraham had gotten were ſlaves purchaſed by him, and the children born from them; though we are not to doubt but that his zeal and wiſdom prompted him to inſtruct the Heathens to the utmoſt of his power; and that in caſe he won over any of them during his ſtay in Haran, they followed him into the land of Canaan. Some think that his father did not ſerve the falſe Gods till he came to Haran (21); but this ſeems an abſurdity; for as it is very probable (22) that this family left Chaldæa purely to ſhun the perſecution they ſo juſtly dreaded, becauſe of their abhorrence of idolatry; it would be very ſurprizing, that the religious principles of the chief of the family, ſhould be corrupted in that very country, whither he fled for refuge. But it might have happened that Terah, although Abraham had convinced him of the folly of worſhipping idols before they abandoned their country, might nevertheleſs be weak enough to relapſe again into it: for in thoſe ages of ignorance, few people had ſtrength of mind ſufficient to ſuppreſs at all times their natural propenſion to idolatry. Some even are of opinion, that Nahor, the third ſon of Terah, was never a true convert; and that he yet quitted his native country, to go to his father in Haran (23). Probably it was he who revived in the mind of that old man, the ideas of the idolatrous worſhip which Abraham had ſuppreſt. It is certain that Laban, Nahor's grandſon, worſhipped idols. Some fathers of the church think that Terah was not faithful either in his life-time or at his death: ſee the 31ſt and 37th Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom; but how could they prove this, or how could it be diſproved? there are an hundred circumſtances in Abraham's life, all which are ſo confus'd and perplexed, that both thoſe who argue for, and thoſe who oppoſe them, give reaſons for their aſſertions: however, father Bolduc (a poor writer) who fancied that our Patriarch founded ſome monaſteries in Haran, and brought only ſuch Monks with him into Paleſtine, as were the greateſt novices (24), is not to be ranked among the authors who can give reaſons for what they advance.

(21) Toſtat. apud Perrerium in Geneſ. chap. xi.

(22) This is founded on the teſtimony of Joſephus, and the book of Judith, chap. 5. St. Auſtin affirms it, De Civit. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 13.

(23) See St. Auſtin, ibid.

(24) See Heidegger Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 2. p. 88.

[D] How many ſciences.] We are told that he was verſed in Aſtronomy, and this Beroſus declared, tho' he does not name him, if Joſephus is to be credited (25). Some alſo relate, that he inſtructed the Egyptians in Arithmetic and Geometry. Joſephus ſays this expreſsly (26), which would alſo be confirmed by Nicholas Damaſcenus, if he related that Abraham taught Arithmetic and Geometry to the Egyptians; but he does not mention any ſuch circumſtance. Heidegger, page 144 of his ſecond volume, cites the fourth book of Nicholas Damaſcenus's hiſtories, as though it were to be met with there; but he miſtook the words of Joſephus for thoſe of Nicholas, in the 16th chapter of the 9th book of Euſebius's Evangelical Preparation. This Patriarch, according to Eupolemus and Artapan (27), inſtructed the Phœnicians and Egyptians in Aſtronomy; but after all, theſe are not articles of faith. The authors who aſcribe theſe particulars to Abraham leſſen the credit of their teſtimony by the falſities they interweave with them. One of theſe tells us that Abraham reigned in Damaſcus (28); another, that he lived twenty years in Egypt with his whole family, at the court of King Pharethon (29); another writer is ſo unjuſt to his memory, as to declare that one of the motives which prompted him to go into Egypt, was a deſire of being acquainted with the tenets of the Egyptians with regard to the Deity; in order to follow them, in caſe they appeared better grounded to him than his own, or to undeceive thoſe people, in caſe their principles were erroneous (30). According to ſome moderns, he did not inſtruct the Egyptians in Mathematics (31); but the reaſon they give for it, is, in my opinion, altogether falſe; for, ſay they, Abraham's brains were ſo diſturbed with jealouſy, becauſe the King of Egypt kept Sarah from him, that he was ſcarce in a capacity to teach ſciences of ſo abſtracted a nature as theſe, which, like poetry, require the writer to be at eaſe, and undiſturbed both in body and mind.

Carmina ſeceſſum ſcribentis & otia quærunt.

"The Muſe delights in ſolitude and eaſe.

But they ſhould have obſerved that Joſephus has expreſly diſtinguiſhed the times; for he tells us, that Abraham did not confer with the Egyptian Sages, till after Sarah was reſtored to him and his mind was at eaſe; as it was entirely, when Pharaoh had loaded him with preſents, and he himſelf was perſuaded that his wife had not ſuffered in her honour.

(25) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7.

(26) Id. ibid. c. 8.

(27) Apud Alex. Polyhiſt. citatum ab Euſebio, Præp. lib. 9. c. 17 & 18.

(28) Nichol. Damaſ. apud Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7. This Juſtin alſo declares, lib. 36. c. 2.

(29) Artapan. apud Euſeb. Præp. lib. 9. c. 18.

(30) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. c. 8.

(31) See Salian. tom. 1. p. 414.

[E] And what a number of books.] A work which treats of the creation has been long aſcribed to him (32); it is mentioned in the Talmud (33), and the Rabbis Chanina and Hoſchaia uſed to read it, on the eve before the Sabbath. The author of the book entitled Cozri, declares that this work of Abraham is abſtruſe, and wants a copious commentary; that it teaches the unity of God, that in certain reſpects the author ſeems to ſay things of a very different nature, but that in others, they all have the ſame tendency. The Jews in general have not aſcribed the work in queſtion to this great Patriarch, and ſome have aſſerted publickly, that Rabbi Akiba is, as they believe, the author of it, and not Abraham (34); and therefore they very much condemn this Rabbi, for preſuming to father it upon him. Quis dedit poteſtatem R. Aquibæ ſcribendi librum Jezira, nomine Abrahami patris noſtri (35). That is, "Who gave "Rabbi Aquiba authority to write the book Jezira, "under the name of Abraham our father?" We meet with a very curious article on this head, in the ſupplement to Moreri, extracted from father Simon's Critical Hiſtory, to which I refer the reader; it is in p. 48 and 536 of the edition of Rotterdam. In the primitive ages of Chriſtianity, the Hereticks called Sethians or Sethinians diſperſed a piece which they called Abraham's Revelation, as St. Epiphanius obſerves (36). Origen has cited a pretended work of this Patriarch, in which two Angels, one good and the other wicked are introduced diſputing on his ſalvation or deſtruction (37). The aſſumption of Abraham was a ſuppoſitious piece (38). We are told (39), that in the library of the monaſtery of the Holy Croſs on mount Amara in Ethiopia, are contained the ſeveral works which Abraham compoſed in the plains of Mamre; where he taught Philoſophy to thoſe men, by whoſe aſſiſtance he defeated the five Kings (40) who had taken his nephew Lot priſoner. By the way, the book on the creation which is aſcribed to Abraham, was printed at Paris 1552, tranſlated into Latin by Poſtel, and illuſtrated with notes. Rittangel, a converted Jew, and Profeſſor at Konigsberg, gave a Latin tranſlation of it with remarks in 1642 (41).

(32) See the remark [A] of the article AKIBA.

(33) See Heidegger Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 2. p. 143.

(34) Abraham Zachut in libro Juchaſin, p. 52. apud Heidegger. ibid.

(35) Præfat. 2. Zohar Mantuani, apud eund. Heidegger. ibid.

(36) Epiph. adverſ. Hæreſ. p. 286.

(37) Origen, Homil. 35, in Lucam, apud Heidegger. ibid.

(38) In Synopſi Athanaſii, liber, qui Aſſumptio Abrahami dicitur, inter rejectos numeratur. Heidegger. ibid.

(39) Kircherus, in Welch, Treatiſe of Libraries, p. 142. Paris edition.

(40) It ſhould be four.

(41) Spizelii Specim. Bibliotb.

[F] That he began to build a temple in that city.] Theſe relate, that Adam, after he was drove from paradiſe, beſought God to permit him to build a houſe, after the model of that which he had ſeen in heaven; a houſe, I ſay, in which he might offer up his prayers, and walk round it out of devotion. God let fall a tent, which was like the houſe ſeen by Adam, who accordingly put it to the uſes abovementioned. After Adam's death, Seth built a houſe with ſtones and mud according to the ſame model above, which the flood ruined; but it was afterwards repaired, God giving his command by Abraham and Iſhmael for that purpoſe. It has been ſucceſſively repaired by others, and laſtly, by Hejazus, in the 74th year of the Hegira, who gave it the form in which it is now ſeen, and this is the oratory or chapel of the temple of Mecca (42). See the remark [I] of the Article HAGAR.

(42) Ex Pocockii Notis in Specim. Hiſt. Arab. p. 115.

Conſult Herbelot's Bibliotheque Orientale, from page 12 to page 16, in which a thouſand curious particulars are related. Were the work which Hecatæus wrote concerning Abraham (g) now extant, we poſſibly ſhould meet with a great many particulars which are not mentioned by any other author. The Chriſtians were reſolved to have their ſhare, in the idle ſtories which are related concerning Abraham; for they tell us that he planted trees, which had a very ſingular property [G]. Here follow ſome other chimeras which the Rabbis have forged. Theſe relate that the Egyptian bondage was inflicted as a puniſhment for ſome faults which Abraham had committed, he having forced the ſons of wiſdom to take up arms, and permitted perſons who were inſtructed in the law of God, to fall again into idolatry; for it is in this ſenſe that they underſtand the Scripture, where it is ſaid, that he armed his trained ſervants born in his own houſe, three hundred and eighteen (h), and his reſtoring (i) thoſe perſons whom the King of Sodom deſired him to give up (k). Father Bartolocci is very warm upon this article, and does not refute it in a ſolid manner [H]. The Rabbis ſay farther; firſt, that the bare ſight of a precious ſtone, which hung about Abraham's neck, cured every kind of diſeaſe; and that after Abraham's death (l), God hung this jewel on the Sun; and ſecondly, that this Patriarch taught magic to thoſe children his concubines brought him (m).

(g) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 1. cap. 7.

(h) Gen. xiv. 14.
(i) Idem, ver. 21.
(k) Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 529.
(l) Bartolocci, Biblioth. Rabbin. tom. 3. p. 562.
(m) Idem. Ibid. p. 394, & tom. 1. p. 703.

[G] Which had a very ſingular virtue.] Gretſer tells us, that he read in a Greek manuſcript belonging to the Auguſtin Library, that Abraham planted a cypreſs-tree, a pine-tree and a cedar-tree, which united into one, each of them, nevertheleſs, retaining its particular roots and branches; that this tree was fell'd, when the materials for building the temple of Solomon were preparing; but that the workmen, though they uſed their art and endeavours, could not fix it any where, which Solomon obſerving, he reſolved to have it uſed as a bench; that the ſybil being brought thither, could never be prevailed with to ſit down upon it, but propheſy'd, that the Redeemer of mankind would die triumphantly on that piece of timber; that Solomon ſurrounded it with thirty ſilver croſſes, in which form it continued till the death of Chriſt (43). This recals to my memory the oak of Mamre, under which it is aſſerted that Abraham uſed to ſit to breathe the freſh air (44). It is ſaid, that oak was ſtill flouriſhing in the time of Conſtantius (45). Drys, id eſt, quercus Mambre juxta Hebron, in qua, uſque ad ætatem infantiæ meæ & Conſtantii regis imperium, terebynthus monſtrabatur pervetus, & annos magnitudine indicans, ſub qua habitavit Abraham. Miro autem cultu ab Ethnicis habita eſt, & velut quodam inſigni nomine conſecrata (46). That is, "The oak of Mamre, "ſtanding near Hebron, where, in my infancy, "in the reign of Conſtantius a turpentine tree was "ſhewn, very old, as appeared by its bulk, under "which Abraham lived. The Heathens have it in "wonderful veneration, and it is conſecrated under "a very auguſt name." Some have even carried their wild fancies ſo far, as to affirm that it was ſeen within theſe three hundred years. This, ſay they, muſt be the ſame with the reed-tree (Calamus) of Seth, which Sir John Mandeville the traveller (a rare witneſs indeed) ſaw near the city of Hebron (47).

(43) Gretſer de Cruce, lib. 1.
(44) The verſion of the Septuagint, Geneſis xviii. favours this aſſertion.
(46) Iſidor. lib. 17. cap. 7. apud Bonifacium, Hiſtor. Ludicr. p. 285. He ought rather to have cited what I now quote from S. Jerom.
(46) Hierom. in locis Hæb. Litt. D. See the remark [G] of the article BARCOCHEBAS.

(47) See Bonifacii Hiſt. Ludicra p. 289. His work was printed in Venice by Baleonius, in 4°, anno 1652; and reprinted at Bruſſels in the ſame ſize by J. Mommartius, anno 1656.

[H] And does not refute it in a ſolid manner.] He pretends that the following words of the King of Sodom, Give me the perſons, and take the goods to thy ſelf (48), ſignify, according to the literal and genuine ſenſe, ſuffer thoſe whom you have inſtructed in your faith to return to the worſhip of idols; but that Abraham proteſted before all the people, he would not ſuffer any ſuch thing. The author cites the 22d and 23d verſes of the xivth chapter of Geneſis, and afterwards accuſes the Talmudiſts of impudence and blaſphemy, for preſuming to aſſert that our Patriarch complied with the deſires of the King of Sodom. He condemns them very juſtly, inaſmuch as they ſuppoſe that the King reclaimed perſons that were converts to the true religion; for the Patriarchs ſervants were not demanded back, but only thoſe perſons whom the four Kings had taken in the plunder of Sodom (49). But father Bartolocci is very much miſtaken, to ſuppoſe that Abraham did not reſtore them, for this appears plainly from the very paſſage in Scripture which he himſelf cites.

(48) Geneſis xiv. 21.

(49) 'Tis ſaid in the 16th verſe, that Abram brought all the goods, and alſo brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women alſo, and the people.

☞ABRAHAM. Though the hiſtory of this Patriarch be ſufficiently known, we yet think it proper to give a ſupplement to Mr. Bayle's account of him, ſince it will afford us an opportunity of laying before the reader ſeveral obſervations and remarks, which we hope will not diſpleaſe. Abraham being ſeventy five years old, was commanded by God, to leave his native country, and his kindred (a), and to go into a ſtrange land; at the ſame time God promiſed him great happineſs, and a numerous poſterity; adding, that he would be a bleſſing, and that in him all families of the earth (b) ſhould be bleſſed [A]. Abraham obeyed, and went with Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother into the land of Canaan. Having wandered ſome time up and down the country,

(a) Gen. xii. 1.

(b) Ibid. 2, 3.

[A] He would be a bleſſing, and in him all families of the earth ſhould be bleſſed.] A great many commentators underſtand this of the Meſſiah, who was to be one of Abraham's deſcendants, and bring ſalvation to all nations in the world. What induces them to explain the words in this ſenſe, is, that they are applied by St. Paul to Jeſus Chriſt (1); and what is here ſaid in thee, is in chapter xxii. verſe 18. in thy ſeed, the Apoſtle laying ſtreſs upon this expreſſion, which is in the ſingular number, argues thus (2). To Abraham and his ſeed were the promiſes made. He ſays not, and to ſeeds, as of many, but as to one, and to thy ſeed, which is Chriſt. And Biſhop Sherlock (3) endeavours to make it appear, that the words cannot admit of any other ſenſe. But if an unprejudiced reader, who never heard of St. Paul's reaſoning, was to inquire into the ſenſe of thoſe words only by the rules of criticiſm, I queſtion whether he would not think they have the ſame meaning, with thoſe ſpoken by Jacob, when he bleſſed the two ſons of Joſeph. He bleſſed them (4) ſaying, in thee ſhall Iſrael bleſs, ſaying, God make thee as Ephraim, and as Manaſſeh. According to this way of ſpeaking, In thee, or in thy ſeed ſhall all nations be bleſſed, ſignify no more than this. When any one ſhall wiſh well to a nation, he will ſay, Let that nation be as happy as Abraham, or as Abraham's ſeed, or poſterity. This ſeems to be the genuine and literal ſenſe of the words (5), and as to St Paul's applying them to Chriſt, Mr. Le Clerc obſerves (6), that this is an allegorical way of reaſoning, at that time common to the Jews; that they might uſe it amongſt the Arabians, Idumeans and Samaritans, who boaſted, they were alſo the ſeed of Abraham. The Jews might ſay, that as the promiſe mentions but one ſeed, it can relate only to the deſcendants of Iſaac, excluſive of the poſterity of all the other children of Abraham. But if this way of reaſoning be conſidered in it ſelf, it cannot hold good, becauſe the word זרע [Zerah] Seed, is a collective word, which ſignifies poſterity in general, whether it includes one nation, or many. Nay the learned obſerve, that the Hebrews never make uſe of that word in the plural number, but

(1) Gal. iii. 8.

(2) Ibid. ver. 16.

(3) The uſe and ſtrument of Prophecy, &c. Diſc. V.

(4) Gen. xlviii. 20.

(5) See Dr. Hammond's Annot. upon Gal. iii. 8.
(6) In Gal. iii. 16.

try, a famine obliged him to retire into Egypt; his wife, though then somewhat old *; was ſtill very beautiful; Abraham fearing leſt the Egyptians ſhould fall in love with her, and therefore kill him to enjoy her, in caſe they knew ſhe was his wife, deſired her to ſay, ſhe was only his ſiſter, that for her ſake the Egyptians might do him good (c) [B]. Sarah complied with his requeſt, and did not wait long for an opportunity of ſhewing her complaiſance and obedience; for no ſooner were they arrived in Egypt, but Sarah was taken into the houſe of Pharaoh, who thinking ſhe was only Abraham's ſiſter, intended to make her his wife; but being afflicted with a plague, he diſcovered the impoſition, and returned her to her huſband, upbraiding him with his diſſimulation [C]. After this Abraham returned out of Egypt, being grown very rich in cattle, in ſilver, and in gold (d), and went again into Canaan, where God was pleaſed to renew the promiſes he had before made him, and aſſured him that his ſeed ſhould poſſeſs the land, in which he then lived as a ſtranger. The ſame promiſe was again repeated afterwards, when Abraham ſeeming to diſtruſt it, (for he ſaid, Lord God, whereby ſhall I know, that I ſhall inherit it (e)? God confirmed it by a miracle [D]. All this time Abraham had no children, and no likelihood of having any, for his wife was barren (f), and ſhe therefore ſaid to him, I pray thee, go unto my maid, it may be that I may obtain children by her (g); her requeſt was granted, and Hagar brought forth a ſon, who was called Iſhmael (h). After this God entered into a new covenant with Abraham, he changed his name [E], which before was Abram, into Abraham; and as a ſeal to his covenant, he

* She was then about ſixty ſix years of age.

(c) Gen. xii. 12, 13.

(d) Gen. xiii. 2.

(e) Gen. xv. 8.

(f) Gen. xi. 30.

(g) Gen. xvi. 2.

(h) See the article of AGAR.

but to ſignify the ſeeds of plants; and ſince this allegorical way of reaſoning was approved of by the Jews, St. Paul might very well turn it againſt themſelves. But Chriſtianity is not grounded on ſuch allegories and accommodations, it being founded on unqueſtionable facts, ſuch as the reſurrection of Chriſt, his miracles, thoſe of his Apoſtles &c. (7). And here, we beg leave to obſerve, that "in this age of Scepticiſm, "where Chriſtianity is ſo vigorouſly attacked, and as "it were cloſely beſieged, the true way of defending "it, is not to enlarge the compaſs of its fortifications, "and make more help neceſſary to its defence, than "it can readily furniſh, but like skilful engineers, to "demoliſh its weak outworks, that ſerve only for "ſhelter and lodgment to the enemy, whence to "batter it more effectually, and draw it within the "compaſs of its firm and natural entrenchments, "which will be found in the end impregnable (8).

(7) Cler. loc. cit.

(8) A Defence of the Letter to Dr. Waterland. p. 3.

[B] That for her ſake the Egyptians might do him good.] Fauſtus the Manichee calumniated Abraham on this occaſion, as if by making Sarah paſs for his ſiſter he intended only to get preſents from the Kings of Egypt and Gerar (9). This indeed would betray very great covetouſneſs, not to ſay worſe (10). We muſt explain the words of the Patriarch, as if he had ſaid, That they may not do me any wrong on your account: that they may not kill me to enjoy you. Abraham might take it as a favour, not to be hurt by the Egyptians. This is Mr. Le Clerc's obſervation, which we ſubmit to the judgment of the reader.

(9) Gen. xx. 2. 14.

(10) Le Clerc in Gen. xii. 13.

[C] Upbraiding him with his diſſimulation.] He told a downright falſhood, when he ſaid that Sarah was his ſiſter. For to lye is nothing but to ſpeak or act in ſuch a manner, and with a deſign to make others believe thoſe things to be falſe, that we know to be true, or that to be true, which we know to be falſe. Now to what intent did Abraham ſay that Sarah was his ſiſter? Was it not to make the Egyptians believe that ſhe was not his wife? He therefore told an untruth, though Sarah had really been his ſiſter; for it is the intent and effect of the words, and not their mere ſound that muſt be conſidered. But it was not only on this occaſion, and before Abimelech, that Abraham diſſembled, for he did it alſo in another circumſtance, which ſeems more weighty. This was when he went to ſacrifice his ſon, when leaving his two men behind him, he told them, Abide you here with the aſs, and I and the lad will go yonder and worſhip, and come again to you (11); though he knew, or at leaſt thought that he was going to make a burnt offering of his ſon to the Lord. Mr. Saurin (12) examines this queſtion, but leaves it at laſt undetermined. "Muſt we believe, ſays he, that Abraham "ſpoke by a prophetical inſpiration, and that it is "what St. Paul hints to us, when he ſays, that this "Patriarch accounted that God was able to raiſe his "ſon even from the dead (13)? But if he knew that "his ſon ſhould riſe from the dead, does not this "leſſen the merit of his ſacrifice? What great ſelf-dé-"nial was it to cut off the head of his ſon, if he knew, "that he would immediately come to life again? "Shall we ſuppoſe, that Abraham was reſolved to "bring back the bones of Iſaac? But is not this ra-

(11) Gen. xxii. 5.

(12) Diſcours ſur la Bible. tom. 1. Diſc. 20. Ed. in 8°. p. 307.

(13) Heb. xi. 19.

"ther the anſwer of an indulgent caſuiſt, who will "ſolve a puzling queſtion at any rate, and not that of "a judicious critic? And can a man, who is going "to reduce his ſon to aſhes by a burnt-offering, pre-"tend to bring back his bones? And though he in-"tended to bring them back, was there any truth in "his ſaying, I and the lad will come again? After all, "though Abraham were to be charged with having "told an untruth on this occaſion (which however "we don't determine) it is certain, that his fault will "appear very ſlight, if compared with his heroical "obedience." Thus far Mr. Saurin; we ſhall only obſerve here, that it is the opinion of moſt Civilians, and eſpecially of Grotius, Puffendorf and Barbeyrac, that when no kind of harm is to be the conſequence of a lye, and a great evil may be thereby prevented, or a great good procured, in ſuch caſes there is no crime in telling a lye; and this, I think, all candid readers will be perſuaded was the caſe of Abraham, in the inſtances we have mentioned. We need not obſerve, that when we ſpeak of a great evil or a great good, it muſt be underſtood comparatively; a leſſer evil being a good if compared to a greater evil, and a leſſer good being an evil, if compared to a greater good.

[D] God confirmed it by a miracle.] The miracle is related in Gen. xv. 17. and the reader may conſult what the ingenious Mr. Shuckford offers upon that paſſage (14). We ſhall obſerve here, that Abraham's diſtruſt cannot be blamed: this was the ſecond time that God promiſed him a numerous poſterity, and yet he had no children, his wife being barren, and they both well ſtriken in years; ſo that the Patriarch might ſuſpect that the revelations he had were only dreams and deluſions; it was therefore prudent in him to deſire that God ſhould confirm them by a miracle. Prodigies and ſtrange appearances are not indeed always a proof of a Divine intercourſe: But when what is pretended to be revealed is not inconſiſtent with morality, and with the known attributes of God, and is moreover ſupported with a miracle, right reaſon teaches man to take it for a real revelation of the Deity; otherwiſe it will be impoſſible that God ſhould reveal any thing to mankind. Mr. Le Clerc obſerves upon Abraham's queſtion, Whereby ſhall I know &c. that the ſenſe may be, "How ſhall "I know when the time is come, that I ſhall poſſeſs "the land of Canaan?" Quomodo cognoſcam, tempus adeſſe, quo mihi Chanahanitis poſſidenda tradetur (15)? To which queſtion God anſwers, that the poſterity of Abraham ſhall be afflicted in a ſtrange land during four hundred years (16), and that in the fourth generation they ſhall come again into the land of Canaan (17).

(14) The ſacred and prophane hiſtory connected. Vol. 1. p. 298. Note b.

(15) In Gen. xv. 8.

(16) Gen. xv. 13.

(17) ver. 16.

[E] He changed his name.] It was the cuſtom of the Orientals, not only to give their children names, which they thought portended good luck, but alſo to change their names, when any thing extraordinary happened to them. Of this ſeveral inſtances are found in the Scriptures (18), but neither Mr. Le Clerc (19), nor Mr. Saurin (20), who barely copies him, quote any paſſage from profane hiſtory.

(18) See Gen. xxxii. 28. Ruth i. 20. Dan. i. 7. Matt. xvi. 18.

(19) In Gen. xvii. 5.

(20) Diſcours ſur la Bible. tom. 1. Diſc. 15. p. 243.

he ordered that this Patriarch and all the male perſons in his family ſhould be circumciſed. It is to be obſerved, that this ceremony was not eſtabliſhed till after Abraham was returned out of Egypt; whence one may infer, that it is not from Abraham that the Egyptians received this rite: we ſhall offer in the remarks a few obſervations concerning circumciſion [F]. God having made this covenant with Abraham, promiſed him at the ſame time, that he ſhould have a ſon by Sarah his wife. This promiſe ſurpriſed the Patriarch, becauſe he was then near a hundred years old (i), and his wife about fourſcore and ten: but God having repeated his promiſe, Abraham believed it, and to ſhew his faith and obedience, he immediately circumciſed himſelf, and his ſon Iſhmael, who was then thirteen years old (k), and all the men of his houſe, either born in the

(i) Gen. xvii. 17. It is ſaid, that Abraham was then an hundred years old; but in ver. 24th, it is ſaid he was but ninety nine.

(k) Ibid. ver. 25.

[F] We ſhall offer a few obſervations concerning circumciſion.] The origin of circumciſion having been lately the ſubject of a warm diſpute, we hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here the arguments on both ſides fairly ſtated. This diſpute was occaſioned by the following obſervations of the author of Chriſtianity as old as the Creation. "Had ſuch "notions, ſays he (21), been adhered to concerning "the Divine goodneſs, as the light of nature dictates, "the Egyptians and ſome other Pagan nations could "never have thought, that cutting off the foreskin "(not to be performed without great pain and hazard) "could have been eſteemed a religious duty accept- "able to a good and gracious God, who makes no- "thing in vain, much leſs what requires the cutting "off, even with extream danger as well as anguiſh. "Had nature required ſuch an operation, nature be- "ing always the ſame would ſtill have required it. "This inſtitution, as is proved by Marſham (22), and "others, ſeems to be owing to the Egyptians, who "thought all to be profane who uſed it not; and it "was after Abraham had been in Egypt, that circum- "ciſion was inſtituted, in order, it is likely, to recom- "mend his poſterity to the Egyptians, on whom they "were for ſome ages to depend: and what makes this "the more probable, is, that it was not till after the "Lord had ordered Moſes into Egypt, that the Lord "met him by the way in the inn and ſought to kill "him (23), for not circumciſing his ſon: and upon "Joſhua's circumciſing the Iſraelites, (circumciſion "not being obſerved during their ſtay in the wilder- "neſs, when they had no communication with Egypt) "the Lord himſelf ſays, This day have I rolled away "the reproach of Egypt from you (24)". This author not having quoted his authorities, we think it proper to inſert them here. Sanchoniatho derives the origin of circumciſion from Saturn. Ὁ Ιλος, ſays he (25), ταυτ' ἐστιν ὁ Κρόνος τὰ αἰδοῖα περιτέμνεται, ταυτὸ ποιήσαι καὶ τοῖς ἀφ' αὐτοῦ συμμάχους καταναγκάσας. Ilus, that is, Chronus or Saturn, circumciſed his ſecret parts, and obliged his followers to do the ſame. And Herodotus ſays, that this was antiently the cuſtom of the Egyptians, who circumciſed themſelves for the ſake of cleanlineſs. Τὰ αἰδοῖα περιτάμνονται καθαριότητος ἕνεκεν (26): And he proves, that the Ethiopians, &c. came originally from Egypt, becauſe they were circumciſed. Ὅτι μοῦνοι πάντων ἀνθρώπων Κόλχοι καὶ Αἰγύπτιοι καὶ Αἰθίοπες περιτάμνονται ἀπ' ἀρχῆς τὰ αἰδοῖα. Φοίνικες δὲ καὶ Σύριοι οἱ ἐν τῇ Παλαιστίνῃ καὶ αὐτοὶ ὁμολογεῦσι παρ' Αἰγυπτίων μεμαθηκέναι. Σύριοι δὲ οἱ περὶ Θερμώδοντα καὶ Παρθένιον ποταμὸν καὶ Μακρώνες τούτοισιν ἀγχιτόνους ὄντες ἀπὸ Κόλχων φασὶ νεωστὶ μεμαθηκέναι, οὗτοι γάρ εἰσιν οἱ περιτεμνόμενοι ἀνθρώπων μοῦνοι· καὶ οὗτοι Αἰγυπτίοισι φαίνονται ποιεῦντες κατὰ ταυτά. αὐτῶν δὲ Αἰγυπτίων καὶ Αἰθιόπων οὐκ ἔχω σαφεῖ ἐπὶτέρους παρὰ τῶν ἑτέρους μαθεῖν (27). That is, "Of all men, the inhabitants "of Colchos, the Egyptians and the Ethiopians only "were circumciſed of old; for the Phœnicians and "the Syrians who live in Paleſtine confeſs that they "learned it from the Egyptians. But the Syrians "who live near the rivers Thermodontes and Par- "thenius, and their neighbours the Macrones ſay, "they received it from thoſe of Colchos. Theſe are "the only nations who are circumciſed; and in this "they follow the example of the Egyptians; but "whether the Egyptians received this cuſtom from "the Ethiopians, or theſe from the former, I cannot "tell." Joſephus obſerves upon this paſſage, that of all the inhabitants of Paleſtine, the Jews only are circumciſed, τῶν δὲ τὴν Παλαιστίνην κατοικούντων μόνοι τοῦτο ποιοῦσιν Ιουδαῖοι (28), but he does not object any thing againſt deriving circumciſion from Egypt. Diodorus alſo ſays, that the people of Colchos circumciſed the children born amongſt them, (being taught ſo by an antient tradition) διὸ καὶ παρὰ τοῖς γένεσι τούτοις ἐκ παλαίου τὸ περιτέμνειν τοὺς γνησιωτέρους παῖδας, ἐξ Αἰγύπτου μετενηνεγμένον τῷ νομίμῳ (29). Theſe are the moſt material arguments, which are produced to prove, that circumciſion is originally an Egyptian rite: and it is further obſerved, that the Egyptians were extremely fond of their own ceremonies, and deſpiſed thoſe of other nations to ſuch a degree, that they looked upon themſelves as polluted, if they had converſed familiarly with ſtrangers (30), adhering ſtrictly to the inſtitutions of their anceſtors, ſays Herodotus, they admit of no others, πατρίοισι χρεώμενοι νόμοισι ἄλλον ἀδόκα ἐπικτέωνται (31). Some people, ſays Mr. Le Clerc (32), cannot believe, that God Almighty ſhould have inſtituted a ceremony ſo difficult to perform, ſo indecent when practiſed on people of age, and ſo little conducive to piety and virtue. They therefore are apt to think, that Abraham having ſeen this practiſed in Egypt, and by the ſervants he had brought with him out of that country, and knowing what the Egyptians alledged to vindicate a cuſtom ſo unreaſonable in it ſelf, he thought fit to imitate them. God ſeeing this, condeſcended in his infinite goodneſs to humour Abraham's weakneſs ſo far, as to preſcribe to him this rite, which the Patriarch already approved in other people. Thus far Mr. Le Clerc, who does not however determine the queſtion, but leaves it to the reader's judgment, referring him to Spencer (33). Let us now hear the arguments of thoſe, who maintain, that circumciſion is originally a Divine inſtitution, not borrowed from any people in the world.

They anſwer, firſt to the quotation of Sanchoniatho, that in a point of ſo remote antiquity his teſtimony cannot be much depended upon; and beſides, they ſay that his Ilus is Abraham himſelf; this Mr. Shuckford has proved almoſt to a demonſtration (34). And with regard to the other paſſages quoted from heathen authors, it is ſaid in general, that they had no knowledge of hiſtory before the time of the Trojan war; and when they ſay that a thing was ἀπ' ἀρχῆς from the beginning, they mean only anciently, time out of mind (35). 2. It appears plainly from the Scriptures, that circumciſion was inſtituted by God, as a ſeal of the covenant he entred into with Abraham. Hence it is that circumciſion was to be practiſed by every deſcendant of this Patriarch upon pain of being cut off from his people (36). 3. This ceremony was alſo eſtabliſhed, that the Jews might be diſtinguiſhed from all other nations, which would have been ineffectual, if circumciſion had already been in uſe amongſt the Egyptians. 4. There is no likelihood that the Egyptians and other nations would have raſhly eſtabliſhed a ceremony that cannot be performed without the utmoſt pain; they would no doubt have abhorred ſuch a difficult and diſgraceful rite, had not ſome very weighty reaſon induced them to introduce it amongſt themſelves. But what other reaſon can be given for their receiving it, except that they had learned either from the Iſraelites or their anceſtors, that God himſelf inſtituted it (37)? 5. It cannot be conceived that God going to enter into a ſolemn covenant with Abraham, ſhould confirm it by a ceremony already uſed by the idolatrous Egyptians, eſpecially ſince Abraham having been in Egypt, could not but know, that they were circumcis'd (38). 6. Finally, if we don't admit that circumciſion owes its riſe to the precept given to Abraham, it will be difficult to find any reaſon why, of all heathen nations the following only are circumciſed; namely, the Phœnicians, the Egyptians, thoſe of Colchos, the Ethiopians, the Idumeans, the Troglodytes, the Homerites, the Saracens, and the Turks. For that theſe only were circumciſed appears plainly by the teſtimonies of antient authors, quoted by Grotius.

(21) p. 90. edit. 4to.

(22) Can. Chron. p. 73. Ed. Franc. in 4to.

(23) Exod. iv. 24.

(24) Joſhua v. 5---9.

(25) Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. 1. p. 38. apud Marſham Can. Chron. p. 73.

(26) Herodot. l. 2. c. 37. ap. eund. p. 74.

(27) Herodot. lib. 2. c. 104. See alſo Strab. lib. 17. p. 824.

(28) Contra Apion. l. 1. c. p. 8.

(29) Diod. Sic. lib. 1. p. 17.

(30) Clericus in Gen. xvii. 10.

(31) Herodot. lib. 2. c. 78 & 91.

(32) Ubi ſupra.

(33) De Legib. Hebr. lib. 1. cap. 4. §. 4. p. 48.

(34) The ſacred and prophane hiſtory connected. vol. 2. p. 27.

(35) Shuckford. ibid. vol. 1. 325.

(36) Spencer de Leg. Hebr. l. 1. c. 4. §. 4. p. 53.

(37) Id. ibid. p. 54.

(38) Id. ibid.

the houſe or bought with money. Within a year after, Sarah was delivered of a ſon, according to the promiſe of God. But when Iſaac was come to be fifteen, or as others think, twenty five years old, God was pleaſed to tempt [G] Abraham, by commanding him to offer his beloved ſon for a burnt-offering. Abraham complied, and he had already ſtretched out his hand to ſlay the victim, when the Angel of the Lord called to him, and prevented his accompliſhing the ſacrifice, acquainting him, that God was ſatisfied with his readineſs to obey. This ſacrifice of Abraham, though not actually performed, has given the Infidels a plauſible pretence to cavil at the inſpiration of Moſes's hiſtory; we will examine their objections, and endeavour to anſwer them in the remarks [H]. Abraham had ſeveral other children by a woman called Keturah, but whether ſhe was really his wife, and whether he married her after Sarah's death, is not certain *. This Patriarch died in a good old age, being a hundred and ſeventy five years. The Muſulmans have a very great eſteem for Abraham, of whom they tell the following ſtory. This Patriarch, ſay they, was born in Chaldea, God having manifeſted himſelf to him, he began his prophetical functions by going to Mecca, and building there the temple that has been ſo famous in after ages, being returned home, he publickly declared that he was the Prophet of God, and notified it alſo to Nimroud, (thus they call Nimrod) King of Chaldea, who with all his ſubjects worſhipped Fire. Abraham met with Nimrod at Urga, a town in Meſopotamia, which was afterwards called Caramit, tius (39). But if we ſuppoſe that Abraham is the firſt who was ever circumciſed, we may eaſily find the reaſon why theſe nations only were circumciſed. For Grotius proves from unqueſtionable authorities, that all thoſe nations (the Egyptians and Phœnicians excepted) were deſcended from Abraham by Iſhmael, by the ſons of Keturah, by Eſau, and by the ten Tribes that were diſperſed (40). Thus we have laid together the moſt ſubſtantial reaſons, that are produced for and againſt the Divine original of circumciſion; and after Spencer's example, we leave the determination of this queſtion to the reader.

* See the Article KETURAH.

(39) De Verit. Relig. Chriſt. lib. 1. §. 16. note 68. p. 89.

(40) Spencer, ubi ſupra.

[G] God was pleaſed to tempt Abraham.] It ſeems very ſtrange that God ſhould here (41) be ſaid to tempt man, eſpecially ſince St. James teaches us (42), that as God cannot be tempted with evil, ſo neither tempteth he any man. And indeed, ſince God knows not only what men will do, but alſo what they would do in all poſſible circumſtances, ſince he ſees the inmoſt receſſes of their heart, one would think he has no occaſion to try them. They who maintain that God really tempted Abraham, ſay, he did not do it properly for his own ſake, but only that other people might know how great the Patriarch's faith was; but Mr. Le Clerc obſerves very juſtly, that nothing like this is ſo much as hinted in the Scriptures. He therefore thinks, that it was only an Angel, who having a mind to know how deeply Abraham's virtue was rooted in his heart, thought fit to try him by this extraordinary command (43). But how this agrees with the hiſtory of this Patriarch, and with the praiſes St. Paul beſtows upon him for his faith, let the reader judge.

(41) Gen. xxii. 1.

(42) James i. 13. Where the Apoſtle uſes the very ſame word πειράζων, which the Septuagint employ in Gen. xxii. 1.

(43) Le Clerc ad hunc locum.

[H] We will examine their objections, and endeavour to anſwer them.] That a merciful Being, who does not delight in the miſery of his creatures, ſhould require human ſacrifices, and order a father to butcher his own ſon, is what can never be reconciled with right reaſon. And that the father of mankind ſhould delight in cruelty, is abſolutely inconſiſtent with his moral character. If the nature of things is the rule of his actions, how can it be conceiv'd that he commands an action which is ſo far from procuring the good and benefit of a man, that it cannot but make him miſerable. Mr. Chub thinks, that in the caſe of Abraham the thing commanded was morally unfit (44); and ſo we preſume every ſenſible man will think. How then could ſuch command be given by a good and benevolent Being? Or if we ſuppoſe that the thing in itſelf was not unfit, it muſt at leaſt appear ſo to Abraham, which amounts to the ſame. How could he believe, that the ſame God, who had promis'd him a ſon, who had given him one in his old age, who had aſſur'd him that by that ſon he ſhould be the father of a numerous poſterity, would now command him to offer that beloved ſon for a burnt-offering? Would not Abraham have ſuſpected that this command was a deluſion of the Devil, ſince it was inconſiſtent not only with God's promiſes, but alſo with his benevolent nature? To this may be anſwer'd, firſt, That Abraham having convers'd ſo often and ſo familiarly with God, could not be miſtaken with regard to any revelation he receiv'd from him; we muſt ſuppoſe beſides, that God being reſolv'd to require ſuch a hard task from Abraham, would do it with ſo much clearneſs and evidence, as not to leave any room for doubts or ſcruples. That God can reveal himſelf in ſuch a manner, muſt be confeſs'd by all who have a right notion of his almighty power. Suppoſing then that Abraham was thoroughly convinced the command came from God, I anſwer, ſecondly, That the unfitneſs of the thing itſelf could not be an objection to his ready obedience; it was natural for him to reaſon after this manner: "This command I receive, appears to me cruel and unjuſt, inconſiſtent with the mercy of God, and ſeems to render all his promiſes void and ineffectual. But I know my merciful Father would not permit, that I ſhould fall into an unavoidable error; the frequent intercourſes I have had with him, perſuade me this is his expreſs command; and tho' it ſeems to me cruel to kill my own ſon, God is powerful to reward him in another manner. Tho' this ſacrifice God requires of me, ſeems inconſiſtent with his former promiſes, my God is faithful; he is infinitely wiſe; he will find out ſome other way to accompliſh his promiſe, tho' to that effect he ſhould raiſe my ſon from the dead (45): I am the rather inclin'd to think ſo, that I have receiv'd that ſon from God, at a time that I and my wife were in a manner like dead bodies, with regard to the procreation of children (46). He that gave me a child in my old age, is able to raiſe that ſame child from the dead, after I have offered it up for a burnt-offering, according to the expreſs command I receive from him." Abraham reaſoning after this manner, might well be perſuaded, that God had very good reaſons for the thing he required of him, though the thing it ſelf was in its nature immoral. But how can it be conceived that God himſelf ſhould command ſuch an inhuman ſacrifice, which from his benevolent nature, we muſt ſuppoſe he abhors? To this we may anſwer in the words of the ingenious Mr. Chub (47). "That God gave the command not with an intent that it ſhould be obeyed, but that he might take an occaſion from it, to ſhew to Abraham and to all his poſterity the unfitneſs of human ſacrifices." If this ſolution does not appear ſatisfactory, we beg leave to offer a conjecture which we ſubmit entirely to the reader's judgment. It is well known that the Scripture often aſcribes to God ſome actions, as tho' he were the immediate author of them, though he only permits them providentially. It is alſo agreed that the nations amongſt whom Abraham lived were wont to ſacrifice their own children to this falſe Deity: Why then could we not ſuppoſe, that Abraham was willing to give to the true God the ſame teſtimony of love and faith which the Heathens gave to their Idols? This ſo far from derogating from the merit of his faith, ſhews it was exceeding ſtrong, ſince he confided ſo much in his God, that he reſolved to offer up his only ſon to him, notwithſtanding the promiſe, that by this ſon he ſhould become the father of a numberleſs poſterity. God was pleaſed with the motive of Abraham's reſolution, though he abhorred the ſacrifice itſelf; and to ſhew his deteſtation of it, he ſtopped Abraham before he had compleated his deſign.

(44) Suppl. to the previous queſtion. p. 18.

(45) Heb. xi. 19.

(46) Rom. iv. 18, 19. See Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. p. 23.

(47) Suppl. to the previous queſtion, p. 18.

Caramit, and now Diarbekir. There was in this town a temple conſecrated to Fire; Abraham publickly intreated the King to renounce this idolatry, and to worſhip the only true God. Nimrod enraged at this conſulted the Magi, or Wiſe-men, who were the Prieſts of fire, and inquired what puniſhment was to be inflicted on ſuch a blaſphemer. Their anſwer was, that he muſt be delivered up to the flames. Hereupon the King ordered, a pile of wood to be prepared, and Abraham to be thrown upon it; but the wood could not be kindled. Nimrod aſtoniſhed at this, aſked the Prieſts, what was the cauſe of ſo ſtrange a phenomenon? They ſaid, that an Angel, flying about the pile, prevented its burning. How! ſaid the Tyrant, can we not drive away that Angel? Yes, replied the Prieſts, if ſome abominable action be committed near the pile of wood, the Angel will fly away rather than behold it. Nimrod hearing this, commanded a young man to commit inceſt with his own ſiſter before all the company: The Angel ſtill perſiſting to hinder the wood from burning, Nimrod quite tired and aſhamed baniſhed Abraham from his preſence, and out of his whole Empire (l). The Perſians have borrowed this from the Rabbis, who pretend that Abraham was delivered from the fire of the Chaldeans, (ſee Remark [A] in Mr. Bayle's article of Abraham, and the marginal note (14) there.) The Muſulmans further relate, that Nimrod made war againſt Abraham, and that it happened one day, as that Tyrant was going to fall upon the Patriarch with his whole army, he ſent a man to him, with this meſſage, O Abraham, it is now time to fight, where is thy army? Abraham anſwered, it will come immediately, and on a ſudden the air was darkened, and there came a cloud of gnats, which devoured Nimrod's ſoldiers to the very bones (m). See the Article IBRAHIM.

(l) Chardin, Voyages en Perſe, &c. tom. 9. p. 254.

(m) Id. ibid. tom. 5. p. 18. note 2.

☞ABRAHAM BEN MEIR, commonly called ABEN ESRA, a famous Rabbi was born at Toledo in Spain (a) according to the opinion of ſome authors, and lived in the twelfth Century (b). The Jews commonly call him חכם Hhaham, that is, the wiſe man [A]. He excelled in Philoſophy, Phyſick, Aſtronomy and Poetry; he was likewiſe a celebrated Grammarian, a Cabaliſt, and a Commentator of the holy Scripture [B]. He was ſkilled in ſeveral languages, particularly the Arabick. He was a man of a great genius, and ſo deſirous of improving his knowledge, that he paſſed away the greateſt part of his life in travelling. Having viſited England, France, Italy, Greece and ſeveral other countries, he died in the iſland of Rhodes in the ſeventy fifth year of his age (c) [C] A. C. 1165, according to father Simon (d). He wrote a great many books, among others, an Expoſition of the Holy Scriptures, which he explains in a very literal manner, and, according to father Simon (e), no Jewiſh author ever expounded them more judiciouſly; but his ſtile is ſometimes too ſhort and obſcure, which obliged ſome other Jews to write explanations upon his commentaries. We ſhall lay before the reader the rules which Aben Eſra gives for explaining the Scriptures [D]. He durſt not entirely reject the Cabala, though he knew it was not to be much depended upon, but he

(a) Jul. Bartolocci, Bibl. Mag. Rabb. p. 1. p. 36.
(b) Wolfius Bibl. Hebr. vol. 1. p. 72.

(c) Bartoloc. ibid
(d) Catal. des Auteurs Juifs. Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 536.
(e) Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 374.

[A] The Jews call him the wiſe man.] R. David Ganz (1) was of opinion, this epithet fell ſhort of Aben Eſra's abilities; he therefore calls him ſapientem magnum & mirabilem: that is, "a man greatly and wonderfully wiſe:" and Father Simon ſays (2) Aben Eſra was one of the moſt learned Rabbis that ever appear'd amongſt the Jews.

(1) Ad ann. 4938. apud Wolf. Bibl. Hebr. tom. 1. p. 72.
(2) Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 535.

[B] A celebrated commentator of the Holy Scriptures.] Inſtead of following the common method of thoſe who went before him, he ſtudied the grammatical and literal ſenſe of the Sacred Writings, which he expounded with ſo much penetration and judgment, that the Chriſtians themſelves give him the preference of their own commentators. He pav'd the way to thoſe critics who maintain that the Iſraelites did not paſs thro' the Red Sea, but only went round the ſhore, during the interval of low water, in order to tempt Pharaoh to follow them, that he might be drown'd by the tide's coming upon him (3).

(3) Baſnage's Hiſt. of the Jews, tom. 9. vol. 13. book 9. cap. 10. p. 259.

[C] In the ſeventy fifth year of his age.] This appears by what he ſaid when he found death drawing near. He applied to himſelf the words ſpoke of Abraham (4): Septuaginta quinque annorum erat Abraham cum egrederetur מחרך Mecharan, de Haran: "Abraham was ſeventy and five years old when he "departed out of Haran." By altering a little the laſt ſyllable, he made it מחרון Mecharon, and adding אף העולם aph hholam, that is, De æſtu iræ hujus ſæculi, "the vexatious anger of this world," then the words run thus; Abraham was ſeventy and five years old, when he went out of the vexatious anger of this world (5). Mr. Baſnage ſays he died A. C. 1174 (6). And Father Simon (7) ſays he was at Rome in 1146, and in the iſland of Rhodes in 1156, where he died in 1165: but which of them are in the right, cannot be well aſcertain'd.

(4) Gen. xii. 4.

(5) Bartolocci, ubi ſupra.
(6) Hiſt. of the Jews, tom. 9. vol. 13. p. 258.
(7) Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 536.

[D] The Rules which Aben Eſra gives for explaining the Scriptures.] He mentions five different methods of explaining the Scripture; the firſt relates to thoſe who enlarge very much upon every word, and are conſtantly making digreſſions, and incumbering their commentaries with every thing they know in Philoſophy, Mathematics, or any other ſcience. He gives an inſtance of a certain Rabbi call'd Iſaac, who wrote two books upon the firſt chapter of Geneſis; and he mentions ſome other Jews, who upon one ſingle word have wrote whole treatiſes of Philoſophy, Mathematics, or Cabala. Aben Eſra refutes this method, by maintaining, that to expound the Scriptures we muſt only interpret the words of the text; and that what relates to arts and ſciences muſt be explain'd in ſeparate books.

As to the ſecond method he mentions, ſee the remark [E].

The third method conſiſts in reducing every thing to allegories, and in finding myſteries every where, without having any regard to the literal ſenſe. Aben Eſra entirely explodes this method, it being difficult when one follows it, not to deviate from the literal ſenſe. However, he does not deny but there are ſome paſſages in the Scripture which admit of a more ſublime explication; ſuch are thoſe that relate to the Circumciſion of the Heart; but then that ſublime ſenſe is really the true and literal ſenſe. He alſo confeſſes there are ſome paſſages which we muſt allow to be myſterious; as that place in Geneſis (8), which mentions the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

(8) Gen. ii. 17.

The fourth method is that of the Cabaliſtical Jews, who reduce the whole ſenſe of the ſacred Writings to a vain and ridiculous playing upon words, and to myſteries founded upon the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, numbers and words broke and divided after an odd and fantaſtical manner. Aben Eſra explodes this method likewiſe, which the Jews ſeem to have borrow'd from the Platoniſts.

Finally, the fifth method of explaining the Scriptures, is to ſearch after the proper meaning of every word, he was afraid of drawing upon himſelf the hatred and ill-will of his contemporaries, who adhered very much to it, and of the common people who looked upon the book called Zohar, which is full of cabaliſtical explications, as a very valuable work: Aben Eſra only declared that this way of expounding the Scriptures was not ſafe, and that if the Cabala of their fathers was to be regarded, it was not proper to add new explications to theirs, nor to abandon the holy Scriptures to the humour of mankind. This cautiouſneſs of Aben Eſra was occaſioned by a diſpute which aroſe amongſt the Jews in his time, about the method of expounding the Scripture. The Talmudiſts would hinder their pupils from ſtudying the ſciences, and oblige them to follow their principles implicitly; alledging, that the ſtudy of languages and human learning had been condemned from the time of the Emperor Titus, leſt the people being diſperſed amongſt ſtrange nations, and captivated with the politeneſs of their writings, ſhould fall into their idolatry (f). This was making religion dependent upon tradition only. Aben Eſra was deeply engaged in this diſpute, calling thoſe Sadducees, who rejected tradition; but it is ſuppoſed, they were the Caraites, whom he miſtook for thoſe ancient hereticks, becauſe they were of the ſame opinion with them in this reſpect (g). Yet Aben Eſra did not run the ſame length with thoſe who followed tradition; but he found fault with the Caraites for rejecting them, deſpiſing authority, and confiding too much in their reaſon, like the Chriſtians. Theſe words drew the cenſure of father Simon upon him [E], but Mr. Baſnage defends him, as the reader may ſee in the remark E.

(f) Baſnage's Hiſtory of the Jews. tom. 9. v. 13. book 9. c. 5. p. 144.
(g) Ibid. p. 2601

word, and to expound it as literally as is poſſible; which Aben Eſra follow'd in his commentaries upon the Holy Scriptures: and he tells us that Onkelos, who wrote upon the Pentateuch, is generally very exact in the tranſlation, and diſcover'd ſeveral hidden things to the other Jews. Indeed he ſometimes follows an allegorical ſenſe; but he does it deſignedly, and only where the literal ſenſe is obvious to every capacity. Hence Aben Eſra concludes, that the Scriptures may be explain'd ſeveral ways, that are not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with the true or literal meaning: ſo that when we meet with two interpretations, one of which agrees with the tradition of ancient interpreters, it ought to be prefer'd to any other; and we muſt not always follow the method of the Caraites, who pretend that ſuch a tradition is to be exploded, when it is contrary to the rules of Writing and Grammar.

Theſe are the rules laid down by Aben Eſra for explaining the Scriptures; and tho' he has a great regard for the tradition of his anceſtors, yet he does not approve of the innumerable whimſies which are diſpers'd thro' all their works: and in all his Commentaries, he ever ſearches after the plaineſt and moſt literal ſenſe.

(9) Father Simon, ubi ſupra, p. 373, &c.

[E] The cenſure of father Simon upon him.] "Aben Eſra, ſays he (10), accuſes the Caraites, whom "he calls Sadducees, with conſulting their reaſon, "and deſpiſing authority; and he charges the Chriſtians with the ſame fault; this method, taken in "Aben Eſra's ſenſe, may indeed lead us into errors, "ſince religion comprehends ſeveral facts which reaſon alone cannot diſcover; but it muſt be obſerved, "that his charge againſt the Caraites and Chriſtians "is groundleſs, for they both explode thoſe traditions "only which they think not to be well founded, as "are moſt of thoſe mentioned in the Talmud; it "cannot, however, be denied, but the Caraites conſult their ſenſes and reaſon too much in points of "religion." Thus far father Simon. To this Mr. Baſnage replies (11), that this is altering the ſtate of the queſtion, and does not remove the difficulty, for no one is ſo weak as to reject what he thinks true, or to believe what appears to be evidently falſe; but the diſpute turned upon three points; firſt the Caraites would not allow that any new precepts ſhould be added to the law, though delivered under the ſpecious pretence of being a tradition tranſmitted from Moſes. Secondly, Aben Eſra and his followers objecting againſt the Caraites, the authority of their fathers, by whom tradition had been handed down to them, the Caraites would not admit that thoſe traditions were faithfully tranſmitted; this gave Aben Eſra a pretence of charging them with contemning the authority of the ancients. Thirdly, the principles of the Caraites being well connected together, they affirmed, that to underſtand the Scriptures, we ſhould conſult our own reaſon, and not follow that of others implicitly; upon this account Aben Eſra accuſes them with paying too much regard to reaſon. This Doctor's fault did not conſiſt then in charging the Caraites with opinions they did not maintain, but in oppoſing them, though they were rational and well grounded. Father Simon, who would by no means allow that the Caraites agree in this reſpect with the Proteſtants, is obliged to miſrepreſent their principles, and makes them reaſon inconſiſtently. The Chriſtians, no doubt, fell, at that time, into the ſame way of reaſoning with the Caraites, being particularly obliged to reject tradition when they entered into any diſpute with the Jews, who objected againſt their adverſaries an uninterrupted ſucceſſion of Doctors, who all explained the Scriptures after a different manner from that of the Chriſtians. It was likewiſe the opinion of the primitive Chriſtians that religion ought not to be founded upon tradition or the ſucceſſion of Doctors. Thus far Mr. Baſnage; and we hope our readers will not be offended with the obſervations of that great man.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ubi ſupra.

☞ABRAHAM USQUE, a Portugueſe Jew, tranſlated the Old Teſtament out of Hebrew into Spaniſh [A]. This tranſlation was firſt printed at Ferrara in the year 1553 (a); 'tis a verbal tranſlation, ſo that it's very difficult to underſtand it; and beſides, it is written in obſolete Spaniſh, which was uſed only in the Synagogues. The author of the preface aſſures us, that he follow'd as much as poſſible Pagninus and his Dictionary: but Father Simon is of opinion, that he declar'd this only that his tranſlation might not be miſtruſted as heretical by the Inquiſitors (b). It is probable that Abraham Uſque made uſe of ancient gloſſes written by ſome Spaniſh Jews [B], and which renders his

(a) Simon Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 310.
(b) Id. ibid.

[A] Tranſlated the old Teſtament into Spaniſh.] This being a critical Dictionary, it is agreeable to our plan to take notice of the errors which authors may have committed. Mr. Arnauld Doctor of the Sorbonne has quoted ſeveral Bibles which are not to be found, and he ſuppoſed this tranſlation of Abraham Uſque was done by a Chriſtian. He alſo cites a French tranſlation of the Bible, as though it were done by a Roman Catholick, though Calvin is certainly the author of it (1). It appears by this how little we may depend upon moſt writers, and how neceſſary a work of this kind is, in which the errors of the moſt eminent authors are corrected, ſince ſo famous a man as Mr. Arnauld, committed ſuch egregious blunders.

(1) Simon Bibl. Crit. tom. 3. p. 415.

[B] Written by ſome Spaniſh Jews.] Some authors aſcribe to D. Kimhi a Spaniſh tranſlation of the Bible, his tranſlation entirely barbarous and almoſt unintelligible (c). The compiler (for it ſeems it was only a kind of compilation) was ſo well appriz'd of the difficulties of tranſlating the Holy Scriptures, that he thought it incumbent on him to mark with ſtars or aſterisks, a great many paſſages in which the ſenſe appear'd dubious or uncertain [C]; but they who reprinted that tranſlation in 1630, with ſome improvements, left out the greateſt part of thoſe aſterisks, whereas they ſhould rather have increas'd them (d). This tranſlation can be of no uſe but to the Spaniſh Jews, unleſs we conſider it as a kind of Dictionary, which may ſerve for a literal tranſlation to the Hebrew words; it may alſo ſerve inſtead of a Grammar, the nouns and verbs in it being interpreted exactly according to the grammatical rules. Nevertheleſs, the tranſlator has not always been ſcrupulouſly accurate as he propos'd, nor in every reſpect very happy in the choice of the Rabbi's, whom he intended to follow; for there are a great many paſſages might be tranſlated more exactly than he has render'd them, either with regard to the ſenſe or to the grammar. Sometimes he follows the Chaldaical paraphraſe, ſometimes R. Kimhi, in other places Raſci, Abou Eſra, or ſome other Rabbi: but he is not very judicious in his choice; and the grammatical exactneſs, to which he keeps cloſely, does not always agree with the free ſenſe of the words [D]; and yet he has not been accurate enough, even with regard to grammar, for in ſeveral paſſages he has left out ſome particles, and thereby entirely perverted the ſenſe.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Ibid.

ABRAHAM ECCHELLENSIS, ſee ECCHELLENSIS.

which he never dreamt of; but it is true that the Jews of Spain, and eſpecially thoſe that procured the Ferrara edition had anciently ſome gloſſes or notes, written in the Spaniſh language, of which Kimhi might be the author (2), and which Abraham Uſque made uſe of in his tranſlation.

(2) Id. ibid. p. 414.

[C] Paſſages in which the ſenſe appeared dubious and uncertain.] The words in Geneſis i. 2. where the vulgar Latin has ferebatur, and our tranſlation moved, Abraham Uſque tranſlates it, ſe movit, moved it ſelf, and puts a ſtar over that word, to ſignify that it is equivocal in the Hebrew, and may be differently rendred. This, as we have obſerved, he does in a great many places, to ſhew how uncertain the Hebrew tongue is (3).

(3) Ibid. p. 415.

[D] The grammatical exactneſs does not always agree with the true ſenſe.] Mr. Simon (4) obſerves very juſtly, that in a Dictionary the proper meaning of every word muſt be rendered, but in a tranſlation a writer is often obliged to depart from the natural and proper ſenſe of the words, in order to make the whole ſentence coherent. This is true of all books in general in what language ſoever, but is particularly true of the Bible: and one could eaſily prove that a great part of the difficulties which occur in the Scriptures are grounded on texts that are too literally tranſlated; and ſometimes men form particular opinions on texts thus grammatically but nonſenſically rendered: for it muſt be obſerved, that as languages were not formed by Philoſophers or Grammarians, but by the Vulgar, and by uſe and cuſtom, we muſt not lay too great a ſtreſs on the conſtruction, but conſider the intention of the writer, and the whole tenor of his diſcourſe.

(4) Hiſt. Crit. du V. T. p. 312.

☞ABRAHAM King of Ethiopia, began to reign in 448 [A], and ſat twenty ſeven years upon the throne, viz. thirteen years with his brother Azba, and fourteen years alone, according to Marius Victorius. This Prince was very zealous for the Chriſtian religion. It is related, that he confined all the ſons of the royal family in a ſtrong hold [B]; leſt ambition ſhould prompt them to the commiſſion of ſome crimes;

[A] In 448.] According to Father Lobo (1), the Abyſſins aſſert to this day, that Abraham, one of their Kings, who reign'd after Lalibala, was not only a Prieſt, but that two angels always brought him the ſacramental bread and wine. Abuſelah, quoted in Lobo (2), tells us, Ethiopiæ reges omnes ſunt ſacerdotes, Liturgiam celebrantes ſuper altaria; & quamdiu regnum obtinent, nihil quid quam manu propria occidere ſolent: ſi quis contra fecerit, amittit jus Liturgiæ, &c. That is, "All the Kings of Ethiopia "are Prieſts, and ſolemnize the holy rites on the altar. "So long as they enjoy the crown, they are not to kill "any thing with their own hands; and if any of "them does this, he is never allow'd to ſolemnize "the myſteries any more. The King at his entrance "into the ſanctuary always takes off his crown, "which is the characteriſtic of his dignity. He then "continues ſtanding, and bare-headed, till the people "have receiv'd the ſacrament; which every one does. "And if he himſelf will receive it, he muſt do it "after all the reſt. And if he kills any thing, all "compacts or obligations which had bound his ſubjects to him are diſſolved.

(1) Voyage Hiſtorique d'Abiſſinie. p. 241. Paris 1728.

(2) Idem, p. 240.

[B] That he confin'd all the ſons of the royal family in a ſtrong hold.] We meet with the particulars of this in Father Lobo (3). "Formerly, ſays he, the "Princes were kept as priſoners on the mountain of "Guexen. Enquiry was made into the conduct and "inclinations of each, and when one of them was "appointed to reign, the Viceroy or Governor of "Tigrey (4) went, accompanied by ſome of the "chiefs and a body of troops to bring the new King. "The Governor drew up his ſoldiers at the foot of "the rock, and went, with the [illegible], to the apartment of the Sovereign elect, fixed a golden buckle "to his ear, which was the firſt characteriſtic of his "dignity; after which, all the reſt of the Princes were "ordered to come and recognize and ſalute their "King. Theſe Princes were immediately ſent back "to confinement, when the new Monarch came "down to the foot of the mountain, and ſhewed "himſelf to his troops. The principal officers being "alighted, ſaluted the King, then conducted him into "the tent which had been prepared for him. Thus "he entred on horſeback, then alighting, one of "the chiefs among the Clergy anointed him with "fragrant oil, all the Prieſts ſinging pſalms in chorus. "After this the King was cloathed with the royal "mantle, the crown was ſet on his head, a naked "ſword was put into his hand, and he was ſeated on "the throne. Then the High-Almoner went up to "an eminence, when he proclaimed to the people "and the army, that they had made ſuch an one "King. The multitude anſwered by acclamations, "beſtowing innumerable bleſſings on the King, and "wiſhing him every kind of proſperity." This author tells us afterwards (5), that this cuſtom of confining the Princes after having continued two hundred years, till the reign of Naod father of David, was aboliſhed. There were ſome particular circumſtances at the coronation of Suſney in 1609, one of which was (6), "The King being come near to the church "of Axume, alighted from his horſe, when ſeveral "little girls held a cord or line croſs the ſtreet in order to ſtop him. Theſe asked him three times who "he was, upon which the King drew back, and "anſwered, that he was King of Jeruſalem and of "Zion. The children anſwered, that he was not "their King, but upon their asking the queſtion a "third time, he drew his ſword, cut the line, and "all

(3) Voyage Hiſtor. d'Abiſſinie. p. 252.

(4) Tigremæon, probably.

(5) P. 254.

(6) Ibid. p. 252.

crimes; and enacted, that he only who was to ſucceed to the crown, ſhould enjoy his liberty, which cuſtom, it is ſaid, ſtill prevails in Ethiopia. There were ſeveral other Ethiopian Princes called Abraham. Genebrard in Chron. Alvarez c. 58. Hiſt. Æthiop.

" all the girls cried aloud that he was their true " King, the King of Zion; then a noiſe was heard " of drums, trumpets and other inſtruments." The ſame author informs us, that the Ethiopians have but a confuſed catalogue of their Kings, and neither the age nor the years they reigned are expreſt in it (8). Their moſt famous Monarch was Lalibala, of whom the Ethiopians relate wonderful things. " The bleſ- " ſed Lalibala Emperor of Ethiopia, ſays Father " Telhes, that pure contemplator of the celeſtial " myſteries, died. When this Saint was born, his " parents were determined to bring him up in the " fear of the Lord; and being grown up, the Emperor " his brother who ſuperintended his education, knew " that he was to ſucceed him; but he was ſo envious " upon that account, that he cauſed him to be whip- " ped a long time together, but not a ſingle ſtroke " fell upon him, for an Angel of the Lord ſcreened " him, and told him that before he died he ſhould " build ten churches, which he did, and died in " peace (9)." Formerly theſe Kings never uſed to ſhew themſelves, but they do it three or four times a year, but are never ſeen at dinner, except by thoſe who feed them, and whenever they give audience they ſtand behind a curtain.

(8) Ibid. p. 247.

(9) Ibid. p. 249, 255.

ABRAM (NICHOLAS) a Lorrain Jeſuit, born in the dioceſe of Toul, anno 1589, entered into the ſociety in 1606, and took the fourth vow in * 1623. He was well verſed in polite literature, and appeared to his ſuperiors ſo great a Divine, that he was made Divinity-Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Pont-a-Mouſſon. He enjoyed that employment ſeventeen years, and died the ſeventh of September 1655. Abram had taught polite literature, before he was made Divinity-Profeſſor (a). He publiſhed ſeveral books [A]; as he was a diſtinguiſhed writer, it is ſurprizing he was ſo little known in foreign countries [B].

(a) Extracted from Nathan Satuel, Bibl. Societat. Jeſu, p. 622.

* The fourth vow (thoſe common to other Religions being, of Poverty, Chaſtity, and Obedience; is, that they will labour at the ſalvation of others, by inſtructing youths, preaching, adminiſtring the ſacraments, and by going miſſionaries among Heretics and Idolaters.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Notes on the Paraphraſe of St. John's Goſpel, written in Greek verſe by Nonnus; A Commentary of ſome of Tully's Orations; A Commentary on Virgil; a collection of theological treatiſes, entitled, Pharus veteris Teſtamenti, ſive ſacrarum quæſtionum Libri XV. Axioms or Maxims of the Chriſtian Life, and a Hebrew Grammar in Latin verſe. He tranſlated into French, Bartolis's Italian pieces intitled, The Life of Vinant Caraffa; The Man of Letters; and Contented Poverty (1). His commentary on Cicero is a very laborious work; the logical analyſes thereof are valuable and accurate, and the notes abound with literature; but as he has been too profuſe of his learning and of his reflections, he is inexpreſſibly tedious. This commentary, though it includes but the laſt volume of orations to the ſecond Philippic incluſive, is nevertheleſs ſwelled to two volumes in folio, which were printed at Paris in 1631. His commentary on Virgil is leſs prolix, and by that means has been more uſeful to ſchools. To his Pharus veteris Teſtamenti (2), a long treatiſe, De veritate & mendacio (of truth and falſhood) is added, in which he is far from giving into the maxims of the rigid Caſuiſts. Mr. de la Monnoie informs us, firſt, that this Jeſuit has added threeſcore and eleven Greek verſes, to complete the adulterous woman, in the 8th chapter of Nonnus's paraphraſe (3). Secondly, That Reineſius mentions this Nicholas Abram, in page 155 of his letters Ad Hoffmanum & Rupertum. I had recourſe to it and find the following elogium. Si me cum tot rationibus audire hic noles, vel hujus (Nic. Abrami) auctoritati cede. Eſt enim ſane quam doctiſſimus, & maxime idoneus explicando Tullio. That is, " If you will not liſten to theſe many reaſons I give, " yield however to the authority of this Abram; for " he is certainly a very learned man, and very well " qualified to explain Tully." To this teſtimony, let us add that of another learned man of the ſame country. Ad intelligendas, adque ad uſum transferendas Orationes Ciceronis ſufficit commentarius Jo. Thomæ Freigii, niſi quis addere malit prolixos Commentarios Nicolai Abrami Jeſuitæ multa rerum varietate inſtructos (4). That is, " The Commentary of J. Thom. " Freigius, is ſufficient for the underſtanding and ap- " plying of Tully's Orations, unleſs any one would " chuſe rather to add the prolix commentaries of " Nic. Abram the Jeſuit, which abound with a great " variety of matter.

(1) Nathan Satuel, Bibl. Script. Societat. Jeſu, p. 622.

(2) Printed in Paris, anno 1648, in folio.

(3) This is a miſtake; for the verſes here mentioned, were added by Francis Nanſius, who publiſhed an edition of Nonnus in 1589. Mr. de la Croze informs me, that Father Simon takes notice of this in p. 330 of his Critical Hiſtory on Commentators.

(4) Joh. Andreas Boſius de prudentia & eloquentia comparandâ. p. 400.

[B] So little known in foreign countries.] His Notes on Nonnus's Paraphraſe were printed at Paris, for Sebaſtian Cramoiſi in 1622, but Heinſius does not ſeem to have heard of them, when he publiſhed the ſame Paraphraſe with a large Commentary in 1627. This is what he entitles Ariſtarchus Sacer. Nor had our Jeſuit's Notes come to Dr. Cave's notice, ſince he does not mention them when he ſpeaks of the various editions of Nonnus (5). Aubertus Miræus and Father Oudin are ſilent on them, the former in his Auctarium de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, printed in 1639: the latter in his Supplementum de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, printed in 1686. Father Simon cites this work of Nicholas Abraham (6) in ſuch a manner, as plainly ſhews he eſteems it, and that it deſerves to be known. But here follows a more ſingular circumſtance, Martin Schoockius, who was remarkable chiefly for his prodigious reading, declared in the latter part of his life, that he had never heard of ſuch an author as Nicholas Abraham. Hanc ſi tuitus fuerit neſcio quis Nicolaus Abrahamus (jam primitùs eum noſſe incipio) prolixo examine haud opus fuiſſet (7). That is, " Had one Nic. Abraham, (Abram) for this " is the firſt time I ever heard of him, ſeen this, there " would have been no occaſion of a long diſcuſſion.

(5) Hiſtoria literaria ſcriptorum eccleſiaſticorum. p. 299 of the London edit. in folio, anno 1688.

(6) Critical Hiſt. on the Comment. on the New Teſtament. c. 23.

(7) Schoockius de fœnore unciario. p. 107. printed in 1688.

☞ ABSALOM, the ſon of David by Maacah the daughter of Talmou King of Geſhur (a), was brother to Thamar, David's daughter, who was raviſhed by Amnon [A], their eldeſt brother, by another mother. Abſalom waited two years for an opportunity

(a) 1 Chron. iii. 2.

[A] Raviſh'd by Amnon.] We find, according to our tranſlation, that when David heard of this, he was very wroth; but the vulgar tranſlation has given a very different repreſentation of this matter. Cum autem audiſſet Rex David verba hæc contriſtatus eſt valdè, & noluit contriſtare ſpiritum Amnon filii, quoniam diligebat eum, quia primogenitus erat ei, i. e. " When King David heard of theſe things, he af- " flicted himſelf extremely; but he would not make " his ſon Amnon uneaſy on that account, becauſe he " loved him, as he was his firſt-born (1)." The latter part of this verſe, Et noluit contriſtare, &c. is not in the Hebrew, nor in any of the verſions, which are made from the Hebrew text. St. Jerom has not inſerted it in his tranſlation. But the Greeks have added theſe words in ſome of their copies (2), and Joſephus (3) manifeſtly read them in thoſe copies which he made uſe of; and it is not improbable, that he gave occaſion to the Greeks to add it to their copies. It is difficult to excuſe David's ſilence and diſſimulation in that affair, eſpecially if he acted upon no other motive than his particular fondneſs for Amnon. Perhaps as he knew himſelf to have been guilty, he could not eaſily reſolve to puniſh a crime, which his own example might have given occaſion to. I ſay this upon the ſuppoſition that the latter clauſe of the verſe be genuine; though it is generally doubted by the beſt critics.

(1) 2 Sam. xiii. 21.

(2) Edit. Nobilii.

(3) L. 7. c. 7.

opportunity of revenging the injury done to his ſiſter, and at laſt procured Ammon to be aſſaſſinated at a feaſt, which he had prepared for the King's ſons. Upon this he fled for refuge to Talmai King of Geſhur, and continued at his court three years; till at laſt, by means of Joab, he had obtained leave of David to return home, on condition that he would never offer to appear before the King. After he had ſtaid two years at Jeruſalem, baniſhed from his father's ſight, he ſent to Joab in order to engage him to ſpeak to David in his favour. But Joab delaying to anſwer his meſſage, he gave orders to ſet his field on fire; which induced Joab to come and expoſtulate with him upon the injury, while the other prevailed upon him to ſollicit his father for leave to ſee him; which he obtained. Abſalom was no ſooner reſtored to favour, but he begun to conſpire againſt his father. He inſinuated himſelf into the people's affections by all the arts and addreſs imaginable; his converſation was extremely affable and courteous, and his perſon prodigiouſly beautiful. Theſe advantages promoted his ambitious deſigns; and in order to carry them on, he pretended that he had made a vow during his exile to ſacrifice at Hebron, and accordingly went thither. There he procured himſelf to be proclaimed King, and engaged the Iſraelites to revolt from his father [B], who was obliged to fly from Jeruſalem. Abſalom came thither ſoon after, and lay with his father's concubines, agreeably to Ahitophel's counſel [C], who likewiſe adviſed him to purſue David, while his troops were yet weary with the flight. But this advice of his was defeated by Huſhai, who was ſecretly in David's intereſt, and repreſented that it would be very dangerous to attack men, whoſe circumſtances had made them deſperate. Ahitophel ſeeing he was neglected in this point hanged himſelf out of deſpair [D], while Huſhai ſent David adviſe to paſs over Jordan immediately [E]. Abſalom's army, though vaſtly ſuperior in number, was defeated in [B] Engaged the Iſraelites to revolt from his father.] It may ſeem at firſt a little ſurprizing, that Abſalom ſhould be able to draw ſuch a prodigious number of the people to a revolt againſt a King ſo eminent for his merit and victories as David was. But we ſhall ceaſe to wonder at this, if we conſider that a great many perſons who had a conſiderable intereſt under Saul's government, were then neglected; that others, who had followed Iſhboſheth's party, were apprehenſive of puniſhment; that Joab's cruelty being permitted to go with impunity, had drawn an odium upon the King, who ſuffered him to treat the people with ſuch outrage and violence; add to this David's own perſonal crimes; his adultery and murder, which muſt unavoidably make men jealous of being injured in the moſt ſenſible part of their property, their wives chaſtity, and their own lives; beſides, the name and power of Bathſheba muſt certainly be very hateful to the women. All theſe circumſtances might very eaſily diſpoſe the nation to a revolt. We have many inſtances of the ill effects which the unbounded luſt of Kings has had upon their government. It was this that was the occaſion of the expulſion of the Piſiſtratidæ and the Tarquinii, and of many other Princes, who are mentioned by Ariſtotle in his Politics, lib. 1. c. 10.

[C] Lay with his father's concubines, agreeably to Ahitophel's counſel.] Ahitophel adviſed him to do this, that a reconciliation between Abſalom and his father might be rendered impoſſible, and that the people who had joined themſelves to his party, might by this means be aſſured, that all hopes of agreement between them would inevitably be cut off. Ahitophel knew the inconſtant humour of the Jews; and he was reſolved to fix them in Abſalom's intereſt, by the conſideration that they could hope for no pardon from David. He ſhewed them the neceſſity of ſupporting the Prince whom they had placed upon the throne, unleſs they were willing to expoſe themſelves to the vengeance of the conqueror, if ever he ſhould recover the kingdom. The inſult which Abſalom offered to his father was the moſt ſhocking that a ſon could poſſibly be guilty of. Jacob even to his death ſhewed Reuben his ſon how ſenſible he was of ſuch an injury (4). Homer tells us, that Phœnix having committed inceſt with one of his father Amyntor's concubines, that Prince curſed him in the moſt ſolemn manner, and devoted him to all the Furies (5). Armais, the brother of Seſoſtris, uſed his brother's miſtreſſes when he was abſent, in the ſame manner as Abſalom did thoſe of his father. This was the only thing that Seſoſtris had forbid him at his departure; and Armais never attempted this outrage, till he had reſolved to raiſe a rebellion (6). It appears that Ahitophel thought that Abſalom had a right to his predeceſſor's wives, which was the general cuſtom among the Perſians, as we find from the example of Smerdis the Magus, who made uſe of the ſame concubines, which Cambyſes his predeceſſor had done. Ἔχει αὐτῷ ὁ Καμβύσης θυγατέρα τῇ οὔνομα ἦν Φαιδύμη; τὴν αὐτὴν δὴ ταύτην εἶχε τότε ὁ Μάγος: καὶ ταύτῃ συνοίκεε, καὶ τῇσι ἄλλῃσι πάσῃσι τῇσι τοῦ Καμβύσεω γυναιξί (7). i. e. "Cambyſes had his daughter, whoſe name was "Phædyma. The Magus took her and lived with her, "and with all the other wives of Cambyſes." In this ſtory we may obſerve, that this Magus had aſſumed the perſon of Tanyoxaris, the brother of Cambyſes, and yet the Perſians did not think it ſtrange, that a brother ſhould take the miſtreſſes of his deceaſed brother. We may conclude from this fact of Abſalom, that this practice was very common in the antient times, and among the other Eaſtern Princes.

[D] Hanged himſelf out of deſpair.] Some writers pretend that he died of a quinſey (8); others that he was choaked with rage to ſee Abſalom's party ruined by ſuch imprudent counſel. Others tell us, that he procured himſelf to be ſtrangled by one of his ſervants. But the general opinion of commentators is, that he hanged himſelf out of deſpair, when he ſaw that if David had time given him to collect his forces and fortify himſelf, Abſalom muſt inevitably be deſtroyed. We may obſerve here that the Jews at that time did not refuſe burial, or aſſign any infamous puniſhment to thoſe who were guilty of Suicide, ſince Ahitophel was buried peaceably in the ſepulchre of his father. Joſephus tells us, that thoſe who killed themſelves are hated by God and man, and that Moſes condemned them to remain unburied till ſun-ſet; tho' even the enemies, who were killed in battle, were allowed the favour of a burial. Διὰ τοῦτο μιμισήτως παρὰ τῷ θεῷ τοῦτο, καὶ παρὰ τῷ σοφωτάτῳ καλάζειτες νομοθέτῃ. Τὰς γοῦ ἀνέλοντας ἑαυτοὺς παρὰ μὲν ἡμῖν μικρὰς ἡλίε δύσεως ἀτάφους κρύπτειν ἔκειναν. Καί τοι καὶ πολεμίους θάπτειν θεμιτὸν ἡγούμενοι (9). But we have no law of Moſes extant upon that point. We find, according to Joſephus's account, that ſelf-murderers were treated in the ſame manner as thoſe were who were hanged for any crimes (10).

[E] Huſhai ſent David advice to paſs over Jordan immediately.] We ſee that Huſhai went over to Abſalom's party at David's deſire, in order to betray him. This action ſeems not very honourable either to the King, or to his friend Huſhai. It is acknowledged indeed Abſalom was a traytor and a rebel to his father; but is it lawful to do evil, or to adviſe it, that good may come from it? Is it lawful to uſe treachery towards a traytor, or to impoſe upon a liar by fictions and lies? Will the crimes of ſuch perſons juſtify the ill things which we do in return? It is anſwered to this, that David did not adviſe Huſhai to betray Abſalom, or to violate the laws of friendſhip and truth in that caſe. He only deſired him to go over and join Abſalom, in order to defeat the pernicious counſels of Ahitophel, as a General ſends ſpies into the enemy's

(4) Gen. xlix. 4.

(5) Iliad. l. i.

(6) Joſeph. l. 1. contra Apion.

(7) Herod. l. 3. c. 68.

(8) Quidam Hebræi apud Sanct. See Gronovius's Diſſert. de Judâ Proditore.

(9) L. 3. c. 11. de Bello Judaic.

(10) Deuteron. xxi. 22.

in the wood of Ephraim [F], and twenty thouſand men were ſlain. As he was flying his head caught hold of an oak, and he was ſuſpended in the air [G], till Joab came and thruſt him through with three darts [H]. David had expreſly ordered his life to be ſpared. His body was caſt into a great pit in the wood, and covered with a heap of ſtones [I]. He was extremely lamented by his father (b). This happened A. M. 3012, before the Chriſtian Æra 1023. He had in his life-time raiſed himſelf a pillar in the King's Dale, in order to perpetuate his memory [K]. He had three ſons and one daughter [L]. The enemy's camp to diſcover what paſſes there; or as a Prince keeps up an intelligence in foreign courts, to penetrate into his enemies deſigns, and countermine the reſolutions which they may take to his prejudice. It was Abſalom's buſineſs to ſtand upon his guard. The unjuſt war which he had declared againſt his father, gave the latter a right to treat him as an enemy, and to employ artifice, as well as open force againſt him. It is never ſuppoſed unlawful for a perſon in time of war to diſguiſe his real intentions. The uſe of ſtratagem, which has always been allowed, is founded upon this. However, we are not obliged to juſtify David in all his actions, and therefore every one may think of this as he pleaſes (11).

(b) 2 Sam. i. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19.

(11) See Father Calmet, Comment. Litter. ſur le 2 Livre des Rois, ch. 15. ver. 34.

[F] Abſalom's army .... was defeated in the wood of Ephraim.] The Scripture tells us, that the wood devoured more people than the ſword. Some of them were deſtroyed by the precipices; others were trodden to death by thoſe who fled; others died of their wounds, or were ſtarved to death. Joſephus aſſures us, that a greater number periſhed as they fled thro' woods and down precipices, than in the fight. Φεύγοντας δὲ διὰ δρυμῶν καὶ φαράγγων ἐπόμενοι τοὺς μὲν ἐλαύνοντες, πολλοὺς δὲ ἀνῄρουν, ὡς φεύγοντας πεσεῖν πλείονας ἢ μαχομένους (12). The Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic verſions, and the Rabbis tell us, that more people were deſtroyed by wild beaſts in the wood, than by the ſword.

(12) Joſeph. l. 7. c. 9.

[G] His head caught hold of an oak, and he was ſuſpended in the air.] He hung there having nothing to ſupport him; and his neck was ſo wedged between the boughs by the ſwift motion of the mule, that he was not able to diſengage himſelf (13). Joſephus is of opinion that he hung by his hair, which being very long was wrapt about the boughs of the tree (14). And the great Bochart is of the ſame opinion in his Epiſtle about the weight of Abſalom's hair; though in another work of his (15) he ſays only, that he ſtuck between the boughs of the trees, and his beaſt going from under him, he hung between heaven and earth. Hæſit inter ramos arborum, & jumento prætergreſſo pependit inter cælum & terram. The learned Sebaſt. Schmidius (16) having obſerved that Theodoret was of opinion that Abſalom hung between the boughs of the tree by his head, and not by his hair, tells us, that this is contrary to the general opinion. But the latter muſt certainly be falſe, ſince it is not founded upon expreſs words of Scripture. In anſwer to this, that author urges, that the Hebrew text ſays, that his head caught hold of the oak, which could not be done but by means of his hair. But there ſeems to be no reaſon to underſtand the words יומק ראשו באלה, i. e. He held his head in the oak, (of his hair;) and it is not probable that he was without an helmet, which covered it. And beſides it is ſaid afterwards, that Joab ſmote him while he was yet alive, in the middle of the oak, which had been no wonder, if he had only hung by the hair, for that would not have killed him; whereas, when Joab came to him, he was yet not quite dead, but very near it.

(13) Biſhop Patrick upon the 2d Book of Samuel, ch. xviii. ver. 9.

(14) Joſeph. ubi ſupra.

(15) Hierozoicon, Part 1. l. 2. c. 9.

(16) Apud Joan. Clericum, Commentar. in 2 Sam. xviii. 9.

[H] Joab came and thruſt him through with three darts.] Our tranſlation tells us, that Joab thruſt them through the heart of Abſalom. But the original word does not ſignify that part, which is ſtrictly called the heart; for then he would have died immediately, and there would have been no need of his ſoldiers falling upon him, as we read they did in the following verſe, but it means the midſt of his body, which did not kill him directly, but there was ſtill ſome life remaining in him (17). Kimchi has a conceit that ſome of Abſalom's crimes are legible in his puniſhment; for he was thruſt through with three darts, having firſt ſtolen the heart of the King; and then of the two hundred men that followed him out of Jeruſalem; and then of all Iſrael; and as he committed inceſt with his father's ten concubines, ſo ten young men compaſſed him about, and killed him. There is a queſtion ſtarted, whether Joab acted amiſs in killing Abſalom, contrary to the expreſs command of David.

(17) Biſhop Patrick and le Clerc in locum.

To this it is anſwered (18), that Joab upon that occaſion was obliged to regard the intereſt of the State, and that of the King himſelf, more than David's particular inclination for his ſon, and his orders, which were plainly contrary to ſtrict juſtice, as well as the King's ſafety. Abſalom was a traytor, a rebel, and the moſt dangerous enemy to the kingdom. The law of God condemned him to death as a ſon, who had revolted againſt his father (19), and as an inceſtuous perſon (20). The King had no right to be heard in this affair, ſince he ſhewed more regard to his own private affection, than to the general good of his ſubjects. The world has always extolled thoſe fathers, who have ſacrificed their paternal tenderneſs to the advantage of their kingdom. Theſe reaſons might determine Joab to kill Abſalom, ſince he was thus an enemy to his King and country. He had before deſerved death for the murder of Amnon; and though David had received him into favour after this action, and ſhewn him all the kindneſs and indulgence imaginable, yet he was ſo baſe as to attempt his father's life and kingdom, and had proſecuted his deſigns to the laſt extremity. So that there was not the leaſt ground to expect, that a man of his ambitious and cruel temper would ever be reclaimed.

(18) Grot. in loc.

(19) Deut. xxi. 18, 21.

(20) Levit. xviii. 29.

[I] His body was .... covered with a great heap of ſtones.] This was done likewiſe to Achan, who was ſtoned to death in the valley of Achor (21). Adricomius, in his Deſcription of the Holy Land, ſays, that this heap remained till his time; and all travellers, as they paſſed by it, uſed to caſt a ſtone to add to the heap, in deteſtation of his rebellion againſt his father. The learned Mr. John Doughtey (22) has ſhewn from many inſtances, that ſuch monuments as theſe were raiſed in honour of perſons of merit among the Grecians; but it is not probable, that David's army intended this as any mark of their reſpect for Abſalom.

(21) Joſhua vii. 26.

(22) Analecta Sacra p. 1. Excurſ. 95.

[K] He had in his life time rais'd himſelf a pillar in the King's Dale, in order to perpetuate his memory.] This Dale is mentioned in Geneſ. xiv. 17. and was not far from Jeruſalem. There he deſigned to perpetuate his name by a magnificent ſtructure, as Raſi and ſeveral other Jewiſh Doctors imagine. Doubdan in his Voyage to the Holy Land, ch. 15. ſays, that this fabric ſtill remains in the valley of Jehoſaphat. But this is certainly a ſuppoſititious monument, as Wagenſeil obſerves (23). For Joſephus, who deſerves more credit than theſe later authors, ſays, it was only a marble pillar στήλη λίθου μαρμαρίου, about two furlongs from Jeruſalem (24), in a place where the King's horſes run races, as we are told by ſome writers, and where other exerciſes uſed to be performed (25). Mr. Doughtey abovementioned has ſhewn, that it was very frequent among the Greeks to place ſuch pillars upon their tombs (26); but the pillar which is here ſpoken of did not belong to a tomb, but to a Cenotaphium. This pillar of Abſalom was called Abſalom's Place, according to our Engliſh tranſlation; but the Hebrew word יד Jad ſignifies an Hand; that is his work. Rabbi Kimchi obſerves, that this word ſometimes is the ſame with Makom, a place, as in Iſaiah lvi. 5. We find in the Hebrew text (27) that Saul ſet him up an Hand or Place in mount Carmel [מציב לזוך] which the author of the Vulgate tranſlation underſtands of a triumphal arch, as a monument of his victory againſt the Amalekites. The Jews (28) imagine that Abſalom had time allowed him, after he was diſentangled from the oak, to erect this monument, which was called Abſalom's Hand, becauſe he had ordered an Hand to be graven upon it.

(23) Wagenſ. upon Sota, p. 221.

(24) Joſeph. Antiq. l. 7. c. 9.

(25) Bp Patrick in locum.

(26) Analect. Sacr. Excurſ. 96.

(27) 1 Sam. xv. 12.

(28) Autor. Traditi. Hebr. in lib. Reg. bîc. apud Calmet in loc.

[L] He had three ſons and one daughter.] This appears from 2 Sam. xiv. 27. But as Kimchi and other Hebrew Doctors ſay, they all died before him. His daughter's name was Thamar; and we find in ſeveral Greek and Latin copies an addition to this 27th verſe of 2 Sam. xiv. which tells us, that Thamar was married to Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon, and was mother to King Abiah. But this inſertion is not in the Hebrew Original, nor in the Vulgate, nor in the Complutenſian edition of the Septuagint, and is of no manner of authority, and cannot be reconciled to chronology without great difficulty. We read in the ſecond book of Chronicles (29), that Rehoboam married Maachah the daughter of Abſalom; but this Maachah is evidently a different perſon from Thamar, and the word Daughter in that paſſage is put for Grand-Daughter; ſo that Maachah was daughter to Thamar (30).

The weight of Abſalom's hair has been the ſubject of great diſpute among the critics, as will appear from the Note hereunder [M].

(29) Ch. xi. ver. 20.

(30) See Calmet in locum.

[M] The weight of Abſalom's hair has been the ſubject of great diſpute among the critics, as will appear from the Note hereunder.] The Scripture tells us, that when he polled his head (which he did at every year's end, becauſe his hair was heavy) he weighed the hair of his head at two hundred Shekels, after the King's weight. This paſſage has ſeveral difficulties in it, which deſerve ſome attention to explain them. The firſt is, Whether Abſalom cut off his hair every year? 2dly, Whether he cut off all his hair, or only part? 3dly, Whether the weight of two hundred Shekels was the weight of all his hair, or only of that part which he cut off? 4thly, What the King's weight was?

1. The words in the Hebrew are from the end of days to days, without any particular deſignation of the time. And the Septuagint render the Hebrew literally, ἀπὸ πέλυς ἡμερῶν εἰς ἡμέρας. The Targum tranſlated it at ſtated times; that is, when it grew too heavy, which might be once in two years, more or leſs, as Bochart obſerves.

2. The Iſraelites wore their hair very long, as appears from the Scripture and Joſephus (31), who informs us, that the guard, who attended King Solomon, had their long hair flowing about their ſhoulders, and that they ſcattered in it every day, ψήγματα χρυσίου, little particles of gold, which made their hair ſhine and ſparkle by the reflection of the ſun's rays upon the gold. It is not probable therefore that Abſalom ſhould cut off all his hair, which was his chief ornament.

(31) Antiq. l. 8. c. 1.

3. We find by experience that the hair does not grow in a year above four inches in length. So that the ſuperfluous hair which he cut off could not poſſibly weigh two hundred ſhekels, for then the remainder would have weighed four or five times as much, which is abſolutely impoſſible.

(32) See his Diſſertation upon this ſubject in the Journal de Trevoux. An. 1702, Auguſt. Art. 1. p. 175.

4. But the greateſt difficulty is, what is meant by the King's Weight, or as it is in the Hebrew, the King's Stone. Mr. Pelletier (32) is of opinion, that the difference of the King's Weight from the common one was never known till the Chaldeans had ſubdued the Jews; and that the author of the two books of Samuel, who lived about the end of the captivity of Babylon, or ſoon after, when the Jews had been accuſtomed to the Babylonian weights for ſixty or ſeventy years, and conſequently might be ignorant of the Hebrew weights, which were then no longer in uſe; that this author, I ſay, to make himſelf the better underſtood, ſubſtituted the common weight, inſtead of that, which he found in his Memoirs; and told the reader that Abſalom's hair weighed two hundred ſhekels, taking notice however that he meant the Babylonian ſhekels, and thoſe of the King of Babylon's weight, to whom the Jews were then ſubject.

Now the Babylonian ſhekel weighed a third part of the Jewiſh ſhekel; which was equal to 219 Engliſh grains; ſo that the Babylonian ſhekel weighed 73 grains.

The Rabbis and other writers (33), who underſtand theſe two hundred ſhekels of the value of Abſalom's hair, and not of the weight of them, pretend that he or his ſervants ſold his hair to the women of Jeruſalem to make peruques: but Bochart (34) ſhews how abſurd it is to imagine a King's ſon would ſell his hair, or that any one would buy it, eſpecially at that rate, ſince peruques were not known in thoſe days.

(33) Sanctius, Salazar, Emmanuel Sa.

(34) Epiſtle to Michael Fankelius at the end of the 3d edition of his Geographia Sacra.

There are others, who imagine that Abſalom having cut his hair ſeveral times, kept it till it weighed two hundred ſhekels; but this makes the remark of the Scripture very trifling, ſince there would have been nothing extraordinary in that.

Bochart (35) conjectures, that Abſalom's hair weighed two hundred ſhekels, only on account of the gold duſt with which it was powdered, according to the cuſtom of that time; all which made it very ponderous; and theſe two hundred ſhekels he demonſtrates to be no more than three pounds and two ounces of our weight. But the Scripture ſpeaks of the real weight of the hair, and not of the weight, which was merely accidental to it.

(35) Epiſt. de Cæſarie Abſalom.

The Septuagint have reduced this weight of two hundred ſhekels to half of it; they mention only a hundred ſhekels, which agrees with the opinion of thoſe who aſſert, that they were gold ſhekels, or the King's ſhekels, which were but half the weight of thoſe of the ſanctuary. But it will be neceſſary to prove firſt this difference between the common weight, and that of the ſanctuary, and between the gold and ſilver ſhekel; ſo that at preſent we may ſatisfy our ſelves with the two hundred Babylonian ſhekels which weighed each of them ſeventy three Engliſh grains.

ABSTEMIUS (Laurentius) a Native of Macerata in Marca Anconitana, devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of polite literature, and made conſiderable advances in it. He taught the Belles Lettres in Urbino, where he was librarian of Duke Guido Ubaldo (a), to whom he dedicated a little work, wherein he explain'd ſome difficult paſſages which occur in ancient authors (b). He publiſh'd this piece under the Pontificate of Alexander VI; and another, he entitled Hecatomythium, which he inſcribed to Octavian Ubaldini, Count of Mercatelli. He gave it that title, becauſe it was a collection of an hundred fables (c), which he afterwards doubled. Theſe have been often printed [A] with thoſe of the ancient Fabuliſts, ſuch as Eſop, Phædrus, Gabrias, Avienus, &c. all which Nevelet collected into a body, and illuſtrated with ſome Notes. Abſtemius has not always kept thoſe ancient originals in view; for he ſometimes intermixes his Fable with jocoſe tales, and now and then is a little ſatyrical upon the Clergy [B]. Some of his conjectures on certain paſſages of the ancients, are inſerted in the firſt volume of Gruterus's Theſaurus Criticus, under the title of Annotationes variæ; but theſe are very few, and don't take up fifteen pages. There is a Preface of his to Aurelius Victor, which was printed in Venice anno 1505 (d). I can't ſay whether (a) See Gruteri Theſaur. Critic. tom. 1. p. 878.

(b) Opuſculum de nonnullis locis obſcuris. Vide de Epiſt. dedicat. ejus Hecatomythii.

(c) See the Dedication to it.

(d) Epitome Bibliotb. Geſner.

[A] Have been often printed.] Geſner mentions the edition of Strasburg in 1522; but that which Nevelet worked upon, is not ſo old by eighty eight years. His Notes are of very little value, and it was certainly not for their ſake, that they were ſo often reprinted. He made none on Abſtemius's fables, and indeed they did not want any.

[B] Now and then is a little ſatyrical on the Clergy.] His 104th fable is a proof of what is here aſſerted. In this we are told, that a Prieſt was ordered by his Biſhop, to ſuperintend a monaſtery, in which were five Nuns, all whom he got with child by that time the year was out. This coming to the Biſhop's ear he was very much exaſperated, when ſending for the Prieſt, he chid him very ſeverely upon that account, calling him a perfidious, ſacrilegious wretch, in thus preſuming to defile the temple of the Holy Ghoſt. Lord, ſays the Prieſt, thou deliveredſt unto me five talents, whether he liv'd any conſiderable time after this. He is one of thoſe whom Laurentius Valla cenſur'd.

The reader is deſir'd to take notice of the obſervations communicated to me, ſince the firſt edition of this work [C].

* Matth. xxv. 20. *behold I have gained beſides them five talents more. The Prelate was ſo delighted with this facetious anſwer, that he gave the Prieſt plenary abſolution. Quo dicto tam faceto permotus epiſcopus, homini veniam dedit. The moral which the author draws from this fable, is no leſs profane than the fable itſelf. Whenever, ſays he (1), we cannot juſtify our ſelves of a crime by ſolid reaſons, we muſt have recourſe to pleaſantry. It is certain this advice has been followed with ſucceſs on ſeveral occaſions; but a Biſhop who ſhould be ſatisfied with ſuch profane waggery as that above, would be very near as unfaithful a paſtor, as the ſuperintendant of the five Nuns.

(1) Fabula indicat, peccata, cùm ratione nequeant, urbanitate diluenda. Abſtemii Tabul. c. 4.

[C] The reader is deſired to take notice of the obſervations which have been communicated to me ſince the firſt edition of this work.] "Abſtemius's conjectures, "inſerted in the firſt volume of Gruter's Theſaurus "Criticus, are only the extract of a work intitled "Obſcurorum Locorum (2), dedicated to the Duke of "Urbino. Gruter, who gave this extract, tells us, "in a little marginal note at the beginning, that "Laurentius Valla criticis'd our Abſtemius. I very "much doubt the truth of this aſſertion, ſince we "don't meet with the leaſt Tract of any ſuch "critique in Laurentius Valla's works, not to men-"tion that Abſtemius highly applauds them in the "Preface to his ſecond Hecatomythium; beſides, "there is room to believe that they were never at "variance, ſince our fabuliſt ſurvived Laurentius "Valla forty eight years at leaſt. He is the firſt, ac-"cording to what I could find, who writ the tale of "the Talents Multiplied, which has ſince been told "by Le Bandel, Verville and others." The above is extracted from a letter, with which Mr. de la Monnoie favoured me.

(2) See the citation (b) of this article above.

☞ABSTINENTS, a Sect of Heretics that appear'd in France and Spain towards the latter end of the third Century, when Diocleſian and Maximian perſecuted the church. They were, we are told, a branch of the Manichees and Gnoſtics; they maintain'd that matrimony was unlawful, and that men muſt abſtain from eating fleſh (a); and if we may credit Philaſtrius [A], they ſaid that fleſh was not created by God, but by the Devil (b). Baronius (c) is of opinion, that the Abſtinents are the ſame with the Hieracites [B]; but Moreri, and after him Luiſcius, ſay, that what is related of the Hieracites does not agree very well with the ſentiments of the Abſtinents, and that they come a great deal nearer to the Encratites: but the opinions or hereſies, for which they are particularly call'd Abſtinents, are the very ſame with thoſe of the Hieracites and of the Encratites; ſo that they ſeem at leaſt to be a branch of thoſe Heretics. We muſt not believe that they maintain'd their opinions enthuſiaſtically, without pretending to give any reaſon for them; they knew how to ſupport them at leaſt with a ſpecious ſhew of arguments. "Matrimony, ſay they, was allow'd under the Old "Teſtament, but condemned ſince the coming of Chriſt: What other new deſign "could he propoſe? What would he preach, or what praiſe-worthy action could he "perform, except that? Did he come to teach mankind the fear of God? But this "the Law had already done. Was it to condemn envy, covetouſneſs, iniquity, &c.? "But all this is contained in the Old Teſtament. He could not therefore have any "other view, but to preach continence to the world; practiſing himſelf that chaſtity, "without which everlaſting life cannot be obtain'd (d)." Thus the Abſtinents reaſon'd, pretending their abſtinence was that very reformation which Chriſt intended to eſtabliſh in the world. They made uſe of ſome paſſages in the New Teſtament, whereby they thought that they could ſupport their opinions. They inſiſted particularly upon theſe words of the Apoſtle, Without holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord (e). From whence they concluded, that to be holy, a man muſt entirely be free from all carnal converſation with women. And if it was objected, that the ſame Apoſtle ſays, that Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled (f); they anſwered in the words of St. Paul (g), There is difference between a wife and a virgin, the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that ſhe may be holy both in body and in ſpirit; but ſhe that is married careth for the things of the world, how ſhe may pleaſe her husband. From this paſſage they argued thus: If there be a diviſion between God and a married woman, how can there be a communication or union between them? And if a woman does not pleaſe God but her husband, how can ſhe inherit life everlaſting? Therefore when the Apoſtle gives this advice, Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her

(a) Philaſtrius de Hæreſib. in Bibliotb. maxim. Patrum t. 5. p. 710.

(b) Ibid.

(c) In Anal. ad Ann. 288.

(d) Epiphan. adverſus Hæreſes, lib. 2. tom. 2. p. 710.

(e) Heb. xii. 14.

(f) Ch. xiii. 4.

(g) 1 Cor. vii. 34.

[A] If we may credit Philaſtrius.] The reaſon why we ſpeak in this doubtful manner is, that we know but very little of the ancient Heretics; and the ſhort accounts we have of them, were written by their profeſſed enemies, who alſo were ſeldom their cotemporaries: their own books are not extant, ſo that to know their opinions we muſt entirely depend on thoſe who relate them in order to confute them. But it is obvious to every one, how cautious we ought to be, before we believe a man who ſpeaks of his adverſary: How reaſonable is it to ſuppoſe, that to make him odious he will blacken his character, and repreſent his opinions in the moſt ſhocking view, in order to get an eaſier victory over him? In ſaying this, we don't pretend to accuſe the fathers of having wilfully miſrepreſented the Heretics; but the fathers were fallible, liable to be impoſed upon, and their very zeal for the orthodox faith might ſometimes miſlead them; ſo that we muſt not blindly receive as truth all that they ſay of Heretics, but examine impartially what they have tranſmitted to us concerning the opinions of Heretics. See the author quoted in the margin (1).

(1) Clericus Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sæc. 1. ad Ann. lxxvi. § 1.

[B] The Hieracites.] Theſe were the followers of Hierax an Egyptian, who lived in the third Century; he was maſter of all the ſciences that were taught in Greece, and underſtood particularly Aſtrology and the Magical or Black Art (2). Beſides the hereſies we have mentioned, he maintained that the body was not to riſe again, but only the ſoul; that thoſe only would be ſaved who lived in celibacy; that children, who die before they are come to years of diſcretion, ſhall not ſee God; that Melchiſedec was the Holy Ghoſt: He alſo diſtinguiſhed the ſubſtance of the Son or Logos, from that of the Father, and compared it to a lamp with two matches, as though there were a Middle-Nature, from which both the Father and the Son had taken their ſubſtance (3).

(2) By this we are probably to underſtand nothing elſe but Natural Philoſophy.

(3) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 67.

her own husband (b); his meaning is not, that ſince the coming of Chriſt, marriage is ſtill praiſe-worthy, but only that it ought to be tolerated, to avoid a greater evil, viz. fornication (i). If we may be allow'd ſome conjectures, we would think, that theſe Heretics fell into this ſtrange way of reaſoning, out of a miſtaken notion of the ſtrictneſs of the Goſpel-morality [C]; underſtanding in a literal ſenſe thoſe paſſages which require of us, to walk not after the fleſh, but after the ſpirit (k), to crucify the fleſh with the affections and luſts (l), &c. It is probable they thought, that the pleaſures of wedlock were inconſiſtent with the ſevere duties of a true Chriſtian. They might perhaps alſo have been of opinion, that the end of the world was near at hand, and that therefore it did not become the diſciples of Chriſt to think of propagating mankind.

(b) Ibid. ver. 2.

(i) Epiphan. ubi ſupra.

(k) Rom. viii. 1.
(l) Gal. v. 24.

[C] The ſtrictneſs of the Goſpel morality.] If the words of Chriſt and his Apoſtles are to be taken in a literal ſenſe and without any modification, I don't ſee why the Abſtinents ſhould be blamed for maintaining that marriage is abſolutely unlawful under the Goſpel-diſpenſation. When the Diſciples ſaid to Jeſus, It is not good to marry, he does not contradict them, but anſwers, as though he approved it, All men, ſays he, cannot receive this ſaying, ſave they to whom it is given: For there are ſome eunuchs, which were ſo born from their mothers wombs; and there are ſome eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men; and there be eunuchs, which have made themſelves eunuchs, for the kingdom of heaven's ſake; he that is able to receive it, let him receive it (4). It ſeems natural to conclude from theſe words, conſidering on what occaſion they were ſpoken, that if a married ſtate be not an abſolute obſtacle to ſalvation, it renders it at leaſt very difficult. And when St. Paul commands us to ſeek thoſe things which are above; to ſet our affections on things above, not on things on the earth, for that we are dead (5), ſhould we not infer from thence, that we muſt look upon our ſelves as dead with regard to this world, and therefore mind nothing upon earth, but only think how to ſecure our ſalvation by the practice of all the Chriſtian virtues? And ſince a married ſtate intangles us in an endleſs round of buſineſs, does not ſuch a ſtate appear inconſiſtent with the ſelf denial St. Paul requires of us? If theſe were the arguments which induced the Abſtinents to believe that marriage is unlawful under the Goſpel, they are at leaſt excuſeable, ſince their only fault was, that they laid too much ſtreſs upon the literal ſenſe of ſeveral texts in the New Teſtament. But who ſhall determine how far the literal ſenſe is to be followed, and when it muſt give way to an allegorical interpretation? It was by inſiſting thus on the literal meaning of the New Teſtament that Mr. Bayle maintained, that a ſociety of Chriſtians who ſhould live up to the ſtrictneſs of the Goſpel, would never be able to defend itſelf, if ſurrounded by worldly Chriſtians that were governed by an ambitious Sovereign. And it is upon the ſame principles that it has been advanced lately (6), that if the plain doctrine of Chriſt was delivered in camps and armies without diſguiſe, or diſſimulation, it would ſooner diſpoſe men to melancholy, than to that chearfulneſs neceſſary to make them brave and daring.

(4) Matth. xix. 11, 12.

(5) Coloſ. iii. 1, 2, 3.

(6) An Inquiry into the Origin of Honour, &c. p. 211.

ABU BECR [A], the firſt Khalif and ſucceſſor of Mahomet. That Prophet's death being divulg'd, part of the inhabitants of Medina, who are call'd by the Moſlems or Muſulmans, Anſars (a), aſſembled to elect a ſucceſſor in his room, and caſt their eyes firſt on one Saad, the ſon of Obâda, their countryman (b). But the Chiefs of the inhabitants of Mecca, call'd Mohâjers (c), came to them, and declar'd that they themſelves might alſo have elected a Khalif, ſince their right was indiſputable: however, that they did not think fit to proceed to ſuch an election, as this might have divided Iſlam (Mahometiſm) into two factions, which would perhaps have been the entire deſtruction of it; but their opinion was, that all the Moſlems ſhould form but one body, who, by a general conſent, ſhould elect a ſucceſſor, without obſerving the diſtinctions of auxiliary or refugee. This affair was not carried on without a very warm conteſt; but at laſt Abu Becr, who had been chiefly inſtrumental in quieting the two parties, was unanimouſly elected (d), by all the chief Moſlems, the very day the Prophet died, and the next day he was recognized by all the people. Nevertheleſs, the followers of Ali maintain ſtiffly, that Ali never conſented to that election, nor to thoſe which follow'd, of Omar and Othman. However, Mahomet's death having produced a great change in the minds of the Arabians, ſeveral tribes among them quitted the new religion, and return'd to that they had formerly profeſs'd; ſo that Abu Becr's firſt care was, either to chaſtiſe thoſe apoſtates, or to make them return to Iſlam: for which purpoſe, he ſent one of the moſt valiant of his Captains called Khâled (e), ſon to Al Walîd, who partly by force, and partly by ſtratagem, reduced them all to their former obedience (f). This expedition being ended, and Abu Becr's authority firmly eſtabliſhed in Arabia, the Moſlems bent their thoughts immediately to foreign conqueſts, on which occaſion a ſignal victory was won by Khâled abovementioned [B]. Abu Becr

(a) i. e. Auxiliaries or helpers, becauſe they favoured and ſuccoured Mahomet when he ſheltered himſelf in their city.

(d) They all gave their aſſent except Ali the ſon of Abu Tâleb, and the reſt of the Haſhemites, who expreſſed their diſapprobation of the choice, by ſtriking their hands one againſt the other. But at laſt Ali perceiving that all were againſt him, he alſo gave his conſent and all the Haſhemites. Hiſtoria Saracenica Elmacini, p. 16. According to Mr. Ockley, (Vol. I. p. 3. of the Hiſt. of the Saracens) one of the Anſars fearing the conſequences of this diſturbance called out to the company, that they ſhould have two Khalifs, i. e. each party one; but this motion was rejected.

(b) Hiſtoria Saracenica, Georg. Elmacin. p. 15. Lugduni Batav. 1625. Folio.

(c) That is, refugees, becauſe they had been driven out of Mecca with Mahomet.

(e) This Khâled was ſent againſt Toleiha (who pretended to be a Prophet) and put him to flight. Hiſt. Saracen. Elmacin. p. 16. where we alſo find that one Thejâj or Sajâj ſet up for a Prophetes, who going to Moſeilama the falſe Prophet, married him, and after ſhe had continued only three days with her husband, return'd home. One of the Arabian writers takes notice of her great proweſs in the ſports of Venus.

(f) Elmacin tells us, p. 17. That ſuch as perſiſted in their apoſtaſy were put to death.

[A] Abu Becr.] It is related in the ſecond volume of the book entitled Rawdat al Ahbeb, that Abu Becr's proper name when an idolater, that is, before he turned Moſlem, was Abd'al Cába, that is, ſervant of the Cába, or temple of Mecca; and that Mahomet changed this name for that of Abdalla, which ſignifies the ſervant of God. Mahomet honoured him alſo with two particular titles, the firſt of which is Seddîk, (mentioned in the text of this article) that is, a faithful and authentic witneſs, becauſe he had atteſted the miracle of Mahomet's nocturnal journey, called by the Mahometans Al Mirâj, or the Aſcenſion. The ſecond title the Prophet gave him was Atîk, or delivered from hell fire, and conſequently predeſtinated (1).

(1) D'Herbelot, p. 18, 19.

[B] A ſignal victory was won by Khâled.] This General was ſent by Abu Becr to reinforce Al Mothanna, who was already advanced very far into Irâk or Chaldea, of which the Perſians were then maſters. Theſe two Generals ſeized on the cities of Hira, of Anbar, and of ſome others, where Al Mothanna reſided to keep them in obedience; and Khâled received orders to march his troops into Syria, to engage thoſe of Heraclius, which were aſſembled from all parts to oppoſe the enterprizes of the Arabians, who had already refuſed to pay the uſual tribute. Khâled's army conſiſted but of thirty ſix thouſand men, who were encamped on the banks of the river * Barmûk in ſight of the Greeks, who were ſaid to be two hundred thouſand ſtrong. Khâled was upon the point of giving battle, when a courier from Medina brought him news of Abu Becr's death. This prudent General

* It is probable that D'Herbelot has miſtaken this for the battle of Yermûkh, an account of which is given in Ockley's Hiſt. of the Saracens Vol. I.

Becr was seiz'd with a slow fever in the 13th year of the Hegira, which bringing him quickly near his end, he resolv'd to declare his successor. For this purpose he cast his eyes on Omar, but met at first with some opposition from his relations on that account; however, he at last overcame it, and then died with greater peace and satisfaction, having reign'd two years, three months, and nine days (g). Elmacin tells us that he was tall and swarthy; according to some, fair and lean; had a thin beard, and that he us'd to adorn his person. He was temperate, devout, and had riches in the utmost contempt. As soon as he was expir'd, Omar offer'd up a solemn prayer for him, and caus'd him to be interr'd in the house of Ayesha his daughter (h), on one side of the tomb of Mahomet his son-in-law. He was a great encourager of learned men (i), and died at sixty three years of age. His genealogy was again united with that of Mahomet, in the person of Hamza, who was his fifth ancestor in a right line (k). Abu Becr was honour'd by Mahomet with the title of Seddik [C], and was, as some pretend, the first proselyte that Prophet made (l) to his religion [D]. He boasted his own great disinterestedness [E]; and a memorable action of his is supposed to be applauded in the Koran [F]. Neither Mr. D'Herbelot nor Mr. Ockley mention several curious particulars in the life of Abu Becr, (who was first a merchant, as the generality of the tribe were) before his promotion to the Khalifat; such as, the wager he laid on the word of the Prophet and his winning

(g) Or, according to others, two years and four months wanting four days, Idem. p. 18.
(h) Idem. ibid.
(i) Idem. p. 19.
(k) D'Herbelot Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 18. Paris 1697. Folio.

(l) According to Mr. Gagnier (vol. I. p. 109. De la Vie de Mahomet, printed at Amsterdam in 1732. 12°) Khadija was the first among mortals who believed in Mahomet; and it is for this reason that the Prophet declared in the book Al Sahih; Among men several are perfect; but among women I compute only four, Asia wife of Pharaoh, Mary daughter of Imran, Khadîja daughter of Khowailed, and Fâtema daughter of Mahomet... The first man that embraced Mahometism was, Ali son of Abu Talêb, according to several authentic writers. Ockley's History of the Saracens, Vol. I. p. 8. 2d edition. Printed in London 1718, 8°.

ral artfully concealed it, and spread a report in his camp, that he had received an express of the march of twelve thousand horse, who, he declared, would join them immediately; for he was sensible that his army stood in great need of such a reinforcement, to revive their courage, which the numerous forces of the enemy had very much damp'd. Having thus reanimated them, Khâled asked the courier a great many questions privately, and among others, enquired who had succeeded Abu Becr. The courier telling him that it was Omar, I am then, replied Khâled, no longer General of the army; for he was sensible that this new Khalif had no great affection for him. The courier answered immediately, that he had guessed right, and Abu Obeidah was to succeed him. Khâled, notwithstanding this news, did yet engage the Greeks, and indeed it was impossible for him to avoid coming to a battle. He gained a complete victory, and routed the Greeks entirely, whose camp he plundered, where he found an immense booty. After so signal a conquest, and as he was to divide the plunder, he went to Abu Obeidah, whom he informed of the several particulars he had heard from Medina, and gave up his commission to him. After so great a change, the spoils of the Greeks were divided, the fifth part of which was sent to Mecca, and the other four distributed among the chiefs of the soldiers (3). According to Elmacin (4), Khâled marched by Abu Becr's order into Irak, where he concluded a peace with all the inhabitants of it, and of the town of Sawada, upon condition that they should pay tribute, which they agreed to, and this was the first tribute that was ever brought to Mecca. He afterwards took Anbar and Ainal Yaman, and sent the captives to Medina..... Khâled won that year a great many battles, in which a numberless multitude of infidels were slain, and prodigious spoils taken from the enemy. See his article.

(3) D'Herbelot, p. 18. This author seems to be pretty much mistaken in several of the circumstances which are related on his authority.
(4) Historia Saracenica, p. 17.

[C] Honoured with the title of Seddîk.] Abu Becr is not the only one who bore that name, for the Koran bestows this title on Joseph the Patriarch, on Jesus Christ, and the Virgin Mary his mother. The Moslems have also given the title of Seddîka to Ayesha, daughter of Abu Becr, and wife of Mahomet, because she bore witness to the truth of several traditions, received from her husband and her father, and which were rendered authentic by her approbation (5).

(5) D'Herbelot, p. 19.

[D] Abu Becr was the first proselyte Mahomet made.] Abu Becr's conversion engaged several of the chief persons in Mecca to turn Mahometans. It is said that his father, his son and grandson were all ranked among those who have the title of companions (first disciples of Mahomet) bestowed on them, which never happen'd to any other Moslems (6). The Prophet, speaking of him, used to say, Whoever is desirous of beholding one predestinated (to paradise) let him look upon Abu Becr (7). It was he also, according to Ebn Shohna and several other authors, who collected the verses of the Koran which were written on separate leaves; that he gathered these into a volume; divided it into chapters, and called it al Môshâf, that is, the book by way of eminence, like the Greeks who had called the Scriptures Βίβλια. He afterwards entrusted the original text of the Koran with Hafsa daughter of Omar, and widow of Mahomet (8). Joannes Andreas, a Moor by birth, who afterwards turned Christian, and Eutychius are of another opinion, thinking this was done by Othman the third Khalif, in which they seem to be mistaken (9).

(6) Here D'Herbelot seems to be mistaken.
(7) Ockley's Hist. of the Saracens, Vol. 1. p. 8. who tells us that Mahomet said further, God, whose name be blessed, hath given man his choice of this world, or that which is with him; and this servant (meaning Abu Becr) hath chosen that which is with God.

[E] He boasted his own great disinterestedness.] Abu Becr declared, that he had never taken a single drachm from any Moslem, nor any money out of the treasury, but so much as was sufficient to defray the expence of a camel that brought him water, and of an Abyssine slave who waited upon him, besides the clothes he wore. A rare example in a Prince (especially in one who was arbitrary) and hardly to be parallel'd among Christian Princes. He gave orders, that immediately after his death, these three things should be carried to Omar his successor, which was accordingly done. Omar, upon receiving them, fell a weeping, and said, God have mercy upon Abu Becr, but he has led so virtuous a life, that it will be difficult for those who come after him, to imitate so excellent a pattern (10). According to Elmacin (11), he took three Staters out of the treasury by way of reward for himself, and said to Ayesha; See, O Propheteſs! the riches Abu Becr has amassed during his reign, and restore them to the Moslems, and she looked, and when they had computed all his substance, the value of the whole amounted to five Staters, which being told to Omar, he said; God be merciful to Abu Becr, for he has left his successors a very hard task. The same author observes farther (12), that every Friday he used to distribute the several monies that were brought into his treasury, among the soldiery, the learned, and to such as merited a recompence for their labours.

(8) D'Herbelot, p. 19. and Elmacin. p. 18.
(9) Ockley's Hist. of the Saracens, Vol. I. p. 118.
(10) D'Herbelot, p. 19.
(11) p. 18.
(12) p. 19.]

[F] A memorable action of his is supposed to be applauded in the Koran.] viz. in the chapter entitled Waleila, and is as follows. An infidel, Omeyya by name, had a Moslem slave called Belâl (13), whom he tormented very much upon account of his religion, but this, so far from shaking his constancy, only strengthened it the more; and indeed, Belâl always desired his sufferings might increase, that he might thereby be enabled to give the stronger proof of his attachment to Mahometism. Abu Becr pitying the unhappy slave, whom his master used to beat in his presence, told him one day, that he was very much in the wrong to afflict a servant of God in such a manner. Omeyya answered; If my treatment of him touches you so intimately, buy him; he shall be your's for a thousand crowns; or in case you are willing, I will exchange him for Nastas who is your slave. This Nastas or Anastasius was a Greek, and a Christian. Abu Becr upon these words, said to Nastas, who was present, If thou wilt turn Mahometan, I will give thee the thousand crowns which are asked for Belâl, and then thou may'st purchase thy liberty with that money. But Nastas resolving not to consent to a bargain so injurious to the religion he professed, Abu Becr exchanged him with Omeyya for Belâl, to whom he gave his freedom the instant he was given up into his hands (14). A proof that humanity is not confined to those who profess the Christian religion.

(13) An Ethiopian, and consequently of Christian parentage.
(14) D'Herbelot, p. 19.

winning it. The teſtimony he gave of his great faith in Mahomet [G]. His reprimand to Abu Jahl, one who bore a mortal hatred to Mahomet. His accompanying him in his flight [H], and their eſcape from the cave in which they had taken refuge, and what befel them in their way to Medina [I]. Abu Becr's entry into that city with the Prophet [K], and the ſpeech he made (m) immediately after Mahomet was expired [L]. Mr. Ockley is pretty diffuſive on Abu Becr's wars, and among other particulars gives us a ſpeech, part of which is in a ſtrain of the greateſt humanity,

(m) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet.

[G] The teſtimony he gave of his great faith in Mahomet.] As the Prophet was giving an account of his nocturnal journey from Mecca to Jeruſalem, and from thence to heaven to a great number of people, and telling them the wonders he had ſeen, ſome perſons ran to Abu Becr (he not being in the aſſembly at that time) and ſaid to him, "Knoweſt thou what thy "companion (Mahomet) pretends, he declares he "has been in the temple of Jeruſalem, and that he "returned to Mecca in one night? Abu Becr an"ſwered; Does the Apoſtle of God ſay ſo? Yes, "replied they. Well, I declare and atteſt, ſays he, "that if Mahomet ſaid ſo, it was true. How, ſaid "they; would'ſt thou aſſert as a truth that Mahomet "has been in Syria, and returned to Mecca in "one night? Is this credible? Yes, replied Abu Becr, "I maintain that all he ſaid on that occaſion is true, "though you call him a liar. But ſurely, ſaid they, "the things he publiſhes are very ſtrange! And what "would'ſt thou thy ſelf ſay, were he to give thee "ſuch a relation?" Abu Becr made no other anſwer, than by ſaying, that if he ſaid ſo, it was true. As theſe people ſeemed to be in prodigious aſtoniſhment, Abu Becr added; What is there in all this that ſhould ſurprize you ſo much? By God (15) I ſwear, that if he were to declare that he has aſcended this night to the ſeventh heaven, and was returned back the ſame night; or was to affirm that he performed that journey in an hour, either in the day or in the night time, I would believe it all to be fact, ... Abu Becr afterwards going to Mahomet, and asking him whether all this were true, he anſwered, yes. But Abu Jahl ſaying to that Prophet, O Mahomet! If it be true, as thou ſayeſt, that thou haſt been in the temple of Jeruſalem, give us now a deſcription of it; for as to my ſelf, I have entered it more than once. Abu Becr hearing theſe words was in ſuch conſternation that he fell with his head againſt the ground; and the Prophet going up to him, whiſpered him ſoftly in the ear; I am prodigiouſly puzzled, ſays he, O Abu Becr, for it was night when I entred it, and conſequently it will be impoſſible for me to deſcribe it.... However, we are told, that Gabriel ſoon drew him out of his perplexity, by bringing him the model of the temple, by which he was enabled to deſcribe it exactly (16).

(15) The Arabic is Wallah, an oath frequently uſed by the Arabs, who do not count it any profanation of the Divine Name to ſwear by it, but rather an acknowledgment of his omnipotence and omnipreſence; and therefore we find it uſed by the moſt religious among them. Ockley's Hiſt. of the Saracens, Vol. I. p. 113. Note.

(16) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, vol. I. p. 256, 257. Amſterdam 1732. 8°.

[H] His accompanying him in his flight.] Mahomet being obliged to fly away for fear of being killed by the tribe of Koreiſh, he went ſtrait to Abu Becr's houſe, and declared, that God had permitted him to flee. Shall I accompany you, replied Abu Becr? Yes, replied the Prophet, and Abu Becr fell a weeping. They then ſet out together, with Abdo'llah, an idolater, whom they had hired for that purpoſe, and arrived at the cave of Thûr which is a mountain, at about an hour's journey from Mecca towards the ſea-coaſt, where they hid themſelves for three days. Abu Becr at his going away, had ordered Abdo'llah his ſon to ſtay in Mecca, in order to hear what the people would ſay of them in the day time, and to come and give them an account of it in the evening. He had alſo provided for their ſubſiſtence, having commanded Amer, ſon to Tohaira his ſervant to get a lamb ready, and to bring it them in the evening with other proviſions neceſſary. Beſides this, Aſma, daughter of Abu Becr uſed to viſit them frequently in the duſk of the evening, and bring them refreſhments. In the mean time the tribe of Koreiſh hearing that the Apoſtle of God (as the Mahometans call Mahomet) was fled, they were greatly aſtoniſhed at it, and immediately ſent ſpies and couriers to all the places adjacent to Mecca. Theſe, after having beat every where about the country for ſome time, at laſt drew near to the cave. It happened that a man was there, who ſeeing them ſo eager in the ſearch, By God, ſays he, it is impoſſible that what you look for ſhould be in that cave. Abu Becr who heard this was ſeized with fear, but the Prophet encouraged him by theſe words; be not dejected for God is with us. Theſe ſpies however went away, upon ſeeing two pigeons which had built their neſt at the mouth of it, and laid eggs there, and alſo a ſpider's web, that was ſpread quite over the entrance. The ſpies being out of ſight, Abdo'llah their idolatrous guide came to them, leading a camel of burthen, and another ſhe-camel, of which they were owners. Aſma, Abu Becr's daughter, brought them proviſions alſo; but having forgot to take a thong with her to faſten the baggage, and the proviſions being in danger of falling to the ground, ſhe cut her girdle in two, and with one part of it faſtned the baggage, and bound her waſte with the other, whence ſhe was afterwards called the Double-girdle Maid (17). Mahomet and Abu Becr arrived afterwards ſafe at Medina.

(17) Ibid. vol. I. p. 288 & ſeq.

[I] What befel them in their way to Medina.] Mahomet and Abu Becr being come to a certain town called Giâmaa, ſituated in the territory of Codaïd, a place very plentiful in water, they paſſed before the tent of a woman, Omm-Mâled by name, whoſe huſband was called Barza. She was then ſitting at the door of her tent, eating and drinking. They entreated her to furniſh them with fruits and meat, for which they offered to pay ready money, but ſhe would not give them any thing, though they were almoſt famiſhed. However, the apoſtle of God happening to ſpy through the crevices of the tent an ewe that was almoſt worn to skin and bones, he called it to him, ſtroaked its teat very gently with his bleſſed hand, and immediately a great quantity of milk came out of it. After this he cauſed a cup to be brought, and filling it, preſented it to Omm-Maled who drank a little of it. He alſo gave his companions ſufficient to quench their thirſt, and himſelf drank as much as he had need of. This being done, he filled the cup a ſecond time, and leaving it with the woman, paid her, and went his way. Her husband afterwards returning home, and hearing what had happened, he ran haſtily after the Prophet and believed in him (18).

(18) Ibid. vol. I. p. 294, 295.

[K] Abu Becr's entry into that city (Medina) with the Prophet.] Being come at a little diſtance from Medina, they were met by about five hundred inhabitants of that city. Mahomet was walking under a kind of umbrello, made of olive branches, with Abu Becr at his ſide. But as moſt of the Anſars (auxiliaries) had never ſeen the Prophet before, they miſtook Abu Becr for him, and congratulated the latter on his happy arrival. Abu Becr going under the umbrello, received them very courteouſly. All this time the Prophet of God continued ſilent, cloſe ſhrouded under the umbrello; but the ſhadow going off his face, and Abu Becr ſpreading his cloak to ſcreen Mahomet from the burning rays of the ſun, the people perceived their miſtake, and diſtinguiſhed very clearly the apoſtle of God (19).

(19) Ibid. vol. I. p. 300.

[L] The ſpeech he made immediately after Mahomet expired.] The people being in a prodigious conſternation at the news, and ſcarce one of them thinking it was poſſible he could be dead, Abu Becr ran ſwiftly to the houſe where Mahomet lived, and going into the room, he uncovered the corps of the Prophet, and kiſſing it, cried out; "O apoſtle of God! Be "thou to me inſtead of a father and mother; an "agreeable odour ſtill exhales from thee now thou "art dead as when thou wert living. I ſwear by "him who holds my ſoul in his hands, that God "ſhall not make thee taſte a double death for ever." Then going out immediately, he ſpake thus to the people who were aſſembled. "O you, whoſo"ever you be, that ſwear in ſo execrable a manner "that the apoſtle of God is not dead, I beſeech you "to hear me a little." Abu Becr, after offering up the uſual prayers to God, ſpoke thus. "If any one "reveres Mahomet, ſo far as to believe he is not "dead, he is miſtaken, for Mahomet is very cer"tainly dead; but whoſoever on the contrary adores "God, ſuch an one is in the right way; for God "lives, he not being ſubject to death." Now that Mahomet humanity, which this Khalif made to Yezid Ebn Abi Sophyan [M], upon the Khalif's ſummoning all the Mahometans to repair to Medina, in order to ſend them to invade Syria. The ſame author tells us farther, that various reports were ſpread concerning the cauſe of Abu Becr's death, ſome ſaying, that he was poiſoned by the Jews, eating rice with Hareth Ebn Caldah, and that they both died of it within a twelvemonth after. But according to Ayeſha, he bathed himſelf upon a cold day, which threw him into a fever of which he died within fifteen days [N]. The reader will ſee the will he made hereunder. Upon his deſigning to make Omar his ſucceſſor, the latter deſired to be excuſed, and ſaid, he had no need of that place. To which Abu Becr replied, that the place had need of him, and ſo appointed him Khalif againſt his will. After Abu Becr had given Omar ſuch inſtructions as he thought proper, Omar being gone out of his preſence, he lifted up his hand and ſaid: "O God! I intend nothing by this but "the people's good, and I fear leſt there ſhould be any difference among them; and I "have ſet over them the beſt man among them. They are thy ſervants; unite them "with thy hand and make their affairs proſperous, and make him a good Governor; "and ſpread abroad the doctrine of the Prophet of mercy, and make his followers "good men." An Arabian author (Niſaburi) has collected in a little book the grave and witty ſayings of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, &c. and among others which he has recorded of Abu Becr are the two following. "Good actions are a guard againſt the "blows of adverſity; death is the eaſieſt (or leaſt conſiderable) of all things after it, "and the hardeſt of all things before it (n)." There are ſeveral others of his name [O].

(n) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 1. p. 115 & ſeq.

Mahomet was mortal, God himſelf has declared in theſe words which he directed to him; (O Mahomet!) thou wilt certainly die; and they (the idolaters) will certainly die alſo (20). And in another place (21), God ſays; Mahomet is only an apoſtle in like manner as the apoſtles who preceded him. If therefore he ſhould die, either a natural or violent death, will you for that reaſon return back? Know therefore, that whoſoever returns back to idolatry, he cannot hurt God in any thing; but thoſe who ſhall gratefully acknowledge the grace of God, ſuch he will reward. The hiſtorian informs us, that this diſcourſe calmed the minds of the people, who ſighed bitterly, and ſhed an abundance of tears, being now no longer in doubt but that the apoſtle of God was really dead (22).

(20) Koran, ch. 39. v. 30,
(21) Ibid. ch. 3. ver. 144.
(22) Ibid. vol. 2. p. 296, 297.

[M] A ſpeech which this Khalif made to Yezid Ebn Abi Sophyan.] He had appointed him General of the forces that were to ſet out upon this expedition, and the ſpeech he made to him is as follows. "Yezid; be ſure you do not oppreſs your own "people, nor make them uneaſy; but adviſe with "them in all your affairs, and take care to do that "which is right and juſt, for thoſe that do other-"wiſe ſhall not proſper. When you meet with your "enemies, quit (acquit) your ſelves like men, and "don't turn your backs; and if you get the victory, "kill no little children, nor old people, nor women. "Deſtroy no palm-trees, nor burn any fields of corn. "Cut down no fruit trees, nor do any miſchief to "cattle, only ſuch as you kill to eat. When you "make any covenant or article, ſtand to it, and be "as good as your word. As you go on, you will "find ſome religious perſons that live retired in "monaſteries, who propoſe to themſelves to ſerve "God that way: let them alone, and neither kill "them, nor deſtroy their monaſteries. And you "will find another ſort of people that belong to the "ſynagogue of Satan, who have ſhaven crowns; be "ſure you cleave their ſkulls, and give them no "quarter, till they either turn Mahometans or pay "tribute (23)." Abu Becr alſo gave the following advice to Amrou another of his Generals. "Take "care to live religiouſly, and let the enjoyment of "the preſence of God and a future ſtate, be the end "and aim of all thy undertakings. Look upon thy "ſelf as a dying man, and always have regard to the "end of things; and remember that we muſt in a "ſhort time all die, and riſe again, and be called to "an account (24)." How inconſiſtent was this excellent advice with the buſineſs (that of cutting men's throats) which Abu Becr ſent Amrou upon!

(23) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens. vol. 1. p. 24, 25.
(24) Ibid. p. 29.

[N] The will he made hereunder.] It is as follows. "This is the teſtament of Abu Becr En Abi Kohâ-"pha, which he made at that time he was juſt a "going out of this world, and entring into the other; "a time in which the infidel ſhall believe, and the "wicked perſon be aſſured (25), and the liar ſhall "ſpeak truth. I appoint Omar Ebnól Chitab my "ſucceſſor over you, therefore hearken to him, and "obey him. If he does that which is right and "juſt, it is what I think and know of him. If he "does otherwiſe, every man muſt be rewarded ac-"cording to his works. I intend to do for the beſt, "but I don't know hidden things; but thoſe who do "evil ſhall find the conſequences of it. Fare ye "well, and the mercy and bleſſing of God be upon "you (26)." What a ſtrain of piety runs through the whole?

(25) Of the reality of thoſe things relating to a future ſtate, which they diſbelievʼd and ridiculed in their life-time. Ibid. vol. 1. p. 116.
(26) Idem. ibid.

[O] There are ſeveral others of his name.] One Abu Becr the ſon of Abdallah, was ſirnamed Al-Dharir, i. e. the Blind. He was a holy Moſlem, whoſe life is written by Jafai. The following ſentence of his is cited. He who imagines he will be able to ſatiate his deſires, by poſſeſſing the things he wiſhes for, is like to a man who would put out fire with ſtraw. Another holy Moſlem of this name being asked, what was the leaſt thing God had created? he anſwered, it is the world, ſince, according to the Koran, it weighs no more, in God's ſight, than the wing of a gnat. But he that eſteems and ſeeks after it, is leſs and lighter than it. Another Abu Becr Shasbani a very valiant man, was born in the province of Mazanderan. He is ſaid to have been one of the three great warriors who gave the greateſt check to the progreſs of Tamerlane's arms in Aſia. He was ſo mighty a terror to the ſoldiers of this latter Prince, that one of the Tartar horſe obſerving his beaſt was afraid of going into the water, and always drew back his head from the manger, he uſed to ſay, one would think that my horſe has ſeen Abu Becr Shasbani either in the water or his oats (27).

(27) D'Herbelot, p. 20.

ABUCARAS (Theodorus) a Prelate [A], was very zealous for Orthodoxy, as is manifeſt from above forty diſſertations, written by him either againſt the Jews, the Mahometans, the Heretics, and in general on religious ſubjects. Genebrard tranſlated fifteen

(1) Cave, Hiſtoria Literaria Scriptor. Eccleſ. p. 557. Oudin. Supplement, p. 259.
(2) Spizelii Specim. Biblioth. Konigii Bibl. Vet. & Nova; & Arnoldi Præfatio.
(3) Simleri Epit. Bibliath. Geſneri.

[A] A Prelate.] Some give him the title of Archiepiſcopum Cariæ (1); others Epiſcopum Cariæ, Καρῶν Επίσκοπον, Carum Epiſcopum (2); Arnoldus and Joſias Simlerus think that Abucaras was Biſhop of Haran in Meſopotamia (3). Dr. Cave obſerves, that Photius had nominated Abucaras to the ſee of Laodicea.

* Arnoldus and Simlerus are in the right; for Abucaras was not Biſhop of Caria, but of Charræ or Haran in Meſopotamia, and he is ſo named in certain of his works in the Arabic tongue, which were ſeen and read by Aſſemanus at Sidon (4).

As to the time when Abucaras lived, Abu'lfaragius ſeems to make him contemporary with John Damaſcenus (5), which confirms the opinion of Turrianus. [Crit. Rem.]

* [He is called Theodoric the Haranite by Abu'lfarag. In Candelabro Sanctor. apud Aſſeman. Bibl. Orient. tom. 2. p. 292.]
(4) Aſſeman. ubi ſupra.
(5) Apud Aſſem. ubi ſupra.

fifteen of these Dissertations into Latin, and published them. Gretser adding these to the rest [B], which himself or Father Turrien had translated, published a compleat (a), as was supposed, edition of them; but it was not so, for Arnoldus printed at Paris in 1685, a treatise of Abucaras, never published till then, from a manuscript in the Bodleian library. He did not illustrate it with Notes, not daring to touch upon the deep mystery which the author examines in that treatise (b), I mean the incarnation and the hypostatical union. Authors find it a difficult matter to know the age in which Abucaras liv'd. Turrien the Jesuit thinks him a disciple of John Damascenus, according to whom he must have liv'd in the eighth century. Gretser makes him flourish a little later [C]; for he supposes him to be the same with the Abucaras who had so great a share in the troubles of the Church at Constantinople, in the time of Ignatius the Patriarch and Photius. This Abucaras first adher'd to Photius, and had undertaken in concert with Zachary Bishop of Chalcedon, to go as his Embassador to the court of the Emperor Lewis II, to whom he was to have presented the book which Photius had written against Pope Nicholas; and to excite that Prince to shake off the papal yoke. However, he was scarce set out, but Basilius the Macedonian, who had usurp'd the Imperial Crown, and put the Emperor Michael to death, recall'd, and commanded him to go no farther. Two years after this (c), he presented himself before the Council of Constantinople, when he humbly begg'd pardon for having devoted himself to Photius; and protested, that both force and artifice had been used to draw him over to his party. His desires were acquiesced with, the Patriarch restor'd him to the Communion of the Church, and gave him a place in the assembly (d). A learned man, with whom Arnoldus got acquainted in England, was of opinion, that Abucaras liv'd in the seventh century (e). The works of this author were inserted in the supplement to the Bibliotheque des Peres, of the Paris edition in 1624.

(a) 'Tis in Greek and Latin; and printed at Ingolstadt, in 4°. anno 1606.

(b) Arnoldi Præfatio.

(c) in 869.

(d) Nicetus Paphlagon. in Vita Ignatii apud Cave, Hist. Literar. Scriptor. Eccles. Antiq. p. 557.

(e) Arnoldi Præfatio.

[B] Gretser adding these to the rest.] The Journal des Sçavans gave a very false account of this Jesuit's edition. Genebrardus, as they say (6), translated and published fifteen Dissertations of this author; and Gretser added them to what he got from Anastasius the Sinaite in two manuscripts out of the Bavarian Library. Had the authors of the Journal understood Arnoldus's Latin, they would not have made that mistake. Theodori Abucaræ dissertationes quindecim jamdiu latinè vertit & edidit Genebrardus, deinde Theodorum Anastasio Sinaitæ ob argumenti similitudinem conjunxit Jacobus Gretserus, deditque ex duobus codicibus MSS. Ductis Bavariæ Maximiliani(7). That is, "Genebrard had long since translated into Latin and "published, fifteen Dissertations of Theodorus Abu- "caras; afterwards, James Gretser annexed Theo- "dorus to Anastasius the Sinaite, because of the simi- "litude of their subjects, and published them from "two manuscripts belonging to Maximilian Duke of "Bavaria." Three particulars are mentioned in these Latin words; first, that Gretser published Abucaras's works after that Genebrard had published fifteen Dissertations. 2dly, That Gretser printed them from two manuscripts belonging to the Duke of Bavaria; and 3dly, That he inserted them with Anastasius the Sinaite; now there is hardly any thing like this in the Journal des Sçavans. We are not there told, that Gretser published more pieces than Genebrard, nor that the edition of Abucaras was made from the Bavarian manuscripts, but that they were used only for the edition of Anastasius, which Arnoldus does not say. We are to observe, that all Anastasius the Sinaite's works were not published with those of Theodorus Abucaras, there being no more than the treatise entitled, Ὁδηγὸς, i. e. Dux viæ adversus Acephalos, added to Abucaras's works, in Gretser's edition.

(6) Journal XXIII of 1685, p. 368 of the Dutch edition.

(7) Arnoldi Præfatio.

[C] Gretser makes him flourish a little later.] Arnoldus's Preface shews pretty manifestly, that Gretser did not dare to advance any thing with regard to the age in which Abucaras lived. Gretserus verò quis fuerit Abucaras, quo sæculo floruerit, ab Antonio Velsero SS. Theol. D. Ecclesiæ Frisingensis Canonico, Præposito Spaltensi, cujus honori librum suum dedicavit, discere volebat (8). That is, "But Gretserus desired "to know who Abucaras was, and the age he lived "in, from Anthony Volserus, Doctor of Divinity, "Canon of the church of Frisingen, and Provost of "Spalta, to whom he dedicated his book." Arnoldus by saying this only of Gretser, insinuates pretty evidently, that we are not to look for any thing more in the Preface of that Jesuit; however, it informs us also, that the Abucaras mentioned in the life of St. Ignatius Patriarch of Constantinople, is the same with the author of the Dissertations.

(8) Arnoldi Præfatio.

ABUDHAHER. This is the name of the Chief of the Karmathians or Cannathians [A], under whom they profan'd and laid waste Mecca, the 317th year of the Hegira [B]. These plunder'd the Pilgrims, and kill'd seventeen hundred within the walls of the very Caaba (a), at a time when those harmless, superstitious people, were walking round that sacred oratory, as their books of devotion enjoin'd. The Karmathians, not contented with the slaughter they had made, carried off the black stone out of the temple, which was there venerated as a present sent from heaven (b); they pull'd down the gate of the temple, and fill'd with dead bodies the well Zamzam, one of the holiest and most sacred parts in that place. To heighten the affliction, Abudhaher ridiculed the Mahometan religion in a most outrageous manner; he brought his horse to the entrance of the Caaba, purposely that he might lay his dung there; and told the Mahometans, that they were great fools, to give the name of God's house to that edifice; and added, Had God the least regard for this temple, he would have crush'd me

(a) By this name that part of the temple is call'd, in which the Mahometans perform their worship.

(b) See the remark [K] of the article HAGAR.

[A] Of the Karmathians.] This is the name of a sect, which sprung up in Arabia, about anno 278 of the Hegira (1). The founder of it was a blasphemer and an impostor, who prevailing with such peasants and inhabitants of deserts, as were the most illiterate and least versed in religion, to be his adherents; he by that means gained an absolute authority over them. Dr. Pocock (2) gives us several etymologies of the word Karmathians. They were at first very inconsiderable, but they afterwards made incredible progress. They possessed themselves of the greatest part of the provinces of Eraki and Hejazi, spread themselves over Syria, and advanced even to the gates of Grand-Cairo (3).

(1) That is, Anno Dom. 891.

(2) Pocock. Notæ in Specimen Hist. Arab. p. 371. This Specimen was printed in Oxford, Anno 1650.

(3) Pocock. Notæ in Specimen. Hist. Arab. p. 372.

[B] The 317th year of the Hegira.] Abul Feda and Ahmed Ebn Yuseph fix it at this period, and relate, that the stone was not recovered till anno 339; but it was not so late according to Safioddin, who tells us that the stone was carried away in 319, and restored in 335 (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 119.

me with his thunder, for ſo terribly profaning this houſe [C]. But notwithſtanding all this, the Mahometans ſtill had the ſame veneration for this temple, and continu'd their annual pilgrimages to it. When the Karmathians found this, they reſolv'd to ſend them back the black ſtone, after having kept it twenty two years. Some time after, they had a mind to be merry, and to ridicule the folly of that ſuperſtitious devotion. How fondly, ſaid they, do theſe people imagine that they have got the black ſtone! but we ſent them another in its ſtead; conſequently the object of their devotion is falſe and ſuppoſititious. In uttering theſe words, they had ſomething more ſubſtantial in view [D], than the bare pleaſure of inſulting the Mahometans. Anſwer was made them, that they needed only to come and ſee the experiment which ſhould be made; and that in caſe the ſtone ſwam on the ſurface of the water, it was the true one. Accordingly it did ſo in the preſence of the Karmathians; by which means, all the doubts and ſcruples which the raillery of thoſe prophane wretches might raiſe, were entirely eraz'd (c). This is a ſmall ſpecimen of the legend of the Eaſtern nations.

(c) Pocockii Notæ in Specimen Hiſt. Arab. p. 118, 119, ex Abulfeda & Ahmede Ebn Yuſef.

The reader will meet with a great many curious particulars relating to the Karnathians and Abudhaher in D'Herbelot's Bibliotheque Orientale (d). He calls them Carnathens, and the name of their Chief Abu Thaher.

(d) In the article CANNATH, p. 256 & ſeq.

[C] For ſo terribly profaning this houſe.] Ahmed Ebn Yuſeph relates, that the Mahometan religion never ſuffered ſuch a calamity, as on this occaſion (5).

(5) Ibid.

[D] Something more ſubſtantial in view.] They had hoped to draw the caravans of pilgrims to them, imagining that thoſe deluded people would go whereever the ſtone ſhould be carried, for which reaſon they would never let it be ranſomed, and were deaf to all intreaties or promiſes. But finding afterwards that the pilgrimages to Mecca were ſtill continued, and that no one came to pay their devotions to the ſtone in their poſſeſſion, they reſtored it. But ſtill they did not quit all pretenſions to it; for when they declared that the ſtone they had given back was a falſe one, they undoubtedly did it merely in the view of raiſing doubts and ſcruples in the minds of the people, and in order to divide at leaſt the pilgrimages one time or other; but the inhabitants of Mecca foreſaw the conſequences of this, and therefore thought proper to ſpread a report, that an experiment having been made upon their ſtone, it had ſtood the teſt.

☞ABU'L AINA, a famous Doctor, was noted for his ſmart ſayings or repartees [A]. He was very poor and made his court daily to the Wazîr or Viſier Iſmael, the ſon of Belâl. One day his daughter, a woman of exquiſite beauty, ſaid to him; Father, as you wait every day upon the Viſier, don't you acquaint him with your neceſſity? I do, anſwered the father, but he will not liſten to what I ſay. But, replied ſhe, does not he ſee your poverty? How ſhould he ſee it, ſays the father, when he will not once condeſcend to look at me? Upon this, his daughter cited very a propos the following verſe of the Korân againſt idols: Do not ſerve that which neither hears, nor ſees, nor can bring thee any profit [B] (a).

(a) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. p. 24.

[A] Was noted for his ſmart ſayings or repartees.] The following incident gave occaſion to Abu'l Ainâ's making one. Moſes, ſon to Abda'lmâlec the Khalif, having ſecretly put to death in priſon a friend of this Doctor, and cauſed a report to be ſpread that he had eſcaped; Abu'l Ainâ being one day asked what was become of his friend, replied in the words mentioned in the Koran (1), Moſes ſtruck him and he died. The Prince being told what Abu'l Ainâ had ſaid, ſent for him, and threatned to puniſh him if he did not bridle his tongue. Abu'l Ainâ, without being in the leaſt diſconcerted, anſwered him in the words immediately following; Intendeſt thou to kill me, as thou killedſt the man yeſterday? The Prince found this paſſage ſo well timed, that he reſtrained his anger, and reſolved to ſilence this Doctor by gifts rather than by menaces. Another time the Khalif complained, that Abu'l Ainâ gave out that he had no courage, but the Doctor ſoon calmed his reſentments by theſe words: The truly noble man is generally modeſt and reſerved; on the contrary, a man of a low and contemptible extraction is generally impudent and raſh (2). So one of our Engliſh Poets,

(1) Chap. 28.

(3) D'Herbelot, p. 24.

Fools in proſperity like bubbles blown,
Fly high, and hardly by themſelves are known:
Forget the dunghil whence the muſhrooms grew,
And take themſelves to be the Lord knows who.

The above ſentence of the Doctor, and the manner in which the Khalif received it, prove that they were both men of ſenſe.

[B] Do not ſerve that which neither hears nor ſees, nor can bring thee any profit.] An excellent leſſon to thoſe who often make a fruitleſs court to great men. There are ſome Turkiſh verſes to the ſame effect, the ſenſe of which is very beautiful, and are as follows:

'Tis ſtrange that earthly mortals ſhould addreſs
Vain creatures, and neglect the power ſupreme.
Thoughtleſs, they never crave of him that's rich,
But idly beg of thoſe who beg themſelves (3).

(4) Lâmaî Laa tûiſ.

ABUL FARAGIUS (Gregory), ſon to Aaron a Phyſician, was himſelf one, and gain'd great reputation in his art, inſomuch that people came from the moſt remote countries to ask his advice. He was born in Malatia [A], near the Euphrates, and would have been very little known in this age, had he made Phyſic the boundary of his knowledge; but he was vers'd in Hiſtory, and has left us a work in that kind, which does honour to his memory. Our age indeed does not judge ſo favourably of it as the Eaſterns did: but thoſe nations are exceſſive in their applauſe; a circumſtance which is owing, either to the few truly learned men they have among them, or to the caſt

[A] He was born in Malatia.] I have looked, but in vain, for this city in Pocock's Prefaces, in Ortelius's Theſaurus, and Baudrand's Geography. However, chance favoured me more than my reſearches, for as I happened to peruſe the Geographia Nubienſis for other matters, I there found that Malatia was a ſtrong city, fifty one thouſand paces diſtant from Samoſata, towards the ſource of the river Euphrates (1).

(1) Geogr. Nubienſ. chon. 4. p. 5. & p. 197.

Mr. Baudrand acquaints me, that he has mentioned this city under the word Melita and Melitene, which is very true, he having placed it in the leſſer Armenia, upon the Euphrates, and ſays that it is now called Malatiah.

caſt of their minds. Be this as it will, there are an hundred hiſtorians in the Weſt, whoſe compoſitions, tho' no ways inferior to thoſe of Abul Faragius, have yet not had the titles beſtowed upon them, which have been given to our Aſiatic [B]. He liv'd about the end of the thirteenth century, and was a Chriſtian [C]; notwithſtanding which, ſeveral Mahometans ſtudied under him [D]. We are to conſider a certain report, viz. that he abjur'd his religion in his expiring moments, in the ſame light with a thouſand other ſuch fictions, which are publiſhed in all ſects [E]. He has divided his hiſtory, which is written in Arabic, by dynaſties; and it is an epitome of Univerſal Hiſtory, from the creation to his own time. It conſiſts of ten parts; and the contents of each may be ſeen in the ſupplement to Moreri. Dr. Pocock (a) publiſhed this work of Abul Faragius, anno 1663, with his Latin verſion of it; to which he added a ſupplement, containing a compendious ſequel of that hiſtory with reſpect to the Eaſtern Princes. He had before publiſhed in 1650, a ſmall extract of the ninth dynaſty of this author, illuſtrated with a great number of learned notes, and entitled it, Specimen Hiſtoriæ Arabum, ſive Gregorii Abul Faragii Malatienſis, de origine & moribus Arabum ſuccincta narratio: i. e. "A Specimen of the Arabic Hiſtory, or a ſuccinct "relation of the origin and manners of the Arabians, by Gregory Abul Faragius, a "native of Malatia (b)." Abul Faraghius is not near ſo exact on the tranſactions of the Greeks and Romans, as on thoſe of the Saracens and Tartar Moguls. The latter piece is the moſt valuable in the whole work; it comprehending, in a moſt inſtructive method, which has all the air of truth, the prodigious conqueſts of Zingis-Chan. All that Abraham Zacuth relates of that Monarch, in his Juchaſin, and ſeveral other particulars, were ſtole from Abul Faragius. I cannot poſſibly gueſs upon what foundation Abraham Ecchellenſis calls our author Gregorius Bar Hebræus Syrus (c) [F].

(a) Profeſſor of the Hebrew and Arabic tongues in Oxford.

(b) In Præfat. Biblior. Πολυ̃ λαέστων. Pariſ. & alibi.

(c) Extracted from Dr. Pocock's Prefaces.

ABUL-

[B] The titles.... which have been given to our Aſiatic.] Dr. Pocock found what follows, prefixed to a manuſcript of Abul Faragius, written anno 900 of the Hegira; Dixit Dominus noſter pater ſanctus, eximius, doctrina & eruditione inſignis, doctorum rex, excellentium excellentiſſimus, temporum ſuorum exemplar, ſæculi phœnix, ſapientum gloria, Doctor Divina ope ſuffultus Mar Gregorius, Abul-Pharaï, filius excellenter ſapientis Aaronis Medici Malatienſis. That is, "Thus ſaid Mar Gregory, Abul Pharagius (ſon to "the excellently wiſe Aaron, a Phyſician of Malatia) "our Lord, our holy excellent father, famous for "his learning and erudition, the King of the Learned, "the moſt excellent of thoſe who excel, the example "of his times, the phenix of his age, the glory of "wiſe men, the Doctor ſuſtained by the Divine aſ"ſiſtance." And here follows what he met with at the end of another copy; Pater & Dominus noſter, rex doctorum, & corona virorum virtute præſtantium, dubiorum in Theologicis occultorum Ἐπιλύτης, Chriſtianorum princeps primarius, ſectæ Jacobiticæ medulla, Mar Gregorius, dominus, pater, unicum ævi decus, & ſæculi phœnix. That is, "Our Lord and father, the "King of the Learned, and the crown of thoſe who "excel in virtue, the reſolver of the hidden doubts "in Divinity, the moſt illuſtrious head of the Chri"ſtians, the marrow of the ſect of Jacobites, Mar "Gregory, Lord, father, ſole glory of his time, and "phenix of the age." To this let us add the words he found prefixed to a Syriac Grammar written by that author; Pater noſter ſanctus, rex doctorum, Mar Gregorius, Doctor Orientis, qui idem eſt Abul Pharaï, filius Aharonis medici Militinienſis, i. e. Malatienſis. That is, "Our holy father, King of the Learned, "Mar Gregory, the Doctor of the Eaſt, who is "Abul-Pharagius, the ſon of Aaron, a Phyſician of "Malatia.

[C] Was a Chriſtian.] We have juſt now ſeen that he was of the ſect of the Jacobites *, which Pocock tells us is more probable than what a learned Jew relates, viz. that Abul Faragius was of the ſect of the Melchites: Cui potius fidem habemus, quàm docto cuidam Judæo, qui eum vocat Ebnol' Koff Chriſtianum Malatienſem, ſecta Melkhitam (2).

[D] Several Mahometans ſtudied under him.] In one of Pocock's copies, what follows was written by a Mahometan: Author libri eſt Abul-Faraï Ebn Hocima, vir multæ lectionis, variiſque ſcientiis inſtructus & penitus imbutus, præcipuè autem medicinæ gloriâ ſæculo ſuo clarus, adeo ut ad eum è plagis occidentalibus frequentes contenderent. Chriſtianus erat, à quo tamen dedicerunt multi è Muſlemorum eximiè doctis. Ferunt ipſum morti propinquum à fide Chriſtianâ deſciviſſe (2). That is, "This book was written by Abul-"Pharagius Ebn Hocima, a perſon of great reading, "and perfectly verſed in various ſciences. He was "particularly famous in his time for his great skill in "phyſic, ſo that people flocked to him from the Eaſt. "He profeſſed the Chriſtian religion, and yet many "learned Muſſulmans were his pupils. It is related, "that he renounced the Chriſtian faith in his expir"ing moments." Theſe words were writ by Ebn Chalecan, an author famous for his lives of illuſtrious men, if we may believe a remark written by another hand, in the ſame part of the copy (3).

[E] Which are publiſhed in all ſects.] We juſt now heard the report that was ſpread, relating to the expiring moments of Abul Faragius. The Mahometans could ſcarce believe, that it was poſſible for ſo great a man as our hiſtorian to be a Chriſtian in his heart; but were perſuaded rather, that he adhered inwardly to the faith, notwithſtanding the erroneouſneſs of his outward profeſſion, till the near approaches of death made diſſimulation unneceſſary. This prejudice prevails univerſally. Every one fancies that the truths of his own religion are ſo clear and obvious, that all perſons of ability of other perſuaſions cannot fail of diſcovering them; and that nothing but worldly conſiderations can prevail with them not to profeſs it openly. Such perſons therefore imagine that when the fatal moment draws nigh, when the fate of eternity ſtrikes more forcibly on the mind (4), all who till then acted in a diſguiſe, give truth the glory, and throw off the mask.

Nam veræ voces tum demum pectore ab imo
Ejiciuntur, & eripitur perſona, manet res (5).

In Engliſh,

"For then their words will with their thoughts agree,
"And, all the mask pull'd off, ſhew what they be.
Creech.

This bad principle has given riſe to the many idle ſtories, which are told in Moreri's Dictionary, concerning Peter Du Moulin, Joſeph Scaliger, &c. and has alſo occaſioned a multitude of diſcourſes, in which certain perſons are made to ſay, The religion I profeſs is better for this world, but not at the hour of death. See the remark [DD] of the article Mahomet.

[F] Calls our author Gregorius Bar Hebræus Syrus.] On this occaſion I ſhall make the little remark following. Pocock mentions two paſſages in which our author is called Mar Gregorius, and another where the name, Mor Gregorius, is given him; but he makes no reflection on the former of thoſe two words, nor tells us, that Abul Faraghius was called Mark. Here I ſhall obſerve that the authors of the Supplement to Moreri may poſſibly be miſtaken, when they declare that this author was called Mark Gregory. They may have miſtaken Mar, a title of honour anſwering to Sir in our tongue, for Mark, a name given in baptiſm. I find the ſame miſtake in the book entitled, The Perpetuity of the Faith defended (6), for the Patriarch of Babylon who joined in communion with the Church of Rome under Pope Paul the Vth, is there named Mark Elie (Elias) whereas the author who is cited (7) on that occaſion, calls him Mar Elias.

(3) Pocock. Præf. Compend. Dynaſ.

(4) Dii longæ noctis quorum jam numina nobis Mors inſtans majora facit! Dido apud Silium Italicum. lib. 8. p. 140. Thus tranſlated, "Ye Gods of "endleſs night, "whoſe gloomy "forms "Riſe larger on "the eye that "ſwims in "death.

(5) Lucretius, lib. 3. ver. 57.

(6) Book 5. chap. 10.

(7) Petrus Strozza de Chaldæor. dogmat. Vide Aub. Miræum, Polit. Eccleſ. p. 219.

* Eaſtern Chriſtians ſo call'd from Jacob a Syrian, the diſciple of Eutyches and Dioſcorus. Elenchus Hæretic. omn. per Gab. Pateolum. Marcoſſ. Coloniæ 1605.

† This name is given to the ſectaries of the Eaſt, who don't ſpeak the Greek tongue, but that differ very little from the Greeks, either with regard to faith or ceremonies.

(2) Pocock. Præf. Specim. Hiſt. Arabum.

☞ ABULFARAGIUS. As Mr. Bayle is not very accurate in his account of this famous man, we therefore think that a ſupplemental article will not be unacceptable. Abulfaragius was born A. C. 1226 (a), and was ſurnamed Bar-Hebræus, that is, the ſon of an Hebrew man, becauſe his father was originally of Jewiſh extraction [A]. From his childhood he apply'd himſelf to the Greek, Syriac, and Arabic languages; and afterwards learning Philoſophy and Divinity, he ſtudied Phyſic under his father, and the moſt celebrated Phyſicians of his time. Being twenty years of age, he was ordained Biſhop of Gûba by Ignatius the Patriarch of the Jacobites, as he himſelf relates in his Syriac Chronicle (b). The next year, viz. A. C. 1247, he was tranſlated by the ſame Patriarch to the See of Lacabena, and ſome years after to that of Alepo. Finally, about the year 1266, he was made Primate of the Jacobites in the Eaſt [B], which dignity he poſſeſſed till his death in 1286 (c). He expected to die in that year, which was the ſixtieth of his age; for he ſaid that he was born when Jupiter and Saturn were in conjunction in the Sign of Aquarius; that twenty years after they were again in conjunction in Libra, when he was made Biſhop; that after twenty other years, when he was promoted to the dignity of Primate, theſe two Planets were in conjunction in the Sign of Gemini, and that they being again in conjunction in Aquarius after the ſpace of twenty years, he thought that the time of his death was now come (d)[C]. At his interment his corps was followed by a numerous attendance, not only of perſons of his own principles, but alſo of Armenians and Greeks [D], who all were preſent at the Divine Service that was performed on this occaſion. Beſides the Hiſtory mentioned by Mr. Bayle, Abulfaragius wrote about thirty other Tracts, ſeveral of which relate to Philoſophy or Divinity: Aſſemanus has given us a catalogue of them, which is too large to inſert here. It will appear by ſome of his arguments, which we ſhall give in the remarks, how deeply he was ſkilled in Philoſophy and Divinity [E]. His

(a) Aſſemanus, Biblioth. Orient. tom. 2. p. 244.

(b) P. 2. fol. 322. ap. eund. p. 245.

(c) Aſſem. ibid. p. 246.

(d) Abulph. in tertia parte Chroniti. Ap. eund. p. 263.

[A] Becauſe his father was of Jewiſh extraction.] So I think we muſt underſtand theſe words of Aſſemanus, Abulfaragius patre Aaron medico natus eſt, ex quo Bar-Hebræi, id eſt, Hebræi filii cognomentum traxit (1). "The father of Abulfaragius was Aaron a "Phyſician, whence he was ſurnamed the ſon of an "Hebrew." This is mere nonſenſe, if Aaron was not of Hebrew extraction; Hence it appears that Dr. Pocock, and after him Mr. Bayle, had no reaſon to ſay, one cannot gueſs why Abraham Ecchellenſis calls him Gregorius Bar Hebræus, for he is alſo thus named in the titles of his books (2).

(1) Aſſemanus, Biblioth. Orient. t. 2. p. 244.

(2) Ibid. p. 248.

[B] Primate of the Eaſt.] The Syrians call Chaldea and Aſſyria the Eaſt, and Syria and Meſopotamia the Weſt (3).

(3) Ibid. p. 252. note 1.

[C] The time of his death was now come.] The following words are found at the end of a Grammar, which is written in the Syriac tongue, and kept in MSS. in the Vatican Library at Rome. Tranſacto illo anno, quo ſe moriturum putabat, quum nequaquam moreretur, aiebat juxta illud Apoſtoli, non oportet reſpicere ad elementa hæc infirma & miſera, neque obſervare menſes aut dies aut tempora annorum; non enim Deus tollit animam, uſque dum cogitet cogitationem, quam nemo effugere queat, juxta dignam laude admonitionem, quam ſapiens illa Thecuitis ad Davidem habuit. Hactenus ille de geſtibus ſuis & de mortis expectatione. Atque ita gaudens & lætus obiit migravitque ad Dominum die 30 Julii Anno 1597 * (Chriſti 1286) &c. (4). That is, "When the year, in which he thought he "ſhould die, was paſt, and he was ſtill living, he "made uſe of thoſe words of the Apoſtle (5); we ought "not to mind the weak and beggarly elements of this "world, nor obſerve days, and months, and times, and "years; for God does not take away a ſoul, till he "has reſolved to perform that decree which no mor"tal can eſcape. Thus far Abulfaragius himſelf re"lates his own actions and his expectation of dying. "He departed this life with chearfulneſs and alacrity, "on the 30th of July in the year 1597 of the Greek "Æra (A. C. 1286)." Here is a very great inaccuracy, if not a downright falſhood; for that very year (1597) in which Abulfaragius is ſaid to die, and in which he really died, is that which he expected would be his laſt, as he himſelf informs us in the words quoted in the text of this article (6). How then can it be ſaid, that he did not die that year? Aſſemanus takes no notice of this contradiction, which we know not how to reconcile; for his brother himſelf ſays (7), that he always had that year in his mind; that he fell ſick that very year, and would take no phyſick, and at laſt died on the 30th of July.

* Æræ Græcorum.

(4) Ap. eund. p. 263. Note 1.

(5) Gal. iv. 9, 10.

(6) Lit. (e).

(7) Ap. Aſſem. ibid. p. 264.

[D] Not only of his own principles, but alſo of Armenians and Greeks.] It is common enough in the Eaſt, for Chriſtians of different ſects to aſſemble in the ſame Church, and to join in the ſame Divine Service. Abulfaragius himſelf ſays (8), that the Neſtorians uſed to meet daily in his Church with the Jacobites; and Olearius obſerves, that Chriſtians, of what denominations ſoever they be, don't ſcruple to join together in their devotions (9). Hence it appears, that a diſagreement in opinions would be no objection againſt uniting in worſhip, if a blind zeal were not excited in the people by bigotted or ambitious leaders.

(8) In Chron. part 3. ap. eund. p. 250.

(9) From a little book written in French, and entitled, La Reunion du Chriſtianiſme, printed at Saumur, but without a date.

[E] How deeply he was skilled in Philoſophy and Divinity.] The arguments he makes uſe of to prove that God ſees and hears, might prove alſo that he has the ſenſe of ſmelling, feeling and taſting; for he reaſons after this manner; Deus vidit, atqui omne vivens videre & audire natura poteſt; omne autem quod natura videre & audire poteſt, nec tamen videt aut audit, privationis viſus & auditus nomine, hoc eſt, cæcitatis & ſurditatis titulo appellari neceſſario debet; Deus igitur, quem his nominibus nuncupari nefas eſt, neceſſario ſequitur quod audiat & videat (10). That is, "God ſees; now every living ſubſtance ſees and "hears naturally; and all that by its nature can ſee "and hear, and yet does not ſee or hear, muſt be "ſaid to be deprived of ſeeing and hearing, that is, "muſt be called blind and deaf; but as it is blaſphe"mous to ſay this of God, it follows therefore that "he hears and ſees." Dicimus quod Creator cuncta quæ exiſtunt comprehendit. Atqui colores & voces ſunt ex iis, quæ exiſtunt, colores igitur & voces Creator comprehendit: Quum autem horum comprehenſio per auditum & viſum duntaxat fiat, neceſſario infertur Creatorem videre & audire (11). That is, "We ſay "that the Creator underſtands whatever exiſts; co"lours and voices are among the things which exiſt, "and they cannot be underſtood but by hearing and "ſeeing; hence it muſt be concluded, that the Cre"tor ſees and hears." But we find all this muſt be taken in a ſpiritual or metaphorical ſenſe; for Abulfaragius himſelf ſtarting this objection, viz. that the ſoul ſees, feels, &c. by the organs of the body, but that God having no body, he can have no organs; how then ſhall he ſee or hear? He anſwers, that the ſoul wants organs, becauſe it is imperfect, but that God being infinitely perfect, can have no occaſion for them. Theſe are examples of his manner of reaſoning in Philoſophy. With regard to Divinity, he maintained with all the Jacobites, that there is but one nature in the Perſon Chriſt; whereas the Orthodox Divines ſay, there are two natures (the Divine and the human) united in one perſon. Abulfaragius reaſons as follows to ſupport his opinion. "To ſay that dif"ferent natures are united together ſignifies, that "from their mutual conjunction one ſingle thing "ariſes; but it is impoſſible that this ſhould be a "mere name without the thing named; otherwiſe "Chriſt would be nothing, which is a direct abſur"dity.

(10) Abulph. Candelabrum Sanctorum de Fundam. Eccleſ. Fundam. 2. cap. 4. §. 1, 2. ap. Aſſeman. ubi ſupra, p. 286.

(11) Ibid.

His ſentiments concerning the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, ſeem more rational than thoſe of the Roman Catholics, and are entirely different from what is call'd Tranſubſtantiation [F]. He held a ſtrange opinion concerning thoſe who are not perfectly virtuous nor altogether vicious. He maintain'd, that they ſhould neither be admitted into Heaven, nor condemned to Hell, but be kept in the ſame Paradiſe in which Adam was at firſt placed [G]. As Abulfaragius liv'd in the thirteenth century, an age famous for miracles of all kinds, it would ſeem ſtrange were none wrought by him, or in his behalf; but he himſelf mentions two; the firſt happened a little after he was advanced to the dignity of a Primate. When in the Eaſter Holidays he was conſecrating the Chriſm, or Holy Ointment, which before conſecration did not fill the veſſel in which it was contain'd, it increaſed ſo much after conſecration, that it would have run over the veſſel, had they not pour'd it immediately into another (f). This was look'd upon as a very great miracle [H]. The other happened in (f) Id. ibid. ap. eund. p. 250.

" dity. It follows therefore, that what ariſes from " the union of two natures muſt be ſomething real, " which muſt be either a ſubſtance or an accident. " It cannot be an accident, and therefore muſt be a " ſubſtance. Now a ſubſtance is either common or " ſingular; it cannot be common, for in that caſe the " name Chriſt would belong to ſeveral ſpecies, and " to ſeveral perſons, which is impoſſible; for a common ſubſtance is that whoſe name and definition " can be applied to all the individuals which are " comprehended under the general or common name. " Therefore that which ariſes from the union of ſeveral natures muſt be a ſingular ſubſtance; but a " ſingular ſubſtance is nothing elſe but a ſingular nature and perſon. Therefore Chriſt, who is not " nothing, but ſomething; who is no accident, but " a ſubſtance; nor a common but a ſingular ſubſtance, " muſt have but one nature and perſon. (12)." This is the principal argument of the Jacobites, which they ſupport by the following ſyllogiſm. The word Man can be applied to Peter and to Paul, therefore they are two men; if then we could apply the word Chriſt to the Divine and to the human nature, there would be two natures and two Chriſts; but there is but one Chriſt, therefore he alſo has but one nature (13). Aſſemanus undertakes to confute theſe reaſonings of Abulfaragius, and of the Jacobites, but his refutation is ſo ſubtle and ſcholaſtic, that we are afraid of tiring the reader ſhould we tranſlate it here; we will only obſerve, that ſuch nice diſtinctions and ſcholaſtic reaſonings, far from ſupporting religion againſt the cavils of Infidels and Heretics, ſeem calculated only to expoſe the Goſpel to ridicule, and afford a ſpecious pretence to explode it. Father Simon thinks the Jacobites differ from the Orthodox only in the manner of expreſſing their opinions (14).

(12) Id. ap. eund. p. 289.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Hiſt. Crit. des Dogm. &c. des Chretiens Orient. c. 9. p. 119.

[F] Entirely different from what is called Tranſubſtantiation.] Theſe are his words; Quemadmodum natura humana Domini non natura, ſed propter unionem cum natura Divina, Deus dicitur & eſt; ita & panis hic & vinum non natura corpus & ſanguis ſunt, ſed propter gratiam Spiritus, qui ipſis illabitur, corpus & ſanguis Chriſti dicuntur. That is, " As the human " nature of the Lord, is not called God, becauſe it " is ſo naturally, but is called and is God only be" cauſe it is united to the Divine Nature; ſo this " bread and this wine, are not naturally the body " and blood of Chriſt, but are only ſo called, becauſe " of the grace of the Spirit which comes upon them" (15). And he explains more particularly how this is to be underſtood, when he anſwers the following objection. " If becauſe of the grace of the Spirit, the " bread and wine are called the body and blood of " God; and if the body and blood are God, becauſe " they are united with God; it will follow, that " the bread and wine are alſo God." To which he anſwers: " If we maintained that the bread " and wine are naturally the body and blood (of " Chriſt;) and that the body and blood are naturally " God, the objection would hold good. But we " don't ſay ſo; we only ſay, that the bread and wine " are the body and blood (of Chriſt) becauſe of the " grace of the Spirit, and (that his body and blood " are) the body and blood of God, not naturally, but " becauſe of their union with God (16)." Thus it appears, how far the Jacobites are from maintaining Tranſubſtantiation. Father Simon ought to have taken notice of this, when he treats of the opinions of the Jacobites; but he is quite ſilent (17). If this is not prevaricating, I don't know by what name to call ſuch an omiſſion. Father Simon's intention was to ſhew, that the Eaſtern Chriſtians agree in almoſt every thing with the Roman Catholics, and that when they differ it is only in words, or in ſome cuſtoms and ceremonies, of an indifferent nature. See his Preface to the book quoted above; but how far he has ſucceeded in his attempt we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew, when we come to give an account of the Sects he mentions.

(15) Ibid. Fundam. 6. cap. 2. §. 4. ap. Aſſem. p. 293.

(16) Ibid. p. 294.

(17) See the chap. quoted in marg. note 14.

[G] Kept in the Paradiſe, in which Adam was at firſt placed.] Theſe are his words; Dicimus haud fruſtra creatus eſt Paradiſus, etſi Adam ſtatim ex eo pulſus & relegatus fuit; ſed initio quidem Adam & Heva in eo habitârunt: poſt eorum vero diſceſſum, animæ juſtorum, ut patrum eorum, qui Deo placuere, Abraham nimirum & Iſaac & Jacob, & Prophætarum, & Juſtorum, & Latronis dexteri, & Apoſtolorum, & Martyrum, & Confeſſorum, & Anachoretarum, ibi habitârunt, & nunc habitant. Sed & Enoch atque Elias ibidem corpore manent. Atque ki quidem uſque ad reſurrectionem. Poſt reſurrectionem verò, quum non omnes homines regno cœlorum digni ſint, nec omnes pœnis infernalibus & Diabolo paratis, hoc eſt, tenebris exterioribus tradantur, ſed medius plurium ſtatus erit inter utrumque hoc extremum; haud inveriſimile eſt, nonnullos homines, qui nec in omnibus perfecti ſint, nec in omnibus imperfecti & impii, ad æternam Paradiſi habitationem deſtinari; quod & verax ille comprobat, qui ait, In domo Patris mei multæ manſiones ſunt; cur enim fieri nequit ut una ex illis manſionibus Paradiſus ſit (18)? That is, " We ſay that " Paradiſe has not been created in vain, though Adam " was immediately baniſhed out of it. For Adam and " Eve lived in it at firſt; afterwards it became the " place of abode for the ſouls of the righteous, as of " Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob; of the Prophets, of the " Penitent Thief; of the Apoſtles, Martyrs, Confeſ" ſors, and Anchorets; they all inhabit Paradiſe. " And Enoch and Elijah are there ſtill in their bodies, " and ſhall remain in Paradiſe till the reſurrection. " But after the reſurrection, as all men ſhall not be " worthy to inherit the kingdom of heaven; nor all " deſerve to be condemned to hell torments, prepared " for the Devil, that is, to be caſt into outer dark" neſs, there will be an intermediate ſtate between " theſe extremes. It is therefore not improbable, " that ſome men, who have not been perfectly vir" tuous, nor yet altogether wicked, will have Para" diſe appointed them for an eternal habitation; " which is alſo confirmed by him that is true, when he " ſays, in my Father's houſe there are many manſions. " For why could not Paradiſe be one of theſe man" ſions?" Aſſemanus remarks on this paſſage, that if Abulfaragius ſpeaks of adult perſons, as he ſeems to do, he muſt have borrowed his notions from the Pelagians, who denying original ſin, maintained that men, who died without being baptiſed, and without having any ſupernatural virtue; but who were alſo free from great ſins, ſhould not obtain the heavenly Paradiſe, nor be condemned to hell, but ſhould go to an intermediate place. But, adds Aſſemanus; if Abulfaragius underſtood this of infants, his opinion has been alſo maintained by ſome other Divines, who thought it was probable, that infants would inhabit this world, and conſequently Paradiſe; though it is not likely, that Paradiſe, if it was not deſtroyed by the flood, ſhould eſcape the general conflagration (19).

(18) Ap. Aſſem. ibid. p. 294.

(19) Id. ibid. p. 295.

[H] A very great miracle.] Aſſemanus pretends to account for this miracle in a natural way; the temple being little, ſays he, and very full of people, this, with the wax tapers and burning of incenſe, might heat the air to ſuch a degree, as to cauſe the balſam to dilute and melt away, and ſo to run out of the veſſel, without any miracle (20).

(20) P. 250. note 1.

in the year 1285, and is thus related by Abulfaragius. The Church of St. John Bar-Nagore having been demoliſhed by ſome robbers, Abulfaragius built a new church and monaſtery in a more ſecure place, and dedicated it to the ſame Saint: and as he deſir'd that the relics of the ſaint ſhould be kept in the new church, he ſent ſome perſons to dig them up out of the ruins of the old church; but they not finding the relics, the ſaint appear'd to ſome Chriſtians, and told them, that except the Primate himſelf came, the relics would never be found. Abulfaragius hearing of this, would not believe it, and feigning to be ſick, ſhut himſelf up in his cell, from the Friday till the Sunday night following; when having ſaid his evening prayers, and being between ſleeping and waking he ſaw a glorify'd boy [I], who told him that the relics were depoſited under the altar of the old church. Upon this the Primate went immediately with his brother and two Biſhops, in queſt of thoſe holy remains, and found them according to the direction of the boy (g). Here follows the character of Abulfaragius, drawn by his own brother. "Who would not, ſays he, deplore the unhappy con-"dition of the famous Jacobites, ſeeing them depriv'd of this extraordinary man, "this excellent Philoſopher? No one but himſelf could give ſuch ſatisfactory an-"ſwers to any foreigner, either on eccleſiaſtical matters, or profane ſciences. No one "could write letters ſo full of good ſenſe, ſo elegant and elaborate, as thoſe of this "great man, whom God had endow'd with the knowledge of the whole circle of "ſciences. This famous Prelate was perpetually writing and compoſing excellent "books, from the age of twenty till the time of his death (h)." The learned Pocock is miſtaken, when he ſays in his preface, that our Abulfaragius was the ſame with Abulfaragius Abdalla Ebn-Attiba [K]. Concerning what is ſaid of Abulfaragius's renouncing Chriſtianity when he was near his death, ſee the remark [L].

(g) Ibid. p. 260, 261.

(h) Barſuma, ap. Aſſeman. ibid. p. 267.

[I] He ſaw a glorify'd boy.] Here again Aſſemanus (21) will not allow the miracle; this, ſays he, might be a dream of Abulfaragius; or a ſtory invented to raiſe the piety of the people: and he obſerves, that St. Auſtin reproaches the Donatiſts with ſuch viſions. But if ſuch a ſtory were related by a Catholic writer, Aſſemanus would have found no fault with it; but it muſt not be allow'd that any miracles were perform'd among thoſe that are called Heretics.

(21) Ibid. p. 261. Note 1.

[K] The learned Pocock was miſtaken when he ſaid, &c.] For our Abulfaragius himſelf relates the death of Abulfaragius Abdalla Ebn-Attiba, and gives a catalogue of the books he wrote (22). "Towards the latter end "of October, in the year 1355 of the Greek Æra, "(A. C. 1043) ſays he, died Abulfaragius, a pious "Neſtorian Monk, a learned man and a Philoſopher. He "wrote in Arabic a Commentary on the Old and New "Teſtament; he alſo explain'd the books of Ariſtotle, "and reprov'd the Neſtorian Patriarchs, for their "neglecting eccleſiaſtical learning: but in my opinion "he was but little skill'd in the Syriac tongue." It appears by this, that Abulfaragius Ebn-Attiba liv'd above two hundred years before our Abulfaragius: and Dr Pocock himſelf (23) places the death of Ebn-Attiba in the year 435 of the Hegira that is, A. C. 1244. 'Tis therefore to be wonder'd, how he could ſay in his preface, that he was the ſame with our Abulfaragius.

(22) In Chron. Syriac. part 1. fol. 112. ap. Aſſem ubi ſupra. p. 309.

(23) Or rather Abulfar. tranſlated by Pocock, p. 233.

[L] Renounced Chriſtianity when he was near his death.] Dr. Pocock ſays, this was a ſtory invented by thoſe who were envious, that the Chriſtians ſhould have ſuch a learned man among them; and he adds, that if he had been an apoſtate, the Chriſtians would never have talk'd of him with ſo much eſteem, but would rather have anathematiz'd him; whereas they, even after his death, call him, Our Holy Father, The Prince of the Chriſtians, The pureſt ſubſtance of the Jacobites: At non ab aliis hoc dictum videtur, quam ab iis, qui tantam eruditionem Chriſtianis invidèrent. Si apoſtatam egiſſet nequaquam eum tanto honore, ſed anathematis potius & diris proſequuti fuiſſent Chriſtiani, apud quos pater noſter ſanctus, Chriſtianorum Princeps primarius, Sectæ Jacobiticæ puriſſima ſubſtantia etiam poſt mortem audit. Renaudot pretends, that this is no convincing argument, becauſe ſuch epithets do not relate to a man's morals, but only to his dignity; therefore the Chriſtians might have given Abulfaragius all theſe titles, notwithſtanding his apoſtaſy. Aſſemanus anſwers, by barely denying what Renaudot ſays, but does not confute, or undertake to confute him (24).

(24) In a note at the beginning of a MS. of Abulfaragius, it is expreſly aſſerted, not only that he was a Chriſtian of the Jacobite ſect, but that he died in the faith of that ſect.

ABUL FEDA (Ismael) Prince of Hamâh, a city in Syria, ſucceeded his brother, the year of the Hegira 743, or Anno Dom. 1342, and died three years after, being about threeſcore and twelve years of age (a). Study was his delight, and particularly that of Geography, as appears from the work entitled, Choraſmiæ & Mawaralnahræ, hoc eſt, regionum extra fluvium Oxum deſcriptio ex tabulis Abulfedæ Iſmaëlis, principis Hamah (b). That is, A Deſcription of Choraſmia and Mawaralnahra, or the countries beyond the river Oxus,

(a) Pocock, in his Notes on the Specim. Hiſt. Arab. p. 363. relates, that he was born the 672d year of the Hegira.

(b) According to Greaves, the Arabic title ſignifies Canon, or rather Rectificatio Terrarum; and therefore Konig was not in the wrong to ſay, that Abul Feda writ a geographical work, entitled, Directorium Regionum.

[A] The year of the Hegira 743.] This the Arabian author of the work entitled Al Saterdan (1) declares; ſo that Blancanus the Jeſuit was groſly miſtaken, when he placed Abul Feda in the fourth Century of the Chriſtian Æra (2). This error ought to have prevented his falling into another, viz. his giving this Geographer the title of Prince of Syria, Aſſyria and Perſia; ſince a little attention would have ſhewn him, that it was impoſſible for an Arabian writer, of the Mahometan religion, to be King of Perſia four hundred years after Chriſt. Voſſius, after having mentioned what Blancanus ſays on this head, animadverts no farther on it, than by ſaying, that he believed Abul Feda did not flouriſh in near ſo remote an age; but at the ſame time he gives him the title of Prince of Syria, Aſſyria and Perſia (3), as does alſo Simlerus. He comes pretty near the truth with reſpect to chronology, ſince he tells us that Abulfeda lived three hundred years ago (4); but inſtead of this, Moreri charges him with believing as Blancanus did, that this Syrian Prince flouriſhed in the third or fourth Century. But it is certain, continues Moreri, that he lived much later, perhaps in the 8th or 9th Century, or even in the year 1200. He ſhould not have ſaid perhaps, he ſhould have aſſerted he was living in the 14th Century, ſince his work was finiſhed the year 721 of the Hegira, as we are told at the end of it. There is a typographical error in the Dutch edition of Moreri relating to this place; for there Mr. Greaves is made to ſay, that our Abul Feda flouriſhed in the beginning of the thirteenth Century, and nevertheleſs he dates the death of that Prince in 1345. A circumſtance which gives me pain, is, to find the learned Dr. Pocock aſſerting, that Abul Feda ſucceeded to the government of the province of Hamâh the 710th year of the Hegira (5). Now this is inconſiſtent with what Mr. Greaves aſcertain'd. However, it is more natural to depend on the latter, ſince Abul Feda is the chief ſubject on which Greaves writes, whereas Dr. Pocock mentions him only occaſionally. But is it not vexatious, that men of Dr. Pocock's knowledge in Oriental affairs, cannot be depended upon; and that at the ſame time they publiſh a circumſtance, one of their fellow labourers ſhould prove it to be falſe?

(1) Apud Gravium Præfatione.

(2) He writes his name Abifeidea in his Chronol. Mathematic.

(3) Voſſius de Mathematic. Diſciplin. p. 250.

(4) He writes his name Abilfeldeas, and Abilfedæas. See Epitom. Biblioth. Geſneri.

(5) Pocock. Not. in Specim. Hiſt. Arab. p. 393.

Oxus, from the tables of Abulfeda Iſmael, Prince of Hamah; this book was printed in London anno 1650. The author cites a great number of Arabian writers in this work, which was written a great many years before he aſcended the throne; it being declar'd at the concluſion of the work, that it was ended the 721ſt year of the Hegira, that is, Anno Dom. 1321. We are obliged to the learned Mr. Greaves for the London edition abovemention'd, who, together with the Arabic original, publiſhed a Latin verſion of it, and a preface, in which he acquaints us, that he conſulted five different manuſcripts; the firſt was that which Erpenius had tranſcrib'd from the copy in the Palatine library; the ſecond was that very copy, which is now in the Vatican library; two other manuſcripts in Doctor Pocock's poſſeſſion; and a fifth that had been purchas'd in Conſtantinople. We are told moreover in this preface, that Ramuſius firſt applauded this work of Abulfeda, and pointed out the uſes of it; that Caſtaldus corrected the longitudes and latitudes by it; that Ortelius mentions it often in his Theſaurus Geographicus, not as having ſeen it, but on the teſtimony of Caſtaldus; that Erpenius, vex'd to find it had not yet been printed, was determin'd to publiſh it, and would certainly have kept his reſolution, had not death ſtopt him in the midſt of his progreſs; that Schickard firſt extracted from thence ſeveral deeply learned remarks, which till then were unknown, and inſerted them in his Tarich Perſicum; but as the copy belonging to the Imperial library, which Tengnagelius lent him, was not legible in many places, he left the greateſt part of the labour and glory to Mr. Greaves (c). 'Tis ſurprizing that Moreri could croud ſo many errors into one ſingle article [B], as he has done in that of Abul Feda. Spigelius did not know in 1668, nor Konig in 1678, that Abul Feda had been printed in England (d).

(c) Infer from this, that Fabricius, in his Specimen Linguæ Arabicæ, p. 99. is miſtaken, when he ſays, in Konig, that Schickard tranſlated Abulfeda into Latin. Spizelius, in his Specim. Bibl. cites the abovemention'd Fabricius, as declaring that Schickard had tranſlated the whole work.
(d) Spizelii Specim. Biblioth. Univerſ.

[B] That Moreri ſhould croud ſo many errors into one ſingle article.] We have already taken notice of ſome, and here follow the reſt. Firſt, as he relates that ſome think Abul Feda was born in Nubia, he manifeſtly confounds him with the author of Geographia Nubienſis, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place. At leaſt, it is plain he does not know that theſe are two different authors, for otherwiſe he would not have mentioned the opinion of thoſe writers, without cenſuring it at the ſame time. Secondly, He confirms the firſt obſervation, when he adds, that Abul Feda has diſpoſed his Geography by climates, which is more applicable to the author of Geographia Nubienſis, than to Abul Feda. The latter has left only a deſcription of ſome parts of Aſia ſituated on the other ſide the Oxus, which he places under the twenty fifth and twenty ſixth climates. The Geography of Nubia is diſpoſed after a different manner; in this, no more than ſeven climates are mentioned, according to that diviſion of the antients, to which the deſcription of the ſeveral parts of the known world there given, is referred. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that Abul Feda makes the firſt climate to paſs over Arabia, and not, as the author of Geographia Nubienſis, over the moſt weſtern coaſt of the Atlantic Ocean; and makes that the firſt Meridian, which paſſes over Cape St. Vincent. Thirdly; We have hitherto ſeen, ſays Moreri, no more than the firſt climates of Abul Feda, but we are as good as promiſed the remainder of them this year. This is an errant falſhood; for the part of Abul Feda here publiſhed relates to the twenty fifth and twenty ſixth climates, and not to the firſt. Fourthly; An author ſhould never employ that looſe and indeterminate expreſſion, this year; for ten years after it has been uſed his reader does not know what date to fix upon; he therefore muſt have recourſe to that of the firſt edition, which is met with only in ſome books; and then it is not always a ſure guide, becauſe a book is ſometimes not publiſhed, till ſeveral years after it was written. This is an inſtance of the perplexity which the words this year, occaſions. Now what reader, upon ſuch a peruſal of Moreri, could gueſs the date in which the reſt of Abul Feda's climates were promiſed? This year is a very long one, ſince it continued to the ſixth edition incluſive. Fifthly, Poſtellus firſt brought this work into Europe, an abridgment whereof he publiſhed in Latin. Here Moreri has again made two miſtakes. Of the ſeveral authors he cites, Simlerus only is concerned on this occaſion. Now all that Simlerus relates is, that Poſtellus having brought this work out of the Levant, left the abridgment of it, which he tranſlated, in Venice, with Ramuſius (6), who intended to publiſh a ſecond volume on America. There is a wide difference between bringing a book out of the Levant, and being the firſt who brings it from thoſe parts; between publiſhing a work, and only leaving the manuſcript of it with a perſon, to make what uſe of it he thinks proper. It is certain that Ramuſius did not publiſh what Poſtellus left with him; and though it were true that Abul Feda (which was in Arabic in the Palatine Library, as Moreri obſerves) was brought into Europe by Poſtellus; and that this copy was the firſt which was ever ſeen in the Weſt; it is nevertheleſs certain, that Moreri makes people ſay more than they really do; and that we may with juſtice complain of his falſifications here. Theſe deſerve to be particularly commented upon.

(6) Simlerus writes his name falſly Rhamnuſius, as does alſo Spizelius.

☞ ABU'LFEDA, was the ſixth in lineal deſcent from Ayûb, or Job, the father of the famous Saladine, (Salâho'ddîn Yuſof) by another ſon named Shâhinſhâh Seifo'ddin (a). Salâho'ddin, as we ſhall hereafter call him, to whom the eſtabliſhment and grandeur of that family was chiefly owing, in the year of the Hegira 570 (b), ſet out from Egypt, of which he had been in poſſeſſion ſome years before, on an expedition into Syria, and having made himſelf maſter of that province (c), gave Hamâh, and ſome other towns and territories there, to his nephew Takîo'ddîn Omar, the ſon of Shâhinſhâh; whoſe poſterity, in a direct line, enjoy'd the ſame under the Kings of Egypt, without interruption, till the year 698 (d). But in that year, Mahmûd the ſon of Mohammed, couſin german to our Abu'lfedâ, and Prince of Hamâh, dying, Salâr and Bibars al Jâſhenkîr, who were at the head of affairs in Egypt under Soltân al Malec al Nâſer Ebn Kelaûn, at that time a minor, took Hamâh and its dependencies from the Ayûbites, and committed the government thereof to Lieutenants appointed by the Egyptian court, till 710 (e), when al Nâſer, having the preceding year recover'd the throne of which he had been depriv'd by Bibars for about eleven months, inveſted Abu'lfedâ with the dominions of his anceſtors (f); and he continu'd in the peaceable poſſeſſion thereof to the time of his death, which happen'd in 733 (g), he being then ſixty years old [A]. It

(a) Abu'lfed. Hiſt. Gen. tom. 3.
(b) A. C. 1174.
(c) V. Excerpta ex Hiſt. Univ. Abu'lfedæ, edita per Schultens, ad calcem vitæ Saladini, cap. 9.
(d) A. C. 1298.
(e) A. C. 1310.
(f) Abu'lf. Hiſt. Gen. tom. 3.
(g) A. C. 1332. Al Jannâbi, Hiſt. Gen. § 36.

[A] Abu'lfeda died in 733, being ſixty years old.] That is to ſay, ſixty lunar years: for he was born in the 672d year of the Hegira (1), at Damaſcus, whither his father Nûro'ddin Ali and his family had removed,

(1) A. C. 1273.

It muſt not be omitted, that this Prince, during the laſt twelve years of his life, enjoy'd the ſupreme title or dignity of Soltân or King, which was granted him in 720 (b) by al Nâſer (i), but without any new acceſſion of dominions. On comparing what has been ſaid in this article with the preceding, it may be eaſily perceiv'd, that the account given of Abu'lfedâ by Mr. Bayle, is erroneous in many reſpects; he having been miſled by Greaves, (as ſeveral other writers (k), better verſed than Mr. Bayle in the Oriental Hiſtory, have alſo been) and confounded our Prince of Hamâh with a King of Egypt, who did not begin his reign till ten years after Abu'lfedâ's death [B]. The writings which this Prince has left behind him, are a ſufficient proof of his capacity and skill, not only in Geography, but in other parts of learning, as in Juriſprudence, Phyſic, Philoſophy, Aſtrology, Hiſtory, and Poetry [C]. I ſhall take notice, in the remarks, of the cenſures of our author's two principal works by a very learned man, and of the anſwers which have been made to them [D]. How cloſely ſoever Abu'lfeda purſued his ſtudies, he did not

(b) A. C. 1320.
(i) Abulf. ubi ſup. apud Schultens in præf. ad vit. Saladini.

(k) D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. Art. Abu'lfedâ; Prideaux, in his account of authors annexed to his Life of Mahomet; and La Roque, in the Preface to his French tranſlation of Abu'lfeda's Deſcript. of Arabia.

moved, on the rumours ſpread of the irruption of the Tartars (2). That city was alſo the refuge of this branch of the family of Ayûb on two other occaſions; for Abu'lfedâ having, by the Soltân's direction, quitted Hamâh, retreated to Damaſcus, for fear of the governor Aſendamar, and was there when he received the news of his promotion to the principality, on the removal of Aſendamar from the government of Hamâh to that of Haleb or Aleppo (3); Abu'lfeda's ſon and ſucceſſor, al Afdal Ali, being depoſed, retired likewiſe to the ſame city, where he died in the year 746 (4).

(2) Abu'lfed. Hiſt. Gen. ubi ſupra.

(3) Idem. ibid.

(4) A. C. 1345. Al Jannâbi, ubi ſupra.

[B] Mr. Bayle, miſled by Greaves, has confounded our Prince of Hamâh with a King of Egypt.] This miſtake of Greaves, a very extraordinary one in ſo great a man, has been diſcover'd by Mr. Gagnier (5), and deſerves a particular examination.

(5) In Præf. ad Abulf. vitam Mah. p. 4. & ſeq.

Mr. Greaves, in an Arabic manuſcript entitled al Sacerdan (or rather al Sukkerdân, which is a Perſian word, and ſignifies a Sugar-diſh) found the following paſſage, as it ſtands in his Latin tranſlation: Rex juſtus, columna religionis (6), al Soltân, Abu'l-feda Iſmael, filius al Melec al Naſer, ſedit ſuper thronum regni [in Hamah] poſt amotionem fratris ipſius al Melec al Naſer Ahmed, feriâ quintâ, XXII die [menſis] al Moharram, anno DCCXLIII [Hegiræ] & regnavit donec obiit VI die [menſis] Rabiæ poſterioris, anno [Hegiræ] DCCXLVI (7). That is, "Al "Mâlec al Sâleh Omâdo'ddin Abu'lfeda Iſmael, ſon "of al Malec al Naſer, aſcended the throne [of Ha-"mah] after the depoſition of his brother al Mâlec "al Nâſer Ahmed, on Thurſday the 22d of al Mo-"harram, in the year 743, and reigned till he died, "the 6th of the latter Rabîa, in the year 746." This paſſage Greaves, from the ſimilitude of names (a moſt deceitful guide) immediately, and without further examination, concluded muſt belong to our Abu'lfeda (8), and no other; and therefore made no ſcruple to inſert the words [in Hamah], which were not in his author, as a thing of courſe. But had he look'd into what precedes and what follows, he would have found, that the author is there giving the ſucceſſion of the Mamlûc Soltan of Egypt, of the race of the Bahrites, (and not of the Circaſſians or Borjites, as Mr. Gagnier has inadvertently written (9); and that the paſſage before us ſpeaks of a King of that dynaſty, who is the 16th in the ſeries of thoſe Princes given us by Dr. Pocock (10).

(6) The original words are, al Malec al Sâleh Omâdo'ddin, which being his title and ſurname, ſhould not have been tranſlated.

(7) Apud Gravium, in præf. ad Abu'lfed. Deſcr. Chorafmiæ & Mawaralnabræ.

(8) His titles and names at length were, Al Malec al Moayyad Omaddo'ddin Abu'lfeda Iſmael Ebn Ali Prince of Hamah.

(9) Ubi ſup. p. 6.

(10) Supplement. Hiſt. Dynaſtiar. p. 14.

It muſt be obſerved that, beſides the interpolation taken notice of above, Mr. Gagnier charges Greaves with having alſo foiſted into his quotation from the Sukkerdân, the name ABU'LFEDA: and I am ready to believe that the word is not in the Bodleian manuſcript, which Mr. Gagnier had recourſe to. But then I am inclin'd to think that Greaves actually read the name ABU'LFEDA in his copy, and did not add it out of his own head; becauſe, if it had been otherwiſe, he would certainly have given us notice of it, by incloſing that name between two crotchets, as well as the words [in Hamah], which are ſo diſtinguiſhed both in the Latin and in the Arabic text: and I am confirm'd in this opinion, becauſe I find it in a manuſcript copy of the ſame book, now lying before me, which exhibiting the paſſage in queſtion in terms ſomewhat different from thoſe above cited, I will tranſcribe it here in Engliſh, tranſlated as literally as poſſible. The words are; His brother, (i. e. the brother of the preceding Prince) al Malec al Sâleh Omâdo'ddin Abu'lfedâ Iſmael, the ſon of al Mâlec al Nâſer, aſcended the throne, on the depoſition of his brother al Naſer Ahmed, on Thurſday the 22*d of al Moharram, in the year* 743 (11). And the length of his reign was three years, two months, and ſome days over.

(11) A. C. 1342.

I hope by this time the reader is ſatisfy'd of the injuſtice of Mr. Bayle's reflexion on the accurate and judicious Dr. Pocock (12), whom no European has hitherto excell'd, if equall'd, in the knowledge of the Arabic tongue and writers.

(12) See Remark [A] of the preceding Article.

[C] The writings which this Prince has left behind him, are a ſufficient proof of his capacity and skill in ſeveral parts of learning.] Beſides his Geographical Canon, which he finiſhed in the 11th year of his reign (13), (not before his advancement to the throne, as Mr. Bayle ſays) he wrote the following books: A General Hiſtory, from the beginning of the world to his own time; the laſt edition whereof he continu'd to the year 730 (14). A ſhort ſyſtem of the Mohammedan Civil Law, compoſed according to the deciſions of al Shâfeï, whoſe ſect he was of. A Treatiſe of Phyſic, written in the manner of Avicen's Canon. Some Poems (15). He was alſo probably the author of the Aſtronomical Tables, a copy whereof is in the Bodleian Library, of the mean motions of the planets in the years of the Arabs, Perſians, Syrians, Greeks and Jews, compar'd with one another; the rules and problems being in verſe, with the explications underneath in proſe: for the title of the book imports, that it was the compoſition of Omâdo'ddîn Iſmael, the ſon of Zeino'ddin Omar, Soltan of Hamâh; by which our Abu'lfedâ ſeems to be deſign'd, tho' that name appears not among the others, and his father is call'd Zeino'ddîn Omar, inſtead of Nûro'ddin Ali (16).

(13) A. H. 721. A. C. 1321.

(14) A. C. 1329. V. Schultens præf. ad vit. Saladini.

(15) Al. Jannâbi, apud Gagnier, ubi ſup. p. 9.

(16) V. Gagnier, ubi ſupr. p. 11.

Of theſe writings, which are all eſteem'd excellent in their kind, none have been printed, except only ſome parts of his Geography and General Hiſtory; the former ſeveral learned men have deſign'd to publiſh; for beſides Erpenius and Schickard, named by Mr. Bayle, Mr. Greaves, and after him Mr. Samuel Clerk and Mr. William Guiſe, at Oxford, and, as it is ſaid, Mr. Thevenot, in France, undertook the ſame province, but were all prevented by death (17), or ſome other accident (18), from executing their purpoſe. Only Greaves publiſhed the deſcription of the two provinces mention'd by Bayle, (which he ſeems, by his manner of ſpeaking of it, to have taken for the whole work) and left behind him a tranſlation of the deſcription of Arabia, which was in 1712 inſerted, together with the original, by Mr. Gagnier, in the third volume of Dr. Hudſon's Geographiæ veteris ſcriptores Græci minores; from which edition, chiefly, Mr. la Roque made his French tranſlation of the ſame deſcription of Arabia, ſubjoin'd to his Journey to Paleſtine. Of the latter work we have two large extracts printed, which give a very advantageous idea of the reſt; the one containing The Life of Mahomet, publiſhed with a Latin tranſlation and notes, by Mr. Gagnier (19); and the other, The Life and Actions of Saladine, publiſhed with a Latin tranſlation likewiſe, by Mr. Schultens (20).

(17) Tho. Smith, in vita J. Gravii.

(18) V. Renaudot's Preface to the Accounts of India and China, p. 12, and 13. Mr. Gagnier did alſo ſome years ago publiſh propoſals for printing the Geography of Abu'lfeda, but met not with the encouragement he deſerved.

(19) Oxon. 1723. fol.

(20) Ad Calcem vitæ Saladini. Lugd-Bat. 1732 fol.

[D] I ſhall take notice of the cenſures of our author's two principal works by a very learned man, and of the anſwers which have been made to them.] I mean that formidable critic l'Abbé Renaudot, who has alſo involved ſome other writers in the ſevere cenſures he has given of Abu'lfedâ. I. He charges Abu'lfedâ with ignorance in not knowing that the Old Teſtament had been tranſlated into Arabic; becauſe he alledges, in excuſe of the miſtakes he may have made in the Jewiſh hiſtory, that the ancient books not, in the mean time, neglect the art of war. He attended his father, in his youth, in ſeveral military expeditions, and ſerved in the wars againſt the Tartars and Franks in Syria; firſt under Al Manſûr Kelaûn, Soltan of Egypt, who overthrew the Tartars, and took many towns and caſtles from the Chriſtians, and among them Tripoli, a place of great ſtrength, which neither Salâho'ddin, nor any other of the Egyptian Kings, had ventured to attack, as Abu'lfeda teſtifies, who was preſent at the ſtorming of that city in the year 688 (l). Then under Salaho'ddin, ſurnamed Khalîl, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Kelaûn, who took Acca or Ptolemais, after a bloody ſiege, and demoliſhed it, in 690 (m). And again, in the year 702 (n), Gazân Khân, Emperor of the Mogul Tartars, having ſent his forces into Syria, led by Kotlû Shâh, Abu'lfeda met them with the troops of Hamah, under his own command, and in conjunction with the Egyptian army, which was headed by other Generals, obtained a ſignal victory over them. He alſo mentions ſeveral other expeditions, of leſſer moment, before his advancement to the throne (o), and alſo after; particularly one into the Leſſer Armenia, where he took the city Malatia or Melitene, in the year of the Hegira 715 (p).

(l) A. C. 1289.

(m) A. C. 1291.

(n) A. C. 1302.

(o) Abu'lf. Hiſt. Gen. Tom. 3. V. Gagnier, in Præf. ad Abu'lfedæ Vit. Mohammedis.

(p) A. C. 1315. Abulf. in Deſcr. Syriæ, apud Aſſem. Diſſert. de Monophyſitis.

books of that people were not then in Arabic, but in the Hebrew tongue (21): which, ſays Renaudot, deceived the learned Pocock, when he grounded his conjecture as to the antiquity of the Arabic verſion on his teſtimony (22). To this it has been anſwered, 1. That Dr. Pocock has cleared Abu'lfeda from ignorance in this matter, by obſerving, that it appears from that author's words, that no verſion of the Hebrew text was then to be found written in Arabic characters, for ſo they ought neceſſarily to be underſtood, ſince the Jewiſh Scriptures had been many years before tranſlated into Arabic by R. Saadias (23), (and perhaps by others) though written in the Hebrew character, as is ſtill their cuſtom, leſt they ſhould be read by thoſe of a different religion (24). 2. That Dr. Pocock lays no ſtreſs at all on Abu'lfeda's evidence to ſupport his conjecture of the antiquity of the Arabic verſion; as appears not only from what has been juſt now quoted from the former, but from what he further adds, viz. that he would not raſhly affirm that the ſaid verſion was at that time (i. e. in the time of Abu'lfedâ, who himſelf tranſcribed ſome parts of the hiſtorical books, by the aſſiſtance of a perſon who underſtood both Hebrew and Arabic) firſt put into a Saracenic dreſs, ſince Aben Ezra aſſerts of Saadias himſelf, That he turned the law into the Iſmaelitic tongue and character (25). II. Renaudot accuſes Abu'lfeda of equal ignorance in reſpect to the council of Nice, and ſays that he copied Al Makrizi or Eutychius, of whoſe moſt abſurd narrative he was not able to judge; and alſo condemns him as ſhamefully unacquainted with the Chriſtian affairs, becauſe he finds in a MS. copy of his hiſtory, ſome marginal notes and emendations written in a large and ſcrawling character (a certain mark, as he ſuppoſes, that it was the author himſelf who took ſuch liberty, and not a critical corrector) among which a ſilly account of the Chriſtian doctrines, taken from ſome catalogues of hereſies, like that which may be read in the beginning of the Preface of the Nicene Council tranſlated by Ecchellenſis, written by men perfectly ſtrangers both to Divinity and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. And then he proceeds to inſult him in the following terms: En hominem infidelem & barbarum, quem ſeculo decimo quarto nugas alterius, qui nono ſeculo viveòat, tranſcribentem audire nos jubet Seldenus, omnium antiquorum teſtimonio inſuper habito (26)! That is, "Behold the infidel and barbarian, "who in the fourteenth Century copied the trifling "fables of another that lived in the ninth, and whom "yet Selden bids us to hear, without having any re"gard to the teſtimony of all the ancients!" This ſharp cenſure was occaſioned by Selden's quoting a paſſage of Abu'lfeda, wherein it is ſaid, That in the twentieth year of Conſtantine, two thouſand and forty eight Biſhops were aſſembled, out of whom he choſe three hundred and eighteen, and that they anathematized Arius, for aſſerting Chriſt to have been created, &c. (27). But theſe words Abu'lfeda expreſly ſays he tranſcribed from the Geographical Canon of al Birûni, who flouriſhed about the year 385 (28). Whence it appears how raſhly Renaudot has affirmed Abu'lfeda to have copied them from al Makrizi or Eutychius. The latter, indeed, he might have copied, but al Makrizi he could not, becauſe he was not born till thirty ſix years after Abu'lfeda's death, that is, in 769 (29). However, Selden gives no credit to this ſtory, but only tells it as ſuch: for he juſtly obſerves, as Renaudot himſelf confeſſes, that that monſtrous number of two thouſand and forty eight Biſhops can ſcarce be made up out of all the Biſhops to be found in the Notitiæ Epiſcoporum of the whole world. As to the argument of Abu'lfeda's ignorance of the Chriſtian doctrines, from the account he found thereof in the abovementioned marginal additions, it can be of no manner of weight, there being not the leaſt proof, beſides Renaudot's own imagination, that they were written by our author (30). III. He has a fling at Abu'lfeda's other work, his Syſtem of Geography. The great fault he finds therein is the ſetting down divers poſitions of moſt of the cities there named, which poſitions differ from one another, ſometimes ſeveral degrees, both in the longitude and in the latitude: this he calls want of exactneſs, and thinks it impoſſible to juſtify the author's negligence and incapacity in that reſpect; and then leaves the reader to judge whether there is any great aſſiſtance to be expected from this work, ſo much cried up for near two Centuries, to reſtore the Oriental Geography (31). Hereto it has been replied, that the very thing which Renaudot eſteems to be a fault, is, in the judgment of other learned men, a principal recommendation: for Abu'lfeda having given the various poſitions of places, according to ſeveral authors, from the comparing them with one another and with later obſervations, the true ſituations may more eaſily be found. Is it to be reckoned for nothing that there are above ſixty authors of note cited in the Geography of Abul'feda, as Greaves aſſures us? Is there no uſe to be made of the obſervations of ſo many writers, for the reſtoring the Eaſtern Geography? eſpecially conſidering that the diſtances of places are alſo ſet down in Paraſang's miles, ſtations, days-journeys, &c. (32). And indeed it ſeems an unreaſonable thing to expect any more from our author than a faithful report of what the beſt Geographers had ſaid before him; unleſs his cenſurer would have had him gone in perſon to the ſeveral places he deſcribes, and to have taken their poſitions on the ſpot. Before we diſmiſs our critic, it may be proper to obſerve that he has alſo been guilty of a miſtake as to the year of Abu'lfeda's death, which he places thirteen years too late, that is, in the 1345 of Chriſt (33).

It cannot be amiſs to take notice that Abu'lfeda ought not to be confounded with Iſmael, ſurnamed Shâhinſhâh, the compiler alſo of a General Hiſtory, a great part whereof he has tranſcribed word for word from the work of that Prince, they being two different perſons, though from the ſimilitude of names, and exact agreement of ſeveral paſſages which have been quoted from them, they have been taken by ſome writers (34) to have been the ſame (35).

Y.

(21) Abu'lf. Hiſt. Gen. apud Pocock. præf. ad Var. Lection. Arab. Vet. Teſt. in tom. 6. Bibl. Polygl. Angl.

(22) Renaudot. Hiſt. Patriarch. Alexandr. p. 77, & ſeq.

(23) R. Saadias died A. C. 947.

(24) Pocock, ubi ſupra.

(25) Idem, ibid. V. Gagnier, ubi ſupra.

(26) Renaudot. ubi ſupra.

(27) Selden. Comment. in Eutychii Origines.

(28) A. C. 995.

(29) A. C. 1367.

(30) Gagnier, ubi ſupra.

(31) Renaudot, Pref. aux Anciennes Relations des Indes & de la Chine, p. 15.

(32) Gagnier, ubi ſupra.

(33) Idem, ibid.

(34) Particularly by Marraccius, in Prodr. ad Refut. Alcor. &c. and by Dr. Prideaux, in the account of authors at the end of his Life of Mahomet.

(35) V. Gagnier, ubi ſupra, p. 16.

☞ABU'L OLA AHMED, a celebrated Arabian Poet, was of the tribe of Tonûkh, and born at Maarra al Nomân, a town of Syria in the territory of Hems, in the year of the Hegira 363 (a), and died in 449 (b). His father, and ſeveral of his family were famous for learning. Abu'l Olâ, when three years old, loſt his eye-ſight by the ſmall-pox, and therefore the greater care was taken of his education, that this defect might be be recompenſed by the accompliſhments of his mind, and a better light (c): nor was this care fruitleſs; for having fine natural parts, he quickly maſtered the politer kinds of learning, and became an excellent Poet. Though he declared he remembered nothing he had ſeen in his infancy, except only the colour red, yet his deſcriptions are very juſt and lively (d) [A]. Abu'l Olâ once took a journey to Baghdâd, where he ſtaid a year and a half, to enjoy the converſation of the learned men of that city, and then returned to Maarra, out of which he went no more. Khakâni and Feleki, two Perſian Poets, were his ſcholars (e). He has been violently accuſed by ſome of Zendiciſm, or denying a Providence and the Reſurrection; a charge that ſeems to have been occaſioned by certain paſſages in his works, which favour very much of irreligion [B]: and others have as ſtrenuouſly defended his orthodoxy (f) [C], notwithſtanding the liberties he has taken in ſome of his writings. However, in the latter part of his life he ſeems to have fallen into the opinions of the Indian Philoſophers, by his abſtaining forty five years from eating of fleſh, eggs, and milk, and his avoiding to put any animal to pain (g), and alſo from the inſcription which he ordered to be put upon his tomb [D]. How eaſy is it for a man to make but one ſtep even from Atheiſm to Superſtition!

(a) A. C. 973.

(b) A. C. 1057. Ebn Shohnah. Pocock. Spec. Hiſt. Arab. p. 364. D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. Art. Abu'l Olâ.

(c) Gol. in Append. ad Gram. Arab. Erpenii. p. 226.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) D'Herbel. ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, ib. Pocock. in Not. ad Portam Moſis, p. 238---341.

(g) D'Herbel. & Pocock. ubi ſupra.

ABU

[A] His deſcriptions are very juſt and lively.] This appears from many paſſages in his various compoſitions, but more eſpecially in that which he entitled The Spark, as deſigning it for a ſpecimen of his genius and knowledge. He alſo wrote a larger work, the title of which is taken from the final rhymes: in this latter he treats of intellectual things, and the vanity and contempt of the world, as he does in the former of viſible and ſenſible objects (1). Golius has publiſhed the firſt piece of the former work, with a Latin tranſlation (2); and alſo a ſhort ſpecimen of the latter, in Arabic only (3).

(1) Gol. in Append. ad Grammat Arab. Erpenii, p. 226, &c.

(2) J. Fabricius had before publiſhed the ſame piece, with a Latin tranſlation (but not ſo exact as that of Golius) and Notes, in his Specimen Arabicum, printed at Roſtock in 1638.

(3) In the Appendix abovemention'd.

[B] Some paſſages in his works occaſioned him to be charged with Zendiciſm.] Thoſe which are generally produced to ſupport this charge, are the following, of which we ſhall give an almoſt literal tranſlation.

1. We laugh, and thereby but proclaim our folly;
For mortal men who dwell in this low world
Should rather weep.
2. Time breaks to pieces vain, fantaſtic man,
As he were glaſs. And tho' the various fragments
Should all be melted down a ſecond time,
This brittle frame could never be repair'd.

(4) Apud Pocock. in Not. ad PortamMoſis. p. 239.

Theſe verſes ſeem plainly to deny the reſurrection; but here are others which ſtrike at all religions without diſtinction.

1. With wonder on the Magian I reflect,
*And his two blended principles * amaze me.*
Nor am I leſs aſtoniſh'd at the Indians,
Who, with a cow's warm urine, waſh their faces.
2. The Chriſtians ſtagger me, when they affirm
That God is ſometimes guilty of injuſtice,
Or croſs'd in the deſigns which he projects:
3. As do the Jews, when they aſſert, that God
Delights in ſprinkled blood; and that the ſmell
Of broiling fleſh is grateful to his noſtrils.
4. Nor am I leſs ſurpriz'd, to hear of people
Who idly come, from earth's extremities,
*To ſcatter pebble, and to kiſs a ſtone .
5. How do theſe notions ſhock unprejudic'd reaſon!
Sure all are blind, and cannot ſee the truth (5).

* i. e. Of good and evil, by the mixture of which that ſect ſuppoſes the world, &c. to have been fram'd. See the article ZOROASTER.

* Theſe are ceremonies which the pilgrims perform at Mecca.

(5) Apud Ebn Shohnah. MS.

1. Jeſus appear'd; annull'd the law of Moſes;
Next, Mah'met came with his five prayers a day.
2. 'Tis ſaid, no Prophet will ſucceed to him:
From morn to eve, confus'd, the people wander.
3. Haſt thou, of all mankind, ſince thou'ſt profeſs'd
Thy preſent † principles, alone enjoy'd
The ſplendor and advantages which flow
From the two lamps that ſhine in heav'ns high arch?
4. If thy reply's impertinent, I'll raiſe
My voice: but if thy words are to the purpoſe,
I'll ſtill ſpeak low (6).

† Or Religion.

(6) Apud eund. V. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. art. ABUL OLA.

1. The Chriſtians wander in a miſt of error;
The Moſlems are deluded by their guides;
The Magians are like mummies wrapt in balm,
And all the Jews in darkneſs are involv'd.
2. Mankind may in two claſſes be divided,
The one have ſenſe, but they have no religion;
The other have religion, and are ſenſeleſs (7).

(7) Apud eund. V. D'Herbel. ubi ſupra.

To theſe paſſages may be added his reply to the Kâdi al Manâri. That judge telling him one day what ſcandalous things people ſaid of him, Abu'l Olâ anſwered, What have mankind to do with me, ſince I have quitted my claim to this their world? To which the Kâdi adding, And to their other world too; our Poet replied, Ay, Kâdi, and to their other world too; which words he repeated ſeveral times (8).

(8) Pocock. ubi ſupra. p. 240.

But theſe latter words, as well as the verſes firſt quoted, may be underſtood in a better ſenſe than what is uſually put upon them. In thoſe verſes he ſeems to deny the opinion of a certain heretical ſect among the Mohammedans, who aſſerted a return into this world: and by his reply to the Kâdi he might reject their ſenſual notions of the next life, which they imagine will be conformable to this (as to eating, drinking, enjoying of women, palaces, &c.) rather than abſolutely to deny a future ſtate. Perhaps his want of ſight might make him a more ſevere obſerver and cenſurer of the actions of other men; on which accounts he might alſo draw their cenſures upon himſelf (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

[C] Others have defended his orthodoxy.] As a proof of which they might produce the following verſes:

1. Mankind to live eternally were form'd;
And that vain ſect's (10) deceiv'd, who idly think
They were created for annihilation.
2. For theſe, when their probation here is ended,
To ſeats of bliſs or woe are hence convey'd.
3. The lying down to die, is but to ſleep,
Then ev'ry active faculty's at reſt.
But the immortal life we hope hereafter,
Is as the waking from a long, long ſleep (11).

(10) Viz. the Sadducees or Zendiks.

(11) Apud Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 238.

See alſo what we have offered in his vindication in the preceding Remark.

[D] The inſcription which he ordered to be put upon his tomb.] It was this. Hadha janâh abi aleyya; walâ janeitoh ala ahad: i. e. "This crime did my "father commit againſt me; but I have not com-"mitted the ſame againſt any." Which words are ſuppoſed to be grounded on an opinion which ſome Philoſophers have held, that the begetting of a child and the bringing him into this world is a ſin againſt him, becauſe of the accidents and evils to which he thereby becomes expoſed; for, as the Poet ſays,

Παῖδας φυτίνειν οὐπόθ' ἁνδρώπους ἐχρῆν,
Πόνους ὁρῶντας εἰς ὅσους φυτεύομεν (12).

(12) Euripid. Fragm. p. 513. Ed. Barnes.

Liberos procreare nequaquam homines decet,
Videntes in quanta procreamur mala.

That is,

"Mankind ſhould never procreate, ſince children
"Are born to woes unnumber'd.

This epitaph of Abu'l Ola's, however, may be underſtood to mean no more, than that children being made obnoxious to death by the ſin of their father, himſelf, having begotten none, had not tranſmitted either death or ſin to any (13).

(13) Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 241.

☞ ABU MASHAR (Jafar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Omar) known to us by the name of Albumaſar, was the Prince of the Aſtronomers of his time. He was born in the city of Balkh in Khoraſân, whence he came to Baghdâd under the Khalifate of al Mámûn. He was at firſt one of thoſe who make it their trade to relate the traditional ſayings of Mahomet, and had a great antipathy to the famous Philoſopher al Kendi, againſt whom he uſed to excite the mob, reproaching him with his philoſophical ſtudies. Wherefore al Kendi privately procur'd ſomebody to recommend Arithmetic and Geometry to him, which he enter'd upon; but before he had maſter'd thoſe, he turn'd his applications to judiciary aſtrology, and began to perſecute al Kendi no more. 'Tis ſaid he began to ſtudy aſtrology after he was forty ſeven years old. The Khalif al Moſtaſn order'd him to be ſcourg'd for foretelling a thing which came to paſs. We are told of ſome experiments that were made to try his ſkill [A]. Some pretend our author died the year 190 of the Hegira (a); but others are much nearer the truth, who place his birth in that year, and his death in 272 (b): for Abulfaragius tells us he died at Waſet at the age of above an hundred, and that he was Aſtrologer to, and very intimate with, al Mowaffec, (brother to the Khalîf al Mótamed) who died in 279. Abu Máſhar was much given to wine, and noted for drunkenneſs (c). He was a man of excellent parts, and wrote ſeveral books in aſtronomy and judiciary aſtrology [B]. According to this writer, in his book of the Olûf, or thouſands of years, the Chriſtian Religion would laſt no longer than fifteen hundred Arabic or lunar years. But 'tis very plain this great Doctor was very much out in his calculation.

(a) Of Chriſt 805.
(b) Of Chriſt 887.
(c) Ex Abulfarag. Hiſt. Dyn. p. 178, &c.

[A] Some experiments were made to try his ſkill.] 'Tis ſaid that al Mámûn the Khalîf, by way of proving Abu Máſhar, caus'd one of his attendants to conceal himſelf in a room, and made him ſit on a golden mortar, laid in a braſs baſon full of blood; and afterwards ask'd Abu Máſhar where the man was. Abu Máſhar made his aſtronomical obſervations, and then anſwer'd: I ſee him ſeated on a mountain of gold, in the midſt of a ſea of blood, ſurrounded with walls of braſs. 'Tis alſo related (1), that a lady having loſt the ſeal which was in her ring, look'd on Abu Máſhar, who immediately declar'd, that the ſeal of God had taken her's: and it happen'd, that after having ſought a long time, ſhe found it in her Koran, which the Mahometans look upon as the ſeal of the promiſes of God, in like manner as they call Mahomet the Seal of the Prophets (2).

(1) In the Rabi Alakbiar.
(2) D'Herbelot, p. 27.

[B] After having written ſeveral books.] Theſe are, the Madkhal, or Introduction to Aſtronomy; a Zeij, or Aſtronomical Tables; and a treatiſe entitled, Ikhtiyârât, or Select Judgments. Some aſcribe to him the books entitled, Abkâm, i. e. Judgments, and Aſrâr al Nojûm, i. e. The Secrets of the Stars; and alſo another, entitled, Ikterân al Cawâkeb, Of the Conjunction of the Planets. But the moſt famous work of all is that of the Olûf, which treats of the beginning, the duration, and end of the world. 'Tis here he aſſerts, that the world was created, the ſeven planets being together in the firſt point of the ſign Aries; and that it will end, when the ſame planets ſhall meet again in the laſt point of Piſces, in their exaltation, or dragon's head. He alſo ſets down, in the ſame work, the Æra's of empires and religions, with the time of their duration (3).

(3) Idem. p. 28.

ABU MOSLEMA (a), a General under the firſt Khalîfs, deſcended from Abbâs, on whom the province of Khoraſân was beſtow'd, in the 125th year of the Hegira (b). He accepted of it, and died the ſame year. Ibrahim his ſon and ſucceſſor ſent Abu Moſlema into that country, being then but nineteen years of age. This General, tho' ſo young, did nevertheleſs drive Naſr out of that province, who commanded therein for Merwan the Khalîf. After the death of Ibrahim, which happened anno 131 of the Hegira, Al Saffâh his brother was rais'd to the Khalîfate, who ſuffer'd Abu Moſlema to poſſeſs the government of the province of Khoraſân; and employ'd him in the murder of Abu Moſlema his counſellor, whom he ſuſpected to be guilty of corrupt practices. Al Saffâh died in 136, and was ſucceeded by Al Manſûr his brother. This Khalîf, after Abu Moſlema had done him the moſt ſignal ſervices, caus'd him to be murther'd in the treacherous manner following. Abdalla having made an inſurrection in Syria, Abu Moſlema was ſent at the head of a choice body of forces to oppoſe him, and entirely routed his army: but Al Manſûr being more ſtrongly affected with the calumny which he pretended Abu Moſlema had vented againſt him, than with the advantages which accru'd from ſo ſignal a victory, ſent for him, in order to take away his life. Abu Moſlema, juſtly ſuſpecting ſome treacherous deſign, refus'd to obey the orders of his Sovereign; but afterwards, being allur'd by careſſes, he waited upon Al Manſûr, who had him thrown into the Tigris. This happen'd the year of the Hegira 137, or the 754th of Chriſt. We are told, that Abu Moſlema had occaſion'd the death of ſix hundred thouſand perſons. He was thought to have had ſome little ſkill in magic; and was of a ſect, which, in the main, is not very different from that of the wretched Spinoza [A].

(a) Herbelot, who has written a long article on this warrior, calls him Abou Moſlem.
(b) That is, the year of Chriſt 742.

Erpenius

[A] Of a ſect, which, in the main, is not very different from that of the wretched Spinoza.] The ſect which Abu Moſlema profeſs'd, taught a kind of tranſmigration very different from that of Pythagoras (1). According to the latter, ſouls were not deſtroy'd, but only ſhifted from one body to another; but the other kind of tranſmigration is thus deſcrib'd by the famous traveller (2) Pietro della Valle, where he takes notice of certain Mahometan Heretics, who call themſelves Ehl Eltahkik, Men of Truth, People of Certainty. "Theſe, ſays he, believe there is no "other God, but the four elements .... that there "is no reaſonable ſoul, or any other life after this; "but that the whole man is only a mixture of the "four elements, of which man is compounded during "his life, join'd together and animated by that cloſe "union which keeps them bound one to the other; "which mixture, when man dies, diſſolves, and is "blended with the four ſimple elements, and conſe-"quently returns to God who created it: and ſo "of all other things, either on earth or in hea-"ven: in a word, that God, man, and every thing "elſe conſiſt of the four elements,; and conſe-"quently, that the four elements are eternal, and "the world, with all its viciſſitudes and changes, "eternal." What difference ſoever there may be between

(1) Beſpier's remarks on The preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, by Sir Paul Ricaut, p. 666.
(2) Pietro della Valle, vol. 3. pag. 392, cited by Beſpier, ibid.

Erpenius did not underſtand Elmacinus's words on that ſubject [B]. I don't pretend to vouch for what I here advance (c), or for the two remarks following, which I quote only on the teſtimony of another. Only the parallel, with regard to Spinoza's doctrine, is mine; and I am not fully perſuaded, that the perſon who animadverts upon Erpenius, underſtands the paſſage in queſtion better than he did.

(c) Extracted from Elmacini Hiſt. Saracen. lib. II. cap. 1. & ſeq.

between this and Spinoza's ſyſtem they are the ſame in the main; both held that the univerſe is but one ſubſtance, and that all we call generation and corruption, life and death, is only a combination or diſſolution of modes. Elmacinus calls the tranſmigration in which Abu Moſlema believed, Metempſychoſis reſolutionis, i. e. The tranſmigration of reſolution.

[B] Erpenius did not underſtand the words of Elmacinus on that ſubject.] He makes him declare that Abu Moſlema was of the ſect of the deſcending ſucceſſion, Profitebatur ſectam ſucceſſionis deſcendentis (3); whereas he ſhould have ſaid, that he was of the ſect which believed the tranſmigration of reſolution. Profitebatur ſectam eorum, qui credunt metempſychoſin reſolutionis. In this manner Beſpier cenſured and corrected Erpenius's tranſlation of the paſſage (4).

(3) Elmacin. Hiſt. Saracen. lib. 2. cap. 3. p. 100.

(4) Beſpier's Remarks on Rycaut's Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire.

☞ABU NOWAS, an Arabian Poet of the firſt claſs. He alſo goes by another name (a), and was born in the city of Baſra the year of the Hegira 145 (b), and died the 195th (c) in the Khalifat of al Amîn. He left his native country in order to go and ſettle at Cûfa, but did not continue long there; for Harûn al Raſhîd would have him near his perſon in Baghdâd, and gave him an apartment in his palace with Maſâb and Rekâſhi, two other excellent Poets. He received the ſurname Abu Nowâs from two locks of hair which fell in ringlets on his neck. His principal works have been collected into one body (call'd by the Arabians Diwân) by various perſons, for which reaſon there is a great difference in the copies of this author. We are indebted to Sûli for one; Ali Ebn Hamza al Isfahâni made a ſecond, and Ibrahîm al Tabari a third. There is a ſtory in the Nighiariſtân (d) relating to this Poet [A], and another in Lâmaî's Defter Latâif [B] (e).

(a) Haſſan Ebn Abd'alawwal Ebn Ati Al-Hâkemi.

(b) Anno Dom. 762.

(c) A. D. 810.

(d) A Perſian book.

(e) D'Herbelot, p. 31.

ABU.

[A] A ſtory .... relating to this Poet.] This is told as follows by D'Herbelot. The Khalif Harun al Raſhid, going his rounds in the night time, about his palace, found one of the Queen's female attendants aſleep, upon which he was reſolved to take this opportunity of obtaining from her what ſhe had hitherto refuſed him ſeveral times. The Lady waking, and ſeeing the Khalif vaſtly urgent, found no other method to free herſelf from his importunities, than by entreating him to ſtay till the morrow, when ſhe promiſed to indulge his fondeſt wiſhes. Harun upon this promiſe diſmiſſed her, but did not fail to ſend her a meſſage the next day, by which ſhe was to appoint the aſſignation. The young Lady, who was as witty as prudent, ſent him no other anſwer than the following Arabic half verſe, (for it is no more in the original) which is ſince become proverbial.

(1) D'Herb. has miſtaken the ſenſe of this half line.

(1) The promiſes a maiden makes at night,
Are merely given to haſten on the light.

The Khalif, greatly ſurprized at this anſwer, gave orders that none of the Poets who lived in his palace ſhould be ſuffered to ſtir out; when ſending for them, he repeated the lines above, and ordered them to make a little copy of verſes or ſong which ſhould include thoſe lines. Every one of the Poets performed his beſt, but thoſe of Abu Nowâs were judged to excel; for he interwove this verſe ſo artfully in his own, that he ſeemed to deſcribe very naturally the whole ſcene between the Khalif and the Lady. However, his skill had like to have coſt him his life; for Harun, after he had beſtowed gifts on the other Poets, told Abu Nowâs that he had deſerved death, for having ſeen what had paſt in the ſecret apartment of his palace, between himſelf and the young Lady. Abu Nowâs, very much aſtoniſhed at what he heard, proteſted to the Khalif that he had not ſtirred out of his apartment all that day, of which he ſaid, he could bring witneſſes. Accordingly they were called, and declaring in his favour, the Khalif was appeaſed, and beſtowed the like gifts on him as on the other Poets. Thus Mr. D'Herbelot tells this ſtory; but we find it related in a more probable and beautiful manner, in a manuſcript collection of Tales in Arabic, from which we have tranſlated it as follows. " (2) The " Khalif Harun al Raſhid one night met a Lady of his " Harâm, or Seraglio, whoſe company he had not fre- " quented for ſome time, rambling about the palace, and " a little elevated with liquor. Her dreſs was very " looſe and negligent, which diſcovering ſome beauties " to advantage, revived the Prince's paſſion ſo ſtrongly, " that he deſired to enjoy her that moment. The " Lady told him, that as he had abandoned her ſo " long, ſhe did not expect the honour of a viſit from " him, and therefore was not in a proper condition " to receive him; for which reaſon ſhe begged him " to ſtay till next morning, when ſhe would prepare " her ſelf for his embraces, and wait upon him. " This the Khalif conſented to, and gave orders next " morning that none ſhould be admitted into his " apartment but the Lady. However, he waited to " no purpoſe, for ſhe never came; upon which he " went to her, and taxing her with breach of pro- " miſe, ſhe anſwered in the following half verſe

(2) Story from an Arabic MS.

The day blots out the promiſe made at night.

" The Khalif hearing this, roſe up, and asked what " Poets were in waiting? Being told there were Abu " Nowâs, al Rekâſhi, and Maſâb, they were called in, " when Harûn commanded each of them to make a " ſtanza, in which the half verſe abovementioned " might be introduced naturally. They obeyed, and " the ſenſe of Abu Nowâs's ſtanza was as follows.

" I met my heart's fond idol in the palace,
" In the ſoft, ſilent hour, to lovers kind:
" The wine my charmer had that evening ſipp'd,
" Smooth'd every frown, and brightned her reſerve.
" She ſtarted; when the ſky-blue mantle dropt
" Which veil'd her ſhoulders; and her zone was looſe,
" The winds that wanton'd o'er her lovely frame,
" Diſcover'd beauties Poets ne'er can paint,
" And ſhook the ſmall pomgranates on the ſpray:
" Enrapt, I cry'd; Dear Lady, come, a promiſe
" To crown my wiſhes;—But ſhe, ſmiling, ſaid,
" The day blots out the promiſe made at night.

" Al Raſhîd hearing theſe lines cried out to Abu " Nowâs, God curſe thee! (an expreſſion of admira- " tion among the Arabians) thou haſt deſcribed the " ſcene as naturally, as if thou hadſt been preſent at " it; and thereupon ordered Abu Nowâs ten thou- " ſand pieces of ſilver, and but five thouſand pieces " each to the other two Poets.

[B] Another ſtory in Lâmai.] This Poet going into Egypt, was ſplendidly entertained by the chief Lords of the court. But one day preſenting a Poem of his to the Sovereign and to Safia his miſtreſs, a native of Abyſſinia and a miracle in beauty, he was received very coldly, and had no recompence. The Poet, exaſperated againſt them both, and being informed that the Prince had preſented his miſtreſs with a gown enrich'd with a vaſt number of precious ſtones, happened to repeat inadvertently the following verſes addreſs'd to the Monarch,

My muſe ſublime on you is thrown away,
Juſt as the pearls on your Safia gay.

Theſe

☞ABU SAID Ebn Aljaptu, ſirnamed alſo Behâder Khân (a) Sultan of the Moguls of the race of Jenghizkhân, ſucceeded his father anno 717 of the Hegira *, and was crowned in the city of Sultania. He immediately created the Emir Chûbân Nûvian Generaliſſimo of his armies, and confirmed Raſhid and Ali Shâh his father's Viſiers, in their employments; and as he was but twelve years of age, Emir Chûban preſided over the whole Empire in quality of Abu Saîd's Governor. In 718 * Raſhid was diſgraced and by the machinations of Ali Shâh, who had bribed the Emir Chûban, at that time Maſter of all the forces of the Empire, and ſoon after put to death. The ſame year Baiſûr, a Prince of the royal family of the Moguls, revolted, and threatned to march to the capital, but was defeated in Khoraſân by the Emir Hôſain Kurkân, who at laſt obliged him to fly on the other ſide of the river Amû, where he was killed ſome time after. When the abovementioned inſurrection broke out, advice being brought to the Sultan that Shâh Uzbek, the Tartar, had marched over Kepjâk, and ſeized upon the city of Derbend, Abu Sâid immediately ſet out againſt him with the few troops he had about him, and was joined by the Emir Chûbân, who had followed the Emir Hôſain into Khoraſân, but was now come to ſuccour his Sovereign. When Abu Saîd was thus reinforced, Shah Uzbec being afraid of engaging him, retired out of the dominions of the Sultan, and Chûban falling upon his rear, killed a very great number of his troops. After this victory the Emir Chûban having cauſed ſome of the chief officers of the Mogul army to be whipped with the utmoſt ſeverity of martial diſcipline, for neglecting their duty in his abſence, they formed a conſpiracy, and following after Chûban, who was marching towards Georgia, they engaged and put him to flight, he eſcaping very narrowly being taken, but arrived at laſt at Sultania. Abu Saîd upon this, fearing their power, withdrew from the capital (Sultania) but afterwards fighting the malecontents or rebels, he gained a complete victory over them. The Sultan, in 721 *, gave his ſiſter Satibeg in marriage to the Emir Chûban, and the nuptials were ſolemnized with the utmoſt magnificence. Timûrtaſh this Emir's ſon rebelled againſt Abu Saîd, but was defeated by Chûban, his father, and being carried priſoner by him to the Sultan, was forgiven in conſideration of his father's ſervices. Ali Shâh the Viſir dying, Saïn, Chûban's Lieutenant General, who afterwards did him very ill offices, ſucceeded him in his poſt. The ſame year the Emir Chûban married his daughter Baghdâd Khâtûn, one of the moſt beautiful women in all Aſia to the Emir Haſan Ilkhâni ſon of Sheikh Hoſain, which proved of very fatal conſequence to him [A]; and Damaſhk Khowâjah, ſon to Chûban, having abus'd his father's authority, and carry'd on an intrigue with one of the wives of the late Sultan Aljaptû, father to Abu Saîd, was put to death (c), by order of [A].

(a) From his bravery ſhewn in combating the rebels.

* A. D. 1317.

* A. D. 1318.

* A. D. 1321.

(c) See the note [A].

Theſe coming to the Prince's ear, he ſent for the Poet in order to know whether he were author of them: Abu Nowâs told the King that he had made ſome lines in his and Safia's praiſe, but that poſſibly his enemies might have altered them, purely to do him an ill office; and ſaying this, he repeated the ſame lines, (changing only a ſingle letter (3) in them) which then run thus.

(3) By changing the letter ain into hamza.

Singing your praiſe, my airy muſe refines,
Bright as the pearls in which Safia ſhines (4).

(4) D'Herbelot, P. 31.

We are not told how theſe lines were received, however, there's no doubt but the Poet was handſomely rewarded.

[A] His daughter Baghdâd Khâtûn in marriage, which prov'd of very fatal conſequence to him.] Unhappily for them, Abu Saîd the Sultan fell in love with her, and thereupon demanded her in marriage of her father Chûban. Nevertheleſs, tho' by the laws of the Moguls, every man is obliged to divorce his wife, when the Sultan deſires to marry her, yet this Emir could not be prevail'd upon to conſent to it (1), and even ſpoke in very unbecoming terms of this young Prince, tho' he did not require any thing from him, repugnant either to his laws or his duty. Abu Saîd however conceal'd the reſentment with which this refuſal fir'd him; and the Emir Chûban imagining that diſtance would cure the Sultan's paſſion, he ſent his ſon-in-law and daughter to Carabagh (2) and carry'd Abu Saîd againſt his will to Baghdâd, in order that he might ſpend the winter there. But the Sultan's love, inſtead of cooling by this ſeparation, grew every day more violent. The Viſir Saïn (formerly Chûban's Lieutenant-General, as was before obſerv'd) fomented Abu Saîd's averſion to that Emir, by telling that Monarch ſeveral falſities of Chûban and his children. But Damaſhk Khowâjâh, ſon of the Emir Chûban, one of the principal officers of the Sultan's houſhold, and who had the moſt frequent acceſs to his perſon, heard of the ill offices which the Viſir Saïn did his father, and ſent him a faithful account of the whole. Chûban took a bold reſolution on this occaſion; for, upon pretence of ſetting out to put an end to ſome troubles which were broke out in Khoraſân, he left Baghdad ſuddenly, and came to Sultania, bringing with him the Viſir Saïn, by way of hoſtage for his ſon, whom he had left at court with Abu Saîd. Damaſhk was entruſted with the management of affairs, nothing of which Chûban his father, who preſided in the government, communicated to any perſon but to his ſon. But Damaſhk, abuſing his father's authority in his abſence, diſpos'd of all things in ſo arbitrary a manner, that Abu Saîd was only Sultan nominally. However, this Prince being weary of always living under the direction of others, diſcover'd his uneaſineſs to ſome of his confidents, one of whom told him that Damaſhk had a private intrigue with one of the wives of Sultan Aljaptû his father. Abu Saîd, upon hearing this, gave orders that Damaſhk ſhould be watch'd, in order to find out whether the report were true; and 'twas not long before the Sultan was an eye-witneſs that it was really ſo; which exaſperated him to ſuch a degree, that he gave orders for putting to death that inſolent Miniſter, who, not content with bereaving him of his authority, was ſo bold as to wound him in his honour. 'Twas in the year 727 *, that Abu Saîd was reſolv'd to rid himſelf of Damaſhk: but no one having then courage enough to ſtrike the blow, chance prov'd very fatal to the Sultan on this occaſion. It happen'd at that time, that the heads of ſome people who had rebell'd in the provinces, having been brought to Abu Saîd's palace; a rumour prevail'd, that they were the heads of the Emir Chûban and his adherents, which had been ſent from Khoraſân: at which Damaſhk was ſeiz'd with ſuch a pannic fear, that without enquiring into the truth of it, he left the palace in the dead of night, accompany'd only by ten men, and fled away. This coming to the Sultan's ear, he caus'd him to be immediately purſu'd by one of his people call'd Meſr-Khowâjah, who coming up with Damaſhk cut off his head, and brought it to the Sultan (3).

(1) According to Khondemir, Damaſhk oppos'd the paſſion which the Sultan had for Baghdad Khatûn his ſiſter, which exaſperated Abu Saîd ſo much, that he got Meſr to make away with Damaſhk.

(2) Abu Saîd generally paſſed the winter in that city.

* A. D. 1326.

(3) D'Herbelot, P. 32, 33.

having abuſed his father's authority and carried on an intrigue with one of the wives of the late Sultan Aljaptû, father to Abu Saîd, was put to death (c), by order of the Sultan, who reſolving afterwards to rid himſelf of Chûban himſelf, the Emir got notice of it, and raiſing a ſtrong force reſolved to engage Abu Saîd his maſter. Chûban however being afterwards deſerted by ſeveral of his principal officers who owed all their fortune to him, his head was ſtruck off [B] by the ungrateful Ghayâtho'ddin, ſirnamed Maleckurt (d) and brought to the Sultan. The murtherer was not however recompenſed; for while theſe things were doing, Sheikh Haſan having divorced his wife Baghdâd Khâtûn, daughter of Chûban, and ſent her to the Seraglio, Haſan was raiſed to the poſt which Ghayâtho'ddin flattered himſelf would be given to him; and the latter was told he might return home if he pleaſed. Shaikh Haſan was nevertheleſs diſgraced ſome time after, upon a rumour that prevailed; but the falſity of it appearing, Abu Saîd reſtored him to favour [C]. The Sultan Abu Saîd died the 736th year of the Hegira, aged thirty two years, of which he had reigned nineteen, or according to others but eighteen. His corps was conveyed to the city of Sultania, with a pomp and magnificence ſuitable to ſo great a Monarch. The hiſtory of Chûban and his family, is an example of the fickleneſs of worldly grandeur [D]. The manner of his death is variouſly

(c) See the note [A].

(d) Son to Raſhid who had been put to death at the deſire of Abi Shah, as was before obſerved.

[B] Chûban's head was ſtruck off.] This Emir before he left Khoraſân, into which, as was before obſerv'd(4), he was come upon pretence of quieting ſome troubles, put to death the Viſir Saïn the author of all theſe evils, to revenge the murther of his ſon Damaſhk; and the Sultan on the other ſide, nominated Ghayâtho'ddin Mohammed, a man of learning, ſon to the late Viſir Raſhid to ſucceed him. Chûban having carried matters thus far, march'd forward with a deſign of ſeizing upon the court and perſon of the Sultan. Coming into the city of Semnan, he viſited Rocno'ddin Alâo'ddacolat al Semnâni, a man venerable for his holineſs, whoſe ſepulchre is ſtill viſited by the Moſlems. After diſcourſing for ſome time together, the Emir promis'd with an oath, to follow his advice to a tittle; and as a proof of the ſincerity of his intentions, Chûban deſir'd the holy man to go to the Sultan in his name, and to require of him the ſurrendring up of the murtherers of his ſon Damaſhk, and conditions of peace in his (Chûban's) favour. The Sheik complying with his requeſt, was receiv'd in a very honourable manner by the Sultan, but he refus'd abſolutely to deliver up into the hands of the Emir, the aſſaſſins of Damaſhk, and would not hear of any treaty with Chûban. The Sheik brought this ill news to Chûban, who exaſperated at the refuſal, and throwing off all reſpect for the Sultan, came and encamp'd within a day's journey of the Ordû or imperial camp, in a place call'd Cûha, but did not keep that poſt long. For ſeveral of his principal officers who ow'd every thing to him, deſerted him with thirty thouſand horſe, and went over to their Sovereign. As the Emir, by being thus abandoned, could not in prudence truſt ſuch of his friends as remain'd with him, whilſt they continued ſo near the troops of the Sultan, eſpecially after their companions had ſet them ſo bad an example, he left his camp, and took his way thro' the deſart of Nûbendijân, in order to withdraw into Khoraſân. This long and difficult march, and eſpecially the deſertion of many officers who left him to ſeek their fortune, weakned ſo much the Emir's army, that he was no longer able to continue in that province (Khoraſân), upon which he reſolv'd to go into Turkeſtân, in which were ſeveral conſiderable Princes, who often infeſted the dominions of the Sultan. This deſign wou'd in all probability have been very advantageous to the Emir; but his evil ſtar ſo order'd matters, that being come to the river Morghab, he chang'd his reſolution on a ſudden, and turning back, threw himſelf into the arms of Gayâtho'ddin ſirnamed Maleckurt, whom he had brought up from his infancy, and raiſed to the higheſt military employments. However, Malec was as unfaithful to him as others had been; for having receiv'd at the ſame time an expreſs from the Sultan, with the promiſe of a great reward, in caſe he would ſend Chûban's head; the firſt viſit he ſuffer'd the unhappy Chûban to receive, was from an executioner. The Emir begg'd to ſee Malec, but was refus'd, and finding he muſt die, he requeſted three things at his hands. Firſt, that the inſtant his head was ſeparated from his body, he ſhould ſend one of his fingers which had two tips, to the Sultan Abû Saîd. Secondly, that he ſhould cauſe his corps to be convey'd to Medina, to be there buried in an oratory or chapel which he had built; and thirdly, that he ſhould get his ſon Jalair, whom Satibeg, Abu Saîd's ſiſter, had borne him, carried to the court of the Sultan Abu Saîd his (Jalair's) uncle. Theſe three requeſts being granted, the executioner ſtruck off his head, which Malec ſent immediately to the Sultan, and ſet out a little after, in order to receive the reward of his treachery. But he was greatly ſurpriz'd to hear by the way, that the Emir Sheik Haſan had divorc'd Baghdâd Khâtûn, daughter to Chûban, and ſent her to the Sultan's ſeraglio. And a greater mortification was, his being inform'd that Sheikh Haſan, in conſideration for his having comply'd with the deſires of the Sultan, was raiſed to the poſt at court which Malec flattered himſelf would have been beſtow'd upon him; and that Baghdâd Khatûn had gained an abſolute aſcendant over Abu Saîd. Upon this ill news, he reſolved before he went farther, to ſend orders into Khoraſân for putting Jalair ſon to Chûban to death, whom he had hitherto ſpar'd, according to the promiſe he had made his father, tho' in oppoſition to the Sultan's orders. Jalair being kill'd, Malec advanc'd forwards towards Carabagh, where Abu Saîd then reſided. But the great credit which Baghdad Khâtûn, Chûban's daughter, had at court, ſhe having been married with great ſolemnity to the Sultan, was the occaſion that he met, as 'twas very natural he ſhould, with a very cold reception at court; and was conſider'd as the murtherer of the Sultana, Baghdad Khâtûn's father, rather than as a man who had done the Sultan a ſignal piece of ſervice. He was even made to ſtay ſo long time in the camp, as was neceſſary for conveying the bodies of Chûban and of Jalair from Khoraſan to Aûgian, whence they were deliver'd, by the Sultan's orders, to the pilgrims of Mecca. The Sultan gave theſe people forty thouſand dinars, upon condition that they ſhould cauſe their bodies to be interr'd in Medina; and rewarded Malec no otherwiſe, than by giving him leave to depart home. The Emir Chûban whoſe cataſtrophe we have heard, bore always the character of an upright man, a friend to juſtice, and a very zealous obſerver of the religion he profeſs'd (5).

(4) Note [A].

(5) D'Herbelot, p. 34. Who informs us further from the Nighiariſtan and Giannibi, that Chûban had done Abu Saîd very ſignal ſervices, having delivered him from ſeveral of his enemies who had fallen upon the provinces of Khoraſân and of Aderbigian, and conquered a great number of rebels who had made an inſurrection in his dominions.

[C] Sheikh Haſan was diſgrac'd, and afterwards reſtor'd to favour.] In the 732d * year of the Hegira, ſome people envying the fortune of Sheikh Haſan, and exaſperated at the great aſcendant Baghdâd Khâtûn the Sultana had over all the affairs of ſtate, whiſper'd ſome things to the diſadvantage of that princeſs's conduct, by accuſing her of ſtill carrying on a private correſpondence with her firſt husband. Theſe reports came inſenſibly to the Sultan's ears, who thereupon immediately baniſh'd Sheikh Haſan to the caſtle of Kamakh, and diſcovered a great coldneſs for his new Sultana. But the injuſtice of theſe rumours being ſoon diſcovered, and the authors of ſo baſe a calumny puniſhed; Abu Saîd reſtored the Sultana and Sheikh Haſan to favour, and beſtowed on the latter the government of part of his dominions, call'd the province of Rûm, in Aſia Minor (6).

* A. D. 1331.

(6) Idem. ibid.

[D] Chûban and his family are an example of the fickleneſs of worldly grandeur.] We have ſeen him governor of Abu Saîd; prime Miniſter, and afterwards brother-in-law to the Sultan, by his marriage with Satibeg. But afterwards, his refuſing to let his daughter Bagdad Khatûn be divorc'd from Sheik Haſan in favour of the Sultan's paſſion, very probably exaſperated his Sovereign ſo much againſt him, as variouſly related [E]. He was the laſt Monarch of the race of Jenghizkhân, and after his death, which happened the ſame year that Tamerlane was born, the Empire was made a ſcene of blood and deſolation (e).

(e) D'Herbelot, p. 32, & ſeq.

paved the way to his ruin, which the ill conduct of Damaſhk, Chûban's ſon, compleated. Monarchs will not bear any controul, particularly in the paſſions of love and ambition, and therefore it is no wonder that Abu Saîd ſhould carry his reſentments ſo far as he did, eſpecially as he was born in ſo warm a climate, and was an abſolute Monarch. We have ſeen the end Chûban and Damaſhk came to, and after this, Baghdâd Khâtûn was made Sultana, who then poyſons Abu Saîd, (according to ſome hiſtorians) and is herſelf put to death by Abu Saîd's ſucceſſor.

[E] The manner of his death is variouſly related.] We are told, that Shah Uzbek having in 735 † made a ſecond irruption into the dominions of Abu Saîd, this Sultan march'd the next year in order to engage his enemy; but that being ſcarce arrived in the province of Shiruſân, a part of Media, the heat and malignant influence of the air threw him into a dangerous fit of ſickneſs. And that whilſt he was under the phyſicians hands, and in the bath, he fell into a fainting fit, which carried him off very ſoon. But according to the author of the preface to the Zafarnâmeh, Baghdâd Châtûn the Sultana, finding the affection which the Sultan had for her, very much leſſen'd, poyſoned him. Arbah Khân his ſucceſſor put the Sultâna to death, upon her being accuſed of having had a hand in Abu Saîd's death, and convicted of holding a private correſpondence with Shah Uzbek, who diſputed the crown with him (7).

† A. D. 1334.

(7) Idem. ibid.

☞ABU TEMAM, or Habîb Ebn Aws Al-Hareth Ebn Kais, ſirnamed Al-Tâyi, becauſe he was of an Arabian tribe ſirnamed Tay, whence three of the moſt famous perſonages of that nation have ſprung, viz. Hâtem, Daûd, and Abu Temâm. The firſt was the model of generoſity and liberality, the ſecond was illuſtrious for his probity and piety, and the third (the perſon in queſtion) is looked upon as the Prince of the Arabian Poets, and none but al Motanabbi can diſpute precedence with him. According to Ebn Khalecân ſome ſay Abu Temâm's father was a Chriſtian, (as the tribe of Tay generally were, in Mahomet's time) and named Tedûs, or, (as Dr. Pocock gueſſes) Theodoſius; which might be corruptly changed into Aws (a). This great Poet was born the 190th year of the Hegira (b), at Jâſem a little town ſituated between Damaſcus and Tiberias. He was educated in Egypt, and died at Mawſel (near where Ninive once ſtood) the 231ſt year of the Hegira, or A. D. 845 (c.) He lived but a few years as Filſôf (d) had foretold him, ſaying, that the vivacity and fire of his genius would conſume his body, in the ſame manner as the blade of an Indian ſword eats away its ſcabbard. He ſung the Elogiums of ſeveral Khalifs, who were all vaſtly liberal to him. He collected all his poetical compoſitions into a volume or Diwân, and entitled it Al Hamâſah (e). Bakhteri, another celebrated Arabian Poet, being aſked who was the beſt Poet, himſelf or Abu Temâm, he anſwered; ſuch verſes as are good in Abu Temâm, excel the fineſt in mine; but ſuch as are bad in my works, are not ſo contemptible as the low verſes in his. Bakhteri flouriſhed almoſt at the ſame time with Abu Temâm. A certain Prince gave him one day fifty thouſand pieces of ſilver (f) for a Poem he preſented him, and at the ſame time made him this compliment; The preſent I make you is of much leſs value than that you have made me. Having written an elegy on the death of another, the following elogium was given Abu Temâm,

(a) Pocock, Spec. Hiſt. Arab. p. 380.

(b) A. C. 805. Others ſay he was born in 188, or 192. of the Heg. or A. C. 803, or 807. Or in 172. of the Heg. or A. C. 788.

(c) Some ſay he died in 228, or 232. of the Heg. or A. D. 842, or 846.

(d) Filſôf ſignifies a Philoſopher, being only the Greek word a little changed; ſo that we are not ſure whether it be a proper name or not.

(e) Here Mr. D'Herbelot is miſtaken, for the Diwân entitled al Hamâſah is a collection of extracts from the ancient Arabian Poets, made or collected only by Abu Temâm. He was, however, as much famed for this collection as for his own Poems. See Pocock's Spec. Hiſt. Arab. ubi ſupra.

(f) Theſe pieces are dirkems or drachms, and of no great value.

The man whoſe virtues thus aſcend the ſky,
Prais'd (mighty Bard) by thee, can never die (g).

(g) D'Herbelot, p. 40.

☞ABU YUSOF, is the ſame with Yacûb Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Habîb al-Cûfi, the companion of Al-Joneid, and diſciple of the famous Doctors Amâſh and Yahya Ebn Saïd al-Anſâri. The Khalifs al-Hâdi and Harun al-Raſhid, made him chief Juſtice of Baghdad; and he was the firſt who was honoured with the title of Kâdi al Kodât, that is, Judge of the Judges, a dignity ſomething like that of the Chief Juſtice or Chancellor among us. He alſo gave a peculiar habit to the Doctors of the Law, and made the doctrine of Abu Hanîfah grow into credit. He amaſſed, in a very little time, great wealth, which he owed more to his induſtry than to fortune, he being deciſive and fruitful in expedients, of which we ſhall give an example [A]. This Doctor having

[A] Abu Yuſof was fruitful in expedients.] The Khalif Harûn al Raſhîd falling in love with one of the ſlaves and concubines of Ibrahim his brother, was for purchaſing her, and for that purpoſe offer'd him thirty thouſand dinars, or crowns of gold, but Ibrahim had ſwore that he would neither ſell nor give her to any perſon. However, as the Khalif his brother was vaſtly urgent, and would pay any money for this ſlave, he ask'd Abu Yuſof what was to be done on this occaſion. The doctor anſwered; If you will not be forſworn give one half of her to the Khalif and ſell him the other half. Ibrahim overjoyed at this expedient, immediately ſent the ſlave to his brother, who notwithſtanding ſent him the whole ſum he had offered him: and Ibrahim highly pleaſed that he had ſo happily extricated himſelf from the difficulty he was under, preſented the Kadi with all the money. Harûn being thus poſſeſſed of the fair one for whom he had a violent paſſion, would have enjoyed her that very night. But here the law was an obſtacle to his wiſhes, for it is a rule that no Moſlem can lie with his brother's concubine, till after ſhe has been married to another. Abu Yuſof being conſulted on the difficulty, adviſ'd the Khalif to give this woman in marriage to one of his ſlaves, upon condition that he ſhould immediately divorce her, and ſurrender her up to his arms. Accordingly they were married; but now the ſlave was ſo fond of his new wife, that he would not ſo much as hear of the divorce, and abſolutely refuſed to put her from him, tho' he was offer'd ten thouſand dinars. 'Twas then Abu Yuſof was obliged to have recourſe to all the law-quirks, in order to ſatisfy his conſcience, and at the ſame time the paſſion of his Sovereign. But here he again extricated himſelf very happily, by adviſing Harûn to make a preſent of the ſlave, who was ſtill his property, to the woman he had married; by which means the marriage would be diſſolved, ſince according to the Moſlem law, no woman can be married to her own ſlave. This being done, the divorce enſued of courſe, and the having one day confeſſed his ignorance on a queſtion that was propos'd to him, the following reproach was caſt upon him, viz. that he received very conſiderable penſions from the royal treaſury, and nevertheleſs did not do his duty, ſince he did not determine the law points which were brought before him. But Abu Yuſof made this agreeable anſwer: I receive, ſays he, from the treaſury in proportion to what I know; but were I to receive proportionable to the things I know not, all the riches of the Khalif would not ſuffice to pay me (a).

(a) D'Herbelot, p. 22.

the woman was given up to the Khalif. Harun al Raſhid was ſo pleaſed with the Kadi for theſe expedients, that the ten thouſand dinars which had been offer'd the ſlave were that inſtant given to him. But this was not all he got upon this occaſion, for the Khalif having made a preſent to his fair one, whom he loved to diſtraction, of an hundred thouſand dinars; ſhe, in gratitude for the good office ſhe had received from Abu Yuſof, as he had taken her out of the hands of a ſlave, and given her up to the embraces of ſo great a Monarch, gave him ten thouſand dinars more. So that this able civilian got fifty thouſand crowns of gold in one night (1).

(1) From the Nighiariſtan, as quoted by D'Herbelot, p. 22, 23.

ABYDOS, a city of Egypt. Stephanus Byzantinus is of opinion that it was a colony of Mileſians [A], and received its name from a man called Abydos. Strabo mentions it as a city that was very much ruined; but tells us, that it ſeemed to have been antiently of a very great extent, and the chief city of the kingdom after Thebes (a). It was the reſidence of the famous King Memnon, who cauſed a magnificent palace to be built in it (b). The temple and ſepulchre of Oſiris were a great ornament to that city, which raiſed its fame in an extraordinary manner, and drew multitudes to it. The greateſt Noblemen in Egypt were particularly deſirous of having their remains interred there, in order that their monuments might be in the ſame place, where that of Oſiris ſtood (c). Nor was the oracle of the god Beſa a ſmall embelliſhment to Abydos. All the inhabitants in the places adjacent to it, held this deity in great veneration, who, when any perſon had not the conveniency to conſult him perſonally, uſed to anſwer in writing. In this caſe, the enquirer needed only to ſend his queries in manuſcript (d). This oracle was ſtanding in the reign of Conſtantius, ſon to Conſtantine the Great, and gave occaſion to the exerciſing of great cruelty and injuſtice [B]. Abydos was ſeven thouſand five hundred paces diſtant from the Nile, weſtward (e); but a canal had been dug, which conveyed the waters of that river to it (f). It lay below Dioſpolis and Tentyris (g), and above Ptolomais (h), which was the greateſt city in all Thebais, and as large as Memphis. The inhabitants of Abydos hated mortally the ſound of trumpets [C]. The thorns or brambles which grew in the places adjacent to that city, have been very much talked of [D]; and flowers in the ſhape of a crown, were ſaid to be always growing upon them. 'Tis thought that this city is now called Abutich. John Leo does not relate, as Moreri makes him ſay, that Joſeph the Patriarch was buried in it [E]. There ſtood on the coaſt of the Helleſpont a city called Abydos,

(a) Strabo lib. 17. p. 559. edit. 1587.
(b) Memnonis regiâ & Oſiris templo inclytum. Plin. lib. 5. cap. 9. Strabo, lib. 17. p. 559.
(c) Plutarch. de Iſide & Oſir. p. 359.
(d) Ammian. Marcell. lib. 19. cap. 12. p. 227, 228.
(e) Plin. lib. 5. cap. 9.
(f) Strabo lib. 17. cap. 579.
(g) Plin. lib. 5. cap. 9.
(h) Strabo, lib. 17. p. 579.

[A] A colony of Myleſians.] This is not very probable. I confeſs indeed that they founded colonies in Egypt, but theſe were near the mouth of the Nile. Their power at that time lay wholly at ſea, and as they traded it was not neceſſary for any of them to fix in a place ſo far diſtant from the ſea-coaſt, as Abydos was. Moreover, they did not ſettle in Egypt, till the reign of Cyaxares King of the Medes (1): now Abydos was conſiderable before that period, ſince Memnon did not only keep his court, but alſo built a magnificent palace in that city.

(1) Strabo, lib. 16. p. 551.

[B] And gave occaſion to the exerciſing of great cruelty and injuſtice.] This happen'd as follows. Such as conſulted the oracle by writing, would ſometimes leave their letters in the temple after they had received their anſwers (2). Now it happen'd, that certain malicious perſons ſent ſome of theſe letters to Conſtantius, who being of a mean, ſuſpicious, credulous, and cavilling diſpoſition, fell into a dreadful paſſion upon that account. Qui ut erat anguſti pectoris, obſurdeſcens in aliis etiam nimium ſeriis, in hoc titulo ima, quod aiunt, auricula mollior, & ſuſpicax, & minutus, acri felle concaluit (3). Immediately he cauſed a commiſſion to be iſſued out for the trying of the criminals; it being pretended, that ſeveral perſons had conſulted that God with regard to the Emperor's life, and the name of the perſon who was to ſucceed him. The perſon who preſided in this commiſſion being avaricious and cruel, found means to involve whomſoever he pleas'd in the proſecution. A numberleſs multitude of barbarities were exerciſed on this occaſion, as appears from Ammianus Marcellinus.

(2) Amm. Marcell. lib. 19. cap. 12. p. 227, 228.
(3) Amm. Marcellin. ad ann. 359.

[C] Hated mortally the ſound of trumpets.] This Ælian informs us of, if we correct him according to Berkelius's conjecture (4). Σάλπιγγος ἦχον βδελύττονται Βυσιῖται, καὶ Ἄβυδος ἡ Αἰγυπτία. (In the editions of Ælian, 'tis Ἄβυ ἡ Αἰγυπτία) καὶ Λύκων πόλις. That is "The Buſiritæ, and the inhabitants of Abydos in E-"gypt, and thoſe of Lycopolis, deteſt the ſound of "a trumpet (5)." Strabo confirms this conjecture, when he relates that this people were forbid all muſic whether vocal or inſtrumental, in the prelude to the ſacrifices which were offer'd to Oſiris in his temple at Abydos (6).

(4) Berkelius in Stephan. de Urbibus, p. 14.
(5) Ælian. de Animal. lib. 10. cap. 28.
(6) Strabo, lib. 16. p. 560.

[D] The thorns or brambles which grew in the places adjacent to that city.] Of this Athenæus informs us (7); but we muſt ſubſtitute the word Ἄβυδον inſtead of Ἄβυλαν, in his work, as the abovemention'd Berkelius conjectures very rationally (8). The ſtory mentioned by Athenæus runs thus. The thorns which grow round the temple of Tindium, were always ſaid to have flowers growing upon them; but according to Hellanicus's remark (9), the reaſon of this was, becauſe people us'd to meet in thoſe places; and whilſt their aſſemblies continued, noſegays of different flowers were thrown on theſe thorns. Demetrius relates, that ſuch kind of thorns or brambles grow about Abydos, and that a fable was current among the Ægyptians, viz. that the Ethiopian ſoldiers, whom Tithonus ſent to King Priam, hearing that Memnon had been kill'd, they threw, near Abydos, their chaplets of flowers on thoſe thorns, whence theſe flowers were ſhap'd like crowns (10).

(7) Athenæus, lib. 15. cap. 7.
(8) Berk. in Steph. de Urbib. p. 14.
(9) In Ægyptiacis, apud Athen. lib. 15. cap. 7.
(10) Demetrius in libris Rerum Ægyptiacarum, apud Athenæum, lib. 15. cap. 7.

[E] Joſeph the Patriarch was buried in it.] Moreri cites John Leo, pag. 8; conſequently one would imagine he refers to that page; however the paſſage is not in this place but in the 8th book, where we find the following words, 'Tis a miſtake to believe, that the Kings of Egypt in the age of Joſeph and Moſes reſided in the city call'd Meſre Hatichi. He refutes this opinion from hence, viz. that thoſe ancient Kings inhabited the weſtern part of the Nile, which he proves from two reaſons; firſt, from the ſituation of the city which the ſcriptures ſay the Jews built for Pharaoh; and ſecondly, from the ſituation of a very ancient edifice, in which Joſeph was ſaid to be interr'd. Some pages after, he obſerves that the city in which that edifice ſtands, is ſituated on an arm of the Nile, and is now call'd El Fiium. I don't find that he makes the leaſt mention of our Abydos.

Abydos, of which I ſhall not now take notice, although that article is very incorrect in Moreri's Dictionary.

ACACIA or ACAKIA (MARTIN) ſee AKAKIA.

☞ACACIUS firnamed Luſcus or Μονοφθαλμὸς, becauſe he was blind of one eye (a), was Biſhop of Ceſarea in Paleſtine, and ſucceeded the famous Euſebius, whoſe diſciple he had been in the year 340 (b). He joined himſelf to the Euſebians [A], and began to diſtinguiſh himſelf in the year 341 in the council of Antioch [B], which was held by the Biſhops of Euſebius's party. Six years after this he was depoſed by the council of Sardica, together with ſeveral other Biſhops, who had declared themſelves of his opinions [C]. But to revenge themſelves upon the Orthodox, for having thus

(a) St. Jerom de Viris illuſtrib. cap. 98.

(b) Cave Hiſtor. Literar. p. 129. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[A] He join'd himſelf to the Euſebians.] This ſect deriv'd its name from Euſebius the author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, who was ſuppos'd to have been a favourer of Arius; and his own opinion with regard to the Trinity is as follows. He declares in ſeveral places, that the Word is God, and the Son of God. He expreſly aſſerts, that he was not produc'd from nothing, nor created in time; but that he was begotten from all eternity from the ſubſtance of the Father. He abſolutely rejects the opinion of thoſe, who affirm that the Word was produc'd out of nothing, and rank him amongſt the creatures. But he ſeems to inſinuate in ſome paſſages, and eſpecially in his Book againſt Marcellus (1), that the perſon of the Son is not equal to that of the Father; and that the ſame degree of adoration is not due to him. He writes in the ſame manner likewiſe in all his other books, in which he rejects the opinion of thoſe, who maintain that the Son was created out of nothing, and is not of the ſubſtance of the Father, and that there was a time when he did not exiſt; but he ſeems to admit ſome inequality between the Father and the Son, and to acknowledge that the Son is in ſome meaſure dependent and inferior (2). And therefore tho' he did not ſcruple to acknowledge in the council of Nice, that the Son was God from all eternity, and rejected in expreſs terms the notion of Arius, who aſſerted, that the Son was produced out of nothing, and that there was a time when he did not exiſt; yet he was always cautious of approving the word Conſubſtantial, which ſignifies, that the Son is of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father; and when he ſign'd his approbation of it, he gave in the letter, which he wrote to his church, a ſenſe of it, which is far from eſtabliſhing the equality of the Son with the Father. When it is affirm'd, ſays he, that the Son is conſubſtantial with the Father, we mean only, that the Son of God has no reſemblance to the creatures, which were made by him; but that he has a perfect reſemblance with the Father, by whom he was begotten, and is not of any other hypoſtaſis or ſubſtance. Which ſhews, that Euſebius did not approve that form, as far as it eſtabliſh'd a perfect equality between the Father and the Son; but only as far as it aſſerted a reſemblance between the Son and the Father, and ſignified, that the Son was begotten by the Father. We may obſerve that Athanaſius in his Treatiſe of Synods, and in his Book concerning the deciſion of the council of Nice, by no means approv'd this explication of Euſebius. But what rendred him moſt ſuſpected of heterodoxy in this point was his friendſhip with the biſhops of Arius's party, the commendations which he every where gives them, his affected ſilence in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory with regard to every thing that related to the council of Nice, and the diſadvantageous manner, in which he ſpeaks of it in his life of Conſtantine. But his opinion concerning the Holy Ghoſt is ſtill more excepted againſt; for he aſſerts (3), that he is not really and true God. The Holy Ghoſt, ſays he, is not God, nor the Son of God, becauſe he is not deriv'd from the Father, as the Son is, but is one of thoſe Beings, who were created by the Son. This ſhews, that Socrates, Sozomen, and ſeveral modern authors are miſtaken on the one hand, who endeavour to clear him from any ſuſpicions of having departed from the common notions of the Trinity; on the other hand, that it is very unjuſt to call him an Arian, and even the Head of the Arians, as St. Jerom has done; ſince he rejected in expreſs terms the peculiar characteriſtics of Arius's doctrine, which were theſe; that the Word was produc'd out of nothing, and is not of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, but different from him; and that there was a time when he was not (4).

(1) Lib. 2. c. 7.

(2) Hiſt. lib. 1. c. 2. Præpar. Evangel. l. 4. c. 5.

(3) In Demonſtr. & Præpar. Evangel. de Eccleſ. Theolog. l. 3.

(4) See Du Pin Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. p. 7. Paris edit. 1693.

[B] . . . . in the council of Antioch.] The eaſtern biſhops having alter'd their reſolution of appearing in the weſtern council, or taking the Pope for judge of the conteſt, which they had with Athanaſius, met at Antioch in the beginning of the year 341, and held a ſynod there of about ninety biſhops. The occaſion of this ſynod was to celebrate the dedication of the church of Antioch; but they took that opportunity to draw up ſome new creeds, and to eſtabliſh ſeveral canons relating to church diſcipline. In the firſt of theſe creeds, they declar'd that they were not followers of Arius, and that they had no other faith than what they receiv'd by tradition; that they receiv'd Arius, becauſe they found he maintained ſeveral orthodox opinions, but that they did not follow him in other points. To this proteſtation is ſubjoin'd a form of belief, in which they do not uſe the term conſubſtantial; but declare that they believe in one only Son of God, co-exiſting with the Father, who begot him, by whom all things were made; and in the Holy Ghoſt (5). This was the firſt creed that was made after that of the council of Nice. It was ſoon follow'd by another, which was drawn up by the biſhops in the ſame council. They enlarge more copiouſly upon the attributes of Jeſus Chriſt; and affirm that he was begotten of the Father before all ages; that he is God of God, a perfect Being, the perfect Image and compleat Reſemblance of the Divinity, Subſtance, Will, Power, and Glory of the Father. They add, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt are not three different names but three hypoſtaſes, and one in will and conſent; ὡς εἶναι τῇ μὲν ὑποστάσει τρία; τῇ δὲ συμφωνίᾳ ἓν. They pronounc'd an anathema againſt thoſe who ſay, that there was any point of time before the generation of the Son, or that he is a Creature formed like other creatures (6). But it is probable that ſeveral of the Biſhops in that Synod diſliked ſome expreſſions in this creed; which might induce Theophronius of Tyanea to draw up a third creed, which was approved by the whole body. In this he declared that he believed in Jeſus Chriſt the only Son of God, who is God, the Word, Power and Wiſdom, by whom all things were created, who was begotten by the Father before all worlds, perfect God of perfect God, who exiſted with the Father in the hypoſtaſis.

(5) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. l. 2. c. 10.

(6) Idem. ibid.

This council of Antioch, which was held in 341, is to be diſtinguiſh'd from another ſynod, which was compoſed of part of the ſame biſhops, who met together about the beginning of the year 342; for this latter was held after Athanaſius had been acquitted; when the eaſtern Biſhops ſent back the Pope's Legates, having detained them till January 342. This ſynod wrote a letter to Julius, in which they excuſed themſelves for not being able to attend the council, which he had call'd at Rome, on account of the Perſian war, and of the ſhortneſs of the time, which there was after Julius's letter was given them, to the day which they had appointed for the meeting of the ſynod. They were diſſatisfied, becauſe Julius had written alone, and addreſs'd his letter only to Euſebius; but they complained above all that he ſhould draw over to his communion Athanaſius and Marcellus, who had been condemn'd and depos'd.

It was in this latter ſynod that the fourth creed was drawn up, which is mentioned by Athanaſius (7). It approaches very near to that of Nice, except the omiſſion of the term conſubſtantial. They compos'd this, as Athanaſius obſerves, in order to ſend it into the Weſt to the Emperor Conſtans.

(7) De Synodis p. 687. and Concil. tom. 2. p. 590.

[C] Six years after this he was depoſed by the council of Sardica, together with ſeveral other Biſhops, who had declared themſelves of his opinions.] The Emperor Conſtantius and Conſtans being deſirous to reſtore peace to the church, call'd a council of the eaſtern and weſtern Biſhops at Sardica (8). There came

(8) Socrat. l. 2. c. 20. Sozomen. l. 3. c. 11.

thus depoſed them, they aſſembled themſelves together at Philippopolis in Thrace [D], where they fulminated in their turn againſt Athanaſius, Oſius Biſhop of Corduba, Pope Julius, and the reſt of their antagoniſts. Acacius had a great ſhare in the baniſhment of Pope Liberius, and bringing Felix into the See of Rome (c) [E]. He ordained came thither an hundred weſtern Biſhops, and ſeventy three eaſtern Biſhops (9); but thoſe of the Eaſt having declar'd to the weſtern Biſhops, that they would not be preſent at the council, unleſs Athanaſius, Marcellus, and other Biſhops, who had been condemn'd, were denied communion with the church; and the weſtern Biſhops refuſing to ſubmit to that condition, the council divided, and the eaſtern Biſhops departed.

(c) St. Jerom ubi ſupra.

(9) Du Pin Bibliot. tom. 2. p. 327.

However the weſtern Biſhops, of whom Oſius was the Head and Preſident (10), continued to hold the council in their abſence, to debate concerning points of faith, and to examine the accuſations rais'd againſt Athanaſius and the other catholic Biſhops, and to make canons relating to the diſcipline of the church. With reſpect to matters of faith, they all agreed, that they ought to make no new creed, but only to maintain that of Nice. However ſome particular perſons were deſirous of making a new creed in imitation of the eaſtern Biſhops, but the whole council diſapprov'd of their deſign. Theodoret has given us this creed in his hiſtory (11).

(10) Theodor. lib. 2. c. 15. Sozomen. l. 3. c. 11. Concil. tom. 4. p. 825.

(11) L. 2. c. 8.

They examined afterwards into the perſonal accuſations, which were rais'd againſt Athanaſius and Marcellus of Ancyra. The former vindicated himſelf, and was acquitted; and the latter having alledg'd, that Euſebius and his adverſaries had taken thoſe things for poſitive aſſertions, which he had only propoſed as difficulties, was likewiſe reſtor'd. They likewiſe reſtor'd Aſclepas Biſhop of Gaza; and excommunicated and depos'd Theodorus of Heraclea, Narciſſus of Neronias, Stephen of Antioch, George of Laodicea, Menophantus of Epheſus, Urſacius of Singidunum, Valens of Murſa, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, and Accacius of Cæſarea (12).

(12) Theodor. ibid.

They made alſo ſeveral canons relating to the diſcipline of the church; but theſe canons were never receiv'd by the church as general laws; nor were they ever inſerted in the code of the canons which was approved by the council of Chalcedon. They were never received in the Eaſt; and the Biſhops of Africa always refuſed to acknowledge them. So that, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (13), they were made uſe of but by the Popes only, who have often cited them under the name of the council of Nice to give them the more weight and authority.

(12) Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 329.

[D] . . . . they aſſembled themſelves together at Philippopolis in Thrace.] The Eaſtern Biſhops having left the council of Sardica, met together at Philippopolis, and wrote from thence a letter, which they dated from Sardica, addreſs'd to all the Biſhops in the world. They declaimed with great ſeverity againſt Athanaſius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and Aſclepas, and repreſented them as men of very obnoxious characters. They declar'd that they had refus'd to join the Weſtern Biſhops, becauſe the latter had receiv'd to their communion the Biſhops, who had been depoſed in the Eaſt; and upon the ſame account they excommunicated Oſius of Corduba, Protogenes, Gaudentius, Maximin, and Julius of Rome. They complain'd that the whole world was overturn'd, and the church diſturb'd, on account of one or two ill men. They accuſed the Weſtern Biſhops of arrogance, and remonſtrated againſt them for endeavouring to eſtabliſh a new law, in aſſuming to themſelves a liberty of examining a-new what had been already regulated in the Eaſt. They obſerved, that the ancient diſcipline of the church was contrary to this practice; and that the ſentences paſs'd in the Eaſt ought to be confirmed in the Weſt, as thoſe of the Weſt were received in the Eaſt. They prov'd this rule by many inſtances. Laſtly, they ſubjoin'd to this letter a confeſſion of faith, in which they profeſs that the Son of God was begotten of his Father before all Worlds, and is God of God, Light of Light, and created all things; and they condemn'd thoſe, who ſay, that the Son was produc'd out of nothing, or that he is of a different ſubſtance from that of God, and is not God; or that there was a time, when he was not the Son of God. They likewiſe anathemize thoſe, who ſay, that there are three Gods, or that Jeſus Chriſt is not God, or that there is more than one Chriſt the Son of God, or that he is the ſame perſon with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt.

(14) Col. 434, &c. and Concil. tom. 2. p. 699.

This letter which is ſtill extant in the Fragments of St. Hilary (14), is addreſs'd to Gregory of Alexandria, Amphion of Nicomedia, and ſeveral other Biſhops, and among the reſt to Donatus of Carthage. Upon which account the Donatiſts cited it in the conference at Carthage; and the catholic Biſhops, who knew nothing of this hiſtory, aſſerted that the council of Sardica was compoſed of Arian Biſhops (15).

(15) Du Pin Bibl. tom. 2. p. 327.

[E] He had a great ſhare in the baniſhment of Pope Liberius, and bringing Felix into the ſee of Rome.] The Emperor finding, that Liberius was almoſt the only perſon, who appeared in defence of Athanaſius, and being deſirous that his condemnation ſhould be confirmed by ſo eminent an Authority as that of the Biſhop of Rome, ſent an eunuch to him, in order to prevail upon him to ſign the ſentence againſt Athanaſius. But this ſolicitation was in vain; for the only anſwer he could obtain of him was this, that he would call a free council, and begin with a confeſſion of faith agreeable to that of the council of Nice: that all the Arians ſhould be excluded, and their opinions anathematized; and that afterwards Athanaſius's cauſe ſhould be examined. The Emperor having receiv'd this anſwer, ſent an order to the Governor of Rome to ſeize Liberius immediately, and ſend him to court; which order was executed. When he was brought before the Emperor, he refuſed to ſubſcribe the condemnation of Athanaſius. Conſtantius urging that he had been condemned by the whole world, and telling him, that he was the only Biſhop, who perſiſted in diſturbing the peace of the Church, in defence of an impious (ἀνοσίου) man: he reply'd, Tho' I ſhould be the only Biſhop, yet the cauſe of faith is not the leſs good on that account; for there were only the three children formerly, who reſiſted the King's command. He deſired then that a council might be call'd; but that, before Athanaſius's cauſe ſhould be examined, all the Biſhops ſhould ſubſcribe the Nicene Creed. Conſtantius having ſpoken very ſeverely of Athanaſius, for being the cauſe of the enmity, which his Brother Conſtans had againſt him. Liberius anſwer'd: You ought not, Sir, to make uſe of Biſhops to revenge your own private animoſities. For the hands of the Clergy ſhould be employ'd only in bleſſing; αἱ γὰρ χεῖρες τῶν Ἐκκλησιαστικῶν εἰς τὸ ἁγιάζειν εὐχαρεῖν ὀφείλουσιν (16). At laſt Conſtantius threatning him with baniſhment, he reply'd: I have already taken my leave of my brethren at Rome; for the laws of the church are much to be preferr'd before the pleaſure of living at Rome. He had three days more granted him to conſider of the affair; but ſtill continuing in the ſame mind, he was two days after baniſh'd to Berœa in Thrace. The Emperor and Empreſs, and the Eunuch Euſebius offer'd him money to ſupport him in his journey, but he refus'd it, and went to the place of his exile with the utmoſt ſatisfaction (17). The Clergy of Rome having thus loſt their Head, engaged in a ſolemn oath not to elect any other perſon in Liberius's room, while he was living. But Conſtantius by means of Epictetus Biſhop of Gentumallo in Italy cauſed one Felix a Deacon to be ordained Biſhop, tho' he had been one of thoſe, who had ſworn not to elect any perſon in Liberius's room. St. Jerom ſays expreſly, that Acacius had a ſhare in this ordination; In tantum autem ſub Conſtantio Imperatore claruit, ut in Liberii locum Romæ Felicem Arianum Epiſcopum conſtitueret (18). The ſame Father, and Socrates the Hiſtorian (19), accuſe Felix of being an Arian; tho' the latter acknowledges, that it was the opinion of ſome perſons, that he was not of the Arian ſcheme, and was compell'd to ſubmit to the ordination: But Theodoret (20), Sozomen (21) and Ruffinus (22), affirm that he was an Arian in point of communion only, and not in doctrine. In Liberii locum, ſays Ruffinus, Felix Diaconus ſuus ab hæreticis ſubrogatur; & non tam ſectæ diverſitate, quam communionis & ordinationis conniventia perhaps it ſhould be convenientiâ) maculatur. Baronius (23) likewiſe inclines to acquit Felix of the imputation of Arianiſm. However that be, all the Ancients agree, that his ordination was irregular. Athanaſius (24) ſays, that he was ordain'd in the palace (without the conſent of the people, without being elected by the Clergy,) by Epictetus, in the preſence of three Eunuchs and three Biſhops, who might rather be conſider'd as ſpies (κατασκόπους) than Biſhops. That the

(16) Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 2. 16.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) De Viris Illuſtrib. c. 98.

(19) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 2. c. 37.

(20) L. 2. c. 17.

(21) L. 4. c. 10.

(22) L. 1. c. 22.

(23) Annales Eccleſiaſt. ad Ann. 355. p. 706. tom. 3. edit. Plantin. 1624.

(24) Epiſt. ad Solitar.

ordained St. Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem in the year 351 [F]; but afterwards had a conteſt with him, and procured him to be depoſed [G], and out of reſentment to him ſeparated himſelf from the Semi-Arians, and joined himſelf to the Anomœans (d) He defended the latter very vigorouſly in the council of Seleucia [H], and that of Conſtantinople, (d) They were called ſo (Ἀνόμοιοι) from their affirming the Son to be unlike the Father in every reſpect.

people would not ſuffer them to enter into the church, and withdrew themſelves from their communion. St. Jerom ſays that he was an Anti-Pope. And Optatus and St. Auſtin in their Catalogues of the Popes omit Felix, and place Damaſus immediately after Liberius. Nay ſome modern Authors make no mention of him in their Catalogues; and yet he is rank'd amongſt the Martyrs in the greateſt part of the Martyrologies.

As for Liberius, who had acted with ſo much reſolution in the times of peace, he grew impatient of the inconveniencies of baniſhment; in which he had not continued two years, before he was prevail'd upon by Demophilus Biſhop of the city where he was baniſh'd, not only to ſign the condemnation of Athanaſius, but likewiſe to approve of a creed which is ſaid to be heterodox. There is a diſpute among the Learned, whether it was the firſt or ſecond creed of Sirmium. St. Jerom ſays expreſly, that he was oblig'd to ſign hereſy; ad ſubſcriptionem hæreſeos compulit (25). And all the Ancients ſpeak of this act of Liberius as an approbation of the Arian doctrine (26). However that be, he wrote a letter of communion to the Eaſtern Biſhops, in which after he had excluded Athanaſius from his communion, and acknowledg'd that he approved of the creed, which Demophilus had offered him, he deſired them to uſe all their intereſt and entreaties with the Emperor, that he might be recalled from his exile, and return to the church which God had intruſted him with. He wrote likewiſe at the ſame time two letters to the ſame purpoſe, one to Urſacius and Valens, and the other to Vincentius of Capua; which are cited in the Fragments of St. Hilary.

(25) De Viris Illuſtrib. cap. 97.
(26) See Du Pin Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 78.

Liberius ſoon after was recalled; for the Emperor being ſatisfy'd with his ſubmiſſion, ſent for him to Sirmium, where he met with the Deputies of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops, who held a kind of council there, in which there was a collection made of the creeds, which had been approved of by the Semi-Arians, in which the Son is declar'd to be like the Father in ſubſtance. This was ſubſcrib'd by Liberius, who was ſent to Rome with a letter from the council directed to Felix, the purport of which was, that Liberius and he ſhould govern the church of Rome in conjunction. But Liberius was no ſooner come to Rome, but Felix was obliged to leave the city, and endeavouring to enter it again by force, he was expell'd with diſgrace (27). Liberius having thus fix'd himſelf again in his ſee, as he had before ſubſcribed Athanaſius's condemnation and the Arian creeds contrary to his own inclination; he ſoon repented of what he had done, and declared his aſſent to the Nicene faith, and reconciled himſelf to Athanaſius. He wrote a letter in the year 362 to all the Biſhops in the world, in which he deſires that thoſe Biſhops might be pardoned, who had been ſurpriz'd into an approbation of Arius's opinions; but he anathemizes the Heads of that party, and thoſe who would not abandon their doctrines (28). At laſt the Semi-Arians finding themſelves oppreſſed by the Anomœans, who had a greater intereſt with the Emperor Valens, had recourſe to Liberius, and ſent to him in the year 366, Euſtachius of Sebaſte, with Silvanus and Theophilus Biſhop of Cilicia. Liberius refuſed to receive them at firſt; inſiſting that they were of Arius's party; but they aſſured him that they had quitted thoſe notions, and declared that the Son of God was like his Father in all things, and of the ſame ſubſtance with him; nay they even gave their aſſent to the Nicene creed, and approved of the word conſubſtantial, and condemn'd the creeds of Ariminum and Seleucia. Liberius having receiv'd theſe declarations from them, wrote into the Eaſt in their favour. He died ſoon after in the year 366 (29).

(27) Sozomen. l. 4. c. 15.
(28) Fragment. S. Hilarii.
(29) St. Jerom & Marcellin. in Chronic. See Du Pin Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 77.

[F] He ordained St. Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem in the year 351.] St. Cyril was ordained Prieſt of the church of Jeruſalem by Maximus Biſhop of that city; but St. Jerom tells us, he refuſed to perform the functions of a Deacon, while that Biſhop was living (30). Socrates (31) and Sozomen (32) inform us, that Acacius and Patrophilus of Scythopolis excluded Maximus, and put St. Cyril in his room. But St. Jerom, who ſpeaks of St. Cyril in a manner, which ſhews that he had no favourable opinion of him, treating him every where as an Arian, ſays that Maximus was dead, when he was ordained. But he accuſes St. Cyril of having perſecuted Heraclius, who had been ordained Biſhop by the Catholics in the room of Maximus, and of having obliged him to continue in the order of Prieſts; Heraclium quem moriens Maximus in ſuum locum ſubſtituerat, variâ fraude ſollicitans, de Epiſcopo in Presbyterum regradavit (33). The ſame father (34) and Ruffinus (35) obſerve, that he very frequently changed his faith and communion. With regard to his changing his communion, Du Pin owns the fact (36). Cyril was at firſt of Acacius's communion; then he left it; afterwards he communicated with the Biſhops of Acacius's party in the year 357; then he abandoned them, and joined with Baſil of Ancyra and the ſemi-Arians; at laſt he reconciled himſelf to the orthodox. But as the abovementioned author aſſerts, he never changed his faith, for he always believed the Son to be like the Father in ſubſtance, without condemning the word Conſubſtantial, it was Acacius who changed his opinions; for he ſometimes affirmed that the Word was like in ſubſtance, and at other times condemned that doctrine, and approved the notion of the Anomœans; but Meletius reconciled them all, and prevailed upon them to approve of the term Conſubſtantial. Mr. Du Pin remarks, that St. Jerom is not to be depended upon, when he ſpeaks of Cyril, becauſe he was prejudiced in favour of Paulinus againſt Meletius and his whole party (37).

(30) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 134.
(31) L. 2. c. 30.
(32) L. 4. c. 19.
(33) St. Jerom. in Chronic.
(34) Id. ibid.
(35) L. 10. c. 23.
(36) Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 143. Note (6).
(37) Idem, ibid. p. 144.

[G] But afterwards had a conteſt with him, and procured him to be depoſed.] Their diſputes about the prerogatives of their ſees very ſoon divided them. The council of Nice (38) had given the Biſhop of Jeruſalem the firſt rank among all the Biſhops of that province, without interfering with the rights of the church of Cæſarea, which is the metropolis of that of Jeruſalem. This honour gave occaſion to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem to aſſume ſeveral extraordinary privileges; and we find that Maximus his predeceſſor ordained Biſhops in Paleſtine, and called a council of the province. But St. Cyril endeavouring to maintain the ſame prerogatives, was interrupted in his attempts by Acacius, who could not ſuffer, that the church of Jeruſalem ſhould uſurp a right which belonged to his own. For that purpoſe he called a council about the year 356, in which he depoſed Cyril, upon pretence that he had ſold the ornaments of the church, and the ſacred veſſels to aſſiſt the poor in the time of famine (39). He choſe in his room Eutychius, who was very probably Biſhop of Eleutheropolis (40).

(38) In the ſeventh Canon.
(39) Sozomen. l. 4. c. 25.
(40) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 134.

[H] He defended the latter very vigorouſly in the council of Seleucia.] This council conſiſted of an hundred and ſixty Biſhops of two different parties. About forty of them were Arians, who maintained that the Son was not like the Father in ſubſtance; the other were called ſemi-Arians, who profeſſed that the Son was of like ſubſtance with the Father, and rejected the notion of Arius and Aetius. There were a hundred and five of this party. The reſt of the Biſhops were probably defenders of Conſubſtantiality. There was an officer of the Emperor's court, whoſe name was Leonas, preſent in the council, to prevent any diſorder. The ſemi-Arians inſiſted that it was proper to examine perſonal cauſes before they entered upon matters of faith. The Arians on the other hand, whoſe leaders were Acacius, George of Alexandria, Uranius of Tyre, and Eudoxus of Antioch, maintained, that it was proper to begin with points of faith, and carried it againſt the others. They propoſed to reject the Nicene creed, and to form a new one; which the other party oppoſed. Theſe conteſts being carried very high, Leonas at laſt declared that he would put an end to the council, and abſented himſelf from it the next day. Acacius's party took this opportunity to depart. The other Biſhops having cited them to appear, depoſed Acacius, George of Conſtantinople [I], but he repented ſoon after of having engaged in that party; and having ordained Meletius (e), Pelagius, and ſeveral other Biſhops, who were of the orthodox faith, he reconciled himſelf to the Catholics, and ſigned the Nicene Creed in the council of Antioch under the Emperor Jovian [K]. He died about the year 366 (f). He was a man of great genius and diſtinguiſhed learning [L]. He gave his name to a ſect who were called Acaciani (g). He wrote ſeveral works before he was made a Biſhop, and particularly a book againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, of which Epiphanius has given us a fragment (h). Some time after he was made a Biſhop, he wrote the Life of Euſebius, his predeceſſor (i). St. Jerom (k) ſays, that he wrote ſeven volumes of Commentaries on Eccleſiaſtes, and ſeven volumes upon Miſcellaneous Queſtions, συμμίκτων ζητημάτων, and ſeveral other treatiſes upon various ſubjects. There were ſeveral other perſons of this name, as particularly a Martyr under the Emperor Decius (l); a Patriarch of Conſtantinople in the fifth Century (m); a Patriarch of Antioch, who ſucceeded Baſil in 458, and died in 459 (n); a Biſhop of Amida in Meſopotamia (o); a Biſhop of Berœa in Paleſtine (p); a Biſhop of Meletum in the fifth Century (q), and a famous Rhetorician in the time of Julian the Apoſtate (r). Olearius (s) has committed an error in ſuppoſing that what Mr. Du Pin has ſaid concerning the author of a memorial of the affair of Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, written in the year 486 (t), is to be applied to our Acacius of Cæſarea, who died almoſt a whole Century before the other. For the Biſhops of Conſtantinople and Beroe, ſee the two next articles.

(e) Epiphan. adverſus Hæreſes. l. 3. tom. 1. c. 28. p. 876. edit. Colon. 1682.
(f) Aubert. Miræ in S. Hieron. de Viris illuſtrib. c. 98.
(g) See J. Forbeſii Inſtruct. Theolog. l. 1. c. 2. § 7.
(h) Hæreſ. 72.
(i) Socrat. l. 2. c. 4.
(k) De Viris Illuſtrib. c. 98.
(l) Tillemont, Memoires Eccleſ. tom. 3. part 2.
(m) Evagr. l. 3.
(n) Idem. l. 2. c. 22.
(o) Socrat. l. 7. c. 21.
(p) Idem, l. 6. c. 18.
(q) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt.
(r) Sujdas.
(s) Bibliotheca Scriptorum Eccleſiaſticor. tom. 1. p. 5. edit. Jenæ 1711.
(t) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 4. p. 262.

Alexandria, Uranius of Tyre, and ſix other Biſhops, and excommunicated nine of them. But at laſt the Emperor having heard the cauſe debated in his preſence, prevailed upon all the Biſhops of both parties to aſſent to the Nicene creed, which had been ſigned at Ariminum (41).

(41) Du Pin, Bibliotb. tom. 2. p. 334. Socrat. l. 2. c. 39, 40. Sozom. l. 14. c. 23.

[I] And that of Conſtantinople.] This council was held in the year 360 by Acacius's party, and was compoſed of fifty Biſhops. They invited thither the Biſhops of Bithynia, who were of their party; and approved and publiſhed in that council the creed of the council of Ariminum with a very ſlight variation (42). Then they condemned Aetius, and excommunicated three Biſhops, who would not conſent to his condemnation. But Mr. Du Pin obſerves (43), that as they condemned him only out of policy and regard to the Emperor, they revenged themſelves upon thoſe Biſhops who had oppoſed them in the council of Seleucia, and depoſed the leaders of the ſemi-Arians upon various pretences, and ordained thoſe of Aetius's party in their room.

(42) Socrat. l. 11. cap. 41.

(43) Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 335.

[K] He ſigned the Nicene creed in the council of Antioch under the Emperor Jovian.] Acacius his party finding the Emperor Jovian inclined to favour the Catholics, joined Meletius Biſhop of Antioch, and held a council in that city in the year 363, in which they declared that they would embrace the Nicene creed, and receive the term Conſubſtantial; but at the ſame time they added, that this word was to be underſtood in ſuch a ſenſe, as to ſignify that the Son of God was begotten of the ſubſtance of his Father, and that he is like his Father in ſubſtance; that we are not to believe that there was any paſſion in this ineffable generation; that we muſt not uſe the word Subſtance in its natural ſenſe; that this term was only made uſe of to deſtroy the error of Arius, who ſaid, that the Word was produced from nothing, which notion had been revived by the Anomœans. The Biſhops having made this declaration in their letter to the Emperor, they approved of the Nicene creed entirely. The Biſhops who were preſent at this council were Acacius, Meletius of Antioch, Euſebius of Samoſata, Pelagius of Laodicea in Syria, Irenio of Gaza, and Athanaſius of Ancyra (44).

(44) Socrat. l. 3. c. 25. Sozomen. l. 6. c. 4. Concilior. tom. 2. p. 827.

[L] He was a man of great genius and diſtinguiſhed learning.] Sozomen tells us (45), that "he was a "ſon of great ſagacity and eloquence, and indefati- "gable in purſuing his deſigns," Φύσει τὰ δεινὸς ὢν νοῆσαι καὶ λέξαι, καὶ τὰ βεβουλευμένα εἰς ἔργον ἄγειν. Philoſtorgius ſays, that "Acacius was bold in diſputation, "of great ſagacity in the management of affairs, and "maſter of an happy eloquence in expreſſing his "thoughts. Ὧι δὲ ὁ Ακάκιος θαρσαλέος μὲν ἐν τοῖς ἀγῶσι, διανοηθῆναί τε πραγμάτος φύσιν ἐξὺς, καὶ λόγῳ δηλῶσαι τὸ γνωσθὲν ἱκανός (46). But the ſame author afterwards tells us, that "it was uſual with him to "ſpeak one thing, and mean another." Ἕτερος μὲν ἐν τῇ δόξαι, ἕτερος δὲ τὴν γλῶτταν (47).

(45) L. 4. c. 23. See likewiſe l. 3. c. 2.
(46) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 4. c. ult.
(47) Idem, ibid.

☞ACACIUS firſt Governor of the Orphans Hoſpital, and afterwards Patriarch of Conſtantinople lived in the fifth Century. He ſucceeded Gennadius in the See of Conſtantinople (a) A. C. 471, and died in 489, having been Patriarch ſeventeen years and nine months (b). He was ſo ambitious, that he maintained his See ought to have the pre-eminence over thoſe of Alexandria, Antioch and Jeruſalem. His intention, 'tis probable, was to draw by degrees the whole power and authority of the Biſhop of Rome to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople; but as he was very cunning and artful, he pretended only at firſt that the church of Conſtantinople was to have the firſt rank after that of Rome; and to compaſs his deſign he prevailed with the Emperor Leo to reſtore and confirm all the privileges which the churches once enjoyed, and eſpecially that of Conſtantinople (c); but by the words of the Emperor's decree it appears that Acacius had more extenſive views [A]. Pope Simplicius was ſo well appris'd of this, and ſo apprehenſive

(a) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. c. 21.
(b) Ann. Pagi ad ann. 489.
(c) Baron. ad ann. 472.

[A] Acacius had larger views.] Theſe are the Emperor's words, as they are quoted by Baronius (1), Sacroſanctam quoque religioſiſſimæ hujus civitatis eccleſiam & matrem noſtræ pietatis & Chriſtianorum orthodoxæ religionis omnium, & ejuſdem regiæ urbis ſanctiſſimam fidem privilegia & honores omnes, ſuper Epiſcoporum ordinationibus, & jure ante alios reſidendi, & cætera omnia, quæ ante noſtrum imperium, vel nobis imperantibus habuiſſe dignoſcitur, habere in perpetuum firmiter regiæ urbis intuitu judicamus & ſancimus (2). That is, "We order and decree, out of "regard to our royal city, that the holy church of "this moſt religious city, the mother of our piety "and of all orthodox Chriſtians, do enjoy for ever "the moſt holy faith (now eſtabliſhed) in this ſame "royal city, with all the privileges and honours that re- "late to the ordaining of Biſhops, and to the right of "precedency, which that city enjoyed either be- "fore our reign or ſince we came to the crown." Tho' no expreſs mention is made of Rome in this decree, yet as it is written in general words, the Emperor might very well have had a mind to ſubmit, if not expreſly, yet in an obſcure manner, the church of Rome to that of Conſtantinople. And Baronius is of opinion that this decree was dictated by Acacius himſelf, for, ſays he (3), a pious Prince as Leo was, could not ſay that the church of Conſtantinople was the mother of all the Chriſtians, and of the orthodox Religion. There is reaſon to believe, that Acacius ſeeing the Weſtern Empire was in a declining condition,

(1) Annal. ad ann. 472.
(2) L. 16. Cod. de Sacroſanct. Eccleſ.
(3) Ibid.

henſive leſt Acacius ſhould encroach upon his power and authority, that he oppoſed him as much as he could; but his letters being loſt, we cannot know exactly what reſiſtance he made. Felix III. his ſucceſſor reſiſted Acacius vigorouſly, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Acacius, though ſecretly in the intereſt of the Eutychians, ſeemed at firſt very zealous for the council of Chalcedon [B], in which the hereſy of Eutyches had been condemned. Baſiliſcus, who uſurped the Imperial crown, having wrote a circular letter, or edict, in which he condemned the council of Chalcedon (c) [C], Acacius dition, and that of the Eaſt very flouriſhing, thought the capital city of that Empire was now to take, in all reſpects, the place of old Rome (4). Baronius endeavours to confute him by diſtinguiſhing the temporal Authority from the ſpiritual; the firſt following the Emperor wherever he goes, but the ſecond being fixed by Chriſt himſelf to the city of Rome: This is a very good argument ſuppoſing the infallibility of the Pope, that is ſuppoſing, what was to be proved: Otherwiſe one would be apt to think, that thoſe cities, where Princes keep their court, muſt generally be better provided with able and learned Clergymen than any other city; and therefore if any diſputes ariſe about religious or eccleſiaſtical matters, which cannot be decided in the places where they happen, the beſt way is to have them determined by thoſe Clergymen that live near the court. This ſuppoſes indeed that Clergymen are preferred according to their merit and learning; but how far this is true we ſhall not venture to determine.

(c) Ap. Evagr. H. E. l. 3. c. 4.

(4) Baron. ibid.

[B] Acacius — ſeem'd at firſt very zealous for the Council of Chalcedon.] "Peter ſurnamed the Fuller, "profeſſed publickly the opinions of Eutyches, for "which reaſon he was removed from his EpiſcopalSee "of Antioch; and having been reſtored to it by this "Emperor Zeno, he wrote a letter to Acacius in which "he maintain'd the Eutychian hereſy. Acacius, who "was his friend, and had been the principal promoter "of his reſtoration, was nevertheleſs ſo offended at his "hereſy, that he aſſembled a ſynod of Biſhops at "Conſtantinople, in which the opinions of Peter were "unanimouſly condemned." Petrus Fullo epiſtolam quandam blaſphemiis pleniſſimam ſcripſit ad Acacium, quando ejus opera expulſo Calendonio in ſedem Antiochenam invectus fuit. Hanc cum Acacius accepiſſet, exhorreſcens tot blaſphemiorum involucrum inſtar ſerpentum, — ad dementem hominem curandum Conſtantinopoli concilium Epiſcoporum congregavit, quo omnium orthodoxorum unanimi conſenſu inſanus ille inſani Fullonis error condemnatus fuit (5). When the ſynod was riſen Acacius wrote a letter to Peter the Fuller, in which he warned him "not to go out of the com-"mon road, leſt he ſhould be a ſtranger to the Prieſt-"hood of God, but to follow the fathers of the council "of Chalcedon." Abſolutus ſynodo Acacius literas ad Petrum Fullonem dedit, ibique eum exhortatus, ne viam non tritam incedat, ſicque a Dei ſacerdotio alienus fiat, ſed ut viam ſequatur, quam ſecuti ſunt patres Chalcedonenſes (6). Thus we ſee, how zealous Acacius appear'd for the orthodox faith. But we ſhall ſhew hereafter (7) that this was nothing but mere affectation and policy.

(5) Tom. 4. Concil. ad Ann. 483.

(6) Ibid.

(7) In the Remar [D].

[C] In which he condemns the council of Chalcedon.] Here follows the ſubſtance of his letter or edict. He firſt confirms the laws which the Emperors his predeceſſors had made concerning the Trinity. He ſays, that as the union and concord of all the Chriſtians is the ſtrongeſt bulwark of his Empire, as well as the moſt effectual means of their ſalvation, he orders the Nicene creed only to be uſed in all the churches of God and the aſſemblies of the orthodox; that rule of faith being ſufficient to overthrow all hereſies, and to unite all the churches. He alſo confirms the council of Conſtantinople, and that of Epheſus. But as for thoſe things, which tend to diſturb the union and tranquillity of the churches and the peace of the whole world, ſuch as the code of Leo and whatever was done in the council of Chalcedon either with regard to faith, or to the explication of the creed, he condemns, as being contrary to the council of Nice. His own words deſerve to be inſerted in this place. Τὰ δὲ διέλοντα τὴν ἕνοσιν καὶ ἐυταξίαν τῶν ἁγίων τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐκκλησιῶν καὶ εἰρήνην τοῦ κόσμου πανὸς, δηλαδὴ τὸν λεγόμενον τόμον Λέοντος, καὶ πανὸα τὰ ἐν Καλχηδόνι, ἐν ὅρῳ πίσεως, ἐκθέσει συμβόλων, ἢ ἑρμηνείας, διδασκαλίας, ἢ διαλέξεως εἰρημένα καὶ πεπραγμένα εἰς καινοτομίαν τὴν κατὰ τοῦ ἁγίου συμβόλου τῶν τιὴ ἁγίων πατέρων, θεσπίζομεν ἐνταῦθά τε καὶ παντάχοῦ καθ' ἑκάσην ἐκκλησίαν, παρὰ τῶν ἀπαύξαχοῦ ἁγιατῶν ἐπισκόπων ἀναθεματίζεσθαι καὶ περὶ παραδίδοσθαι (8). That is, "Thoſe things, which have diſturbed the "union and order of the holy churches of God, and "the peace of the whole world, viz. the Tome of "Leo, as it is called, and whatever has been decreed "at Chalcedon, in the definition of the faith, and "in the expoſition of ſymbols, either to explain, to "teach, or to diſpute; tending to introduce an in-"novation in the holy creed drawn up by the three "hundred eighteen Fathers (of the council of Nice) "(all thoſe things) we order to be anathematized, and "to be burnt, wherever they be found." The Emperor alſo condemns thoſe, who deny that the only Son of God was born of the Virgin Mary, and was truly made man, and maintain that he received his fleſh from heaven, or that he only took it ſeemingly and not really. He requires further that all the Biſhops ſubſcribe this epiſtle; and thoſe that act any way contrary to it, he declares to be the authors of tumults and ſeditions in church and ſtate, and enemies of God and of himſelf: if therefore they be Biſhops or Clerks, he condemns them to be depoſed, and if Monks or Lay-men, to be baniſh'd, their goods forfeited, and themſelves ſubject to the moſt ſevere puniſhment. Baronius and other Writers diſclaim very much againſt Baſiliſcus for having wrote this letter; but we are rather inclined to believe, that this Prince intended to remove the ſcruples which the council of Chalcedon might raiſe in the minds of honeſt but unlearned Chriſtians. That council in order to explode the pretended hereſy of Eutyches, had enter'd into ſuch minute particulars concerning the perſon of Chriſt and the union of the Divine and human nature in one hypoſtaſis, as could not but puzzle extremely thoſe who were no ſcholars, and did not underſtand the nice diſtinctions of the Philoſophers and Divines. The definition of the council, as related by Evagrius, is this. Τοὺς παθητὴν τοῦ μονογενοῦς λέγειν τολμῶντας τὴν θεότητα τοῦ τῶν ἱερῶν ἀποθεῖται συλλόγε, καὶ τοῖς ἐπὶ τῶν δύο φύσιων τοῦ Χριστοῦ κρᾶσιν, ἢ σύγχυσιν ἐπινοοῦσιν ἀπίστατε, καὶ τοὺς οὐρανίε ἢ ἑτέρας τινὸς οὐσίας τὴν ἐξ ἡμῶν ληφθεῖσαν αὐτῷ τοῦ θήλυ μερφὴν παρεκβάσιος ἐξελαύνει, καὶ δύο μὲν πρὸ τῆς ἑνώσεως φύσεις τοῦ Κυρίου μυθεύοντας, μίαν δὲ μετὰ τὴν ἕνωσιν ἀναπλάτοντας, ἀναθεματίζει.— Ὁμολογοῦμεν ϗ καὶ συμφώνως ἅπαντες, διδάσκομεν — ἕνα τὸν αὐτὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, Υἱὸν, Κύριον, μονογενῆ ἐν δύο φύσεσιν ἀσυγχύτως, ἀτρέπτως, ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀχωρίστως γνωριζόμενον. οὐδαμοῦ τῆς τῶν φύσεων διαφορᾶς ἀνῃρημένης διὰ τὴν ἕνωσιν, σωζομένης ϗ μᾶλλον τῆς ἰδιότητος ἑκατέρας φύσεως, καὶ εἰς ἓν πρόσωπον, καὶ μίαν ὑπόστασιν συντρεχούσης· οὐχ ὡς εἰς δύο πρόσωπα μεριζόμενον, ἢ διαιρούμενον (9). That is, "Thoſe, who dare to maintain that the Di-"vinity of the Son is paſſible, (or can ſuffer) he * ex-"pels the aſſembly of the Saints. He alſo oppoſes "thoſe who imagine that there has been a mixture or "confuſion between the two natures of Chriſt. It "rejects thoſe, who ſay, that the form of a ſervant, "which Chriſt took up among us, was of a heaven-"ly ſubſtance, or of any other. Finally it anathe-"matizes thoſe, who pretend that Chriſt had two na-"tures before the union (of theſe natures) but only "one after the union — And we confeſs and all una-"nimouſly teach — one Jeſus Chriſt, Son, Lord, on-"ly-begotten, (acknowledged) in two Natures, with-"out confuſion, immutably, indiviſibly, and inſepa-"rably. The difference of the two natures being "not taken away by the union, the properties of ei-"ther nature being rather preſerved, concurring in "one perſon and in one hypoſtaſis, and not divided "or parted into two perſons." If this decree of the council of Chalcedon be compared with the letter of Baſiliſcus, it will appear, that the Emperor agrees with the council in what is moſt eſſential; and that he only explodes ſome nice diſtinctions and too curious explications, which ſeem calculated only to puzzle mens conſciences, and to occaſion diſcontent, diſputes and diviſions among Chriſtians.

(8) Ap. Evagr. H. E. lib 3. cap. 4. p. 336. edit. Reading.

(9) Ap. Evagr. H. E. lib. 2. cap. 4. p. 291.

* Pope Leo in his letter to Flavianus, which letter the council approves.

Acacius affected with the deepeſt ſorrow ſtirred up the Monks and all the people [D] of Conſtantinople againſt Baſiliſcus, repreſenting him as an arch-heretick (d). Baſiliſcus, frightened at this, retracted his former letter, as though it had been ſurreptitious, ordered that it ſhould be cancell'd, and wrote another letter, in which he confirmed the council of Chalcedon (e) [E], and, what Acacius principally deſired, reſtored to him the authority he claimed, of ordaining the Biſhops of ſeveral Provinces. Acacius now in the height of his power ſoon made it appear, that his zeal againſt the followers of Eutyches was nothing elſe but policy, for he was a great friend and ſupporter of Peter Mongus an Eutychian, who having been depoſed from the Biſhoprick of Alexandria, was reſtored by the credit of Acacius (f), notwithſtanding the letters which Pope Simplicius wrote to him, deſiring him to oppoſe the reſtoration of that Heretic as much as lay in his power. In the mean time the Emperor Zeno, who then had already wreſted the Imperial ſcepter out of the hands of Baſiliſcus, publiſhed an edict of union * [F] directed to the Biſhops, Clergy, Monks, and people of Alexandria, Egypt, Lybia and Pentapolis; his intention was to baniſh all diſputes and diviſions by that edict, in which he maintains the Nicene creed, and condemns expreſly Neſtorius and Eutyches (g). This edict was probably dictated by Acacius himſelf (b), Peter Mongus having ſubſcribed to it, there were, it ſeems, no reaſons to ſuſpect him any longer of heterodoxy. But Pope Felix III, who had now ſucceeded to Simplicius, rejected the Emperor's edict, and eſpouſed the cauſe of John Talaia or Talaida [G], who had been expelled the See of Alexandria by the friends of Mongus. Felix, to determine the cauſe between theſe two competitors, and in all likelihood to humble the pride of Acacius, who being a favourite of the Emperor, was now powerful in the Eaſt, aſſembled a Synod at Rome, in which it was reſolved that a letter ſhould be wrote to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, complaining of the injury done to the church and to the Catholic faith, by thoſe who had betrayed it, and deſiring that they might be puniſhed; that a letter ſhould alſo be written to Acacius, reproaching him with conniving at Heretics, and ſummoning him to appear before the Pope, and anſwer to all

(d) Evagr. ibid. c. 7.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Evagr. ibid. c. 13 and 20

* It is called Ἑνωτικὸν, Henoticon.

(g) Apud Eund. ibid. cap. 14.

(b) Theophanes, in Chronographia, p. 89.

(27) 1 Cor. i. 10.

[D] Stirred up the monks and all the people of Conſtantinople.] Dr. Cave, who ſeems to entertain a very great opinion of Acacius, ſays that "he maintained "the Catholic Faith with an invincible conſtancy; and "that by the credit he had with the people and friars "of Conſtantinople, he brought things to that paſs, "that the Emperor fearing an inſurrection, cancell'd "his former edict." Acacius invicta animæ conſcientia fidem Catholicam propugnavit, & authoritate ſua apud plebem C. P. & Monachos effecit ut tumultum graviſſimum veritus Baſiliſcus edictum — revocaverit (10). From theſe words of Dr. Cave one would conclude, that the Emperor only feared an inſurrection, but that the people had not yet revolted. Whereas Evagrius ſays expreſly, that Acacius συγκινῆσαι τὸ μοναδικὸν καὶ τὸ δῆμον (11), "excited the monks and people." Theophanes does not accuſe Acacius of being the author of the revolt, but he ſays, that "Acacius ſeeing a "great number of the Clergy and Monks of Con"ſtantinople aſſembled to ſupport the council of "Chalcedon was ſo frightened at it, that he feigned to "be of their opinion, and preached from the pulpit "againſt Baſiliſcus and Zeno." Τοῦ κλήρου καὶ τῶν μοναχῶν ΚΠ. ὑπερμαχούντων τῆς ἁγίας ἐν Χαλκηδόνι συνόδου φοβηθεὶς Ἀκάκιος, τὰ πλήθη ὁμοφρονεῖν αὐτοῖς ὑπεκρίνατο· ὅθεν ἐπὶ ἄμβωνος κατὰ Βασιλίσκου καὶ Ζήνωνος προσεφώνει (12). This agrees much better with the whole conduct of Acacius, who was a great friend and ſupporter of Peter the Fuller, and Peter Mongus, two Eutychian Biſhops.

(10) Hiſt. Lit. p. 364.

(11) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 7.

(12) Theophan. Chronogr. p. 84.

[E] He confirmed the council of Chalcedon.] Evagrius ſays it expreſly, and immediately after this, he gives us (13) the letter of Baſiliſcus, in which Neſtorius and Eutyches are indeed expreſly condemned, but no mention is made of the council of Chalcedon: But the Emperor does not forget to reſtore to Acacius the right of ordaining Biſhops in ſeveral provinces. The council of Chalcedon had granted that privilege to the Archbiſhops of Conſtantinople, and that council being exploded, Acacius would have loſt his privileges; this it ſeems was the only reaſon which obliged that ambitious Prelate to oppoſe the former letter of the Emperor, and to oblige him to write another: and the council of Chalcedon not being mentioned in that letter, ſeems to be an effect of the cunning of Acacius, who favouring the Eutychians, tho' not yet openly, would not have the council of Chalcedon directly approved.

(13) Lib. 3. cap. 3.

[F] An edict of union.] This edict had ſo far the intended effect, that the people of Alexandria having read it, joined in communion with the Catholick and Apoſtolick Church (14). This edict was not expreſly condemned by the church for fear of offending the Emperor, and creating greater diviſions and ſchiſms; and alſo becauſe Zeno far from exploding directly the council of Chalcedon, did in expreſs words condemn the opinion of Eutyches, and in his private letters to the Biſhops of Rome admitted the council we have mentioned. Natalis (15) Alexander ſhews by the very words of this edict that it did not contain any hereſy. But, ſays the Author, from whom I borrow this remark, Zeno's edict has been prejudicial to the orthodox faith, and favourable to the hereticks, becauſe it does not mention St. Leo's letter, nor the definitions of the council of Chalcedon, and becauſe it does not contain theſe words ex duabus and in duabus naturis, of two, and in two natures, which are the diſtinguiſhing marks of the catholick faith, againſt the Eutychian hereſy (16). But it ſeems that the Emperor having a mind to unite the Chriſtians, and to put a ſtop to their quarrels and diviſions, was very much in the right to ſuppreſs thoſe party-expreſſions, which tend only to create and foment hatred and diviſions among thoſe, who ought to be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind and in the ſame judgment (17). And it were to be wiſhed that all party-expreſſions were left out of our creeds.

(14) Evagr. H.E. lib. 3. cap. 14.

(15) Sæcul. V. cap. 3. in Diſſert. xviii.

(16) Ap. Evagr. lib. 3. c. 14. in not. var. nota a.

[G] John Talaia, or Talaida.] Thus he is called by Liberatus; but Valeſius (18) thinks he ſhould rather be called Thladias, the Eunuch, that being the meaning of the Greek word Θλάδιας. This John was a Prieſt, and Purſe-keeper, or Treaſurer of the church of St. John the Baptiſt at Alexandria. He was ſent to Conſtantinople, to petition the Emperor, that when Timothy, the then Biſhop of Alexandria, ſhould die, the citizens might have the liberty to chooſe his ſucceſſor: The Emperor ſoon found out that this ambitious man coveted the biſhoprick for himſelf, therefore he made him ſwear, that he would never accept it; afterwards the Emperor granted the requeſt of the Alexandrines, and publiſhed a law by which he enacted that after the death of Timothy, the Clergy and people of Alexandria ſhould chuſe their own Biſhop. Timothy dying a little while after, John forgetting his oath diſpoſed money among the people, to be made a Biſhop; which ſucceeded according to his wiſhes. The Emperor hearing of this, ordered that John be expelled from his See, and Peter Mongus reſtored to it (19). Hence we may judge what honeſt views the Popes Simplicius and Felix III. had when they ſupported the intereſt of a man guilty both of ſimony and of perjury; but theſe, it ſeems, are ſmall crimes, if compared with heterodoxy.

(17) 1 Cor. i. 10.

(18) In Diſſert. de duab. Synod. in quib. Acacius damnatus eſt, cap. xi.

(19) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 12.

all the articles drawn up againſt him; and that the Emperor ſhould be deſired to compel him to it (i). Theſe letters were brought to Conſtantinople by Vitalis and Miſenus both Biſhops, and by Felix Protector of the Church of Rome. The Emperor anſwered the Pope, that he ought not to trouble himſelf with the affair of John Talaida, ſince that man had ſworn he would never attempt to get into the Epiſcopal See of Alexandria, and that afterwards breaking his oath, he had committed all manner of ſacrileges. That Peter Mongus had been promoted to that See after a diligent inquiry; that he had with his own hand ſubſcribed to the faith of the Nicene council (k); I ſuppoſe the Emperor made this anſwer at the inſtigation of Acacius, who had alſo prevailed upon Vitalis and Miſenus to communicate with him [H] and with his followers, or as Evagrius calls them, with the Heretics (l). The Pope hearing how his Legates had prevaricated, aſſembled a ſynod againſt them as ſoon as they were returned to Rome, and deprived them of their Biſhopricks; he alſo excommunicated Acacius and Peter Mongus (m); but he did not think fit to ſend immediately to Acacius the ſentence pronounced againſt him, in hopes, ſays Valeſius (n), that he would repent, and renounce the communion of the Hereticks. But Acacius truſting to the Emperor's favour, far from altering his conduct, ſtretched his power and authority farther ſtill; for he depoſed Calandion Biſhop of Antioch, whom he had himſelf ordained for that Biſhoprick, and reſtored Peter the Fuller to that See (o), which he had already enjoyed, but had been depoſed as an Heretick. The Pope hearing of this held another ſynod of forty three Biſhops at Rome, in which Acacius and Peter the Fuller were again excommunicated. Tutus Protector of the Church of Rome was ſent to Acacius to deliver him the Pope's letter, in which was contained the ſentence of excommunication and deprivation [I]. This letter with the ſentence being delivered to Acacius, not by Tutus himſelf, but by ſome Monks, occaſioned a ſedition, in which ſeveral Monks were killed, by perſons who were of Acacius's party; others were ſeverely pelted, and ſome were thrown into priſon (p). Acacius received the ſentence without any concern, and to be even with the Pope, he eraſed his name out of the ſacred Diptichs, that is, out of the liſt of thoſe Biſhops, whoſe names were mentioned in the publick prayers; this was breaking off all fellowſhip with him. He alſo depoſed all the orthodox Biſhops, ſays Godeau (q), and put Heretics in their places; and being ſupported by the Emperor, he enjoyed his Biſhoprick quietly till his death, which happened in the year 488 (r). It is not an eaſy thing to give a true character of this Biſhop, for whatever we know of him has been tranſmitted to us by his profeſſed enemies. If the facts, they relate, are true, we may, it ſeems, infer from them, that Acacius was a very ambitious man, who minded religion only ſo far as it was ſubſervient to his views, who being ſecretly an Eutychian, declared for the council of Chalcedon, only becauſe the privileges of his See had been confirmed in that council, and rejected that council, or at leaſt did not care to obey its decrees, as ſoon as his credit and authority were well ſettled: A haughty man, who could not bear that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould have the pre-eminence over him; and who ſupported the Eutychians to contradict the Pope, and to have an opportunity of exerting his own power and authority. Suidas ſays that he was ſo proud, and thirſted ſo much after honour and glory, that with his conſent his picture was ſet up in the churches, which no Biſhop ever permitted before him. The Roman Catholic authors give him generally a very bad character. But if we were

(i) Id. ibid. c. 18. See alſo Valeſius, Diſſert. de Acacio Conſtant. Epiſ. at the end of the third volume of the Eccleſ. Hiſt. Scrip. Gr. edit. Reading.

(k) Id. ibid. c. 20.

(l) Ibid. c. 21.

(m) Valeſius, Diſſert. de Acacio Conſt. c. 2.

(n) Ibid. cap. 3.

(o) Valeſ. ibid. Evagr. lib. 3. H. E. cap. 16.

(p) Theophanes, Chronogr. p. 91.

(q) Hiſt. Eccl. V. Siecle, T. 3. Liv. 3. p. 666.

(r) Cave Hiſt. Liter. p. 364.

[H] Acacius prevailed upon Vitalis and Miſenus to communicate with him.] When the Pope's Legates were come to Abydos in their way to Conſtantinople, they were there detained by the order of Zeno and of Acacius; their letters were taken from them, they were put in priſon, and Zeno threatened them that they ſhould be put to death, if they did not come into fellowſhip with Acacius and Peter Mongus, that is, look upon them as orthodox, and take the ſacrament with them upon occaſion: This is what Theophanes relates (20). Valeſius adds (21) from Pope Gelaſius, that when the Emperor and the Patriarch ſaw they could not prevail over the Legates by threatning, they endeavoured to entice them by fair words, and what is more powerful by gifts and preſents; promiſing them alſo upon oath, that their coming into fellowſhip with Acacius and Peter Mongus, would not in the leaſt injure the cauſe they were to maintain.

(20) In Chronograph. p. 91.

(21) In Diſſert. de Acacio, cap. 2.

[I] The ſentence of excommunication and deprivation.] The Greeks blamed this ſentence againſt Acacius for the following reaſons; becauſe he had not been condemned by a council or ſynod, but by the Pope himſelf, who alone ſubſcribed his name to the ſentence. And indeed the two ſynods held at Rome, and in which he was condemned, had not been called together on his account; the firſt being aſſembled againſt Vitalis and Miſenus the Pope's Legates, who were depoſed for their prevarication, as we have ſaid, and Acacius only cenſured and ſeverely reproved as Evagrius relates (22). The ſecond ſynod was held on account of the diviſions of the church of Antioch; in that ſynod Peter the Fuller was condemned for having invaded the Epiſcopal See of that City, and Peter Mongus Biſhop of Alexandria and Acacius were condemned for being favourers and abettors of Peter the Fuller (23). If then a Biſhop cannot be lawfully condemned, but in a ſynod held particularly on his account, the complaint of the Greeks was very well grounded. As to their other complaint, viz. that the Pope alone ſubſcribed to the ſentence of Acacius, Felix himſelf anſwers in theſe words: Quoties intra Italiam propter eccleſiaſticas cauſas præcipue fidei colliguntur Domini Sacerdotes, conſuetudo retinetur, ut ſucceſſor Præſulum ſedis apoſtolicæ, ex perſona cunctorum totius Italiæ Sacerdotum juxta ſollicitudinem ſibi eccleſiarum omnium competentem, cuncta conſtituat (24). That is, "Whenever the Prieſts of the Lord are aſſembled "in Italy on account of eccleſiaſtical affairs, eſ- "pecially of ſuch affairs as relate to the faith, it is "uſual for the ſucceſſor of the Prelates of the Apo- "ſtolick See, to determine every thing in the name "of all the Prieſts of Italy, according to the care "which he is obliged to take of all the churches." Thus the Pope determines in his own cauſe; but the Greek churches, it ſeems, were not obliged to ſubmit to his determination. They alſo complain'd, that Acacius had not been examined nor convicted according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws. To which Gelaſius anſwers, that "Acacius having himſelf laid open his crime in his "letters, this was a ſufficient confeſſion without any "further inquiry; Cum proprium crimen ſuis literis ipſe detexerit, nec audiri debuerit jam ſponte confeſſus (25) But this was a mere begging of the queſtion, ſince. Acacius never confeſſed, he had done any thing that deſerved cenſure.

(22) Lib. 3. cap. 21.

(23) Valeſius ad Evagr. H. E. lib. 3. cap. 18. note 1.

(24) Felicis Epiſt. Apud Valeſium, ibid.

(25) Gelaſ. apud eund. ibid.

were acquainted with all the circumſtances of his actions, they would perhaps appear in another light. We find in the ſentence of his excommunication a paſſage, which deſerves to be taken notice of [K]. There are two letters of Acacius extant, one to Peter the Fuller (s) in Greek and Latin; the other to Pope Simplicius about the ſtate of the Church of Alexandria (t), in Latin only (u).

(s) In Tom. iv. Concil. p. 1098.
(t) Ibid. p. 1080.
(u) Cave, Hiſt. Liter. p. 364.

[K] A paſſage, which deſerves to be taken notice of.] The Pope ſpeaks after this manner; Sublatum tibi nomen & munus miniſterii ſacerdotalis agnoſce, Sancti Spiritus judicio, apoſtolica auctoritate damnatus, nunquamque anathematis vinculis exuendus (26). That is, "Know that you are deprived of the name and "office of a Prieſt, and that you are condemned by "the Holy Ghoſt, and by the Apoſtolick Authority, "and that you are never to be delivered from the chains "of this anathema." Here the haughty Pope delivers his enemy to the devil irretrievably and for ever. Valeſius (27) himſelf finds this an exceſſive ſeverity, unworthy the Vicegerent of Chriſt. But, ſays he, the Pope who always wiſhed for the converſion of Acacius, could not propoſe to anathematize him for ever; he only intended to threaten him, that if he did not repent, his ſentence would never be repealed: Valeſius confirms this by a paſſage from Pope Gelaſius, but whether the words of Felix admit of ſuch a modification let the reader judge.

(26) Ap. Valeſium, Diſſert. de Acacio, cap. 6.

(27) Ibid.

☞ACACIUS Biſhop of Berœe in Syria, lived in the fourth Century, and in the beginning of the fifth. Having been brought up from his youth in a monaſtery, it is ſaid he conſtantly led a virtuous life (a). When yet in Prieſt-orders and Abbot of a monaſtery, he prevailed upon Epiphanius to write againſt hereſies. Acacius was ſo much valued by Flavianus (b), afterwards Biſhop of Antioch (c), that he employed him in a very important affair. There was a famous Anchoret called Julianus, and Saba by the Syrians. In the diſputes between the Orthodox and the Arians, each party pretended they had Julianus on their ſide. Flavianus, to confound the Arians, ſent Acacius to the Anchoret, in order that he might prevail with him to return to Antioch, and there openly confute the untruths of the Arians and confirm the Orthodox faith. Acacius happily ſucceeded in his commiſſions. Julianus went to Antioch, and in his way thither performed a great many miracles, if we may credit Theodoret (d). Some time after (e) Acacius was promoted to the Biſhoprick of Berœe, and conſecrated by Euſebius Biſhop of Samoſata (f). He was (g) at the council of Conſtantinople held in the year 381, in which were preſent an hundred and fifty Biſhops (h). Acacius was afterwards ſent to Rome by Flavianus (whom he had conſecrated Biſhop of Antioch) to reconcile the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, who had long been at variance on account of Flavianus himſelf, and Paulinus, who both had been Biſhops of Antioch [A] at the ſame time, the Eaſtern ſiding with Flavianus, and the Weſtern favouring the party of Paulinus (i); that party, after the death of Paulinus, inſtead of ſubmitting to Flavianus, had conſecrated Evagrius. The Emperor Theodoſius [B] being at Rome, the Weſtern Biſhops complained to him of Flavianus, repreſenting him as a tyrant, and petitioned the Emperor to depoſe him. Theodoſius (k) favouring Flavianus became

(a) Sozomenus, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 28.
(b) Theodoritus, Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 4. cap. 27.
(c) Ibid. lib. 5. cap. 23.
(d) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 27.
(e) A. D. 381.
(f) Theodor. ibid. lib. 5. c. 4.
(g) Id. ibid. c. 8.
(h) Socr. H. E. lib. 5. cap. 8.
(i) Theodor. H. E. lib. 5. c. 23.
(k) Theophanis Chronogr. p. 50.

[A] Flavianus and Paulinus had been Biſhops of Antioch at the ſame time.] To clear this we muſt trace the hiſtory a little higher. Under the reign of the Emperor Conſtantius, who favoured the Arians, one Meletius had been promoted to the See of Antioch (1); at firſt he only preached upon moral ſubjects, but venturing afterwards to explain the Nicene Faith, and to maintain the Conſubſtantiality of Chriſt, the Emperor was ſo offended at it that he baniſhed him; and Euzoïus an Arian was elected in his room (2). Upon this, they who favoured Meletius, left the Arian congregation, and held ſeparate meetings: this however was not done by all the orthodox, for a great many of them ſcrupled to ſide with Meletius, becauſe he had been elected by the Arians (3), who thought he was of their opinion (4). Thus the church of Alexandria was divided into two parties, not to mention that of the Arians. Some time after Paulinus was made Biſhop of the Orthodox party at Antioch (5), ſo that there were three Biſhops for that ſee, Meletius who by the order of the Emperor Julian returned from his baniſhment, Euzoïus, who was Biſhop over the Arians, and Paulinus over one part of the orthodox (6). Euzoïus was afterwards tranſlated by the Arians to the ſee of Alexandria (7). Meletius having been baniſhed a ſecond time by the Emperor Valens, was again reſtored by Gratian: and being come to Antioch, thoſe of his party would oblige him to enjoy the Epiſcopal See in concert with Paulinus: But Paulinus repreſented that it was againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, for one who had been ordained by the Arians, to partake of the Epiſcopal Authority. Thoſe who favoured Meletius hearing this, procured him, tho' in a riotous manner, a church without the city, where he might exerciſe his functions over them. This occaſioned at firſt a great uproar; however both parties ſoon came to this agreement, viz. that all thoſe, who aſpired to be Biſhops of Antioch ſhould promiſe upon oath, that they would not accept of that Biſhoprick, till after Meletius and Paulinus were both dead, and that as ſoon as one of them ſhould die, the other ſhould be acknowledged ſole and lawful Biſhop. Flavianus was one of the ſix who took that oath (8). But it ſeems an oath was not much valued by him, for Meletius was no ſooner dead, but his party forgetting their agreement with the abetters of Paulinus, choſe Flavianus for their Biſhop, who did not ſcruple to accept the ſee, and was conſecrated accordingly (9). Paulinus dying ſome time after, his party elected Evagrius, and would not ſubmit to Flavianus; 'tis plain they were in the right in this; ſince that man, becauſe of his perjury, was unworthy the high ſtation he enjoyed in the church. Hence we may judge how ſcrupulouſly honeſt Acacius was, ſince he ſupported the intereſt of a perjur'd Biſhop, who was guilty of a double crime, firſt of perjury, ſecondly of dividing a ſecond time the church, whoſe peace had been reſtored by the agreement made between Meletius and Paulinus. This new diviſion occaſioned by Flavianus laſted at leaſt ſeventeen years (10).

[B] The Emperor Theodoſius &c. Either Theodoret who relates this muſt be miſtaken as to the circumſtance of the time, or Sozomen; for this laſt hiſtorian tells us (11), that John Chryſoſtom, a little while after he was raiſed to the ſee of Conſtantinople, intending to unite the eaſtern and weſtern churches, divided upon account of Paulinus, ſpoke himſelf to Theophilus *, and deſired him to aſſiſt him in the deſign he had of reconciling the Biſhop of Rome to Flavianus: Theophilus complied with his requeſt, and accordingly Acacius and Iſidorus were ſent to Rome. Now 'twas after the death of Theodoſius, in the beginning of Arcadius's reign, that John was made Biſhop of Conſtantinople. What would make me think that Theodoret miſtakes, is, that he places this whole affair under Pope Innocent I, ſucceſſor of Anaſtaſius I. now 'twas after the death of Theodoſius, that Anaſtaſius was choſen Biſhop of Rome (12).

(1) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 44.
(2) Ibid.
(3) Ibid.
(4) Theodorit. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 31.
(5) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 6.
(6) Id. ibid. c. 9.
(7) Id. lib. 4. c. 21.
(8) Socrates, lib. 5. cap. 5.
(9) Id. ibid. cap. 9
(10) Theodor. lib. 5. cap. 23.
(11) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 8. cap. 3.
* Biſhop of Alexandria.
(12) See the Annotations of Valeſius and Will. Lowth on Theodorit. lib. 5. cap. 24. edit. Reading. Cambridge 1720.

came his advocate, and adviſed the Biſhops to be reconciled to him, and to promote the peace of the church, Paulinus was now dead, and Evagrius had been unlawfully ordained; he told them alſo, that Flavianus was acknowledged by all the Eaſtern Churches for their Primate. This advice of the Emperor prevailed ſo far with the Weſtern Biſhops, that they promiſed to ſuppreſs their hatred, and to receive kindly ſuch perſons as Flavianus ſhould ſend to confirm the union and good underſtanding between them; and accordingly Flavianus ſent Acacius to Rome at the head of ſeveral worthy Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons, who healed the breach that had continued ſeventeen years (l). Acacius having thus happily finiſhed his commiſſion, went into Egypt, and being returned into Syria, he brought letters of peace and union to Flavianus from the Weſtern and Egyptian Biſhops (m). This happened ſome time after John ſurnamed Chryſoſtom (the Golden Mouth) had been conſecrated Biſhop of Conſtantinople (n). Acacius did not ſeem at that time to entertain any hatred againſt this great man, but either out of pride, envy, or revenge, he ſoon became his greateſt enemy, and perſecuted him to the utmoſt of his power; for being arrived at Conſtantinople, he complained, that he had not been kindly received by Chryſoſtom (o), who ſeemed to deſpiſe him, and was ſo exaſperated at it, that he reſolved to be revenged of Chryſoſtom [C]. Immediately he joined with Theophilus and other Biſhops [D], who were reſolved to have John Chryſoſtom depoſed. They held a council without the gates of Conſtantinople, and ſummoned Chryſoſtom to appear before them, and to anſwer to the articles that were exhibited againſt him. But as he refuſed to comply, excepting againſt ſeveral of them, and eſpecially againſt Acacius (p), as being his profeſſed enemies, and appealing to a general council, the council paid no regard to his challenge, and depoſed him, as though the charge brought in againſt him had been fully proved (q); they alſo prevailed with the Emperor to confirm their ſentence, accuſing Chryſoſtom of having preached againſt the Empreſs Eudoxia, and called her Jezebel in one of his ſermons. Upon this the Emperor ſent an officer of his palace with ſome ſoldiers to remove Chryſoſtom from his Epiſcopal See (r). Chryſoſtom complied, and went into the country; but within a few days a plague raging in the Emperor's bed-chamber, he ſent again for Chryſoſtom and reſtored him to his Biſhoprick [E] (s), which he would probably have enjoyed till his death, had he not been ſo imprudent, as to give his enemies

(l) Theodor. lib. 5. cap. 23.

(m) Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 3.

(n) See the Remark [B].

(o) Palladius, De Vita Chryſoſt. p. 48.

(p) Palladius, ibid. p. 72.

(q) Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 17.

(r) Pallad. ubi ſupra, p. 75.

(s) Id. ibid.

[C] He reſolved to be revenged of Chryſoſtom.] If we may believe Palladius, who wrote the life of Chryſoſtom, Acacius had ſo little power over his paſſions, that he declared before ſome of his enemy's Clergy he would be even with him. His words, according to Palladius (13), were theſe: Ἐγὼ αὐτῷ ἀρτύω χύτραν. That is, "I will give him a bone to pick. How far Palladius, whoſe life of Chryſoſtom is a mere panegyrick, is to be credited in this, we leave our readers to judge.

(13) In vita Chryſoſt. p. 49.

[D] He joined with Theophilus and other Biſhops.] Theodoret, who relates the ſame ſtory (14), does not name the Biſhops who conſpired againſt Chryſoſtom, and the reaſon he gives for it is, that notwithſtanding the perſecution they raiſed againſt Chryſoſtom, they were very worthy men on other accounts. Theſe are his words; Διηγήσασθαι τὴν κατὰ τούτου τολμηθεῖσαν ἀδικίαν βυλόμενος, τὴν ἄλλην ἀρετὴν τῶν ἠδικηκότων αἰσχύνομαι. ὧν δὴ χάριν αὐτῶν καὶ τὰς προσηγορίας κατακρύψαι πειράσομαι. That is, "Intending to relate the injury "attempted againſt him (Chryſoſtom) I * revere the "virtues of thoſe, who attempted it: I will therefore endeavour to conceal their names." This reſerve ſeems to be the effect of humanity and Chriſtian charity; but it is inconſiſtent with the impartiality of an hiſtorian, whoſe duty it is to ſet in a clear light the vices of men as well as their virtues. It is pretended indeed, that this rule ought not to be obſerved in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; that to inſpire the readers with a great eſteem for the Chriſtian Religion, 'tis requiſite they ſhould entertain a very good opinion of thoſe, who during ſeveral centuries, and even from the beginning of Chriſtianity, preſided over the church; that therefore a prudent hiſtorian muſt exaggerate whatever is praiſe-worthy in the life and actions of the ancient Chriſtians, and excuſe or palliate whatever they ſaid or did amiſs (15). But this is a very dangerous maxim, tending not only to introduce a perfect ſcepticiſm into hiſtory, but alſo to render Chriſtianity itſelf ſuſpected; ſince infidels will be apt to conclude from thence, that the Chriſtians diſtruſt their own cauſe, and are afraid leſt the vices and falſe reaſonings of their ancient teachers ſhould be publiſhed to the world (16). But as Chriſtianity does not depend on the good or bad conduct of its profeſſors, why ſhould we not be permitted to ſet the vices as well as the virtues of the ancient Fathers and Biſhops in a true light? We'll cloſe this remark with a curious paſſage of Melchior Canus (17), quoted by Mr. le Clerc. Dolenter hoc dico, potius quam contumelioſè, multò à Laertio ſeverius vitas Philoſophorum ſcriptas, quam à Chriſtianis vitas ſanctorum; longèque incorruptius & integrius Suetonium res Cæſarum expoſuiſſe, quam expoſuerunt Catholici, non res dicam Imperatorum, ſed martyrum, virginum, & confeſſorum. Illi enim in probis aut Philoſophis aut Principibus, nec vitia, nec vitiorum ſuſpiciones tacent. Noſtri autem plerique vel affectibus inſerviunt, vel de induſtriâ quoque ità multa confingunt, ut eorum me nimirum non ſolum pudeat, ſed etiam tædeat. Hos enim intelligo Eccleſiæ Chriſti, cum nihil utilitatis attuliſſe, tum incommodationis plurimum. — Certum eſt autem, qui fictè & fallaciter hiſtoriam eccleſiaſticam ſcribunt, eos viros bonos atque ſinceros eſſe non poſſe, totamque eorum narrationem inventam eſſe, aut ad quæſtum, aut ad errorem; quorum alterum fædum eſt, alterum pernitioſum. That is, "It is with grief I ſay it, rather than with "an intention to inſult any body; that the lives of the "Philoſophers are written by Laertius with much "more dignity, than thoſe of the Saints by the "Chriſtians; and Suetonius is more impartial and "upright in the Hiſtory of the Emperors, than "the Catholic Writers in thoſe, I don't ſay of "Princes, but of the martyrs, virgins, and confeſſors. For thoſe heathen writers don't conceal "the vices either real or ſuſpected, of the beſt "Emperors or Philoſophers whoſe lives they relate; "but moſt of our Authors are either ſo prepoſſeſs'd "with their paſſions, or wilfully invent ſo many "falſhoods, that I am not only aſhamed but perfectly "tir'd with them; for I am perſuaded, that they "have not done any good by this to the Church "of Chriſt, but rather injured it very much. — "And it is certain that thoſe, who writing Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, falſify and diſguiſe it, cannot be "honeſt and ſincere men, and that all theſe relations "are calculated either from a view of intereſt, which "is a baſe action, or to impoſe upon others, which "is pernicious." The reader is to obſerve, that Melchior Canus was a Roman Catholic, and aſſiſted at the council of Trent.

(17) Loc. Com. lib. 11. p. 650. ap. Eund. ibid. p. 136.

[E] A plague raging in the Emperor's bedchamber he — reſtored Chryſoſtom to his See.] Palladius alone ſpeaks of this plague, but he does not mention what plague it was, and Socrates (18), Sozomen (19), Theodoret

(18) Lib. vi. cap. 16, &c.

(19) Lib. viii. cap. 17, &c.

* Valeſius tranſlates mihi pudorem injiciunt, i. e. "make me aſhamed." But the word αἰσχύνομαι, ſignifies alſo, I revere, I have a reſpect for one; and this, I think, is the ſenſe of that word in this paſſage.

(15) See Clerici, Art. Crit. vol. 3. Ep. v. p. 135.

(16) Clericus, ibid. p. 140.

enemies a ſpecious pretence to render him odious to the Sovereign. The Empreſs Eudoxia cauſed her ſtatue to be caſt in ſilver, and had it placed near a temple at Conſtantinople (t). Chryſoſtom hearing this declaimed againſt her in a very outragious and unbecoming manner [F]. This gave his enemies, and particularly Acacius, a fair opportunity of accuſing him before the Emperor. But they did not do it, till they had held another Synod againſt Chryſoſtom, in which they read a canon made in another council *, wherein it was decreed, that if a Biſhop or a Prieſt, after being once depoſed either juſtly or wrongfully, returned to his church without the leave of a Synod, he ſhould no more be admitted to trial, but be abſolutely expelled (u). Chryſoſtom was judged by that canon, and expelled accordingly, but not without the Emperor's conſent, who notified to him, that ſince he had been condemned in two Synods the Emperor could not go to his church (x). Chryſoſtom was afterwards baniſhed, and died in a few months. If we may believe Palladius, Acacius and Antiochus adviſed the Emperor to conſent to the depoſition of Chryſoſtom, ſaying theſe words, Let the guilt of his depoſition be upon our heads, ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν ἡμῶν ἡ Ἰωάννου καθαίρεσις (z). Biſhop Godeau ſays (aa), that Acacius being an hundred and ten years of age, wrote a letter to the Emperor Theodoſius the Younger, adviſing him to confirm the ſentence pronounced againſt Cyril Biſhop of Alexandria, who had been depoſed in a conventicle of Schiſmatics. As Biſhop Godeau does not quote his authorities, we are not able to trace them. The Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians give Acacius a very good character; Sozomen ſays (bb), that what is very praiſe-worthy in this Prelate is, that after he was raiſed to that dignity, his houſe was always open to ſtrangers as well as to citizens, who had acceſs to him at all times, even when he was at his meals or aſleep [G]: And Theodoret aſſures us (cc), that he was eminent both for his wiſdom and the ſanctity of his life. We won't diſpute his wiſdom, which perhaps was nothing but policy and craft, but how his ſanctity can be reconciled with his hatred againſt Chryſoſtom, and the ſhare he had in the perſecution, which that great man ſuffered, we cannot well apprehend, except it be alledged, as we obſerve in the Remark [E], that Acacius had no hand in that affair, till after Chryſoſtom had ſo bitterly inveighed againſt the Empreſs Eudoxia; if this be the caſe, Acacius cannot be blamed for having promoted the deprivation of ſo fiery a preacher. Acacius lived to a good old age, he being about a hundred and ten when he died.

(t) Theoph. Chron. p. 54. Sozom. lib. 8. cap. 20.

* Held at Antioch, but by the Arians.

(u) Pallad. p. 78. and Socrates lib. 7. cap. 18.

(x) Socrates, ib.

(y) Ubi ſupra, p. 82.

(z) Id. ibid.

(aa) Hiſt. de L'Egliſe, tom. 3. p. 315.

(bb) Lib. 7. cap. 28.

(cc) Lib. 5. cap. 27.

(20) Lib. 5. cap. 34.

(21) In Chron. p. 55, &c.

Theodoret (20), and Theophanes (21), who all relate at large the Hiſtory of Chryſoſtom's depoſition, have not a word of that Plague; but they ſay, that the people riſing in a riotous and tumultuous manner, obliged the Emperor to reſtore Chryſoſtom; this, I ſuppoſe, was the plague which Palladius meant. The ſame Hiſtorians don't ſay that Acacius was any ways concerned in this affair before the reſtoration of Chryſoſtom, but only when he was baniſhed again a few months after. But one would imagine that Palladius, who is rather a Panegyriſt than an Hiſtorian, intended to repreſent his hero aſſiſted, like the ancient Patriarchs and Prophets, by a miraculous power from heaven (22).

(22) Palladius, De Vita Chryſoſt. p. 75.

(23) That Sermon or Homily is inſerted in vol. 7. of his works, p. 545. edit. Savil.

(24) Socr. lib. 6. c. 18. Sozom. l. 8. c. 20. Theoph. in Chr. p. 54.

[F] Declaimed againſt the Empreſs in a very outragious manner.] He began one of his ſermons (23) in the following words (24), Πάλιν Ἡρωδιὰς μαίνεται, πάλιν ταράσσεται, πάλιν ὀρχεῖται, πάλιν ἐπὶ πίνακι τὴν κεφαλὴν Ἰωάννου ζητεῖ λαβεῖν. That is, "Herodias runs "mad again, ſhe is again out of her ſenſes, ſhe dances "again, ſhe again deſires to receive the head of John "(alluding to his own name) in a diſh." Some perſons doubted whether Chryſoſtom ever ſpoke theſe words, but it ſeems unreaſonable to reject the teſtimony of the Hiſtorians we have quoted, and eſpecially of Socrates, who lived very near the time of Chryſoſtom. Socrates indeed favoured the Novatians, whom Chryſoſtom oppoſed; but he ſeems for all that to do juſtice to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, tho' he did not think fit to conceal his faults; 'tis at leaſt confeſſed by every one, that Chryſoſtom delivered a violent invective againſt Eudoxia on the very ſame occaſion that Socrates ſays he ſpoke the words we have quoted (25): 'Twill not be denied, we preſume, that a man who thus publickly brands the throne, deſerves the moſt ſevere puniſhment; and that, if ſuch an one is a Biſhop, he has no reaſon to complain, when for his raſhneſs he is depoſed and ſent into baniſhment.

(25) Nouvelles de la Rep. des Let. An. 1704. Fevrier p. 161, 162.

[G] Even when he was at his meals or aſleep.] Sozomen admires this extraordinarily, and looks upon it as proof of Acacius's virtue, or at leaſt of his endeavours to be virtuous: Theſe are his words. Ἄγαμαι ἔγωγε τοῦτο μάλιστα, ἢ γὰρ οὕτως εἶχεν, ὡς ἀεὶ πιστεύειν· ἢ πρὸς τὸ ἕτοιμον εἰς κακίαν τῆς φύσεως παρεσκευασμένος, τοῦτο ὑπενόησεν· ὥστε ἀεὶ φοβεῖσθαι προσδοκῶν ὑπὸ τῆς ἐξαπίνης εἰσόδου, ἐν τῇ συνεχεῖ φυλακῇ μηδὲν ἁμαρτάνειν ἂν δοκῇ, ἀλλ' ἐν σπουδαίοις εἶναι πράγμασιν (26). That is, "I wonder very much at this; "for he either lived in ſuch a manner, that he could "always depend upon himſelf *; or he invented "this, to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the evil incli- "nations of nature; and to the end, that ſuſpecting "conſtantly left any one coming in unawares, ſhould "ſurprize him, he might always take care not to "commit any fault, but be conſtantly employed in "ſome good action." This reaſoning of Sozomen does not appear very well grounded; for tho' a man be ever ſo vicious, he will ſeldom chuſe to commit evil actions in his own houſe, eſpecially if they be of a lewd nature; not to mention, that keeping one's houſe open, will never hinder the maſter of it from being covetous, unjuſt, or ambitious, if he be naturally inclined to thoſe vices. Acacius then might give every body free acceſs into his houſe at all times, without being the more virtuous upon that account. We may alſo obſerve, that it is a mark of great vanity and pride to have a houſe left open in this manner, in order that every body may be an eye-witneſs of our good actions. We may therefore conclude, that Sozomen knew not how to praiſe a man rationally, ſince he commended Acacius on that account.

(26) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 28.

* That is, never fear to be ſurpriſed in any evil action.

ACAMAS ſon of Theſeus (a) followed the reſt of the Grecian Princes to the ſiege of Troy. He was deputed, with Diomedes, to the Trojans, in order to get Helena reſtored. This embaſſy was of no effect with regard to the principal article; but was ſucceſsful to Acamas, with reſpect to what is called good fortune in gallantry; for Laodice, King Priam's daughter, fell ſo deſperately in love with him, that after having revolved in her mind all the reflections, which honour and infamy could ſuggeſt, ſhe was forced to reveal her paſſion to Philobia, wife of Perſeus; and to beg her aſſiſtance in an affair of a moſt urgent nature to a Lady (b). Philobia, touched with compaſſion, deſired her huſband to order matters in ſuch a manner, as that the wiſhes of Laodice

(a) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 5. and lib. 10. p. 325, and 343.

(b) Παρακαλεῖν τε αὐτὴν ὅσον οὐκ ἤδη διεχομένην, ἀρῆγαν αὐτῇ. Parthenii Erotic. cap. 16. That is, "She begg'd her "to aſſiſt her "immediately, "otherwiſe ſhe "was a dead "woman.

dice might be compleated. Perſeus alſo pitied the poor Lady, and being beſides very deſirous of obliging his wife, he inſinuated himſelf into Acamas's friendſhip, and obtained a viſit from him, in the city (c) of which he was Governor. Laodice did not fail to go thither, attended by ſome Trojan women. A ſplendid feaſt was made, which being ended, Perſeus laid her in the ſame bed with Acamas, telling him that ſhe was one of the King's concubines. Laodice was highly ſatisfied with her gallant; ſhe took leave of him, and at nine months end was delivered of a ſon, whom ſhe committed to the care of Æthra, grandmother by the father's ſide to Acamas [A]. This child was called Munitus [B], and what became of him afterwards ſhall be mentioned in the remarks (d). Acamas was one of the heroes who concealed themſelves in the wooden horſe (e). He afterwards met with an adventure in Thrace, of much the ſame nature with that above related, except that it proved of very fatal conſequence; the ſtory is this. Phyllis, the King's daughter falling in love with him, overtures of marriage were ſoon made; the Fair-one was promiſed, and the crown was beſtowed on her by way of dowry. Acamas deſired leave to viſit his own country; but Phyllis begged him, in the moſt tender manner, not to leave her; however, her intreaties were vain, and being able to obtain from him only an oath that he would return, ſhe preſented him with a box (f), telling him it was conſecrated to Rhea mother of the Gods; and at the ſame time deſired him not to open it, but when he ſhould have no farther hopes left of ſeeing Thrace again. Acamas went aſhore on the iſland of Cyprus [C], and reſolved to ſettle in it; but Phyllis, after venting the moſt dreadful imprecations againſt that perfidious man, hanged her ſelf. Acamas opened the box, when immediately his brain was filled with the wildeſt chimeras. He got on horſeback, but ſpurred forward in ſo heedleſs and raſh a manner, that himſelf and the beaſt fell, and Acamas was thruſt through the body with his own ſword. Tzetzes relates this ſtory, but has confounded Acamas with Demophoon (g); for it is of the latter, that all authors relate the ſeveral incidents concerning the unfortunate Phyllis. See the paſſionate letter which Ovid pretends ſhe wrote to Demophoon, whereby it appears that their marriage had been conſummated (h). We are not to omit, that one of the tribes in Athens was called Acamantides [D], from our Acamas (i), by the appointment of the oracle. According

(c) It was called Dardanus.

(d) Extracted from Hegeſipp. lib. 1. de Rebus Mileſiorum, cited by Parthenius, Erotic. cap. 16. and from Tzetzes on Lycophron.

(e) Tryphiodorus de Excid. Trojæ. Vide etiam Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 21.

(f) Tzetzes in Lycophron.

(g) Who alſo was ſon to Theſeus.

(h) Turpiter hoſpitium lecto cumulaſſe jugali
Pœnitet, & lateri conſeruiſſe latus. Ovid. Epiſt. Phyll 57.
" But to admit
" thee looſely to
" my breaſt,
" Is treaſon, fa-
" tal to my pre-
" ſent reſt. Floyd from Ovid.

(i) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 5. and lib. 10. p. 525. See alſo Suidas and Stephanus Byzantinus.

[A] Whom ſhe committed to the care of Æthra, grandmother by the father's ſide to Acamas.] The reader is to know, that Caſtor and Pollux having made an incurſion into Attica, in order to recover their ſiſter Helena, they took the city of Aphidnæ, whither the raviſher had ſent that celebrated beauty. Æthra, Theſeus's mother had been ſent thither at the ſame time; her they took priſoner, and brought to Lacedæmon. She was in that country when Paris carrying off Helena, forced her to embark with them for Troy. Demophoon and Acamas followed the reſt of the Greeks, chiefly with the deſign of delivering the good old Lady their grandmother, either by paying her ranſom, or by ſtorming the city. Troy being taken, as the Greeks were plundering it, theſe met the old Lady in the ſtreets; and being inform'd who ſhe was, they embraced one another with the utmoſt tenderneſs (2). 'Twas then Æthra told Acamas, that Munitus was his ſon (3); for ſhe had brought him up, Laodice having let her into the ſecret of the whole affair, which had paſs'd in Perſeus's houſe. Johannes Cornarius has made a pretty great blunder in his tranſlation of Parthenius, he having rendred the words: Ὁι ὑπ' αἴθρα τραφέντα μετὰ Τρῳὰς ἄλωσιν διεκόμισεν ἐπ' οἶκυ, in the following manner; Quem ſub Dio enutritum poſt Trojæ captivitatem tranſportavit in domum; that is, " Whom, being brought up in the " open air, he carried home after Troy was taken." He ſhould have ſaid, brought up by Æthra, and not, brought up à la belle etoile (in the open air). We ſhall preſently quote Plutarch, who relates, that ſome looked upon this whole ſtory as fabulous.

(1) Scholiaſt. Euripid. in Hercul. Pauſanias, lib. 10. p. 342.

(2) Quintus Calaber, lib. 13. v. 496. Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 342.

(3) Tzetzes on Lycophron, quoted by Mezeriac on Ovid's Epiſtles, p. 143.

[B] Was called Munitus.] He followed his Father into Thrace, and died there by the bite of a ſerpent (4). Plutarch in the Life of Theſeus, calls him Μάνυχος, Munychus; however, ſince he is always called Μούνιτος, Munitus, by Parthenius, Lycophron and Tzetzes, we may believe that either the text of Plutarch has been there corrupted, or that he could not rightly recollect the true pronunciation of this word. Don't authors, when they cite names merely by memory, daily miſtake in the ſpelling of a ſyllable, and ſometimes in more than one? I ſhall expatiate further on this in the article Ephorus. I cannot directly ſay, whether Plutarch, when he declared, that Demophoon lay with Laodice, had not forgot himſelf. Perhaps ſome writers which are not extant, told him ſo; poſſibly too, Tzetzes might have read in certain authors which are now loſt, that the ſeveral incidents concerning Phyllis, related to Acamas. However this be, each of the brothers ſeem to have been reſpectively compenſated; for if on one ſide Plutarch deprives Acamas of the happy moments which he ſpent with Laodice, and gives them to Demophoon; Tzetzes, on the other ſide, robs the latter of the many ſoft nights he ſpent with Phyllis, and beſtows them on Acamas. But to be ſerious: Had Meurſius examined carefully thoſe paſſages, in which the ſon of Laodice is called Munitus, he would not have borrowed Plutarch's words to prove that the port of Munychia was not ſo nam'd from Munychus ſon to Pantacles as is generally aſſerted; but from Munychus ſon to Demophoon and Laodice (5). The following are Plutarch's own words; Οἱ δὲ κ τοῦτο τὸ ἔπος διαβάλλυσι, καὶ τὴν περὶ Μυνύχυ μυθολογίαν, ὃν ἐκ Δημοφοῶντ Λαοδίκης κρύφα τικτόσης ἐν Ἰλίῳ συνεκθρέψαι τὴν Αἴθραν λέγυσι (6). Alii hunc verſum rejiciunt, (the verſe in which Homer relates, that Helena carried Æthra to Troy with her) & Munichi fabulam quam ex Demophoonte à Laodice clàm editum Ilii creviſſe ſub Æthra memorant: That is, " Some reject this verſe, and the fiction of Muny-" chus, who, being the ſon of Demophoon and Lao-" dice, and of whom ſhe was deliver'd privately, is " ſaid to have been brought up in Troy by Æthra.

(4) Parthenii Ereticor. cap. 16.

(5) Meurſius, lib. 1. cap. 14. Lect. Atticar. cited by Mezeriac, who cenſures this miſtake in his Commentary on Ovid's Epiſtles, p. 144.

(6) Plut. in Theſeo, ſub fin. pag. 16.

[C] Acamas went aſhore on the iſland of Cyprus.] There was a mountain in that iſland named Acamas, ſo call'd from the ſon of Theſeus, as Heſychius affirms, who obſerves that the ſpring, or head of the river Bocarus which ran by Salamis roſe in this mountain. Geographers mention a famous promontory in the ſame iſland (7), and ſome obſerve, that the whole iſland was anciently called Acamantis (8); but I don't find in any ancient author, that the promontory of Acamas was nam'd from a city which Acamas the Athenian, (a friend to the Trojans) who fled thither, built on that promontory, and call'd it after his own name. This city and the friendſhip of Acamas the Athenian for the Trojans are equally chimerical. I ſhould be glad to know where Stephano Luſignano, Divinity-reader to the preaching friars in Paris in the ſixteenth Century, met with this rare piece of erudition (9).

(7) Strabo, lib. 14. Ptolem. lib. 5. cap. 14. Plin. lib. 5. cap. 31.

(8) Philonides apud Plin. lib. 5. cap. 31. Stephanus verbo Κύπρος.

(9) Hiſt. of Cyprus, fol. 4 and 29.

[D] One of the tribes in Athens went by the name of Acamantides.] Moreri calls this tribe Acamante, but all the French writers I have met with give it the name of la tribu Acamantide, i. e. " the Acada-" mantide tribe." I'll here take notice of another miſtake

According to Stephanus Byzantinus he founded a city in Phrygia Major [E], and made war against the Solymi. I dare not determine whether Acamas was ſon to Phædra or Ariadne [F]. We ſhall take notice, in the remark [D] of ſome other Acamas's, whom Moreri has treated with his uſual inaccuracy.

(10) We here ſuppreſs the errors which had been pointed out in the firſt edition.

As theſe errors are ſtill found in ſeveral editions of Moreri, we have thought proper to inſert them here, in this third edition of the Critical Dictionary.

Theſe are as follows, Firſt, he quotes the firſt book of Strabo, with regard to Acamas a Promontory of the iſland of Cyprus; but ſhould have quoted the xivth. Secondly, He calls Acamante the ſon of Theſeus. Thirdly, He tells us that Suidas mentions Acamantides, a Philoſopher of Heliopolis, whereas Suidas calls him Acamantius.

(11) Homer's Iliad, lib. 6. verſ. 7.

(12) Id. lib. 4. verſ. 474.

miſtake of that writer, to prevent my being obliged to do it twice (10). He tells us that Homer, in the 2d book of the Iliad, mentions one ACAMAS a Thracian Prince, who came to ſuccour Priam, and one ACAMAS, ſon of Antenor, who for his wonderful modeſty was rank'd among the Gods. Homer indeed ſpeaks of this Thracian Prince in the book above cited, and relates elſewhere that he was kill'd by Ajax (11). 'Tis alſo certain that he ſpeaks of Archilochus and Acamas, ſons of Antenor, and declares them μάχης ὣ εἰδότε πάσης, i. e. "skill'd in all kinds of "combats;" but then he does not mention a word of the chaſte Acamas's deification. Moreri is almoſt the author of this aſſertion, and would be ſtrictly ſo, had not Charles Stephens given him the following foundation to build upon; Fuit & alius ejuſdem nominis filius Antenoris, qui tempore belli Trojani cælebs erat, & diis ſimilis habebatur. i. e. "There "was another of the ſame name, the ſon of An- "tenor, who was a batchelor at the ſiege of Troy, "and was eſteem'd to be like the Gods." As this writer cites no authority for what he here advances, I could not make any enquiries concerning this pretended celibacy; and if I durſt give a ſcope to conjecture, I would ſay that the Printers had compoſed cælebs for celebris, in ſome work which Charles Stephens copied; yet at the ſame time I don't deny but that Homer mentions ſeveral unmarried men, who were killed (12). But ſuppoſe we take it for granted that this Trojan was a batchelor, and was honoured with the elogium, like to the Gods; are we to conclude from thence that his chaſtity was ſo wonderful that it procured him divine honours? Had all thoſe been deified, on whom Homer beſtows the epithet Διοίκλος (God-like) poor Atlas's (13) ſhoulders muſt have had a fine time on't.

(13) See Juvenal's 13th Satyr, verſ. 47. where he ſays,

. . . . Contextaque fidera paucis nominibus miſerum urgebant, Atlanta minori pondere. i. e. "E're God's "grew nume- "rous, and the "heavenly croud, "preſt wretch- "ed Atlas with "a lighter load. Creech.

[E] According to Stephanus Byzantinus, he founded a city in Phrygia Major.] This city he calls Acamantium, but Geographers don't ſay a word of it. The epitomizer of this writer, or the tranſcribers, have ſo corrupted this paſſage, that 'tis impoſſible to make the leaſt ſenſe of it, unleſs we ſupply ſome words. But what words ſoever we ſupply, ſtill the war in which Acamas was ſaid to be engaged againſt the Solymi, will be as little known as before.

[F] Whether Phædra or Ariadne.] I find two learned men differing abſolutely in opinion on this particular; for Mezeriac aſſerts that Acamas was ſon to Phædra (14), but the only proof he ſeems to give for it is, that Demophoon, Acamas's brother, was Phædra's ſon; which he proves from Aulus Sabinus's epiſtle of Demophoon to Phyllis. Valeſius on the other ſide declares, that Adriadne was Acamas's mother (15), to which purpoſe he cites the Scholiaſt on Homer (16): He ſays farther, that Demophoon, according to the Scholiaſt, was brother to Acamas; and that Euripides confirms this aſſertion (17). But neither of theſe writers obſerv'd, that tho' Acamas and Demophoon had been brothers, yet this would not clear up the matter; ſince they might have been ſo, tho' the one was ſon to Ariadne, and the other to Phædra.

(14) Mezeriac, on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 137.

(15) Henr. Valeſius in Harpocrat. p. 4, and 5.

(16) In Ὀδυσσ. Ο.

(17) In Ione.

ACARNANIA, a country ſituated on the Ionian Sea, between Ætolia and the gulph of Ambracia. It is related that the Taphii and the Teleboæ were the firſt poſſeſſors thereof; and that Cephalus conquered it, after Amphitryo (a) had eſtabliſhed him Sovereign of the iſlands in the neighbourhood of Taphos. It is added further, that Alcmæon, ſon of Amphiaraus, poſſeſſed himſelf of it after the ſecond Theban war, and called it after the name of his ſon Acarnan (b). He had joined his forces to thoſe of Diomedes, and having conquered Ætolia in concert, that country fell to the ſhare of the latter. Some time after they were ſummoned to go to the ſiege of Troy; upon which Diomedes attended the reſt of the Greeks in that expedition, but Alcmæon continued quiet in Acarnania (c); a circumſtance which, many ages after, was of important ſervice to the Acarnanians, who made a great merit of it in Rome [A]; by repreſenting, that their anceſtors, were the only people in all Greece, who did not join in the expedition againſt Troy. The Romans employed this trifling reaſon, when they aſſiſted theſe people againſt the Ætolians [B]; ſo true it is, that politicians, on certain occaſions,

(a) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 317.

(b) Id. ibid. p. 318.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] Who made a great merit of it in Rome.] Ephorus the hiſtorian furniſhed them undeſignedly with an opportunity of doing this; for the Acarnanians, after hearing what he related of Alcmæon, turn'd it artfully to their own advantage with regard to the Romans, who pretended that the Founder of Rome was deſcended from Æneas. This is Strabo's conjecture: Τούτοις δ' ὡς εἰκὸς τοῖς λόγοις ἐπακολουθήσαντες οἱ Ἀκαρνᾶνες, σοφίσασθαι λέγονται Ῥωμαίους, καὶ τὴν αὐτονομίαν παρ' αὐτῶν ἐξανύσασθαι λέγοντες, ὡς ἂ μετεσχήκει μόνοι τῆς ἐπὶ τὴν προγόνους τοὺς ἐκείνων στρατίας οὔτε γὰρ ἐν Αἰτωλικῷ καταλόγῳ φαίζοιντο, οὔτε ἰδίᾳ, οὐδὲ γὰρ ὅλως τοῦτο μὰ τοῦτ' ἐμφέροιτο ἐν τοῖς ἔπεσιν (1). i. e. "'Tis probable that the Acarnani- "ans, in purſuance of this relation, cunningly pre- "vailed upon the Romans, to indulge them the free "uſe of the laws of their country, upon pretence "that they were the only people who did not en- "gage in the war againſt the anceſtors of the Ro- "mans, as not being mentioned in the Ætolian "Roll particularly, nor in any manner in Homer's "verſes." However, they grounded this latter aſſertion on an untruth; for Strabo ſhews by the liſt of the warriors and ſhips, inſerted in the ſecond book of the Iliad (3), that the Acarnanians furniſhed their quota in the Trojan expedition.

(1) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 318.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Homer mentions only their country, but does not call it Acarnania.

[B] The Romans employed this trifling reaſon, when they aſſiſted theſe people againſt the Ætolians.] After the death of Alexander, ſon to Pyrrhus King of Epirus, the Acarnanians were terribly afraid of the Ætolians; and did not rely very much on that Monarch's widow, who was Guardian to her two ſons. This prompted them to implore ſuccour from the Romans, which was not refuſ'd them; and thereupon the Ætolians were commanded not to moleſt a nation, which was the only one that had not aſſiſted the Greeks in the expedition againſt Troy. Acarnanes quoque diffiſi Epirotis adverſus Ætolos auxilium Romanorum implorantes, obtinuerunt à Romano ſenatu, ut Legati mitterentur, qui denunciarent Ætolis, præſidia ab urbibus Acarnaniæ deducerent; paterenturque eſſe liberos, qui ſoli quondam adverſus Trojanos auctores originis ſuæ, auxilia Græcis non miſerint. i. e. "The Acarnanians having ſome ſuſpi- "cion of the Epirotes, implored the Romans to aſ- "ſiſt them againſt the Ætolians, and obtained from "the Senate of Rome, that Embaſſadors ſhould be "ſent to the Ætolians, to require them to with- "draw their garriſons from the cities of Acarna- "nia; and permit a people to be free, who alone "did not aſſiſt the Greeks againſt the Tro- "jans, from whom the Romans originally deſcend- "ed (4)." Plutarch relates two incidents full as ridiculous: "Agathocles tyrant of Syracuſe . . . . "laugh'd at the inhabitants of Corcyra, when they "asked him the reaſon, why he laid waſte their Iſland. It is, ſays he, becauſe your anceſtors formerly gave a reception to Ulyſſes. And in like manner, when the "Ithacans complained to him about his ſoldiers, "for plundering them of their ſheep; ah but, ſays "he,

(4) Juſtin. lib. 28. cap. 1. See La Mothe le Vayer, Lettr. xcv. vol. 2. pag. 325.

occaſions, don't ſcruple to make uſe of the moſt ridiculous pretences. The Ætolians and Acarnanians were long united (d), either with a deſign of repulſing the Macedonians and other Greeks, or of maintaining their liberties againſt the Roman arms; but, at laſt, they were quite exhauſted, and loſt all courage. In Acarnania the year conſiſted only of ſix months (e). The inhabitants of this country were very laſcivious, if ſome Dictionaries are to be credited [C]: but a circumſtance which may be more depended upon, is, that the dreſs of their women was no ways modeſt (D). Cicero does not ſpeak of a city called Acarnania [E].

(d) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 317.

(e) Macrobius, Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 12. p. 242.

I obſerved, that the Acarnanians and Ætolians were united for a long courſe of years;

" he, your King came many years ago into our iſ-
" land, and did not only carry off our ſheep, but " even put out our ſhepherd's eye (5)." What follows is ſtill more ludicrous. Mahomet the ſecond, Emperor of the Turks, writ to our Pope Pius the ſecond in theſe words; " I am ſurprized, ſays he, that
" the Italians ſhould unite together againſt me,
" ſince we are both deſcended from the Trojans;
" and that 'tis their duty no leſs than mine, to re" venge the blood of Hector on the Greeks, whom
" nevertheleſs they aſſiſt in oppoſing me (6)." In this manner chimerical evils, which exiſted only in the imagination of poets, have been made to apologize for real evils.

(5) Plutarch. de ſerâ Numinis vindictâ.

(6) Montagne's Eſſays Book 2. chap. 36. p. 763.

[C] The inhabitants of this country were very laſcivious, if ſome dictionaries are to be credited.] Let us firſt cite Biſhop Lloyd; Mollitiei & laſciviæ notati leguntur; (Acarnanes) teſte Luciano in Dial. de Meretriciis, unde proverbium, Porcellus Acarnanius, in laſcivos. i. e. " According to Lucian in his dialogue of " harlots, the Acarnanians are cenſured in Hiſtory
" for their effeminacy and laſciviouſneſs, which gave
" occaſion to the proverb level'd againſt the wanton,
" an Acarnanian hog." Hoffman tranſcribed the whole paſſage in his dictionary; and Moreri ſays as follows: The Acarnanians were accuſed of being too laſcivious and over delicate. Hence that filthy proverb among the ancients, Porcellus Acarnanius, an Acarnanian hog, took its riſe. We read the ſame in Pinedo's notes on Stephanus Byzantinus (7). I look'd into Lucian's Dialogues of Curtezans, but don't find that the Acarnanians are there deſcribed as voluptuous and effeminate people. 'Tis true indeed that Muſarium the Curtezan anſwered her mother, (who reproach'd her with indulging favours to Chereas gratis, and at the ſame time wonder'd how ſhe could reject a peaſant of Acarnania), in the following manner: What! leave Chereas, to give myſelf to ſuch a lubberly clown, who ſmells as rank as a goat? Chereas is to me a ſmooth-faç'd creature, as the ſaying is, and an Acarnanian hog (8). Eraſmus ſuppoſes, that " by Acarnanian
" hog, an effeminate favourite was underſtood (9);
" and that it alluded to the comedy of Ariſtophanes,
" in which a hog is the ſymbol of the inſtruments
" of venereal pleaſures." Alluſum opinor, ad porcellum, quem inducit Ariſtophanes in Ἀχαρνεῦσιν, ſymbolum eorum membrorum, quibus obſcœnæ voluptates peraguntur (10). I don't believe that any perſon underſtands what Muſarium's anſwer alludes to; and I confeſs that 'tis a myſtery to me, for which reaſon, I ſhan't animadvert on thoſe, who aſſure us, that the Acarnanians were reputed a laſcivious people. If it were true, I wonder 'tis not once mentioned by authors. By the way, Eraſmus is not miſtaken in the figurative ſignification of the word χοιρίσκος. The Latins had adopted that figure. Noſtræ mulieres, ſays Varro (11), maximè nutrices, naturam, quâ fœminæ ſunt, in virginibus appellant porcum, & Græcè χοῖρον. i. e. " Our women, the nurſes eſpecially, call that " part in virgins, which diſtinguiſhes the ſex, porcum,
" in Greek χοῖρος." See Menage's Origine della lingua Italiana, under the word Potta. Here follows a conjecture I am not ſatisfied with, and which I advance merely to ſee whether it may not furniſh a hint to thoſe who have more genius and learning than I can pretend to. Chereas always fed the Curtezan with hopes, which was the only coin he paid her in (12). The moment, ſays he, my father is in his grave, the inſtant I get poſſeſſion of my paternal eſtate; my ſubſtance ſhall all be at your diſpoſal, and I'll make you my wife. Muſarium decoy'd by thoſe promiſes, ſurrendred to him both her perſon and her purſe. Did ſhe not therefore ſay juſtly to her mother? I can neither ſtrip nor ſhear this gallant of mine; but then he's an Acarnanian hog; I feed him indeed, but I ſhall be well paid for it all at once. 'Tis the ſame with theſe animals; nothing is got by feeding them, till after they are well fatted, and all the expences, neceſſary for that purpoſe, have been made; but at laſt the monies firſt laid out, return with large intereſt. Perhaps Acarnania abounded in thoſe days with hogs, as Weſtphalia does in ours; and poſſibly the maſters of the famous eating-houſes in the ſeveral cities of Greece, uſed to ſend for great numbers of hogs from thence, in order to feed them (13); which might be the reaſon of the curtezan's employing the epithet Ἀχαρνεύσιος.

(7) Thomas de Pinedo in Stephan. Byzan. p. 50.

(8) Λεῖός μοι, φασι, χαιρίας καὶ χοιρίσκος Ἀχαρνάνιος. Lævis mihi, ut aiunt, Chæreas & Porcellus Acarnanius, Lucian. Dialog. Meretric. p. 723. tom. 2.

(9) In mollem & amabilem atque in deliciis habitum dicebatur. Eraſm. Chil. 2. Centur. 3. num. 69. p. 445.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Varro de Re ruſticâ, lib. 2. cap. 4.

(12) Luciani Dialogi Meretric. p. 721, 722.

(13) Ὥσπερ αἱ καπηλίδες τὰ διλφάκια τρέφουσι. " As the cook-
" ſhop-keepers
" breed little
" pigs." Athen. lib. 14. p. 656.

[D] The dreſs of their women are no way modeſt.] The manner in which Apollonius cenſures the Athenian Ladies informs us of this. Whence, ſays he to them, did you borrow the faſhion of ſplendid, purple habits (14), of a bright and pale red; of ſillemot, yellow, green, and ſuch like colours, with which you make as gaudy a figure, as a meadow in the month of May? For we don't find that the women of Acarnania ever trick'd themſelves up after this manner †. The Latin (15) verſion runs thus; Coccineæ atque etiam purpureæ croceæque veſtes unde à vobis ſumptæ? Cum neque Acarnanides mulieres ita exornentur. i. e. " Whence was the " mode borrowed, of the ſcarlet, purple and ſaffron-
" colour'd robes you wear? ſince even the women
" of Acarnania don't adorn themſelves after that
" manner." 'Tis plain that Apollonius would not have expreſs'd himſelf thus, had not the women of Acarnania been noted for the immodeſty of their dreſs. This paſſage ſeems to confirm the aſſertions which we meet with in ſome dictionaries, viz. that the Acarnanians paſſed for a laſcivious people; but, to ſay the truth, the conſequence would be a little forc'd. Thoſe authors want a more preciſe authority. Artus (Arthur) Thomas (16) did not underſtand thoſe words of Apollonius, which he pretended to comment upon. The Acarnanians, ſays he, were anciently very expert in the chariot-race, as Pauſanias tells us in the ſixth and laſt book of his Eliacks; having formerly been look'd upon as a wiſe nation and deep politicians, becauſe they had eſtabliſhed their ſtate and commonwealth in ſo happy a manner, that ſome ſay Ariſtotle wrote an hundred and fifty books, drawn wholly from the laws and government of that nation: but both the books and the government are loſt, which occaſioned Philoſtratus to mention their women in this place. A wretched commentator! he has quite miſtaken the ſenſe of this author.

(13) Ὥσπερ αἱ καπηλίδες τὰ διλφάκια τρέφουσι. " As the cook-
" ſhop-keepers
" breed little
" pigs." Athen. lib. 14. p. 656.

(14) Philoſtrat. in vita Apollonii, lib. 4. cap. 7.

† This is tranſlated from the French verſion of Vigenere.

(15) Alemanus Rhimuccinus, pag. 167.

(16) Artus Thomas, Sieur d'Embry, in his Annotations on the Life of Apollonius, vol. 1. book 4. chap. 7. p. 800.

[E] Cicero does not ſpeak of a city called Acarnania.] This nevertheleſs is aſſerted by Moreri. " 'Tis, adds that author, in Sicily, and is famous for a temple dedicated to Jupiter; and for this purpoſe he cites Cicero, Orat. in Verrem, and Servius in lib. V. Æneid. Hoffman goes ſtill farther, and mentions two circumſtances; firſt, that this city ſtood near Syracuſa; and ſecondly, that it was burnt by the Goths. All this he had read in Charles Stephens. The truth is, Cicero does not ſpeak of Acarnania, but Acradina one of the four diviſions of the city of Syracuſa, Ea tanta eſt urbs ut ex quatuor urbibus maximis conſtare dicatur, quarum una, &c. . . . . altera autem eſt urbs Syracuſis, cui nomen Acradina eſt; in qua forum maximum, pulcherrimæ portus, ornatiſſimum prytaneum, ampliſſima eſt curia, templumque egregium Jovis Olympii (17). That is, " The city is ſo large, that " it is ſaid to conſiſt of four large cities, one of " which &c. . . . Another diviſion of Syracuſa is " called Acradina, in which is a vaſtly large forum;
" very beautiful porticoes, and a moſt nobly adorn'd
" prytaneum *, a moſt ſpacious court, and a magnificent
" temple of Jupiter Olympius." Servius, whom Moreri cites, ſays no more than that Acarnania is a part of Epirus (18), and not a little country in Egypt as Hoffman pretends (19).

(17) Cicero in Verrem Orat. 6. fol. 77. verſo.

* That is a Council-houſe.

(18) Servius in v. lib. Æneid. ver. 298.

(19) Item regiuncula Ægypti. Servius in Æneid. lib. 5. Hoffman, Voce Acarnania.

years; but I muſt add, that they were engaged in frequent wars, and that the Ætolians very much annoyed the Acarnanians. This Polybius tells us, when he relates that the Acarnanians declared war againſt the Ætolians, the inſtant the King of Macedonia ſolicited them for that purpoſe (f). He applauds them for following a very laudable political maxim, viz. in preferring honour to profit even in the moſt urgent dangers (g).

(f) Polybii Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 30.

(g) Id. ibid.

ACCARISI (FRANCIS) an Italian Civilian, born in Ancona, went through his ſtudies in Sienna, where Bargalio and Benvolenti taught the law with tolerable reputation. He had a great friendſhip for both; but the former was much dearer to him than the latter, and indeed with very good reaſon; for Bargalio was not only very communicative, and promoted Accariſi's ſtudies to the utmoſt of his power (a), but had alſo applauded him highly in a ſpeech which was printed; containing the Elogiums of the family of the Accariſi; and upon his death-bed, recommended to him the printing of his excellent diſpute De Dolo. The firſt publick employment which Accariſi obtained, was that of explaining the * Inſtitutes in Sienna, which he did for ſix years. He afterwards was deſired to explain the † Pandects; and as ſeveral foreigners reſorted to Sienna, for the ſake of purſuing their ſtudies, the great Duke Ferdinand the Firſt, ordered that a Profeſſor ſhould be appointed to explain the civil law, in the ſame manner as Cujacius had done. Accariſi was choſe for this purpoſe, and acquitted himſelf worthily of it; after which he was raiſed to the chair of Law-Profeſſor in ordinary, vacant by the death of Bargalio, and filled it with great reputation for twenty years. His fame ſpread ſo far, that all the Univerſities in Italy wiſhed to have him, and thereupon made him very advantageous offers; but he led ſo agreeable a life in Sienna, that he long reſiſted thoſe temptations; however, their repeated ſolicitations proved at laſt effectual, and they prevailed with him to quit his reſolution of dying in the chair he had firſt enjoyed; a reſolution that is very ſeldom made by perſons of his character [A]. Rainuccio Farneſe Duke of Parma, was the perſon who laid this temptation in his way, by appointing him his Counſellor; promiſing at the ſame time, that he ſhould have the honour to ſuceeed Sforza Oddus and Philippo Marini. The great Duke was reſolved that Accariſi ſhould not continue long in the ſervice of another Prince, and thereupon ſoon brought him back [B], by nominating him principal Law-Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Piſa. Accariſi having left the Duke of Parma went to Piſa, took poſſeſſion of the Profeſſorſhip, and enjoyed it till his death, which happened in Sienna four years after, viz. the fourth of October 1622. The author (b) that furniſhes me with this article, and who is the only one Moreri quotes, does not ſay that Accariſi writ ſeveral Law Treatiſes; or that Rainuccio Farneſe could never prevail with him to leave Sienna. Moreri has made two miſtakes on this occaſion, and did not underſtand the meaning of IV. Non. Octobris, which he ſays anſwered to the 26th of September. We ſhall take notice of another of Moreri's miſtakes in the ſecond remark.

(a) Ab illo factus ſubrat omnium ſuorum ſtudiorum particeps. Nic. Erythræus, Pinacoth. II. cap. 25.

* A book in which the elements, and principles of the Roman (or civil) law are contain'd: and was digeſted by order of the Emperor Juſtinian.

† The Digeſts, or body of laws, compiled in the reign of the Emperor Juſtinian anno 534; containing the anſwers of the antient lawyers, to all law queries.

(b) Janus Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. II. c. 25.

[A] A reſolution very ſeldom found in perſons of his character.] One of the moſt common faults of profeſſors is, that they can ſeldom be prevailed with to ſettle in the univerſities, where they are firſt employed. Inſtead of conſidering this firſt vocation as a kind of marriage, they look upon it merely as a tranſient engagement, as an interim, or proviſional employment; and a kind of baiting place, if I may ſo call it, in which they reſide only till they can provide themſelves better. They have as little affection for the ſecond vocation as they had for the firſt; and don't care to pitch their tents for good and all, till they are ſeated in the moſt profitable chair. It has been ſaid of ſome, that they make the tour of all religions in a little time; and there are others, who, when they have an opportunity for it, ride poſt, as we may ſay, thro' the ſeveral univerſities. Some Profeſſors will be well paid for their reſidence; unleſs their ſtipends are conſiderably augmented, they are immediately for moving away bag and baggage. Tacitus who doubtleſs included a great number of faults in the words profeſſoria lingua (1), would have mentioned that I now ſpeak of, had it been practiſed in his age. Nor are the Clergy exempt from this petty infirmity: 'Tis well known that rigid moraliſts inveigh againſt certain Prelates, who being nominated to Biſhopricks of a ſmall revenue, are afterwards ſo often tranſlated, that they at laſt obtain the moſt eminent Metropolitan Sees. This is a ſpiritual polygamy, or ſomething worſe; ſince according to the ancient canons (2), a ſpiritual marriage is contracted between the paſtor and his flock. Nor are the Chriſtian Societies, where the benefices are of ſmall income, unacquainted with the effects of this ambulatory diſpoſition.

(1) Taciti. Ann. lib. 13. cap. 14.

(2) Ne virginalis pauperculæ ſocietate contempta; ditioris adulteræ quærat amplexus. That is, "Leſt deſpiſing "the ſociety of a "poor virgin, he "ſhould ſeek the "embraces of a "more wealthy "adultreſs." Hieronymi Epiſt. ad Oceanum, tom. 2. p. 744. quoted in the Advice to the Jeſuits of Aix, concerning a Mask or Interlude, &c. p. 37.

Parcius iſta viris tamen objicienda memento (3).
Imitated,
"But hold! beware how you aſperſe theſe men.

(3) Virgil. Ecl. 3. ver. 7.

See the remark (G) under the article ALCIAT (Andreas.)

[B] Soon brought him back.] Such was the ill ſucceſs the Duke of Parma had, after having ſo long ſolicited Accariſi to come to his court; not to mention the gratifications he made him. 'Tis true, indeed, that he won him at laſt; but he was taken from him by the very ſame methods he had employ'd to get him from others; and yet Moreri ſays, that he did not go over to that Duke; and that he would have forced his inclinations too much, had he quitted his country, to which the beneficence of Ferdinand great Duke of Tuſcany, had bound him. This is a freſh and inexcuſable miſtake, ſince we read in Nicius Erythræus, that when Accariſi went to attend upon the great Duke of Parma, he had enjoyed for twenty years at leaſt, the new Profeſſorſhip which the great Duke Ferdinand had founded in the college of Sienna. We alſo read in the ſame author, that Accariſi was not above four years Profeſſor in Piſa, whither he was invited a little after he had engaged himſelf in the ſervice of the Duke of Parma. Now he died in 1622, four years after he had accepted the Profeſſorſhip of Piſa: conſequently the Duke of Parma prevailed with him to come, about 1616, at which time there was no great Duke whoſe name was Ferdinand. Moreri himſelf ſays in the article MEDICIS, that Ferdinand the firſt died in 1609, and that Ferdinand the ſecond ſucceeded his father in 1621.

ACCARISI (JACOPO) Doctor of Divinity, and born in Bologna. I have nothing to add to what Moreri relates of him, except firſt, that the Orations which he publiſhed were ſpoken by him in Rome, Colen, Mantua and other places; ſecondly, that he taught rhetoric in Mantua, in the academy founded in that city anno 1627 (a).

(a) Ex Aub. Miræo Script. Eccl. Sæc. xvii. pag. 251.

ACCIAIOLI (Donato) a man famous for his learning and the employments he poſſeſſed in Florence his native country, flouriſhed in the fifteenth Century. He might have acquired much more erudition, had the publick affairs in which he was engaged, permitted him to devote more time to his ſtudies; and the delicacy of his conſtitution had not ſhortned his days (a). The ſmall fortune he left his children, is of itſelf a ſufficient teſtimony of his great probity and diſintereſtedneſs. His daughters, like thoſe of Ariſtides antiently, were married at the publick expence (b); which at the ſame time is a proof, that his country was ſatisfied with his ſervices. He had been ſent into France to ſue for ſuccour againſt Pope Sixtus the fourth, who haraſſed the Florentines in a moſt terrible manner; but he died before he had paſſed the Alps (c). He died at Milan in Auguſt 1473, in his thirty ninth year (d); and his body was carried to Florence, and buried in the church of the Carthuſians (e). * [If Donatus Acciaioli was born in the year 1428, as it is aſſerted by Palmieri in Remark [D], and died in 1473, he was then 45 years old, and not 39, as Mr. Bayle has it here from Varillas. Crit. Rem.] The epitaph which was engraved on his tomb was compoſed by Politian. The works he left behind him are, A Latin tranſlation of ſome of Plutarch's Lives [A]; The Life of Charlemain; and Commentaries on Ariſtotle's Ethicks and Politicks. As the latter life has ſometimes been annexed to thoſe of Plutarch, it occaſioned Georgius Wicelius to commit a ſtrange blunder; for he gave out that this life was written by Plutarch (f); ſo admirably was he verſed in the hiſtories of different ages. Some have accuſed Acciaioli of being a plagiary [B] with regard to his Commentary on Ariſtotle's Ethicks; others have laviſhed the greateſt encomiums

(a) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 16.

(b) Volaterr. lib. 21.

(c) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 16.

(d) Varillas anecdotes de Florence, p. 169.

(e) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 16.

(f) In Hagiologio fol. 178. apud Voſſium De Hiſt. Lat. pag. 624.

[A] Some of Plutarch's lives.] According to Voſſius (1) and Konig (2), he tranſlated four of them, viz. thoſe of Hannibal, Scipio, Alcibiades and Demetrius; but as we don't find that Plutarch writ either Scipio's or Hannibal's life, 'tis more probable to ſuppoſe, that Acciaioli writ the lives of thoſe two illuſtrious Generals originally (3), than that he tranſlated them from the Greek; a circumſtance Voſſius ſeems not to have conſider'd. Poſſibly the epitomizer of Geſner miſled him on that occaſion. Father Meneſtrier declares, that Acciaioli impoſed upon the public, when he boaſted his having tranſlated Hannibal's life from the Greek (4).

(1) Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. p. 624.
(2) Konigii Bibl. vet. & nov. p. 4.
(3) Pocciantius, de Script. Flor. pag. 51. ſays expreſly ſo; Dictavit proprio Marte Vitam Annibalis & Scipionis, i. e. "He had no aſ-"ſiſtance in "writing the "lives of Hanni-"bal and Scipio.
(4) See the Journal des Savans, of Sept. 2. 1697, p. 654.

[B] Some have accuſed Acciaioli of Plagiariſm.] 'Tis aſſerted that he arrogated to himſelf the lectures of Joannes Argyropylus, and drew from thence the commentary which he publiſhed on Ariſtotle's Ethicks; aſſuming to himſelf the property of others. Scripta, quæ ſub nomine Acciaioli ea de re circumferentur, non Acciaioli commentaria, ſed Argyropyli prælectiones Florentiæ habitæ, & ab Acciaiolo deſcriptæ editæque à pleriſque exiſtimantur. Theſe are the words of Simon Simonius, in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to a work printed in 1567 (5); and this accuſation was revived a great many years after by Gabriel Naudé, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt poſitive terms. Argyropylus Byzantinus (ſays he) (6) cujus prælectiones Florentiæ habitas non abſque manifeſto plagii crimine ſibi poſtea vindicavit Donatus Acciaiolus. i. e. "Ar-"gyropylus the Bizantine, whoſe lectures read in "Florence, Donatus Acciaioli claim'd afterwards as "his own, in which 'twas manifeſt that he was a "Plagiary." Moreri has confounded Ariſtotle's Ethicks with the commentary on thoſe Ethicks. 'Twas even thought, ſays he, that the Ethicks of Ariſtotle addreſs'd to Nicomachus, which Donato had publiſhed, were alſo written by the aboveſaid Argyropylus; but Volaterranus aſſerts the contrary. Thus we ſee how excellently well this writer could tranſlate the moſt eaſy Latin, that of Voſſius. He had read the following words in the laſt mentioned writer: Imò, commentaria illa in Nicomachia Ariſtotelis, multi arbitrantur non ipſius eſſe Acciaioli, ſed prælectiones eſſe Argyropyli, ab Acciaiolo autem deſcriptas, inque lucem emiſſas. Nihil tale tamen de eo Volaterranus (7). i. e. "Nay, many think that the commentaries of "Ariſtotle's works addreſſed to Nicomachus, were "not written by Acciaioli, but that they were "only the Lectures of Argyropylus tranſcrib'd "and publiſhed by Acciaioli; yet Volaterranus ſays "nothing of it." Moreri's tranſlation creates a double confuſion: firſt, as the commentary is there miſtaken for the text; and ſecondly, as the ſilence of a writer is conſtrued into an expreſs refutation of a charge. The learned Conringius has juſtified Donatus againſt Naudé, not by ſhewing, that Argyropylus did not furniſh materials for that work, but by declaring that Acciaioli mentioned whence he had them (8). Can a more authentic confeſſion be deſired than that which follows. Joannes Argyropylus Byzantinus, cum Florentiæ inter cætera philoſophiæ opera Ariſtotelis libros, qui ad Nicomachum de moribus ſcribuntur, mirificè eſſet complexus, eos tuo nomine Latinos fecit, publiceque deinde explicuit, non ſine magna audientium approbatione; habent enim libri 2 ſummam dignitatem, admirabilemque doctrinam, ordinem verò propè ſingularem. Itaque ſi accurata & exquiſita quædam explanatio accedat, magnum auditoribus afferent fructum; quod ego jam inde ab initio mecum conſiderans unà cum pleriſque aliis, qui hujus quoque Præceptoris diſciplinam ſequuntur, in iis audiendis præcipuam curam diligentiamque adhibui. . . . . Poſtea verò cum viderem hos libros à te & ab iis omnibus, qui ingenio vehementer excellunt, libentiſſimè legi, ulterius progrediendum ratus, Expositionem hujus Doctoris, accommodatam præcipuè menti philoſophi, literis mandare conſtitui; at ii, qui adeſſe non potuerunt, ... hæc quæ nos ex ejus ore accepimus percipere & ipſi pro arbitrio poſſent; quare traductionem illius ac ordinem explicandi pluribus verbis ſecuti ſumus, lata interdum & diffuſa oratione utentes, ut explanatio aperta magis magiſque omnibus eſſet communis (9). i. e. "John Argyropylus the Byzantine, having in Flo-"rence, among other philoſophical works, taken a "particular delight in the moral writings of Ariſtotle "inſcribed to Nicomachus, tranſlated them into La-"tin under your patronage, and afterwards read pub-"lic lectures on them with great applauſe; for the "ſubject of theſe two books is very great, the in-"ſtruction is wonderful, and the order and method "very ſingular. If therefore theſe are accurately "and judiciouſly explained, the auditor muſt neceſ-"ſarily reap a great benefit from them; a circumſtance "which, from the beginning, prompted me and ſe-"veral of my fellow-pupils, who ſtudied under this "maſter, to attend his lectures with the utmoſt care "and aſſiduity.— But afterwards, when I perceived "that theſe books were read with pleaſure by you "and all perſons of exalted genius; I thought it "proper to proceed farther, and reſolved to commit "to writing the Commentary of this excellent "Master, agreable to the ſenſe of Ariſtotle, in or-"der that thoſe who could not be preſent at his lec-"tures, might, whenever they pleaſed, peruſe what "we heard from Argyropylus's own Mouth. "For this reaſon I have expanded his tranſlation, "and ſometimes explained his meaning, employing "a copious and diffuſe ſtyle, in order to render "his commentary more intelligible and of more "general uſe." Had Voſſius met with this paſſage, would he have contented himſelf with merely oppoſing Volaterranus's ſilence to the accuſers of Acciaioli? He might have read this in a work of Geſner (10). Is it not very ſtrange, that a poor author, after having ſo ſolemnly declared in his Preface, that he there publiſhed only a paraphraſtic tranſlation of Argyropylus's Lectures, ſhould yet be charged for ſo many years with being a Plagiary.

(5) Sim. Simonii Comment. in Ariſtot. Ethic.

(6) Nauderi, Bibliograp. Polit. p. 26.

(7) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 624.

(8) Conring. Introduct. Polit. Ariſtot. p. 649. 650. apud Thomaſium, de plagio Literar. p. 153.

(9) Donat. Acciaioli, præfat. ad Coſmum Medicen. Commentar. in Ethica Ariſt. ad Nicomach.

(10) Geſn. Bibliotb. fol. 216. verſo.

encomiums [C] on him, upon account of that work. He was high in the esteem of Cardinal of Pavia, as is manifest from the letters he received from him, which are published among those of his Eminence.

We have annexed a considerable supplement hereunder [D].

[C] The greatest Encomiums.] This appears by comparing the text of Paulus Jovius, with Varillas's Paraphrase. Erudita & pereleganti commentatione magnum lumen attulisse judicatur Moralibus Aristotelis, explosis scilicet sophistarum interpretum ineptiis, quum Eustratii Græci placita secutus, certiore ubique vestigio niteretur (11). i. e. "He is thought to "have very much illustrated Aristotle's Ethicks by "his learned and very elegant commentary; having "therein exploded the silly glosses of the sophists; "and following the opinions of Eustratius the Greek, "he went upon a more certain foundation." This is the text, and now follows the paraphrase. He yet translated Aristotle's Ethicks with much greater accuracy than his predecessors in that work; and cleared them of the ridiculous interpretations with which the ancient and modern sophists had disguised them by an admirable commentary; wherein he shewed, that whosoever strikes into that labyrinth without any other guide than the famous Eustachius, will infallibly lose his way (12). *[The English reader will observe, that what follows, to the end of the paragraph, are Mr. Bayle's animadversions on Varillas's French Paraphrase, in his Anecdotes of Florence. And being a critique on the construction of that French writer; the sense is not altogether so clear in English as in the original. The English of that passage of Varillas, according to Bayle's corrections, would run thus. He yet translated Aristotle's Ethicks with much greater accuracy, than his predecessors in that province had done; and in his admirable commentary expunged the ridiculous interpretations, with which the ancient and modern sophists had disguised them: shewing also, that whosoever strikes into this labyrinth without taking the famous Eustratius for his guide, will infallibly lose his way. CRIT. REM.] I need not inform the reader, that the author of the Anecdotes says more than the Latin with regard to Acciaioli, as well as to Eustratius (13); and that instead of applauding the latter, as was his intention; he, on the contrary, degrades him to the meanest class of interpreters: for he should have said, avec un autre, (with another); and not, sans un autre, (without another). What would Father Bouhours say to the words, par un admirable commentaire, (by an admirable commentary)? Those words are so unhappily placed, that one would conclude, the sophists had given ridiculous interpretations by an admirable commentary.

(11) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 16.

(12) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 169.

(13) It is thus we must read, and not Eustachius.

[D] The reader will find a considerable supplement hereunder.] I may justly call it so, since 'twas communicated to me by a gentleman of very great abilities (14). "The treatise which Matteo Palmieri has left (14) Mr. de la Monnoie.
"on the origin of the family of the Acciaioli, may "be of great service to correct and enlarge the "article of Donato Acciaioli. This treatise, writ"ten originally in Latin by Matteo Palmieri, was "translated into Italian by one Donato Acciaioli,
"a Knight of Rhodes. The original was never "published, but the translation was printed at Flo"rence in 4to, anno 1588, for Bartolomeo Sermar-
"telli, annexed to the History of the Ubaldini, and
"the life of Nicolo Acciaioli, or great Seneschal of "the kingdoms of Sicily and Jerusalem. We there
"read, that the Donato in question was born in
"1428, that he was buried at the public expence,
"and that Christophoro Landini pronounced his fune"ral-oration *. We shall omit the rest of the particu- * This is ob-
"lars for brevity sake. . . . Sabellicus in his dialogue de served by Pocci-
"reparatione linguæ Latinæ, (which, by the way, antius, de Script. Florent. p. 51.
"is generally cited as written by an anonymous au"thor), and Vives, libro V. de tradendis disciplinis,
"have very much commended Donato Acciaioli's
"life of Charlemain. Leonardo d'Arezzo's Floren-
"tine History, which our Donato translated out of "Latin into Italian, was printed at Venice, in Folio,
"anno 1473, according to father l'Abbe's Supple-
"ment to novæ Bibliothec. MSS. page 341."

☞ACCIAIOLI (DONATO) of whom Mr. Bayle treats in the preceding article, was of royal extraction, he being descended on the father's side from Justin, nephew to Justinian Emperor of Constantinople, and also from the Dukes of Athens, Bohemia and Corinth. His ancestors had enjoyed very honourable posts in the kingdom of Naples, as Seneschal (that of a kind of Chief Justice) and had also been Viceroys of Sicily, and Generals. Some of them had likewise possessed very high employments in the Republic of Florence; had gone on several embassies to different powers of Europe; were related to all the Princes of the Morea and the adjacent Islands; raised to the dignity of Cardinal; had erected several splendid Carthusian Monasteries in Florence, Naples, &c. and signalized themselves by the most glorious actions, and among others the Acciaioli's of Vasconcellos, who went into America. Our Acciaioli was son to Neri Acciaioli and Lena Strozzi. He studied in his childhood under Jacopo Ammanti of Lucca, and afterwards under Giovanni Argiropolo a Constantinopolitan, and soon was esteemed the ablest Orator, Philosopher, Mathematician and the most general Scholar of his age. Some of his works, omitted by Mr. Bayle, are as follows [A]. A very eloquent oration was spoke at his funeral by Christophoro Landini, and his memory was honoured with the following inscription written by Politian;

Donatus

[A] Some of his works omitted by Mr. Bayle are as follows.] According to the author of the History of the Florentine Writers (1), Acciaioli writ also the books hereunder mentioned.

(1) Istoria de gli Scrittori Fiorentini del P. Guilio Negri, in Ferrara 1722. fol.

Libri tres de Anima.

Laudatio ab ipso habita in æde principe patriâ, in funere Franciſci Vaivodæ, qui in bello contra Turcas obierat in Pannoniâ; & cui utpote de se optimè merito, civitas Florentina parentavit.

Orationes eloquentissimæ, quas ingenti auditorum plausu, habuit ad Paulum II, ad Sixtum IV, ad Francorum Regem, ad Senenses, ad Mediolani Duces; apud quos sæpe pro sua republica Oratoris munus implevit.

Liber cui titulus, Rei familiaris cura, Joanni Oricellario dicatum.

Tractatus de bono & malo Opere, Joanni Oricellario sacer.

He also translated into his native tongue, Leonardo Aretino's twelve books of the History of Florence, which was dedicated to the principal Magistrates of that city, and printed at Venice for Jacopo Rossi in 1476.

In the Library belonging to the family of the Strozzi in Florence, is preserved a manuscript folio volume of original Latin letters, written by Donato Acciaioli, all which have remained unpublished, except one to Alamanno Rinuccini, dated March 14, 1454. . . . . Several of his works are not to be found.

One of his descendants was also famous for his love of literature, being educated in the Roman seminary, where he was greatly admired for the brightness of his parts, insomuch that he was appointed to deliver an oration, which he did on the festival of the Holy Ghost in the Pope's chapel, in presence of Urban VIII. He writ the following piece: Oratio sub titulo, Phœnix ab igne redivivus, à se habita de Sancti Spiritûs adventu. Impressa primò Romæ, anno 1642, & iterùm evulgata anno 1645 (2). (2) Idem, ibid.

Donatus nomen, patria eſt Florentia, gens mi
Acciajola domus ; clarus eram eloquio.
Francorum ad regem, patriæ dum orator abirem ;
In Ducis Anguigeri mœnibus occubui,
Sic vitam impendi patriæ ; quæ me indè relatum
Inter majorum nunc cineres ſepelit (a).

That is,

" Donatus is my name, my country Florence ;
" And from the fam'd Acciaioli I ſprung.
" By eloquence I gain'd immortal wreathes,
" But going on an embaſſy to France,
" Within the walls of fam'd Milan I died.
" My life I thus devoted to my country,
" Which kindly bringing my remains from thence,
" Here buried them amid my kindred aſhes.

(a) Iſtoria de gli Scrittori Fiorentini, Del P. Guilio Negri, in Ferrara 1722, Folio.

☞ACCIAIOLI (JOHN) ſon to Marcellus of the ſame family with the former Acciaioli, was a native of Florence. This Gentleman quitting the affairs of the bar, where he preſided in quality of Senator ; and the hopes of riſing in the world, with which he might juſtly flatter himſelf from the dignity of his anceſtors, the greatneſs of his fortune, and the fame of his talents, entred into holy orders, and conducted himſelf ſuitably to the character he had aſſumed ; firmly reſolved to ſecond his ſtrong propenſion to all kinds of learning, and being endowed by nature with a genius capable of attaining them all, he applied himſelf to his ſtudies under the direction of Clement Tomaſino, by whoſe great care he became, in a ſurpriſingly ſhort time, a profound Philoſopher. After having learnt the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabic languages, and having a ſtrong thirſt for the neweſt and more rare branches of Science, he went to Bologna, and there entertained himſelf with the moſt ſublime Sciences. He then took a journey to Padua, where arming himſelf with every kind of literature, diſputing with the famous Pandaſio and Piccolomini, he anſwered with great promptneſs and facility all queſtions relating to ſcholaſtic matters ; inſomuch that the Venetian Nobility flew with great eagerneſs to Padua to hear ſo excellent a man, where, in preſence of theſe and the two celebrated Literati abovementioned, he gained an immortal name. Nor did he get leſs reputation in Florence in 1565, where he alſo diſputed publickly for ſeveral days before a great concourſe of learned men. Acciaioli was looked upon as an Oracle in all Sciences ; and the moſt eminent men of the age uſed to frequent his houſe, in order to conſult him on doubts, and to aſſiſt at the conferences which were there held. He left only the following work. Multa Doctiſſimorum problematum monumenta, magno ſtudio & ingenio elucubrata. He is mention'd with great honour by Francis Bocchi, in his Elogia of the moſt celebrated Florentine writers ; by Baptiſt Arrighi, Francis Verino ; as alſo in part the firſt of Notizie Litterarie ed Iſtoriche dell' Academia Fiorentina (a).

(a) Idem, ibid. p. 258, 259.

ACCIAIOLI † (ZENOBIO) a Dominican Friar, born in Florence, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his works. By his employment of Librarian to the Vatican, under Pope Leo the Xth one may ſuppoſe that he was a man of learning. He enjoyed that ſtation from the year 1518, to his death, which happened in 1520, he being then fifty eight years of age. He underſtood Greek and Hebrew, and tranſlated into Latin ſome of the works of the antient fathers of the church, viz. Olympiodorus on Eccleſiaſtes ; Euſebius's Treatiſe againſt Hierocles ; The twelve Books of Theodoret, De Græcarum affectionum Curatione ; and Juſtin Martyr. Being a Poet as well as an Orator, he ſung the praiſe of heaven and earth both in proſe and verſe. There are extant of his, Poems and Sermons on the Epiphany ; and Verſes and Orations in honour of Leo the Xth. Some of his letters to Picus of Mirandola, are publiſhed ; and alſo, a treatiſe De Laudibus Urbis Romæ ; A Panegyric on the City of Naples, ſpoke in the general chapter of the order ; and The Chronicle of the Convent of St. Mark in Florence. He collected into one volume the Greek Epigrams of Politian, and publiſhed them in 1495 (a).

† It ſhould be Zanobio.

(a) Extracted from Ambroſe d'Altamura, Biblioth. Ordin. Prædicat. pag. 243.

Ambroſe d'Altamura, whom I have ſtrictly followed in this article, has, in all probability, not been very accurate, ſince Mr. de la Monnoie writes to me as follows. Of the ſeveral works of Zenobio Acciaioli, the following only are extant, viz. A Tranſlation of Euſebius's book againſt Hierocles, that of Olympiodorus on Eccleſiaſtes, and that of Theodoret on the cure of the falſe opinions of the Gentiles. The Poems, whether Greek or Latin, mentioned by Gyraldus, were never printed. Some are of opinion that he did not die till 1537, becauſe Jerom Aleander, who ſucceeded him as Librarian of the Vatican, did not poſſeſs this employment till that year ; in the ſame manner as Zenobio was preferred to it in 1518, after Philippus Beroaldus junior, who died the ſame year.

ACCIUS (LUCIUS) a Latin Tragic Poet, ſon to a freed-man [A], was born under [A] A Son of a freed-man.] The oftner I reflect on the following words of Moreri, Marcinus and Serranus, who had been raiſed to the dignity of Conſuls in ancient Rome, were his near relations, the more difficult I find it to aſcribe his blunder to any other cauſe than this. He had read in Charles Stephen's dictionary, Natus parentibus libertinis, Marcino & Serrano conſulibus ; i. e. " Born in the conſul- " ſhip of Marcinus and Serranus of parents who had " been affranchized ; " and not giving due attention to the words libertinis and parentibus, he imagin'd he muſt ſay, that this poet was nearly related to thoſe two under the Conſulate of Hoſtilius Mancinus and Attilius Serranus; the year of Rome 583, if S. Jerom's Chronology may be credited; however, we ſhall ſhew hereafter, that it is not much to be depended upon [B]. He made himſelf known before the death of Pacuvius, a dramatic piece of his having been acted the ſame year that Pacuvius [C] brought one upon the ſtage; the latter being then fourſcore years of age, and the former but thirty. We don't know the title of the play of Accius which was exhibited that year; but the titles of ſeveral of his Tragedies are known, they having been cited by ſeveral authors (a). He wrote on the great ſubjects which had been repreſented on the Athenian ſtage, ſuch as Andromache, Andromeda, Atreus, Clytemneſtra, Medea [D], Meleager, Philocletes, * Thebais, Tereus, the Troades, &c. He did not always take his ſubjects from the Grecian ſtory, but formed one purely Roman, the title

(a) Nonius, Marcellus, Varro, Aulus Gellius, &c.

* The civil wars of Thebes in Greece, between the two brothers Etheocles and Polynices.

two Conſuls; at leaſt, he ought to have changed Marcinus into Mancinus. St. Jerom writes in this manner: Lucius Accius Tragœdiarum ſcriptor clarus habetur, natus Mancino & Serrano conſulibus, parentibus libertinis (1). i. e. "Lucius Accius a celebrated "Tragic-poet, born in the Conſulate of Mancinus "and Serranus, of parents who had been affranchiz-"ed." Father Briet aſcribes to Aulus Gellius two or three particulars concerning Accius, which belong to St. Jerom only (2).

(1) In Chron. Euſebii, ad ann. 2. Olymp. 160.

(2) Brietius de Poët. Lat. p. 5.

[B] It is not to be depended upon.] Notwithſtanding this aſſertion, I yet cannot produce any demonſtrative reaſons againſt this chronology; and ſee nothing but perplexity and confuſion on all ſides. Cicero had often ſpoke with Accius, as is proved in the remark [H]. Now Cicero was born anno 647 of Rome, and we can hardly ſuppoſe that he would have had frequent converſations with our poet, till he was twenty; Accius therefore muſt have been living the year 667 of Rome; at which time he would be eighty four years of age according to Euſebius's Chronicle. I confeſs all this is not impoſſible; however it can ſcarce be probable, ſince Gyraldus could not be perſuaded that Lucius Accius, ſo many of whoſe tragedies are quoted, was the very Poet with whom Cicero converſed ſo often; and therefore he is of opinion that there were two Poets call'd Accius. Add to this, that Corradus, who rejects this diſtinction, does not dare to make Accius above ſeventy years of age when Cicero was twenty: inſomuch, that becauſe of this paſſage of Cicero, he fixes the birth of Accius forty years lower than St. Jerom has done (3). But this is not all: Cicero tells us in his firſt Philippic, that a tragedy of Accius was repreſented, during the celebration of the games which Brutus was to have exhibited; and at which he was not preſent, becauſe he left Rome after Cæſar's murther. That dramatic piece was highly applauded, but the applauſes related more to Brutus than to Accius. This would have reflected an honour on the Poet from ſo long a diſtance as threeſcore years. Niſi forte Accio tum plaudi & ſexageſimo poſt anno palmam dari putabatis, non Bruto. "Unleſs you ſuppoſed, that "Accius, after an interval of ſixty years and not "Brutus, was applauded and honoured with the "palm." If we conſult theſe threeſcore years from the death of Accius (4), he then muſt have died the year 650 of Rome; and conſequently Cicero tells an untruth, when he ſays that he had often heard Accius ſay certain things. If we compute them from the time this piece was firſt repreſented on the ſtage, we then ſhall make the Orator a very weak reaſoner, in ſuppoſing that a good play was applauded only the firſt time it was brought on the ſtage, which is abſolutely falſe. However, this opinion is more probable, than to ſuppoſe that Accius died when Cicero was three years old. If therefore the paſſage in the firſt Philippic does not prove that Accius died before the year of Rome 667, let us ſuppoſe he lived till that period: but, as we are not certain of St. Jerom's accuracy (5), let us venture to aſſert that Accius might then be about ſixty or ſeventy, and that if he lived to ſo great an age as Pacuvius, we then may ſuppoſe that Valerius Maximus ſpeaks of our Poet and of Cæſar. Is (poeta Accius) Julio Cæſari ampliſſimo & florentiſſimo viro in collegium poetarum venienti nunquam aſſurrexit; non majeſtatis ejus immemor, ſed quod in comparatione communium ſtudiorum aliquanto ſuperiorem ſe eſſe confideret. Quapropter inſolentiæ crimine caruit, quia ibi voluminum, non imaginum certamina exercebantur (6). i. e. "This Poet (Accius) never roſe "from his ſeat, when Cæſar the moſt illuſtrious Hero of the age came into the college or aſſembly of "the Poets; not that he forgot his exalted dig-"nity, but becauſe he was ſenſible he had ſome ſupe-"riority over Cæſar, with regard to their reſpective "performances. For this reaſon Accius was not "thought to have been guilty of inſolence on this "occaſion; the diſpute there being about learning, "not about anceſtors." This laſt laſt thought is not unlike one we meet with in the (7) ſatyr againſt the French Academy (8). I confeſs, we cannot without ſome difficulty extend Accius's life, to the time Cæſar's proſperity was at its height; a circumſtance which made Corradus think that Valerius Maximus hints at Sextus Julius Cæſar in this paſſage. But why may we not ſuppoſe, that the perſon here alluded to is Caius Cæſar, who was kill'd by Marius's ſatellites; and who, tho' he had been no more than ædile, had yet ſo much credit, that his diſputes with Sulpitius the Tribune, occaſioned a civil war (9)? He was one of the moſt eminent Orators of his time, and a good tragic writer. Be this as it will, we are to remember that Cæſar was a Poet very early. Feruntur & à puero, & ab adoleſcentulo quædam ſcripta, ut Laudes Herculis, Tragœdia Oedipus — (10). "'Tis related, "that he wrote ſome pieces when but very young "and yet a boy, as the Praiſes of Hercules and the "Tragedy of Oedipus."

(3) Corrad. in Brut. Cicero. pag. 198.

(4) P. Manutius, in Philipp. I. ſub finem, computes them in this manner; not recollecting what Cicero has ſaid concerning the converſations he had with Accius. Obſerve, by the way, that what is advanced in the judgment of the Learned on the Poets, vol. 2. p. 15, viz. that Accius died the 618th year of Rome, the 161ſt Olympiad, is falſe.

(5) See the remark [O].

(6) Valer. Maxim. lib. 3. c. 7.

[C] The ſame year that Pacuvius.] Cicero relates this on the teſtimony of Accius himſelf, Ut Accius iiſdem ædilibus ait, ſe & Pacuvium docuiſſe fabulam, cum ille octoginta, ipſe triginta annos natus eſſet (11). i. e. "As Accius declares, that he and Pacuvius "taught dramatic poetry under the ſame Ædiles, the "latter being fourſcore and himſelf but thirty." We find it, iiſdem ædilibus, in Tully; but ſome perſons having erroneouſly read or written this paſſage in the manuſcript, aſſerted that theſe two Poets publiſhed their pieces in the ſame houſe, in iiſdem ædibus, paucis quidem annis interpoſitis (12). i. e. "few years "one after the other;" Which is evidently a double miſtake. Corradus thinks, that Accius had mentioned this circumſtance of his life in his annals (13); but Voſſius pretends 'twas in a work entitled Didaſcalica (14), and gives this reaſon for it, that Accius had treated on Poetry and Poets in this work, as may be gather'd from the paſſages which Chariſius and Aulus Gellius have quoted from thence. However, this is far from being a weighty reaſon; for Voſſius makes againſt himſelf, when he refutes Corradus. The latter had recourſe to the Annals of Accius, becauſe, ſays he, 'tis not uſual for a Poet to ſpeak of himſelf in a dramatic piece. But does not the contrary appear from Terence's Prologues? How was it poſſible for Voſſius who uſes this reaſon, not to conſider that Accius might ſay very naturally in a Prologue, that one of his plays had been acted at the ſame time with one of Pacuvius? Add to this, that beſides his Annals and his Didaſcalica, Accius writ ſeveral works which were not of the dramatic kind.

(7) St. Euvremont is by ſome ſaid to have writ that Satyr. See the Hiſtory of the French Academy, p. 69. but in the Chevræana, pag. 307, it is aſcrib'd to Count d'Etlan.

(8) The Comedy of the Academiſts. In this Godeau being ſuppoſed to ſay as follows to Colletet.
Colletet je vous trouve un gentil violen,
Is anſwered thus,
Nous ſonimus tous egaux, etant fils d'Apollun.
Thus imitated,
"Colletet, moſt
"genteely you
"play on the "fiddle.
"Since we both
"ſpring from
"Phœbus, is "that ſuch a
"riddle?

(9) Aſcon. Pedian, in Orat. pro M. Scauro.

(10) Suetonii, in ejus Vita, cap. 56.

(11) Cicero in Bruto.

(12) Crinitus de Poët. Lat. cap 5. Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 3.

(13) Corrad. in Cicero Brut. pag. 342.

(14) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 30.

[D] Medea.] Father Leſcalopier's conjecture appears to me very probable, viz. that the verſes which Cicero quotes in his ſecond book De Natura Deorum, were borrowed from the Medea of our Poet (15). Theſe verſes deſcribe the aſtoniſhment with which a ſhepherd is ſuppos'd to be ſeiz'd, who having never ſeen a ſhip, diſcovered from the top of a mountain that which carried the Argonauts. Petrus Crinitus is weak enough to infer from thence, that Cicero ſpoke of a tragedy of Accius, entitled the Argonauts (16). But tho' this Poet had really written ſuch a tragedy, yet Crinitus might juſtly be cenſured, for aſſerting it on ſo ſlight a foundation. The author whoſe con-

(15) See Leſcalopier, Comment. in Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, p. 382.

(16) Crinit. de Poët. Lat. lib. 1. cap. 7.

title of which was Brutus [E], relating to the expulsion of Tarquin. If it were true that he wrote a dramatic piece entitled The Wedding, and another called The Merchant (b), we might justly suppose that he also writ Comedies [F]. Accius did not write Plays only, several works of another kind being composed by him, particularly Annals, which are cited by Macrobius, Priscian, Festus and Nonius Marcellus. Decimus Brutus, who was Consul the year 615 of Rome, and had gained several victories in Spain, for which he was honoured with a triumph some time after, was his patron and friend (c). This Brutus was so well pleased with the verses which Accius had writ in his praise, that he had them inscribed at the entrances of the several temples and monuments [G], which were built with the spoils of the vanquished. This might arise from a principle of vanity, rather than of friendship; and be less a proof of his loving the Poet, than of his fondness for applause; but be this as it will, it is plain that Decimus Brutus highly approved of Accius's Poetry, and Brutus was a very good judge of it [H]. I don't find that Tully censures Accius, when he says, that he affected a little too much to write in a harsh style; this glancing at another Poet [I], which Moreri might easily (b) Vossius, de Poët. Lat. p. 7. mentions those two pieces; and the last on the authority of Varro; but I could not find it there.

(c) Anno 623. See Sigonius Fasti.

jecture I just now mentioned, should not have prov'd from Crinitus's testimony, that the Grammarians mention the Accius of Medea; for he ought to have directly cited Nonius Marcellus. I just now find by the Fragments of the tragic Poets collected by Scriverius, that the verses relating to the ship of the Argonauts (Argo) were borrowed from the tragedy of Medea.

[E] The title of which was Brutus.] Manutius falsly supposed, that it was represented when the * Ludi Apollinares were celebrated, at which Mark Anthony's brother presided in the room of Brutus, who had withdrawn himself from Rome (17); but 'tis evident from Tully's Epistles, that the Tereus of Accius was exhibited on that occasion (18). 'Tis surprizing that most commentators on Cicero should not have known this. Maturantius thought that the tragedy call'd Atreus was acted, but Beroaldus and Hegendorphin are for Brutus.

* Games in honour of Apollo.

(17) Paulus Manutius in Philip. I. Cicer. sub fine.

(18) Cicero. Ep. ad Attic. lib. 16. Epist. 2 and 5.

[F] That he had also writ Comedies.] Donatus the Grammarian puts this matter beyond all doubt; for he considers it among one of Terence's perfections, that he confin'd himself to comedy, without having once yielded to the temptation of writing tragedy; which, among other things, says he farther, neither Plautus, Afranius, Accius, nor hardly any of the greatest comic Poets were able to do. As I don't confine myself servilely to a verbal translation, it may be proper to quote my author's words. Hæc cum artificiosissima Terentius fecerit, tum illud est admirandum, quod & morem retinuit ut Comœdiam scriberet, & temperavit affectum, ne in Tragœdiam transiliret, quod cum aliis rebus minimè obtentum esse à Plauto, & ab Afranio, & ab Accio, & multis ferè magnis Comicis invenimus (19). One might infer from thence, that at first Accius wrote Comedy only; but as he ow'd his great reputation to his Tragedies, I don't know whether Donatus has been altogether so accurate as he should have been, in ranking him thus among the comic Poets. Mr. Dacier knew very well that Accius was a tragic writer, and declares it expressly in his remark on the following verse of Horace;

(19) Donat. de Tragœd. & Comœd.

Nil comis tragici mutat Lucilius Attî (20) ?
That is,
"Does not Lucilius Accius's rhimes accuse?
Creech.

(20) Horat. Sat. x. lib. 1. ver. 53.

And yet he translates this line thus; —— Does Lucilius find nothing to alter in Accius's Comedies * ?

* [Mr. Dacier, I suppose, employed the word Comedie on this occasion, because the French sometimes give that name to Tragedy, as well as to Comedy.]

[G] Inscribed at the entrance of the temples and monuments &c.] This Cicero and Valerius Maximus inform us of. Decimus quidem Brutus, says the former (21), summus ille vir & imperator, Accii amicissimi sui carminibus templorum ac monumentorum aditus exornavit suorum. i. e. "That illustrious General Decimus Brutus, adorned the entrances of the temples and monuments with the verses of his very "dear friend Accius." — And Valerius Maximus relates as follows: Similiter honoratus animus erga poetam Accium D. Bruti suis temporibus clari ducis extitit, cujus familiari cultu & prompta laudatione delectatus, ejus versibus templorum aditus, quæ ex manubiis consecraverat, adornavit (22). i. e. "In like "manner the great soul of Decimus Brutus a famous "General exerted itself in favour of Accius the Poet, "whose easy address and ready talent in applauding "gave him so much delight, that he adorned with Accius's verses, the entrances of those temples in which "he had consecrated the spoils of his enemies." Scriverius quotes another passage which runs thus: Amatus etiamnum in tantum Attius à Decimo Bruto fuisse dicitur, ut Attianis versibus templorum & monumentorum frontes & aditus exornare consueverit (23). i. e. "We are told, that Decimus Brutus was so very "fond of Attius, that he us'd to adorn the fronts and "entrances of the temples and monuments with "the verses of that Poet." These, he says, are the very words of Cicero in Brutus; but I am certain they are not to be met with there. Possibly some modern author had misled him in the following manner: He had cited Cicero in Bruto with regard to the age of Pacuvius and Accius; then related the particulars concerning D. Brutus, and contented himself with giving the sense of Cicero's words, and yet had cited idem Cicero. This made Scriverius imagine that Cicero's own words were cited, and had been extracted from the same book which was quoted before, and so did not give himself the trouble to verify that passage. Thus we see that the ablest and most laborious commentators love to have their business done to their hands. Vossius being doubtless misled by Scriverius, cites Cicero pro Archia & in Bruto, concerning this action of D. Brutus (24). This mistake may perhaps be of an older date than I supposed it to be. Scriverius might not have it at first hand: Tho' he collected with great care whatever related to Accius, yet he did not cite the passage from Columella hereafter mentioned (25).

(21) Cicero pro Archia Poëta, cap. xi.

(22) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 14.

(23) Scriver. in Testimon. de Attio.

(24) Vossius, de Poët. Lat. p. 7.

(25) In the remark [N].

[H] Was a very good judge of those matters.] Velleius Paterculus highly extols, in few words, the military virtues of this Brutus (26); but Cicero makes the following elogium on his erudition. D. Brutus, M. filius, ut ex familiari ejus L. Accio poeta sum audire solitus, & dicere non incultè solebat, & erat cùm literis Latinis, tum etiam Græcis ut temporibus illis satis eruditus (27). i. e. "Decimus Brutus, son of "Marcus Brutus, had a very polite way of expressing "himself, as his friend Accius the Poet has often told "me; and was pretty well acquainted, considering the "age he lived in, with the Greek as well as with "the Roman learning.

(26) Vell. Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 5.

(27) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 28.

[I] his glancing at another Poet.] Namely Attilius, whom Tully mentions, not only in one of his epistles to Atticus, Hoc enim Attilius, Poëta durissimus (28); but also in another passage, a great part of which ought to be cited, because it shews what judgment we are to pass on those who despise their native tongue, and the writers of their own nation. A quibus tantum dissentio, ut cùm Sophocles vel optimè scripserit Electram, tamen malè conversam Attilii mihi legendam putem, de quo Licinius,

Ferreum scriptorem opinor, verum scriptorem tamen
Ut legendus sit.

(28) Idem, Epist. 20. lib. 14. ad Attic.

(29) Vossius has disposed the words of Licinius in this manner, in his book, de Poët. Lat. pag. 7.

Rudem enim esse omnino in nostris Poëtis aut inertissimæ segnitiæ est, aut fastidii delicatissimi. Mihi quidem nulli satis eruditi videntur quibus nostra ignota sunt (30). That is, "From whom I differ so far, that tho' the "Electra of Sophocles be very beautiful in the ori-"ginal, I yet think that Attilius's bad translation of "it ought to be read. Licinius says of Attilius, (30) Cicero de Finib. lib. 1. Circa init.

"I

(e) Netatum autoribus & L. Accium Pœtam in Camœnarum ædem maxima fama ſtatuam ſibi poſuiſſe, cùm brevis admodum fuiſſet. Plin. Hiſt. Nat.

eaſily have ſeen, had he not relied too much on thoſe who had writ on that ſubject before him. It is true, indeed, that Accius has been cenſured for the harſhneſs of his diction, tho', in all other reſpects, he was looked upon as a very good Poet (d). We meet in Aulus Gellius with the excellent reflection he made on that reproach [K]; nor is the anſwer leſs judicious, which he made to thoſe who aſked him, why he did not plead at the bar, ſince he ſucceeded ſo well in the drama [L]. He was but ſhort in ſtature, and yet he cauſed a very large ſtatue of himſelf, to be ſet up in the temple of the Muſes (e). He was ſo high in the public eſteem, that a comedian was puniſhed

(d) See the remark [N].

" I think him a harſh writer; but yet believe
" He merits our peruſal.

" To be unacquainted with the Poets of our own na" tion is owing either to a prodigious careleſneſs, or to " too refin'd a delicacy. I look upon thoſe as unlearned
" to whom the writings of our own authors are " unknown." Suetonius mentions the Electra of Attilius, as we ſhall ſhew in the article of that Poet. The Electra was undoubtedly a Tragedy, and yet Attilius is rank'd among the comic Poets in Volcatius Serdigitus's † catalogue (31); and according to Voſſius's remark, the verſes which Tully, Varro, and Macrobius (32) cite of this author, are of a comic rather than a tragic kind. Whoever ſhould make a difficulty of this, would be deceived; for are not Corneille and Racine tragic writers only, in an abſolute ſenſe, tho' both of them writ Comedies? and in caſe Moliere had taken it in his head to write a Tragedy, as 'tis ſaid Scarron deſign'd at laſt to attempt, would he not ſtill have been call'd a Comic Poet? A majori parte ſumitur denominatio. i. e " A " title takes its name from the greater part." See the remark [F]. But to return to the falſe accuſation of Accius's ſtyle; 'tis to be obſerv'd, that Cicero quotes this Poet often; and in his oration for Sextius, he calls him a very great Poet: Summi Poëtæ ingenium non ſolum arte ſua, ſed etiam dolore exprimebat. i. e. " He diſplay'd the genius of a Poet, not only by " his art, but by his grief." This paſſage is curious; for we there find that Æſop the famous Tragedian, employed thoſe verſes of Accius, which bore ſome alluſion to Cicero's baniſhment, to make the people ſenſible of the injuſtice of that ſentence. The Romans uſed often to apply ſeveral ſtrokes in their dramatic pieces, to the times. See Suetonius (33) and Cicero's firſt and tenth Philippic, in which we are told, that whilſt a Tragedy of Accius was playing, the audience were perpetually applauding as a teſtimony how dear Brutus was to them.

† His judgment on the Latin comic Poets.

(31) Apud Aul. Gell. lib. 15. cap. 24.

(32) I believe that Voſſius, de Poët. Lat. p. 8, is miſtaken with regard to Macrobius.

(33) Sueton. in Cæſar. cap 84.

[K] The excellent reflexion he made on this reproach.] Accius, in his way to Aſia, paſs'd thro' Tarentum, and there ſaw Pacuvius, who had retired to that city in his advanced years. He made him a viſit with the Tragedy of Atreus in his pocket, and read it to him, as it was very natural for a Poet to do. Pacuvius told him, that his verſe was lofty and ſonorous, but at the ſame time a little harſh and crude. Accius confeſs'd his criticiſm was juſt, and thought it a happy omen with regard to his future productions; a genius being like an apple, which, if it be not hard and green before it is ripe, proves good for nought. But 'tis better to conſider the original. Tunc Pacuvium dixiſſe aiunt, ſonora quidem eſſe quæ ſcripſiſſet & grandia, ſed videri ea tamen ſibi duriora & paulum acerbiora. Ita eſt, inquit Accius, uti dicis; neque id ſane me pœnitet, meliora enim fore quæ deinceps ſcribam. Nam quod in pomis eſt, itidem, inquit, eſſe aiunt in ingeniis, quæ dura & acerba naſcuntur, poſt fiunt mitia & jucunda: ſed quæ gignuntur ſtatim vieta & mollia, atque in principio ſunt uvida, non matura mox fiunt, ſed putria. Relinquendum igitur viſum eſt in ingenio quod dies atque ætas mirificet (34). This puts me in mind of an advice which Lipſius gives to young people. Tho' he himſelf was extravagantly fond of a certain conciſe ſtyle, which either diſguſts moſt readers of the epiſtles of that great man, or makes them laugh; he yet cenſures ſuch young perſons as affect brevity, and declared, that it was the parent of a dry, jejune way of writing; but that it was neceſſary, youth ſhould have many ſuperfluities which might be prun'd as they grow older. Adeò, ſays he (35), juventutem ad brevitatem non voco, ut etiam abſterream, ſive quia tutò adſumere vix poteſt, & brevitatis imitatio facillimè ætatem hanc decipit; ſive quia nec utiliter poteſt, & juvenili illo brevitatis ſtudio, aridus plerumque & exſuccus ſtylus evadit, nec facile ad laudatam illam temperiem venitur, niſi initio ubertas quædam & luxuries ſit quam ætas paulatim depaſcat. i. e. " I am ſo
" far from recommending brevity to youth, that I ra" ther deter them from it, either becauſe 'tis hardly
" ſafe, and very apt to deceive people of that age;
" or becauſe it is of no uſe; and that by this juvenile
" affectation of brevity, a ſtyle becomes generally
" dry and jejune. Nor is it eaſy to attain to that " happy medium in writing, unleſs here be at firſt a " certain copiouſneſs and luxuriance, which age may " inſenſibly wear off." Balzac was of the ſame opinion. Amputanda plura ſunt efflorescenti illi ætati quam inſerenti, facileque eſt remedium ubertatis, ſterilia nullo labore ſuperantur (36). i. e. " The bloom " of life requires more pruning than ingrafting; re-
" dundancy is eaſily remedied, but ſterility is abſo-
" lutely incurable." But to return to Accius: Charles Stephens obſerves very juſtly, in his Dictionary as well as thoſe who have built on his foundation; that Quintilian excuſes Accius, by imputing his manner of writing to the age in which he lived. Tragœdiæ ſcriptores Accius atque Pacuvius clariſſimi gravitate ſententiarum, verborum pondere, & autoritate perſonarum. Cæterum nitor, & ſumma in excolendis operibus manus, magis videri poteſt temporibus quàm ipſis defuiſſe. Virium tamen Accio plus tribuitur, Pacuvium videri doctiorem, qui eſſe docti affectant, volunt. i. e. " Among the tragic writers, Accius and " Pacuvius excel for the grandeur of their ſenti-
" ments, the force of their expreſſions, and the ma-
" jeſty of their characters. The grace and laſt po-
" liſhing they wanted, ſeem'd to be owing to the " ages they lived in rather than to themſelves. Such as " pretend to learning, declare that Accius had more
" genius, and Pacuvius more knowledge (37)." One would imagine that Quintilian had copied theſe verſes of Horace, (36) Balzac. Epiſt. Selectæ.

(37) Quintil. Inſtitut. Orator. lib. 10. cap. 1.

Ambigitur quoties uter utro ſit prior, auſert
Pacuvius docti famam ſenis, Accius alti (38).
That is,
" When Accius and Pacuvius are compar'd,
" Both are eſteem'd, both wrote with great reward;
" Pacuvius all the critick voices gains
" For learning, Accius for his lofty ſtrains. Creech.

(38) Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. verſ. 50.

There is a paſſage in Ovid which ſeems to cenſure the ſtyle of Accius, as ſomething ſavage and fierce; but in the whole, I ſhould think this alluded rather to the cruel actions he deſcribes in his Tragedies. The ſenſe of Ovid's thought is, that if we were to judge of a man's inclinations from his writings, Accius would be ſavage; Terence would be a friend to luxurious entertainments, and thoſe who write of wars, couragious.

Accius eſſet atrox, conviva Terentius eſſet,
Eſſent pugnaces, qui fera bella canunt (39).
That is,
" Accius would cruel be, and Terence blithe;
" And combatants all thoſe who ſing of wars.

(39) Ovid Triſt. lib. 2. verſ. 359.

(34) Aul. Gell. lib. 13. cap. 2.

(35) Lipſ. in Inſtitut. Epiſtola.

[L] Nor is the anſwer leſs judicious.] Quintilian relates this little circumſtance. Aiunt Accium interrogatum cur cauſas non ageret, cum apud eum in tragœdiis tanta vis eſſet, hanc reddidiſſe rationem, quod illic ea dicerentur quæ ipſe vellet, in foro dicturi adverſarii eſſent quæ minimè vellet (40). That is,
" Accius being asked why he did not plead at the bar,
" ſince his Tragedies were written with ſo much
" ſtrength and fire, gave this reaſon: I may write,
" ſays he, as I pleaſe, in my dramatic pieces; but at " the bar, my antagoniſts will force me to hear a " great many diſagreeable particulars." I know a man

(40) Quintil. Inſtitut. Orat. lib. 5. cap. 13.

puniſhed [M], for only naming him on the ſtage. We ſhall examine in the remarks, whether we may aſcribe to him what Valerius Maximus relates of one Accius a Poet, who would not riſe from his ſeat, to honour Julius Cæſar, when he came into the aſſembly of the Poets. Cicero ſpeaks very contemptuouſly of one Accius, who had written a hiſtory; and as the tragic Poet wrote Annals, ſome inſiſt that he is the perſon whom Tully cenſures; but others are of a quite different opinion [N]. There was in the ſame age a tolerable good Orator of the ſame name, againſt whom Cicero defended Cluentius. This Accius was of Piſaurum, for which reaſon he may be looked upon as a relation of our Poet [O]. It is falſe to aſſert that Cicero alſo ſpeaks of another man of wit who uſed a like reaſon to divert his ſon from the ſtudy of the law, and to encourage him to ſtudy Divinity. What, ſays he, can be more agreeable than to ſpeak before people who never contradict you! This is the preacher's advantage: And what more grating than to be obliged, the inſtant you have done ſpeaking, to hear all your aſſertions confuted; and to be unmercifully forced to ſhew a reaſon for whatever you have advanced? Such is the pleader's condition.

This recalls to my mind a thought in Montagne. "With regard to the gift of eloquence, ſome, ſays "he (41), are vaſtly quick; and maſters of ſo great "a flow of words, that they are ready upon all oc- "caſions; others, of a more tardy genius, firſt me- "ditate on what they ſhall ſay, and their words are "always laboured.... Were I to give my opinion "with reſpect to the two different advantages of "eloquence, which the Preachers and Lawyers ſeem "chiefly to poſſeſs, the tardy genius would make the "better Preacher, and the quick genius the abler "Lawyer; becauſe the former may take what time "he pleaſes to prepare himſelf, not to mention that "the thread of his diſcourſe is carried on without "the leaſt interruption: but the Pleader is obliged "to be ready every moment to enter the liſts; and "the unforeſeen anſwers of his antagoniſt either "confound his arguments, or oblige him to ſtrike "immediately into a new courſe of reaſoning..... "The Lawyer, ſays he further (42), has the more "difficult task of the two; and we meet, I believe, "with more tolerable Lawyers than Preachers, at "leaſt in France.

(41) Montagne's Eſſays, Book I. the beginning of chap. x. p. 52, 53.

(42) Idem, p. 54.

[M] That a Comedian was puniſhed.] Being brought before the Judge to give ſatisfaction for this injury, he ſaid, in his defence, that it was lawful to name a man who gave his pieces to be exhibited on the ſtage; but Publius Mutius who tried the cauſe, pronounc'd ſentence againſt him. Lucilius, the ſatyric Poet, was not ſo fortunate, for the player who had offended him, by name, on the ſtage, was acquitted; ſo true it is that all Judges are not of the ſame mind, or that a greater regard is paid to ſome perſons than to others. The author who relates theſe two law-ſuits, expreſſes himſelf thus: Mimus quidam nominatim Accium poëtam compellavit in ſcena; cum eo Accius injuriam agit; hic nihil defendit, niſi licere nominari eum, cujus nomine ſcripta dentur agenda (43)..... Caius Cælius judex abſolvit eum injuriarum, qui Lucilium poëtam in ſcena nominatim læſerat: Publius Mutius eum qui L. Accium poëtam nominaverat condemnavit (44). That is, "A certain player mentioned Accius "by name upon the ſtage, upon which Accius ſued "him for damages, but the defendant made no other "anſwer, than by ſaying, it was lawful to name any "perſon who wrote dramatic pieces with a deſign "that they ſhould be acted..... Caius Cælius the "Judge, acquitted him who had inſulted Lucilius the "Poet by name upon the ſtage, but Publius Mutius "condemned him who had named Accius." Glandorpius did not know the place where theſe incidents are related; and aſſerts it (45) merely on the teſtimony of a modern author, whoſe falſe commentary he copies, viz. That the defendant was condemned becauſe he had called Accius barely by his name, without prefixing to it any title of honour or reſpect. Sine præfatione honoris nominaverat (46).

(43) Autor Rhetor. ad Herennium. lib. 1.

(44) Ibid. lib. 2.

(45) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 3.

(46) Catenæus, whoſe words are not cited by Glandorpius; but are found in the Commentary on Pliny's Epiſtles, lib. 5. Epiſt. 3. p. 291.

[N] Others are of a different opinion.] Were I to chuſe I ſhould think as theſe do; for, not to mention that as Cicero has ſo often ſpoke of, and cited our Accius, either with applauſe, or without cenſure, he could not with any decency have abuſed him in his firſt book, De Legibus (Of the Laws); I obſerve farther, that thoſe injurious expreſſions are directly oppoſite to the character of the Poet whoſe article we now write. Sublimity, grandeur and ſtrength, were the characteriſtics of Accius, and we have read (47) the teſtimonies of Horace and Quintilian on that account; to which let us add two verſes from Ovid, and the deciſive decree of Velleius Paterculus.

(47) In the remark [K].

Ennius arte carens, animoſique Accius oris,
Caſurum nullo tempore nomen habent (48).

(48) Ovid. Amor. lib. 1. Eleg. 15. ver. 19.

Imitated,

"Ennius, whoſe muſe by nature was deſign'd
"Compleat, had art with bounteous nature join'd;
"And tragic Accius, of ſtyle ſublime,
"And weighty words ſhall ſtand the ſhock of time.
Mr. Cromwell.

Clara etiam per idem ævi ſpatium fuere ingenia, in togatis Afranii, in tragœdiis Pacuvii atque Attii uſque in Græcorum comparationem EVECTI, magnumque inter hos ipſos facientis operi ſuo locum; adeò quidam, ut in illis limæ, in hoc pene plus videatur fuiſſe SANGUINIS (49). i. e. "At one and the ſame time "ſeveral great genius's aroſe, Afranius for comedy, "Pacuvius and Attius for tragedy; this laſt excelled ſo "much in it, that he was thought to equal the "Greeks, among whoſe works his held a very ho- "nourable place, but in ſuch a manner, that thoſe "of the Greeks ſeem more correct, and his to have "more fire." Were the author I ſhall now quote as conſiderable as the abovementioned, the following character would exceed all we have yet given; for here we ſee Accius raiſed above the famous Euripides. Accius poëta junior ſuo ingenio præcelluit Euripidem, qui fuit altus & ingenio ſublimis (50). That is, "Accius, a more modern Poet, had a greater genius "than the lofty, ſublime Euripides." Another declares that Accius and Virgil were the two moſt excellent Poets of Rome. An Latiæ Muſæ non ſolos adytis ſuis Accium & Virgilium recepere, ſed eorum & proximis, & procul à ſecundis, ſacras conceſſere ſedes (51)? i. e. "Did the Latin Muſes receive not "only Accius and Virgil into the moſt ſecret part of "their temple, but even indulged the ſacred ſeats "not only to Poets who were next to theſe in "reputation, but even much inferior to them?" What probability is there to think, that a perſon on whom theſe elogiums were beſtow'd, could have written a Hiſtory that deſerves the character which Tully gives of the following? Nam quid Accium memorem, cujus loquacitas habet aliquid argutiarum, nec id tamen ex illa erudita Græcorum copia, ſed ex librariolis Latinis? In orationibus autem multus & ineptus, ad ſummam impudentiam. i. e. "Why ſhould I "take notice of Accius, in whoſe loquacity there is "indeed ſome ſtrokes of wit, but they are not taken "from the learned Grecian ſtores, but from the "compoſitions of the Latin ſcribblers. In his "ſpeeches he is too diffuſive and filly, even to the "moſt exalted pitch of impudence (52)." We are to take particular notice, that the Annals of Accius the tragic Poet were in verſe; and that Cicero ſpeaks in that paſſage, of thoſe only, who had written Hiſtory in Latin proſe, for he makes no mention of Ennius. The beſt criticks are of opinion, that this paſſage of Cicero is corrupted; and that we muſt read Macrum not Accium; ſo that this cenſure would be levell'd at Licinius Macer the Hiſtorian. Voſſius gives into this opinion (53); but when he brings for a proof, the friendſhip which was between Siſenna and the perſon whom Cicero ſatyrizes; when, I ſay, he concludes from thence that Cicero did not ſpeak of Accius, he is miſtaken; for, with his leave, Accius and Siſenna were about the ſame age: for Siſenna was old after the civil war between Marius and Sylla (54), that is about the year of Rome 672, and Accius was ſtill living in 665.

(49) Vell. Paterculi. lib. 2. cap. 9.

(50) Acron. in Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2.

(51) Columellæ, de re ruſt. lib. 1. Præf.

(52) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. 1. initio.

(53) Voſſius, Hiſt. Lat. lib. 1. cap. 10.

(54) Vell. Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 9.

[O] Look'd upon as our Poet's relation.] St. Jerom obſerves, that Accius our Poet, was carried to Piſaurum, other celebrated Orator of this name, ſirnamed Navius. Moreri has here committed an error, not conſidering that this Accius Navius is the ſame perſon with the famous Soothſayer (f) whom he ſpeaks of ſome pages after, under the title of ACTIUS NÆVIUS; nor is he leſs miſtaken when he makes the tragic Poet, and the Annaliſt mentioned by Macrobius, two perſons. But what he adds, viz. that Aulus Gellius ſpeaks likewiſe of Accius the Hiſtorian, as a different perſon from the tragic Poet, in the ninth chapter of the third book, is doubly falſe; for that author does not mention an Accius in that part of his work; and in all other places of it, wherever he ſpeaks of Accius, the tragic Poet is to be underſtood. Several perſons were ſatyriz'd, for imitating or admiring the Latin of this Accius [P], in an age when that tongue was more refined.

(f) Cicero, lib. 1. de Divinatione, relates his ſtory. Moreri cites, lib. de Divin. in Verr. which is a falſe citation.

rum, when the Romans ſent a colony thither; and that there was a ſpot of ground, adjacent to the city, call'd Fundus Accianus (55). This ſpot was given to him when lands were diſtributed among the inhabitants of the new colony. Scaliger obſerves on this occaſion, that the colony of Piſaurum was not founded till four years after that of * Bologna, i. e. the year of Rome 568, fifteen years before Accius was born (56). We may therefore conclude that St. Jerom is miſtaken. It was more natural for a Poet, who was the glory of the ſtage in thoſe days, to reſide in Rome, than in one of the colonies; however, we may ſuppoſe that there were ſome grounds for this falſe aſſertion. Poſſibly, Accius's father followed thoſe who conducted the colony to Piſaurum; and perhaps the patron to whom he ow'd his liberty, was one of the principal Commiſſioners of this new ſettlement. In caſe he followed his patron, the land which afterwards was called Fundus Accianus might have been given him; and he might have left, among other children, the father of Accius the Orator. Cicero ſpeaks as follows of this Orator: T. Accium Piſaurenſem, cujus accuſationi reſpondi pro A. Cluentio, qui & accuratè dicebat & ſatis copiosè, eratque præterea doctus Hermagoræ præceptis, quibus etſi ornamenta non ſatis optima dicendi, tamen ut haſtæ velitibus amentatæ, ſic apta quædam & parata ſingulis cauſarum generibus argumenta traduntur (57). i. e. "Titus Accius of Piſaurum, whoſe accuſation I anſwered in "my play for A. Cluentius, who was a correct ſpeaker "and had a pretty great flow of words, was moreover well vers'd in the precepts of Hermagoras, "which, tho' they were not adorned with the brighteſt flowers of Rhetoric, yet, like javelins hurl'd by "light-arm'd ſoldiers, they furniſh certain proper "and ready arguments for all kinds of cauſes." Scaliger does not cenſure St. Jerom for having confuſedly fix'd the great reputation and death of Pacuvius to the third year of the 156th Olympiad (58); and Accius's great reputation to the ſecond year of the 160th Olympiad. All which can only perplex thoſe who know that Pacuvius was fifty years older than Accius. For, if we were to ſuppoſe that Pacuvius died aged fourſcore and ten years, the year in which S. Jerom fixes his death; we then muſt compute that Accius was about forty, the third year of the 156th Olympiad; and yet, according to St. Jerom, he was born under the conſulſhip of Mancimus and Serranus, which anſwers to the ſecond year of 152d Olympiad. Conſequently we cannot depend very much on this Chronology, as I obſerv'd in my ſecond Remark.

(55) In Chron. Euſeb. numb. 1876.

* This was the Bononia of the Old Romans.

(56) Scaliger, Anim. in Euſeb. ibid. ex Patercul. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(57) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 78. See alſo Orat. pro Cluentio.

(58) Pacuvius Brunduſinus tragœdiarum ſcriptor clarus habetur; vixitque Romæ quoad picturam exercuit, & fabulas vendidit. Deinde Tarentum tranſgreſſus propè nona-genarius diem obiit. Chron. Euſeb. num. 1863. That is, "Pacuvius of "Brunduſium "was looked "upon as a fine "tragic writer. "He lived at "Rome as long "as he follow-"ed painting and "ſold dramatic "poems. After-"wards going to "Tarentum, he "died at near "ninety years "of age.

[P] The Latin of this Accius.] Perſius and Martial very much ridiculed thoſe whoſe admired or imitated it.

Eſt nunc Briſæi (59) quem venoſus liber Acci,
Sunt quos Pacuviuſque & verrucoſa moretur
Antiopa, ærumnis cor luctificabile fulta (60).

In Engliſh,

"Some love to hear the fuſtian Accius roar,
"And ſome on obſolete Pacuvius pore,
"Whoſe harſh Antiope's afflicted heart
"Misfortunes only ſtrengthen——

(59) Caſaubon is of opinion, that we are to read Briſeis inſtead of Briſæi, and that it was the title of one of Accius's Tragedies. Scriverius in Teſtimon. de Attio, is miſtaken, when he thinks that Perſius does not hint at the tragic Poet in this place.

(60) Perſ. Satyr 1. verſ. 76.

Martial expreſſes himſelf thus, in the ninety firſt Epigram of his ſecond book;

Attonituſque legis Terrai Frugiferaï,
Accius & quidquid Pacuviuſque vomunt.

Thus Engliſh'd,

"Amaz'd you read Terrai Frugiferaï,
"And ſuch like words as Accius and Pacuvius
"Pour forth.

Had the Romans imitated thoſe obſolete writers, in the ſame manner as our greateſt Wits now imitate Marot, and other Poets of the ſixteenth Century, in tales, * ballads, pindaric odes, † rondeaux &c. written purpoſely in the ancient dialect, methinks no perſon could have juſtly cenſured them for it; but 'tis very probable, they employed this muſty, ſuperannuated ſtyle, in a ſerious way; and thought that the perfection of eloquence, conſiſted either in writing wholly in the obſolete dialect, or in interſperſing the more modern language with ſeveral expreſſions borrowed from the old. See the excellent hints which Favorinus the Philoſopher gives a young man, who was in this taſte § (61). Authors, now-a-days, are very ſeldom guilty in this particular; and more perſons are too ſoon diſtaſted with a word commonly us'd, or ſearch for new-coin'd expreſſions, than too affectedly fond of antiquated words. Theſe are only employed in a humorous, jocoſe way, and in burleſque ſubjects. Some authors only who write in Latin, are ſtill fond of uſing the moſt obſolete expreſſions. When the Latin tongue had attain'd to its perfection, there was doubtleſs another kind of people among the Romans. Theſe were conſtant admirers of the old Poets, but then they never employ'd their ſuperannuated expreſſions, nor would allow others to do it: their only view in this, was to mortify their co-temporary writers, by ranking the old authors above them. Horace ſaw thro' their whole deſign,

Sic fautor veterum, ut tabulas peccare vetantes,
Quas bis quinque viri ſanxerunt: fœdera regum
Vel Gabiis, vel cum rigidis æquata Sabinis,
Pontificum libros, annoſa volumina vatum,
Dictitat Albano Muſas in monte locutas.

Jam Saliare Numæ carmen qui laudat, & illud
Quod mecum ignorat, ſolus vult ſcire videri,
Ingeniis non ille favet, plauditque ſepultis,
Noſtra ſed impugnat, nos noſtraque lividus odit (62).

That is,

"Thus old lovers do admire the ancient laws,
"The Sabines leagues have their deſerv'd applauſe;
"On muſty leaves at awful diſtance look,
"Age makes it reverend, and exalts the book.
"Give him the Bards old ſongs, oh rare! divine!
"I ſwear 'tis good, a muſe ſang ev'ry line.

"Thoſe that applaud the ſongs of former times,
"The dotiſh Bards old verſes or monkiſh rhimes;
"Who wou'd be thought to have a ſharper eye,
"And in thoſe poems numerous graces ſpy,
"In which they ſee no more fine things than I;
"'Tis not to praiſe the old, but ſcorn, abuſe,
"And hate new books, and damn the modern muſe.

Creech.

This alſo is a taſte which the preſent age does not give into. We are contented with extolling the ages of Greece and Rome above our own, but then we don't prefer the orations and poems of the 15th and 16th Centuries, to thoſe of the preſent.

* A piece of French poetry, not ſo much in vogue now as formerly. The Ballades are ſhort, and confined to a certain number of ſtanzas. They are a kind of ballads, and are thus characteris'd by Boileau,

La ballade aſſervie à ſes veilles maximes,
Souvent doit tout ſon luſtre au caprice des rimes.

† An antient kind of French poetry, of which Boileau ſays;

---Villon le premier,
A des refrains reglez aſſervit les rondeaux.

Menage is of opinion that it was called ſo from its conſtruction; and becauſe the beginning of the firſt verſes always muſt be repeated, by which means it runs round, as it were.

§ Favorinus's advice above, is both humorous and judicious. Sed antiquitatem tibi placere ais, quòd honeſta & bona, & ſobria, & modeſta ſit. Vive ergo moribus præteritis; loquere verbis præſentibus. i. e. "But you de-"clare, (ſays he "to the Youth) "that you are "pleaſed with "antiquity, be-"cauſe it is "juſt, good, ſo-"ber and mo-"deſt.... Live "therefore like "the antients; "but ſpeak like "the moderns.

(61) Apud Aul. Gell. lib. 1. cap. 10. quem vide etiam, ibid.

(62) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 2. ver. 23.

† Acco might have ſaid with the Lady who offers her looking-glaſs to Venus;

Venus, take my votive glaſs,
Since I am not what I was,
What from this day I ſhall be,
Venus, let me never ſee. Prior's Poems, Vol. 1.

ACCO. Charles Stephens tells us, that ſhe was an * old woman, who ran diſtracted, when ſhe found by her glaſs, that old age had deformed her † features; to which purpoſe he quotes Cælius Rhodiginus Book VI. chap. 15, but we don't meet with any ſuch paſſage in that work (a). The author of the Supplement to Moreri, ſays further, that this woman took a pleaſure in ſpeaking to her image in the glaſs; and that ſhe would often pretend to refuſe, what ſhe longed for very much. Plutarch, ſays he, adds, That Mothers uſed to frighten their young children with her name, and keep them from being naughty, and quotes the 16th book of Cælius Rhodiginus, and Cicero 2d ad Atticum. I ſhall give the critique of this paſſage hereunder [A], and in the mean time ſhall ſet down what Cælius Rhodiginus relates in another paſſage which is not cited (b). Acco was ſo unaccountably whimſical, that whenever ſhe uſed to view her ſelf in the glaſs, ſhe would diſcourſe with her image, as though it had been a living woman; would nod, promiſe, threaten, ſmile, and employ the ſeveral geſtures and actions which are uſed in converſation. Others write, that ſhe would ſometimes take up a ſpunge, and endeavour to drive a nail with it, as though it had been a hammer: this is all we find in Cælius Rhodiginus. With regard to Plutarch, all he obſerves is, that Chryſippus did not approve that men ſhould be terrified by God's juſtice, to prevent their falling into ſin (c). For, would he ſay, Men have arguments enough to oppoſe what is advanced with regard to Divine Puniſhments; arguments which ſhew that ſuch diſcourſes are like thoſe of our old women, who terrify children by calling out upon Acco and Alphito [B], when they are naughty. Plutarch ſhews that Chryſippus contradicted himſelf.

* Charles Stephens ſays, jam decrepita, i. e. "decrepit, or "very old.

(a) Lloyd has not made any alteration in that paſſage, except that he cites Cæl. Rhodig. book 16. chap. 2.

(b) Book 17, cap. 2, he tells us that he read this in the epitome of the Adages or Proverbs of Tarræus and Didymus.

(c) Plutarch, de Stoicorum repugnant. pag. 1040. B.

[A] I ſhall give the critique of this paſſage hereunder.] Firſt, none of the three authors who are cited, relate that Acco ran diſtracted, upon finding herſelf ſo ugly in the glaſs; or that ſhe pretended to refuſe, what ſhe long'd for very much. Plutarch is expreſly quoted for this; ſince, after taking notice of Acco's diſtraction, her chimæra with regard to her image, and her diſſimulation, 'tis further ſaid, that Plutarch adds; which is as much as to ſay, I. That Plutarch related thoſe three circumſtances, which conſequently, is an impoſition upon the reader, ſince that author relates thoſe particulars only, which I quoted from him. II. How negligent is that writer, to quote only Cicero 2d ad Atticum? Does he mean the ſecond epiſtle, or the ſecond book? And muſt the reader be left to gueſs which? Muſt he be at the trouble to examine which letter and book it is? But if he has the patience to do this, 'twill be loſt labour. In the nineteenth epiſtle of the ſecond book are theſe words; Certi ſumus periiſſe omnia; quid enim ἀναζώμεθα tamdiu. i. e. "It is certain all is loſt, what ſignifies "then our ſhuffling any longer? III. Cicero is falſely quoted, for he does not ſay any thing of Acco. The Greek word which he, and ſeveral other authors employ to denote what we call cajoling, ſhuffling, and pretending to refuſe what one paſſionately deſires: this word, I ſay, which Eraſmus (1) inſerted among his proverbs, has made ſome perſons ſuſpect that Acco was a hypocrite; but as this is only a conjecture, a writer ought not to cite Plutarch, Cicero, or even Cælius Rhodiginus, for conjectures which other perſons have advanc'd.

(1) See Acciſſare, in Adagior, Chil. 2. Cent. 2. numb. 99.

[B] Who terrify children by calling out upon Acco and Alphito.] I believe that this is a cuſtom all the world over; but then I heard ſeveral perſons of very great learning exclaim againſt it. The Romans had alſo their † Manducus, with which they us'd to threaten children, as will be ſhewn under that word.

† This anſwers to our Bulbeggar, or Raw-head and bloody-bones.

☞ACCOLTI (Bernardo) ſon to Laura Federighi, a noble Lady of Florence, and of the famous Benedetto, (brother of Peter the Cardinal) Secretary to the Republic of Florence, was ſirnamed l'Unico, or the Non-ſuch, perhaps for the prodigious extent of his underſtanding, for the variety of ſciences he had acquired, and the excellency of his poetic vein, which gained him a ſeat among the Academicians of the court of Urbino. His ſhining merit procured him ſo much favour with that great Mæcenas Pope Leo the Tenth, that as a proof of the high eſteem he had for Accolti, he generouſly created him in 1520, Prince of the State of Nepi. But though this great Man was raiſed to this high dignity (a happineſs very few Poets meet with) he nevertheleſs continued his compoſitions with as much vigour as ever. He wrote many pieces [A]. Several famous writers, and among others Ludovico Arioſti and Baldaſſare Caſtiglione, ſpeak of him with great applauſe (a).

(a) Iſtoria de Fiorentini, Scritt. Folio 1722.

[A] He wrote many pieces.] Among others are a collection of beautiful Poems, printed at Venice in 1519 and 1553. The liberality of Pope Leo X, a Poem ſtill in manuſcript. Two letters to Peter Aretino from Rome, and inſerted in Francis Marcellini's collection of Letters, written by ſeveral Literati to Peter Aretino, and printed at Venice 1551.

Accolti, of which name there are alſo ſeveral other learned men, made the Epitaph of the famous Poet Seraphino of Aquila, who died in 1500, which runs thus,

Qui giace Serafin. Partirti or puoi:
Sol d'aver viſto il Saſſo che lo ſerra,
Aſſai ſei debitor a gli occhi tuoi (1).

(1) Idem, ibid.

That is,

"Here Seraphim's interr'd. Now thou may'ſt go,
"Happy enough, ſince thy admiring eyes,
"Have ſeen the precious marble where he lies.

☞ACCOLTI, the name of an antient family in Tuſcany, which has produced ſeveral great men. I. Benedict Accolti, the Elder, called ſo to diſtinguiſh him from another of the ſame name, who lived about the year 1450. He was born at Arezzo in Tuſcany, and flouriſhed about the year 1376 (a). He wrote the ſame year a Treatiſe, which he dedicated to the Emperor Charles IV, wherein he exhorted him to undertake an expedition into Italy, after he had crowned his ſon Wenceſlaus King of the Romans, in order to quiet the Diſorders there, and to put a ſtop to the deſigns of thoſe, who in Tuſcany had invaded the rights not only of the Roman Empire, but even of the Pope himſelf. We ſhall give ſome account of this Treatiſe in a note [A].

(a) Caſim. Oudini Comment. de Scriptorib. & Scriptis Eccleſ. tom. 3. Sæc. 14. col. 1146.

II. Benedict

[A] We ſhall give ſome account of this treatiſe in a note.] It is preſerv'd among the Latin Manuſcripts, which were brought from the Ambroſian Library at Milan to that of the Emperor of Germany, Cod. 138. as we are inform'd by Lambecius (1), who tells us that the author's name is mark'd only with the initial letters, B de A; and that this Treatiſe was never publiſh'd. The title of it is as follows: Incipit tracta-

(1) Comment. Bibliothecæ Cæſareæ Vindobenſis cap. 8. p. 817.

II. BENEDICT ACCOLTI the Younger, is ſuppoſed to have been the grandſon of the former (b), and was born at Arezzo in 1415. He flouriſhed about the year 1450 (c), and wrote ſeveral books [B]. III. PETER ACCOLTI the ſon of Benedict Accolti a Gentleman of Arezzo and Laura Federica, was born about the year 1455. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law, of which he was profeſſor, and taught with great applauſe. He was afterwards made Vicar of Rome by Pope Julius II. who likewiſe created him Cardinal of St. Euſebius in March 1511 (d). He was raiſed ſucceſſively to the Biſhopricks of Ancona, Arras, Cremona, and Cales, and to the Archbiſhoprick of Ravenna. He wrote ſeveral Hiſtorical Tracts, and died at Rome the 11th of December 1532. IV. BENEDICT ACCOLTI was born at Florence the 29th of October 1497. He was nephew, or as Leander Albertus tells us [C], grandſon to the preceding, and ſon of Michael Accolti, and Lucretia Alemanni. He made a prodigious progreſs in the ſtudy of the law, and became ſo great a maſter of the Latin tongue, that he was called the Cicero of his time. The intereſt of his uncle and his own merit made him very much conſidered at the court of Rome, ſo that Leo X. gave him the Biſhoprick of Cales; Adrian VI. preferred him to that of Cremona, and to the Archbiſhoprick of Ravenna; and Clement VII. created him a Cardinal the third of May 1527. He wrote at the deſire of the laſt of theſe Popes a Treatiſe concerning the Rights of the Papacy over the Kingdom of Naples. He left ſeveral other works, and particularly divers pieces of Poetry. He died at Florence in 1549. V. FRANCIS ACCOLTI, Biſhop of Ancona, was brother to the laſt named. He was a perſon of eminent genius and merit, and great things were expected from him: but he died of the Plague when he was very young, under the Pontificate of Adrian VI. VI. BENEDICT ACCOLTI, is famous for being at the head of a conſpiracy againſt Pope Pius IV. which he carried on in conjunction with Peter Accolti his couſin, Count Antonio de Canoſſa, the Chevalier Peliccione, Proſpero d'Ettore, and Thaddeo Manfredi, who were all deeply involved in debt, and men of enterprizing tempers. The motive, or rather pretext of this conſpiracy was, as they affirmed, that Pius IV was not the lawful Pope, and that it was neceſſary to remove him in order to chooſe another in his room. Accolti animated his accomplices with the hopes of very opulent rewards. He engaged to give Pavia to Antonio, Cremona to Thaddeo, Aquileia to Peliccione, and a revenue of five thouſand crowns to Proſpero. But ſome of thoſe who had undertaken to give the blow, having (b) Oudin. tom. 3. col. 2582.

(c) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. lib. 3. c. 7.
(d) Voſſius and Oudin. ubi ſupra.

tus de habilitate temporis ad proceſſum verſus Italiam, tum propter electionem Imperatoris Romanorum, tum propter diſcordias Italorum; & primo deprecatio & hortatus ad movendum pectus Cæſareum ſine retardatione debere ingredi Italiam ad paciſcendum diſſidia & ad confutandum rebelles. i. e. "Here begins a Treatiſe, the deſign of which is to ſhew, that it is a proper time to undertake an expedition into Italy, upon the account both of the election of a King of the Romans, and of the diſputes among the Italians; and in the firſt place an exhortation to induce the Emperor to go to Italy without any delay in order to ſtop the diſorders there, and to ſubdue the rebels." Then follows the Preface directed to Charles the fourth, Emperor of Germany, and King of Bohemia. The author immediately after introduces Italy in all the circumſtances of diſtreſs, addreſſing herſelf to him, in order to induce him to defend her cauſe. When this ſpeech is finiſh'd, he brings in another proſopopœia or oration of Italy to the Emperor Charles the fourth; which begins thus: Sequitur lacrymabilis Arenga Italiæ quærulantis ſuper abſentia ſui naturalis Domini, & eum revocare nitentis. Quæ occaſio meum deſiderabilem Dominum tenuit tot annis? quæ tanta oblivionis licentia à calore cordis ejus miſerabilem me projecit, quemadmodum mei vultus ſibi nunquam innotuiſſet imago &c. That is, "Here follows the ſorrowful harangue of Italy complaining of the abſence of her natural Lord, and endeavouring to recal him. What affair has detain'd my dear Lord from me ſo many years? What cloud of oblivion has ſeparated me, wretched as I am, from the tenderneſs of his affection, as if he had never known my face? &c." The Preface concludes with a Dedication of the book, and a diviſion of it into twelve chapters. At the end of this treatiſe follows another tract, intitled, Epiſtola de Succeſſore ipſius, inclyto videlicet Filio Domino Domino Wenceſlao, Romanorum & Bohemiæ Rege potentiſſimo. i. e. "An Epiſtle concerning the Emperor's Succeſſor, his moſt renowned Son Wenceſlaus, the moſt potent King of the Romans and Bohemia." It begins thus; Sacri Imperii fidelium univerſitas plenitudine gaudiorum laſciviens hilareſcat, jucundis exultet applauſibus &c. To this is added, Notitia ſtatûs Hetruriæ. i. e. "An Account of the State of Tuſcany;" in which is ſhewn what cities and caſtles at that time had leagued together againſt the Emperor and the Roman Empire; and what on the other hand had continued in their allegiance. Theſe Tracts are written in a very affected and bombaſt ſtyle, as the learned reader will eaſily perceive from what we have tranſcribed of them; and this was the univerſal fault of all the writers of that barbarous age, wherein all true taſte of polite literature was extinguiſh'd.

[B] And wrote ſeveral Books.] Libri quatuor de Bello à Chriſtianis contra Barbaros geſto pro Judæâ & ſancto Sepulchro recuperando. i. e. "Four Books concerning the War which the Chriſtians carried on againſt the Infidels in order to recover Judea and the Holy Sepulchre." This work was publiſh'd at Francfort in Germany in 1574, by Robert Winter in his Collectaneum Variorum, p. 1171, where it is intitled, Harangues militaires de la Guerres faicts par les Chretiens contre les Barbares, i. e. "Military Diſcourſes concerning the Wars carried on by the Chriſtians againſt the Barbarians." It was publiſhed again in Latin at Florence in 1623, in 4to, with notes by Thomas Dempſter, a man of great eminence for learning at that time. We have another piece of Benedict Accolti's de Præſtantiâ virorum ſui ævi, i. e. "Of the excellent Perſonages of his time." Written in the manner of a Dialogue, and dedicated to Coſmus de Medicis, Duke of Florence, who had a great eſteem for our author. This was printed in 8vo, at Parma in 1692. He likewiſe made a large collection of letters and pieces, that regard public affairs; which is ſtill preſerv'd in manuſcript among the Archives at Florence (2).

(2) Oudin. ubi ſupra.

[C] . . or as Leander Albertus tells us, Grandſon to the preceding.] We find this paſſage in Voſſius (3); Ac Leander Albertus in Italiâ ſuâ, cum iſta ſcriberet, (edidit autem opus hoc ſuum anno 1550) eundem etiam ſupereſſe ait; atque addit AVUM ei fuiſſe Petrum de Accoltis Aretinum, qui Epiſcopus Anconitanus fuit, atque à Papa Julio II, anno 1511, creatus eſt itidem Cardinalis tituli S. Euſebii. i. e. "Leander Albertus tells us, that while he was writing his Italia, (which was publiſhed by him in 1550,) this Cardinal was living; and adds, that his GRANDFATHER was Peter de Accoltis of Arezzo, who was Biſhop of Ancona, and created Cardinal of St. Euſebius by Pope Julius II. in 1511.

(3) De Hiſt. Lat. lib. 3. cap. 7.

having failed twice or thrice for want of courage, though they had an opportunity of executing their purpoſe, Accolti, who was accuſed of having lived at Geneva, began to be ſuſpected by the Pope, becauſe he had deſired audience of him too frequently; ſo that he was ſeized with his companions, and puniſhed with them, after they had all confeſſed their crime. This happened in 1562 (e).

(e) Pier. Valer. de Intel. Liter. Thuan. lib. 36. Auberi, Hiſt. des Cardinaux.

ACCCORDS (STEPHEN TABOUROT SEIGNEUR DES) Advocate in the Parliament of Dijon, and afterwards the King's Advocate in the Bailiwick and Chancery of that city, was born in 1549 (a). He was a man of genius and erudition, but amuſed himſelf too much with trifles, as is plain from his book entitled † Les Bigarrures, firſt printed at Paris in 1582 [A]; which work I have ſometimes quoted (b). This was not his firſt production, he having printed ſome Sonnets before (c); a circumſtance which (a) We ſee round the print of his head, that he was 35 years old in 1584.

(b) See the table of contents under the word Accords.

† Bigarrures ſignifies properly colours ill ſuited in dreſs, furniture, &c. and in a figurative ſenſe, a work of wit, compoſed of various unconnected ſubjects, which have no manner of relation to one another, a rhapſody.

(c) See the IVth Book, p. 477. of his Bigarrures; printed for Maucroy at Paris, in 12°, anno 1662.

[A] His book entitled, les Bigarrures, firſt printed at Paris, in 1582.] As he himſelf ſets down this date, in his Preface to the ſecond edition, we are to believe him rather than la Croix du Maine, or du Verdier Vau-Privas, who fix it at 1583. The firſt book of the Bigarrures is divided into twenty two Chapters, which treat, among other ſubjects, Of the Rebuſ's of Picardy, of ambiguous or double meanings, of Antiſtrophes, of * Retrograde verſes, of Alluſions, of Acroſticks, of the Echo, of Leonine verſes, of the other kinds of verſe contriv'd waggiſhly and ingeniouſly, of Epitaphs &c. Theſe, ſays la Croix du Maine, abound with facetious and pleaſant touches (1). The Printer did not fail to take notice, that he publiſh'd this work without the author's leave, who ſays the Printer (2) declar'd publickly, that age, time, and his profeſſion, had chang'd his humour and inclination; and that it would very ill become him to own things he had compos'd in the wanton, unripe ſeaſon of life, being then ſcarce eighteen; or ſhould he, after he had given a proof of his abilities, in ſome noble and learned ſubject, pretend not to ſtifle his natural and illegitimate little children, born out of wedlock (for thus he us'd to ſpeak of his three firſt books.) By this I plainly ſaw, that it was a ſtudied excuſe, calculated merely to amuſe us, which prompted me to publiſh all ſuch manuſcript pieces of his, as I had by me. The author alſo pretended ignorance on this occaſion; "I was "very much ſurpriz'd, ſays he (3), when I ſaw the "firſt impreſſion of this work, imagining that it had "been buried in oblivion. But upon peruſing it, "as a piece that was, in ſome meaſure, entirely new "to me, and on which I had not ſet eyes for fourteen "years; I immediately diſcovered my own genius "and ſtyle, at the time when I drew it up merely "for my own diverſion †; and to make myſelf laugh "firſt, and afterwards other people: ſo that the only "§ order I obſerv'd in it, was, to croud the examples "in a confus'd and irregular method, as they occurr'd "to me. This book being a patch-work piece, no "ways curious, and compos'd on little ſcraps of "paper, tack'd together at various times, a great "many of which I knew however were loſt, inſo-"much, that as every man is fond of his own pro-"ductions, I then reſolv'd to ſend the additions ſince, "which were increas'd ſince that time, with thoſe "which had been omitted." Be this as it will, he owns the ſecond edition; On which occaſion, ſays he farther (4), I read the waggiſh work quite through, which I had never done before; in order that it might be republiſh'd in a faithful and genuine manner. And, as I have ſince recollected ſeveral curious little particulars, and had others on the ſame ſubject ſent me in a very friendly manner, by one of the moſt learned men in France, I have added them to the work as an Appendix. Pâquier did not approve of Tabourot's enlarging his Bigarrures; ſince it ſhew'd that he continued too long in places which he ought to have but juſt paſt through. Works of this kind ſhould be to authors as inns to travellers, which are proper to bait at, but not to live in. They may be as ſo many excurſions, but not as a fix'd habitation. Such young people may be excus'd, as trifle away a few hours in amuſements of this kind; but when they either correct or augment ſuch productions in their riper years, one would imagine they intended to devote themſelves to this way of writing all their life time, & tanquam ad Sirenum ſcopulos conſeneſcere, i. e. "grow old, as "it were, before the rocks of the Syrens." This I take to be the ſenſe of the letter which Pâquier writ to Tabourot in 1584. I read your beautiful Bigarrures, ſays Pâquier, with much pleaſure, not only becauſe of the friendſhip that is between us, but alſo upon account of the ſprightly and agreeable touches with which they abound; or rather, becauſe they are variegated and diverſified with a numberleſs multitude of fine ſtrokes. But I could have wiſh'd they had not been augmented in the ſecond edition. If I may be allow'd to gueſs, methinks a great many of the additions are far from boaſting that eaſineſs and humour, which diſtinguiſh your productions; inſomuch that I could eaſily have perſuaded myſelf, ſome other perſon had lent you thoſe pieces out of a miſtaken charity. Such ſubjects as theſe are to be conſider'd as a kind of ſport, and not as a vow on which all our thoughts are to be fixed. My writing in this manner is a proof that I both love and honour you; ſince I never deliver'd my ſelf with ſo much freedom before † (5).

* Retrograde verſes, are thoſe which form exactly the ſame words, whether read backward or forward, as is in this, Signate, ſigna, temerè me tangis & angis.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoiſe, p. 80.

(2) Andrew Paſquier's advice to the reader, prefixed to the Bigarrures.

(3) The author's preamble, concerning the editions of the Bigarrures, dated at Verroney, Sept. 25, 1584.

† The author's own words are, When I built it (the work) to tickle my ſelf.

§ It is plain that this Gentleman's order was nothing but diſorder.

(4) Idem, folio. a. v.

† The French is, Puiſque pour la premiere fois, je vous parle librement; which may alſo be tranſlated thus: "Since I "deliver my ſelf "with ſo much "freedom, the "firſt time of "my writing to "you.

(5) Pâquier's Letters, book 8. vol. 1. pag. 492, 493.

I believe that des Accords made very little uſe of this advice, but publiſh'd his Bigarrures with more additions. I have the Paris edition by me, printed in 1614, which contains not only the fourth book of the Bigarrures, but alſo the les * Contes facetieux du Sieur Gaulard, a Gentleman of the Burgundian Franche Comté, and les † Eſcraignes Dijonnoiſes, collected by the Sieur des Accords. This fourth book is not preceded either by the ſecond or the third, but the author gives ſeveral reaſons, why he nevertheleſs calls it the fourth (6); and among others ſays, that had he follow'd the common method of writers, his whole work would not be well variegated. He confeſſes, that he annex'd the Sieur Gaulard's tales to make it ſell the better. Thoſe perſons, ſays he (7), who have purchas'd only the firſt book, purely for the ſake of joking and laughing, will be forc'd to buy this alſo, allured by the wanton touches with which I have interſperſed it, ſuch as the apophthegms, on ſilly jeſts, or rather abſurd reflexions of Mr. Gaulard; on which model, I have been told, ſome perſons in France were for attempting other pieces; but theſe people are in the wrong, to deprive our Burgundian of the glory he juſtly merits. And therefore I'll act as the Caſtilian widow did, who would not ſell her horſe, without her cat.

* Facetious Tales

† Dijon Stories.

(6) In his Preface to the 4th of the Bigarrures.

(7) Ibid. fol. A: iij.

We are to obſerve that the fourth book of the Bigarrures is of a more ſerious turn than the firſt, and divided into three chapters. The firſt contains ſome reflexions, uſeful for the bringing up of children: The ſecond relates to the changing one's ſirname; and the third, ſeveral particular obſervations on French verſe; the work concluding with a diſcourſe on pretended Wizards and their impoſtures: the whole book being interſper'd with a great number of curious and uſeful particulars. As the particular caſt of this fourth book is very different from the reſt; he gives that as one reaſon why he publiſh'd it before the ſecond and third. But I muſt cite his own words, as they ſhew that he ſtill continued to write in a waggiſh ſtrain, (ſince he apologizes for his ſo doing) after Pâquier had adviſed him to the contrary. What I have done (8), ſays he (9), was chiefly to ſhew by the diſcourſes of this book, that my mind is not always employed on laſcivious matters, in order to ſtop the mouths of a croud of ignorant ſlanderers, who have malicioufly objected this to me, with regard to ſuch as think it indecent in a man of my profeſſon, to wanton ſtill, ſometimes in proſe, and at other times in verſe; I refer them to the celebrated Pâquier's learned prefatory Epiſtle to his French letters, where he ſhews, from the ſtrongeſt reaſons as well as, examples, that the mind muſt not be ſo conſtantly fix'd on one profeſſion, as not to be ſometimes ſuffer'd to rove through the gay regions of fancy. I indeed applaud thoſe who, like the Germans, can be confined wholly to one profeſſion; but then we ſhould not condemn others, who having a genius capable of cultivating ſeveral, exert it ſo happily in all, that they equal or fall but very little ſhort of ſuch as apply themſelves but

(8) That is with regard to his publiſhing the 4th book of his Bigarrures, before the 2d and 3d.

(9) Preface to the 4th book of the Bigarrures, fol. A. ij.

which was not known either to La Croix du Maine, or Du Verdier Vau-Privas. The work entitled, Les Touches, was printed at Paris in 1585 [B]. 'Tis indeed a collection of ingenious Poems, but moſt of them on obſcene ſubjects, which are worked up in too looſe a manner, according to the depraved cuſtom of that age. His Bigarrures are in the ſame ſtrain. He was cenſured for this kind of writing, which obliged him to make his own apology [C]. He is ſaid to have written a Dictionary of French Rhymes but to one only. 'Tis well known that the minds of the French, are of ſo ſprightly, ſo various a caſt, that 'tis a pain to them, to be confin'd wholly to one ſcience. Why therefore am I cenſured, for employing thoſe hours which others triſle away in this laudable occupation; which, if ſeriouſly conſider'd, will not be found either idle or fruitleſs?

Here follows another reaſon, which ſhews particularly, that he ſubmitted but for a time to the cenſures of the criticks, and did not intend to ſuppreſs the ſecond book, tho' a little laſcivious. " In the ſe-
(10) Preface to the fourth Book of the Bigarrures, fol. A. iij. " cond, ſays he (10), I treat in like manner, of the periphraſes, the hyperboles, the metonymias, the metaphoras, the ſynechdoches &c. in the moſt proper " French diction I could poſſibly make choice of; " and the examples I have given are ſo entertaining, " that they muſt neceſſarily divert the reader. But " as ſome of theſe are as laſcivious and offenſive to " the ears of our ſtupid criticks, as the firſt, I ſtill " leave them for another opportunity; and have " paſs'd at one leap to the fourth, purpoſely to content the moſt ſerious minds, who will be pleas'd " with me for exhibiting ſome things never touch'd " upon before, that I know of."

[B] The work entitled, les Touches, was printed at Paris, in 1585.] He divided it into three books, and dedicated the firſt to a Prelate, viz. to Pontus de Tyard, Lord of Biſſy, and Biſhop of Châlons. He
(11) In the Dedication. boaſts (11), that the whole was written in two months, at Verdun upon the Soane, in 1585 (12), and
(12) This ſhews that he did not follow Stephen Pâquier's advice. ſays that they are epigrams, which may with the greateſt propriety be called Touches: for 'tis a ſlight kind of fencing, in which by parrying with the file, I give ſuch a touch or thruſt, as ſcarce raiſes the
(13) Dedication to the Touches. ſkin, and cannot pierce deep into the fleſh (13). 'Tis
(14) Preface to the Touches, printed with the Bigarrures. ſaid in another place (14), That touches according to the author, is a term borrowed from Fencers, who ſo call the thruſt they give with their ſwords parry'd; the mark of which appears on the clothes of the perſon who is thus hit; the ſword being whited with chalk &c. The Touches of des Accords, which are commonly annexed to his Bigarrures are different from thoſe I have been ſpeaking of.

[C] He was cenſur'd for this (obſcene) kind of writing, which obliged him to apologize for himſelf.] I have cited his apology elſewhere (15), and will here add, that
(15) In the remark [M] of the article MAROT. his Printer has given him ſuch a character as ſeems to confirm it. " Which occaſioned me, ſays he, to pub-
(16) Andrew Paſquet's advertiſement to the reader, prefixed to the Bigarrures. " liſh all ſuch copies of them as I had by me, with the " free addition of words both ſmutty and laſcivious, " as we may ſay, provided they were ingenious: for " notwithſtanding that the author was willing to pay " ſome regard to chaſte ears, and purpoſely omitted " ſeveral particulars; yet as I heard himſelf declare, " that this was ipſum evitare Priapum; and that, unleſs this liberty were taken, a great number of fine " thoughts would loſe all their grace; I at laſt choſe " to follow his opinion rather than his advice. He " will excuſe me for thus gueſſing at his real ſentiments, but I ſhall apologize for myſelf in the following verſes of Catullus,

" Caſtum decet eſſe pium Poëtam
" Ipſum; verſiculos nihil neceſſe eſt,
" Qui tum denique habent ſalem & leporem,
" Si ſunt molliculi & parùm pudici *.

" Carm. xvi. ver. 5.

Tranſlated,

" The Bard himſelf ſhould modeſt be,
" Tho' gay his verſes are, and free,
" Which ever are moſt witty found,
" When they with ſmutty ſtrokes abound.

" And will be ſo bold as to aſſert, that theſe, ſo far " from offending any, (a few hypocrites excepted) " will, on the contrary, be as ſo many hints to young " people, not to amuſe themſelves ſo much in thoſe " curious reſearches, ſince they will here find them " prepared to their hands; and in ſuch abundance as " will give them a ſurfeit, and occaſion them to dip into good books, whence they may gather wholeſome " inſtructions: for I am firmly of opinion, that the " multitude of books which are now publiſhed, and " the eaſy opportunity there is of peruſing them, " deprave the mind, and divert it from enquiring after, and reading carefully good ones; even when " ſuch people fancy themſelves poſſeſſed of collections, which diſcover the whole ſecret, and in " which the viands are ready chew'd for them †. " With regard to the laſcivious touches, I cannot " think they can ſhock thoſe perſons ſo much as the " Priapeia of Virgil, Catullus and Martial's Epigrams, the Amorum of Ovid, Terence's Plays, " Petronius Arbiter, and in a word, the moſt beautiful and rare productions of antiquity, which are " repreſented to them as ſerious things, and worthy " their imitation; whereas the laſcivious deſcriptions " which are here exhibited, repreſent wantonly ſuch " ideas as make but a very ſlight impreſſion. Moreover, every thing in this book is curious, genteel " and ingenious; and the author ought not to have " conceal'd himſelf, upon pretence that the ſubject is " too trifling." The meaning of this, is, that Des Accords did not write in ſo licentious a manner, in order to foment the wanton paſſions; but purely to amuſe, and that his verſe might not be barren of thoſe witty touches, which give them a ſprightlineſs and poinancy, agreable to the taſte which had prevailed for ſeveral ages. He was not ignorant of the maxim, that delicate obſcenity is more dangerous than coarſe ſmut (17): for in this manner he applies it in his own juſtification,

† i. e. Collections in which the fineſt paſſages of books are inſerted or pointed out.

(17) See my Illuſtration with regard to obſcenities, num. xii.

Des Amadis (18).

" Qui voudra voir ces Eſcrits,
" Les liſe auprès de s'amie,
" Car ils donneront envie
" A tous deux d'eſtre laſcifs.

(18) Des Accords in the Touches, printed with the Bigarrures, in 12°, p. 82, for Maucroy; Paris anno 1662.

Imitated

" Of the Amadis's.

" Let him whoſe ſoul is tun'd to love,
" Read theſe to his fond turtle-Dove;
" The lines will warmeſt thoughts inſpire
" Till both diſſolve in Cupid's fire.

" Of one who read Amadis, and cenſur'd the Bigarrures.

" Toi, qui permets les lectures
" D'Amadis, & ne veux pas
" Qu'on liſe les Bigarrures,
" Cauteleuſement tu as
" Apperceu que les mots gras
" N'entrent vivement dans l'ame,
" Pour ſuborner une dame,
" Comme les mignards appas.

In Engliſh.

" When you allow the wanton page
" Of Amadis to pleaſe the age,
" But then with frowning air, forbid
" The Variegations to be read,
" Archly you judge, looſe thoughts inſpire
" (When coarſely drawn) not half the fire,
" In a young Nymph's ſoft-heaving breaſt,
" As thoſe in decent language dreſt.

I here call to mind a reflexion of Sorel. Thoſe Poets, ſays he (19), whoſe compoſitions are liable to the cenſure of the Magiſtrate, and burnt at the †Greve, are great fools; for they imagine that ſuch pieces are very pleaſing to thoſe who love to ſport with women; but ſo far from it; that all who read their * ſmutty collections, are not prompted to venery for a long time; the reaſon of which is, thoſe pieces abound ſo much with ſmut and ribaldry, that they ſtrike the reader with horror. But to do juſtice to the author, I muſt obſerve that he qualifies this a little. However, I am aware, ſays he (20), that ſome may object we ought not then to forbid

(19) Sorel's Remarks on the Berger Extravagant, book xi. p. 379. printed at Roan in 1646, in 2 vol 8°.

† Or as we might ſay by the common hangman; the Greve being with regard to Paris, what Tyburn is to London.

* It is in the original Cabinet Satyrique, a very obſcene book.

(20) Idem, pag. 379.

Rhymes [D]. By the way, the Lordſhip of Accords is an imaginary fief or tenure, founded only on the device of his anceſtors [E]. We are to obſerve, that WILLIAM TABOUROT his father who was Advocate in the Parliament of Dijon, Counſellor to the King, and Maſter Extraordinary of the Chamber of Accompts *, is very much applauded by Peter de St. Julien, in the work entitled the Original of the Burgundians (d). He died in the forty ſixth year of his age (e) July the 24th 1561.

(d) See La Croix du Maine, p. 156.

(e) See his epitaph in his ſon's Bigarrures, pag. 325.

* The Chamber of Accompts is a Sovereign Court of great antiquity, in which the accompts of the monies are kept, &c. to which Preſidents and Maſters belong.

forbid the reading of them, ſince they create an averſion to vice; to which I anſwer, this is to be underſtood of thoſe only who are virtuouſly inclined: for we ought not to enjoin ſuch penances as may expoſe men to temptation, ſince but too many are fond of living in filth.

[D] He is ſaid to have written a Dictionary of French Rhimes.] La Croix du Maine declared that he wrote a work entitled, Of French Rythmes (21); but he afterwards corrected himſelf, and found (22) that the true author was John le Fevre, born in Dijon, Secretary to Cardinal de Givri, and Canon of Langres. This retractation is juſt, for Des Accords himſelf acquaints the public that it was written by another. Theſe are his words at the cloſe of his chapter of French Poetry. I ſhall give, ſays he (23), my opinion more at large, in the collection I am preparing of the French Poetry, in which Pelletier has laboured with great erudition; Ronſard (as in all other things) divinely and with great propriety; and Quintil the Cenſor well enough conſidering the age he lived in: theſe, and ſome others, have cleared away the thorns; from all whom I ſhall borrow compendiouſly, (quoting their own words, and mentioning their names) in compiling a ſequel to our uncle le Fevre's Dictionary of French Rhymes, which I ſhall publiſh one time or other. I am inclined to believe that Des Accords kept his word, from a paſſage in the Preface to the Dictionary of French Rhymes, printed in 1596, by the heirs of Euſtache (Euſtachius) Vignon in 8vo. The author begins thus; I firſt, ſays he (24), compiled this Dictionary (which conſiſted of very near the ſame number of words it now does) by way of amuſement, and to ſupply the defect of my treacherous memory. Afterwards meeting with that of the Seigneur des Accords, enriched with a great many annotations on Rhyme; I took a fancy to reviſe my own, and philoſophize alſo a little on this ſubject, which has been of ſome advantage to me.

(21) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 156.

(22) Idem, pag. 222; and it is to be obſerved, that he tells us this Dictionary of French Rythmes was printed at Paris by Galiot du Pré, in 1572.

(23) Des Accords Bigarrures, book iv. chap. 3. at the concluſion, pag. 494. of the above cited edition.

(24) Preface to that Dictionary of Rhymes.

[E] The Lordſhip of Accords is an imaginary fief or tenure, founded merely on the device of his anceſtors.] Let us hear his own account. "Since, ſays he (25), "in the Diſcourſe on the changing one's firname (26), "I blame thoſe who do it; and yet by aſſuming the "title of Seigneur des Accords, ſeem to declare myſelf "worthy of the puniſhment I would inflict on others; "I muſt inform the reader, that I had not ſo great a "contempt for that kind of writing, ſince I myſelf "expreſt my name by way of acroſtic (27) in the "ſeveral chapters of the firſt book; and in the ſecond "have ſet down the year and place where it was com- "poſed. However, as the ſubject was far from be- "ing important, I did not ſet down my own name, "but a Lordſhip borrow'd from my device, the "body of which is a drum (28), and the motto à "tous Accords, i. e. chiming with all, which my fa- "ther, my grandfather and great grandfather had "taken before me. Thou will find in the chapter of "the particular remarks on French Poetry, on what "occaſion this device was raiſed to a Lordſhip." It may not be improper to ſet down what he relates in the chapter to which he refers. "He had ſent a ſon- "net to a virtuous, agreeable Gentlewoman, daughter "to the late Mr. Begat, the great and learned Preſi- "dent of Burgundy; who, ſays he (29), — did me "the honour to love me. —— And inaſmuch, conti- "nues he, I had ſubſcribed my ſonnet with only "my device, A tous Accords, chiming with all; "this Lady firſt nicknam'd me, in her anſwer, Seig- "neur des Accords, by which title her father alſo "called me ſeveral times. For this reaſon I choſe "this firname, not only in all my writings compos'd "at that time, but even in theſe books." Baillet aſſures us (30), that he took the name Torvobatius, by way of anagram.

(25) Preface to the 4th book of the Bigarrures.

(26) The 2d chapter of the 4th book of the Bigarrures.

(27) Indeed, the firſt letter of the firſt chapter is E; that of the 2d chapter S; and ſo on to the firſt of the ſixteenth chapter which is T; ſo that the whole form the words ESTIENNE TABOUROT. This had been done before by others. See Baillet's Auteurs Deguiſés. That is, "Diſguiſed Au- "thors.

(28) Conſequently the figure in the device was expreſſive of his name Tabourot, to which it manifeſtly alluded.

(29) Bigarrures, book iv. chap. 3. p. 491, 492.

(30) Author Diſguis'd, pag. 440, 607.

† ACCURSIUS a Law-Profeſſor in the thirteenth Century, was born in Florence. The Expoſitions he wrote on the Body of the Law, gained him a very great reputation. It is related that he did not begin till late that ſtudy, and was forty years of age [A] when he attended the lectures of the famous Azo; but that he had applied himſelf before this time to other parts of knowledge. He made ſo great a progreſs in the civil law, that he was afterwards a celebrated profeſſor in that ſcience. He taught in Bologna, and afterwards devoting himſelf to retirement, he wrote a Continued Gloſs on the whole Body of the Law; a work which was found ſo commodious and uſeful to young ſtudents, that it quite eclips'd all the former Expoſitions; and indeed none of them were either ſo complete, or ſo well digeſted. Some tell us, that the contradictions which occur in Accurſius, were not the effect of inconſtancy, or a weakneſs of memory, but owing to his having diſtinguiſhed only by the firſt letter of their names, the ſeveral authors his predeceſſors in that way of writing, whoſe opinions he quotes: and that as many of theſe initial letters afterwards faded away, the readers were thereby miſled, they taking ſeveral particulars which Accurſius quotes, as the doctrines of other writers, to be his own ſentiments. His authority was formerly ſo great [B], that ſome have call'd him

† The Italians call him Accorſo.

[A] And was forty years of age.] Others ſay he was but twenty eight. Jam quadragenarius vel, ut alii ſcribunt, xxviii. annos natus, jus civile ab Azone audivit. Theſe are Panzirolus's words, in the 147th page of his ſecond edition printed at Venice in 1655 (1). Sir Thomas Pope Blount, citing Panzirolus and Konig, make him thirty ſeven and not twenty eight years old (2). Konig's citation is juſt, but that of Panzirolus is erroneous, unleſs my edition differs from the firſt. Foſterus had better have been cited, for he tells us, that Accurſius was Azo's pupil at thirty ſeven years of age (3). See the remark [F].

(1) Panzirol. de Clar Leg. interpret. lib. 2. cap. 29.

(2) Pope Blount, Cenſ. Celeb. Autor. p. 286.

(3) Forſter. Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. 3. cap. 12.

[B] His authority was formerly ſo great.] I cannot cite any thing more diverting, or better adapted to the preſent purpoſe, than a paſſage quoted by one of the modern Civilians, who had very little eſteem for Gloſſographers. Noſtis quanta ſit autoritas gloſſatoris. Nonne heri dixit Cyn. gloſſam timendam propter præſcriptam idololatriam per advocatos, ſignificans quod ſicut antiqui adorabant idola pro diis, ita advocati adorant gloſſatores pro evangeliſtis. Volo enim potius pro me gloſſatorem quam textum; nam ſi allego textum, dicunt advocati diverſæ partis & etiam judices, credis tu quod gloſſa non ita viderit illum textum ſicut tu, & non ita bene intellexerit ſicut tu? Ego recordor, & (ſi illud pro novo) quod, dum eſſem ſcholaris, eram ſatis acutus, & dum ſemel eſſemus multi ſocii in una collatione, auſus fui unum textum allegare contra ſententiam Doctoris mei: tantum audaciam habui. Dixit unus ſotius, Tu loqueris contra gloſſam quæ dixit ſic. Et ego reſpondi; Etſi gloſſa dicit ſic, ego dico ſic; ignarus auctoritatis gloſſatorum. Credebam enim quod eſſent communes apoſtillæ, quales ſunt in libris grammaticæ, ſicut ſuper Virgilio & Ovidio: ſed him the Idol of the Lawyers (a). Moſt interpreters have taken as much (b) or more pains (c) to explain his gloſs, than to comment upon the very text of the laws. Some criticks, who were fond of the beauties of diction, have exclaimed greatly againſt this author's harſh and barbarous ſtile [C]; however, it is almoſt univerſally agreed that he was a great genius; and that the blemiſhes in his manner of writing, are owing to the age he lived in [D]. He was in very happy circumſtances, having a very handſome houſe in that town, and a fine ſeat in the country. His two ſons made a happy progreſs in their ſtudies, as we ſhall ſoon ſhew. Some writers tell us that Accurſius had a very learned daughter [E], who was inſtalled in the profeſſorſhip of the civil law. He died in 1229 [F], aged ſeventy eight years. His monument is ſeen in Bologna in the church of the Franciſcans, on which the following very ſhort inſcription, written with the utmoſt ſimplicity, is engraved; Sepulchrum Accurſii gloſſatoris legum, & Franciſci ejus filii

(a) Extracted from Pancirol. De Claris Legum interpr. lib. 2. cap. 29. pag. 147 & ſeq.

(b) Arth. Duck. De Uſu & Author. Juris Civil. Rom. lib. 1. cap. 5. Apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. celebr. Autor. pag. 286.

(c) Forſteri Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. 3. cap. 12.

ſed tamen non ita eſt; fuerunt enim gloſſatores maximæ ſcientiæ viri & auctoritatis. Etſi aliud non eſſet quam gloſſarum ordinatio, & de quibus poteſt dici id quod arbitror de nullo dici poſſe, videlicet quod totum corpus juris viderunt, magis ergo ſtandum eſt eis qui viderunt, quum nobis qui non vidimus (4). That is, "You know the great authority an interpreter hath. "Did not Cyn. ſay yeſterday, that the gloſs was to "be dreaded, becauſe of the idolatry which the law-"yers will have paid to it, inſinuating, that the "lawyers worſhip the interpreters as ſo many Evan-"geliſts, in the ſame manner as the antients worſhip-"ed idols as ſo many Gods. With regard to my ſelf, "I had much rather have the gloſs, than the text in "my favour: for if I refer to the text, then the "Lawyers of the adverſe party and even the Judges, "ſay, Do you imagine the interpreter did not ſee as "far into the text as you, and did not underſtand it "as well as you? I remember (let this be by way "of news) that when I was a Student, I was pretty "acute. One day as ſeveral of my fellow-pupils and "I were diſputing, I was ſilly enough to cite a text "in oppoſition to our maſter's opinion. Says one of "my companions, What! you ſpeak againſt the gloſs "which ſays ſo and ſo? I anſwer'd, Tho' the gloſs "ſay ſo, yet I ſay ſo and ſo; not knowing the great "authority of the gloſſes, for I ſuppoſed they were "explanatory notes, in a grammatical way, like thoſe "on Virgil or Ovid; but 'tis far otherwiſe, the in-"terpreters being men of the greateſt learning and "authority. 'Twill be ſafer for us therefore to de-"pend on thoſe who ſaw through the whole body of "the law, than on our ſelves who have not." Hottomanus cites ſome other paſſages of the ſame author, which confirm the ſame circumſtance, and inform us, that whenever the gloſs was oppoſed, before a Judge, to the opinion of two Doctors or Interpreters, the former always carried it: Si ſententia gloſſatoris duobus Doctoribus eſt contraria, profectò in judiciis prævaleret ſententia ipſius gloſſæ (5).

(4) Raphael Fulgoſius in L. Si in ſolutum C. De Action. & Oblig. apud Fr. Hottomannum, præf. Conſiliorum.

(5) Idem, ibid. apud eundem.

[C] Have exclaimed greatly againſt this author's harſh and barbarous ſtyle.] Ludovicus Vives is one of them (6); ſee alſo Bernartius's Treatiſe on the advantages of reading hiſtory. A great many authors, among the civilians of the ſixteenth Century, cenſured this barbarous diction. Alciatus ſeems to have led the way; and to have firſt given the taſte of uniting the Belles Lettres with the Civil Law; to which Budæus, one of thoſe who moſt ſtrongly attacked Accurſius, likewiſe contributed (7). It cannot be denied but that through their ignorance of polite literature, the Gloſſographers committed a great many miſtakes. Albericus Gentilis has, on the contrary, declared very much in their favour, and would not own that Accurſius ever employed the ſaying, Græcum eſt, non poteſt legi (8). i. e. "'Tis "Greek, and therefore cannot be read," with which he has been reproached (9). This author is of opinion that theſe words are not to be met with any where in Accurſius; and declares that he was better skill'd in Greek than is generally imagined; but, however this be, the proverb, Græcum eſt, non poteſt legi, is ſuppoſed to have taken its riſe from the cuſtom of the Gloſſographers, who, as 'tis pretended, whenever they met with a Greek word, uſed to leave the place uninterpreted, and gave this reaſon, that being Greek it therefore could not be read; and after having thus leap'd over this gap, they continued to interpret the Latin.

(6) Ludov. Vives, De Cauſis Corrupt. Artium. lib. 1. p. 52. & lib. 7. p. 206. Vide etiam Braſſicanum inter Epiſtol. Eobani Heſſi.

(7) See Pâquier's Recherches de la France, book ix. chap. 39. who ranks Budæus in the firſt, and Alciatus in the ſecond place.

(8) Alb. Gentilis, de Juris interp. fol. 29.

(9) Vide Sich. in præfat. ad Codicem Theodoſianum, & Alciatum, cap. 16. lib. 2, Diſpunct.

[D] That he was a great genius; and that the blemiſhes in his manner of writing, are owing to the age he lived in.] I ſhall cite but two authors: Hanc ſignificationem in animo habuit F. Accurſius gloſſatorum veterum Coriphæus, homo ingenii prorſus ſtupendi, qui in tantis diſciplinarum tenebris ipſam diſciplinarum diſciplinam accuratiſſimè intellexit, cum non juriſdictionem, ſed juriſditionem ſcribendum cenſuit (10). i. e. "In this ſenſe it was underſtood by Francis Accur-"ſius, the Prince of ancient Commentators, a man "of prodigious talents, who, in ſo dark an age of "learning, was extreamly well vers'd in the law, be-"ing of opinion that we ſhould write it, juriſditio-"nem and not juriſdictionem." Thus a German ſpeaks; let us now hear a Frenchman: Antiqui, (interpretes juris) inter quos Accurſius & Bartolus principatum tenent; de ſermone non valde anxii, rerum quas tractant curam ſolum habuerunt; quas cum noſſent, quantum in illa barbarie & codicum depravatione noſſe poterant, explicare niſi inconditè & barbarè nequiverunt, quod non tam eis quam ſæculo illi tribuendum, quo linguæ & bonæ literæ prorſus jacebant (11). i.e. "The an-"cients (the interpreters of the law) among whom Ac-"curſius and Bartolus are conſidered as the chief, being "not very ſolicitous about ſtile, bent all their thoughts "to things only, which they underſtood as well as "the corrupt manuſcripts, and thoſe barbarous times "would permit them to do; but then it was impoſ-"ſible for them not to expound in a rude and barba-"rous manner, which however ought not to be impu-"ted ſo much to them as to the age they lived in, in "which languages and learning were quite eclipſed." We are to obſerve, that Barthius gives the Chriſtian name of Francis to our Accurſius, in which he is not ſingular (12). I my ſelf followed them in the firſt edition, but have not done ſo in this.

(10) Barthii Animad. ad Claudian in Rufin. lib. 2. ver. 85. p. 1200, 1201.

(11) Rolandus Mareſius, Epiſt. xl. lib. 1. p. 176, 177. edit. Lipſ. A. 1687.

(12) Arthur Duck, and Sir Thomas Pope Blount, have done the ſame. See Pope Blount, Cenſ. cel. Aut. p. 286.

[E] A very learned daughter.] Panzirolus mentions her only by hear-ſay. Filiam quoque habuiſſe dicitur, quæ jus civile Bononiæ publicè docuit (13). That is, "We are told he had a daughter, who taught the "Civil Law publickly in Bologna." When an incident of this kind is doubtful, it is a thouſand to one but 'tis falſe; for ſuch things are ſo ſingular, that they cannot but be well known when they are true. For this reaſon I don't give much credit to what I juſt now read in the Theatrum of Paulus Freherus, viz. that Accurſius had two daughters, who for their great erudition, were employed to read public lectures in Bologna (14). Freherus, I hope, will not take it amiſs if I diſtruſt John Frauenlobius, of whom he cites a book in the German language.

(13) Panzirol. De cl. Leg. interp. lib. 2. cap. 29. p. 149.

(14) Paul. Freh. Theatr. Viror. Erudit. p. 784.

[F] He died in 1229.] We ſee nothing like this in the Theatrum of Paulus Freherus, which was compil'd during ſo many years, with ſuch prodigious labour. On the contrary, we there find that Accurſius flouriſhed in 1236, died in 1279, and wrote a Commentary on the * Authenticks in 1236 (15). He himſelf is cited for this laſt particular by John Fichardus in his Lives of the Civilians (16).

This citation however is falſe, as appears from the following remark communicated to me by very good hands (17). "Volaterranus tells us, that Accurſius "began to ſtudy the Law at forty, and died in 1279, "in the 78th year of his age (18); whence it would "follow, that he was born in 1201. Nevertheleſs "Accurſius himſelf informs us, on the Authenticks, "ut præp. nom. Imper. on the word Indictiones, that "he actually wrote in 1220; and on the laſt Law but "one, in the code De Accuſationibus, that he wrote "in 1227; which would have been impoſſible, were "Volaterranus's calculation juſt; otherwiſe, Accur-"ſius would have writ on the Law, a long time before "he ſtudied it. Theſe Æras of 1220 and 1227 ex-"clude that of 1236, which is erroneous, and can-"not be admitted by thoſe who fix the death of Ac-"curſius to 1229."

* Authenticks; they are the ſame with what is called Novella Conſtitutio; theſe are the conſtitutions of ſeveral Emperors, particularly of Juſtinian; and are ſuppoſed to have been ſo called, either becauſe they changed the antient law very conſiderably; or becauſe they were drawn up from new caſes, and after the reviſal of the Code, compiled by the command of the aboyementioned Emperor.... Whenever our Accurſius ſpeaks of the Novells, we are to underſtand thoſe which Juſtinian publiſhed in Greek. Authenticks are the Latin verſions of theſe Novells, and received that name becauſe they were tranſlated very faithfully. Dictionaire de Trevoux.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Apud Freher. ibid.

(17) By Mr. de la Monnoie.

(18) Volater. lib. 21. p. 781. This author obſerves that Accurſius began to ſtudy the law in the reign of the Emperor Frederic the IId. now this Emperor reigned from 1212 to 1250.

filii (d). That is, "The ſepulchre of Accurſius, the expounder of the laws; and of "Francis his ſon." Accurſius uſed to ſay, that Theology was not neceſſary for the underſtanding of Divine matters [G], the Roman laws inſtructing ſufficiently in the knowledge of them. Moreri quotes Catel to a very wrong purpoſe [H]. Francis Hotman miſtook when he ſaid, that Azo and Accurſius were inſtructed by Odofredus; for both Odofredus and Accurſius were Azo's pupils, and afterwards profeſſors at the ſame time in Bologna. Albericus Gentilis has taken notice of this error in Francis Hotman (e).

(d) Panzirol. De Clar. Leg. Interpret. lib. 2. cap. 19.

(e) Alberic. Gentil. in Dialog. de Juris Interpretibus, fol. 60.

[G] That Divinity was not neceſſary for the underſtanding of divine matters.] Conringius cenſured him in a proper manner upon that account. Ridicula eſt Accurſii gloriatio in gl. ad l. 10. ſect. 2. ff. de J. & J. nihil opus eſſe Theologiæ ſtudio, ad cognoſcenda divina, ut quæ ex legum Romanarum libris aſtatim queat peti. i. e. "Accurſius's boaſt (in his gloſs on book 10. ſection the ſecond, ff. de J. & J.) is ridiculous, viz. that "the ſtudy of Divinity was not neceſſary, in order "for attaining a knowledge in divine things, they be-"ing amply treated in the books of the Roman "Laws (19).

(19) Conring. De Civili prudent. cap. 3. apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Cel. Aut. p. 286.

[H] Moreri cites Catel to a very wrong purpoſe.] We need only compare the text of theſe two authors, to ſhew the miſtake. Catel having ſaid that Montpellier is one of the principal cities of France, in which the Roman Law was read publickly, adds: "For we find, that the great, and ancient Civilian "Placentinus, who lived before Accurſius the gloſſo-"grapher read law-lectures publickly in the city of "Montpellier, which he mentions often in his "Summa drawn up (as he himſelf tells us in his "Inſtitutes) during his abode at Montpellier, as the "Writers of his life have obſerved. He died in "that city the twelfth of February 1192, and was "buried in St. Bartholomew's church yard (20)." Now hear Moreri: Catel aſſerts that Accurſius died at Montpellier in 1192. What he adds is very erroneous. Others, ſays he, as Fichardus and Trithemius, make him flouriſh in the following Century; and even the laſt ſays he had a Profeſſorſhip in Bologna anno 1240. But theſe, perhaps, committed a miſtake by confounding this famous man with Francis Accurſius his ſon, a perſon of great worth and erudition; who was a Law-profeſſor in Bologna, and Counſellor to Richard King of England. The father ſhould have been placed under the thirteenth Century which would have been the direct way not to confound him with his ſon; ſo that Moreri's perhaps, has no manner of foundation. There was no King of England nam'd Richard, at that time.

(20) Catel's Memoirs of the Hiſt. of Languedoc, p. 293.

☞ACCURSIUS or ACCORSO, called Azzone becauſe he was diſciple to the famous Azzone, went to Bologna to hear the latter, where he ſtudied, and became ſo eminent in the ſtudy of the Law, that loſing his name and ſirname, he retained that of Accorſo only, ſo called, according to Michael Poccianti, from the celerity or ſprightlineſs of his genius, which enabled him to anſwer with prodigious readineſs, any queſtion that was put to him. He applied himſelf with ſo much vigour under the Emperor Frederick the IId, at thirty ſeven, or according to Francis Bocchi at twenty ſeven years of age, to the civil and canon laws, and maſtered them in ſo ſhort a time, that he was conſidered as the Prince of the Lawyers, ſo that all Bologna being divided into two literary factions, upon account of Bulgario and Martin Creſſi, both very famous Law-profeſſors and competitors, Accorſo, by his penetration and vaſt erudition, drew all the pupils of both to his own ſchool. Being aſked why he began the ſtudy of the Law ſo late, he anſwered, ſe tardè quidem incipere, ſed eò maturius abſoluturum: that is, "That indeed he began it late, but ſhould therefore maſter it the ſooner." Verini beſtowed the following elogium on him;

Juris conſultos interpres Accurſius omnes
Excellit, brevibuſque notis ænigmata rerum
Expoſuit; nulluſque error reperitur in illis.

That is,

"Accurſius the commentator ſurpaſſed all the Lawyers, he has explain'd the moſt knotty "points by ſhort notes, and not a ſingle error is found in them (a)."

(a) Iſtoria degli Scrittori Fiorentini, p. 1, 2.

A bold aſſertion this, in contradiction to the univerſally received maxim, Humanum eſt errare.

† Or rather Accorſo Cervoto.

† ACCURSIUS (CERVOT) ſon to the former, made much greater haſte than his father did to get his degrees: for he deſired to be admitted Doctor of Laws before he was ſeventeen, which was granted, after long debates had paſt, whether it was allowable by the ſtatutes (a). He drew up expoſitions, and annexed them to thoſe of his father, but they were not in much eſteem. Deterior interpres ineptas gloſſas & longè à vero diſtantes paternis addidit, quæ Cervotianæ vocatæ ut plurimum rejiciuntur (b). That is, "A "bad expounder, he added ſilly comments, which were far from being true, to thoſe "of his father; the gloſſes of the ſon, which are called Cervotianæ, are moſtly "rejected.

(a) Panzirol. de Cl. Leg. Interp. lib. 2. cap. 29.

(b) Idem, ibid.

* Accorſo Franceſco.

* ACCURSIUS (FRANCIS) elder brother to the former, was ſo highly eſteemed by the citizens of Bologna, that upon hearing he was to follow the King of England into France, in order to teach the law in that kingdom, they commanded him not to leave their city, upon pain of having his whole eſtate confiſcated. Accurſius thought to have over-reached them, by ſelling it to a friend, but his artifice did not ſucceed; and his eſtate was nevertheleſs confiſcated, which obliged him to return back when it was reſtored to him. He had taught in Toulouſe, and was one day very much puzzled to explain the ſubject of the intereſt of money; when James of Ravanne, one of the moſt learned Lawyers of his time, mixed incognito with the auditors; and pretending to paſs for a ſcholar, ſcholar, he raiſed ſeveral objections to Accurſius, which the latter anſwered but indifferently. Some have ſaid that Accurſius, at his return to Bologna, was a Law-profeſſor in that city with Bartolus; and that having a diſpute with him, about the reading of a paſſage in the Pandects, they were obliged to ſend to Piſa, to conſult the old manuſcript of that book: but it is very improbable to ſuppoſe, that Accurſius was living when Bartolus was a Law-profeſſor [A] (a).

(a) Extracted from Panzirol. de Cl. Leg. Interpr. lib. 2. cap. 19.

[A] That Accurſius was living when Bartolus was Profeſſor.] Bartolus was born 1313; and was admitted Doctor of laws at the age of one and twenty, that is, in 1334 (1): ſo that Accurſius the ſon muſt have liv'd 120 years at leaſt, in caſe he had heard Bartolus read lectures on the Law, for he had been emancipated by his father (2). Let us ſuppoſe he was then but fifteen; and that this was done the laſt year of his father's life, i. e. in 1229; he yet muſt have been an hundred and twenty years of age in 1334. Panzirolus's conjecture is pretty probable, viz. that the Accurſius, who was Bartolus's collegue, was ſon to an Accurſius who taught the Law in Reggio his native country, about the year 1273, and likewiſe read lectures in Padua (3). He is often mentioned by Gulielmo Duranti.

(1) Panzirol. de Cl. Leg. Interp. cap. 67.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 29.

(3) Idem, ibid. cap. 42.

We ſhall here add another of Mr. de la Monnoie's obſervations. "Antonius Auguſtinus mentions in ſe-
"veral parts of his Emendationes (4), this diſpute of "Bartolus concerning the reading of a certain word
"in the laſt paragraph of the Law, Si creditor under
"D. de diſtract. pign. and is inclined to think that "Bartolus had Baldus on this occaſion for his anta-
"goniſt, rather than Francis ſon of Accurſius. Alex"ander of Imola quoted by the abovementioned An-"tonius Auguſtinus, was alſo of opinion that the "conteſt happened between Baldus and Bartolus;
"but as Bartolus himſelf declared expreſly that it was
"with Francis ſon of Accurſius; Panzirolus's expe-
"dient ſeems therefore the moſt natural:" which, as the reader has juſt now ſeen, appeared ſo to me.

(4) Particularly in book 4. chap. 17.

ACCURSIUS (MARIANGELUS) a Critic in the ſixteenth Century, was born in Aquila [A] in the kingdom of Naples. His predominant paſſion was the ſearching for, and collating of old manuſcripts, in order to correct the paſſages of antient writers. The Diatribes which he printed in Rome in folio, anno 1524, on Auſonius, Solinus and Ovid, are a proof of his ability in that kind of erudition. He had taken vaſt pains with Claudian [B]; however, this work was never publiſhed, though he gave out that he had corrected near ſeven hundred paſſages from antient manuſcripts. Barthius expreſſes his diſſatisfaction, that ſo important a work ſhould ſtill be kept in manuſcript (a), and that the reſt of his compoſitions were not reprinted (b). The writer abovementioned thinks that the wit of our Accurſius is not of the contemptible kind, and declares him to be often judicious. This critic made Latin and Italian verſes [C]; underſtood muſic and optics, and travelled into the northern parts of the world [D]. The

(a) Barth. in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 399. tom. 3. pag. 1602; in Claudian. p. 826. & Adverſarior. lib. 20. cap. 18.

(b) This has been done with regard to Auſonius, in the Amſterdam edition of 1671; but not purſuant to the whole tenor of the title, which promiſes, Notas integras Accurſii.

[A] Was born in Aquila.] Beſides the teſtimony of Toppi, approved by Leonard Nicodemus's ſilence, the following verſes ſhew manifeſtly that he was a native of that city;

* Ut volucrum regina ſupervolat æthera, & alti,
Immotum lumen ſolis in orbe tenet;
Sic illa genitus Marianzelus urbe . . . .
Alite quæ à Jovia nobile nomen habet,
Felici ingenio ſolers ſpeculatur, &c.

Imitated,

"As to the radiant ſource of light,
"Allur'd by the refulgent blaze,
"The eagle darts his towring flight,
"And on the God does ſtedfaſt gaze.

"So Mariangelus renown'd,
"(Sprung from the town that owes its name
"To Jove's great bird) by learning crown'd,
"Aſpiring ſoars to doubtleſs fame.

* The Poet in theſe lines mentions Accurſius as born in the city (Aquila) ſo called from the King of birds, the eagle; and introduces them with comparing our critick's ſearch after learning, to that bird's ſoaring to the skies, and fixing his eyes on the ſun.

These lines are found in a piece of Francis Arſillus (1), printed at the end of a collection of poems, entitled Coryciana, publiſhed at Rome in 1524. There is in that collection a Protrepticon, containing eighty ſeven lines, written by our Accurſius ad Coricium (2). The title of Arſillus's piece, is, De Poetis urbanis ad Paulum Jovium. Pierius Valerianus, co-temporary with Accurſius, ſurnames him Aquilanus, not only in his Commentary on the twelfth Æneid, but in ſome Latin verſes (3), which he inſcribed to him. Barthius was therefore certainly miſtaken, in declaring that Accurſius was born in Amiternum (4), and Konig, not knowing this to be an error, has affirmed the ſame after Barthius. The following words of Accurſius, Nec placuit reticere, ne quis (quod Saluſtius civis ait meus) modeſtiam in conſcientiam duceret, "which I did not "think proper to conceal, leſt (as my fellow citizen
"Saluſt ſays) any one ſhould think my modeſty the "effect of my being conſcious of the contrary (5)," miſled Barthius. Now the reaſon why Accurſius calls Saluſt, who was born at Amiternum, his countryman, is becauſe the city of Aquila roſe from the ruins of the former; and was ſubſtituted, in ſome meaſure, in its ſtead. 'Tis but five miles from the ruins of Amiternum. See Baudrand.

(1) L. Nicodemo calls him Arſilius by miſtake, in his Addizioni alla Bibliotheq. Napolet. p. 170.

(2) Mr. de la Monnoie informs me he was a German, called Goritz.

(3) Lib. 4. Amorum, apud Nicodem. Add. alla Bibl. Napolet. p. 170.

(4) Ipſe Saluſtii civis, Amiternus nempe, Barth. in Stat. tom. 2. p. 399.

(5) Mariang. Accurſ. in Teſtitudine.

[B] He had taken vaſt pains with Claudian.] Since Accurſius, in the midſt of the fatigues of his travels into Germany and Poland, corrected near ſeven hundred errors in this Poet; we may preſume he labour'd very hard at that task, when he had more leiſure. Talis, ſays he (6), non Ales legitur in codicibus (Claudiani) etiam noviſſimè recognitis. Qui tantum abeſt ut non etiam nunc verſibus ſint claudi ac deformes, ut eos ex vetuſtis exemplaribus, dum Germaniam Sarmatiaſque nuper peragramus, ſeptingentis ferè mendis inter equitandum eluerimus. That is, "We read Ta-
"lis, not Ales in all the editions of Claudian, even "thoſe which were laſt reviſed. But the verſes
"of this part are ſtill ſo lame and disfigured, that I
"corrected near ſeven hundred errors by means of "the old manuſcripts, as I rid on horſeback through
"Germany and Poland."

(6) Accurſii Diatrib. in Auſonium. Theſe words are not inſerted in the edition of Auſonius, anno 1671.

[C] Compoſed Latin and Italian verſes.] Here follows what Accurſius himſelf tells us on this head, in a fable entitled Teſtudo, which he annexed to his Diatribes. He therein relates, how much he ſuffer'd in Rome, from thoſe who envied him, and how they imputed things to him of the moſt innocent nature as crimes. Noviſtis, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to two young Princes of the houſe of Brandenburg, to whom he dedicated his work, ipſi Principes, quam mihi veſtitum prope (ut aiunt) militarem probro verterint, tum fidibus ſcire, muſicen callere, philoſopho indignum prædicent, quantumque invaſerint, quod & opticen cum literarum ſtudiis, vernaculoſque cum Latinis numeris conjunxerim. i. e. "You yourſelves, Princes, are ſen"ſible that they declared it was ſcandalous for me to "appear in a military habit, as they called it; how they
"cry'd, that to play on inſtruments or underſtand muſic
"was unworthy a philoſopher; and how violently
"they inſulted me, becauſe I join'd the ſtudy of op-
"ticks to that of the Belles Lettres, and wrote Italian
"as well as Latin verſes." He there ſays, that he was writing the Hiſtory of Brandenburg, from the memoirs with which he was furniſhed.

[D] And he travelled into the Northern parts of the world.] We have already heard what he himſelf declares, viz. that he corrected a great number of paſſages on his ſaddle, as he rode through Germany and Poland. The following citation informs us, that he uſed to remark the moſt minute particulars, even to

The writers who inform us of theſe particulars, might have added that he underſtood to perfection the French, Spaniſh and German tongues; that he collected a great number of antiques, which were lodged in the Capitol; and that he ſpent thirty three years in the court of the Emperor Charles the Vth, who was very much delighted with him, and beſtowed conſiderable favours upon him (c). We are not to omit, that in his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus, there are five books more than in any of the preceding ones (d)[E]. This addition was printed at Auſburgh in 1533; and Accurſius aſſures us he had corrected five thouſand miſtakes in this hiſtorian (e). That year he publiſhed in the ſame city, the Epiſtles of Caſſiodorus in twelve books, with a Treatiſe on the Soul; and it is to him we are indebted for the firſt edition of that author (f). As ſome Latin writers, his cotemporaries, affected to uſe the moſt obſolete words, he ridiculed them in a very facetious dialogue printed in 1531 [F]; and annexed to it a little treatiſe written by Voluſius Metianus, a Lawyer of antient date (g). He alſo wrote a book on the invention of printing [G]. He was reproached for being a plagiary, with regard

(c) Nicolo Toppi, Biblioth. Napol. p. 206.

(d) Henr. Valeſij Præf. in Ammian. Marcellin.

(e) Toppi, Bibl. Napolet. p. 206.

(f) Leonardo Nicodemo, Addizioni alla Biblioth. Napoletan. p. 170.

(g) 'Tis entitled, Diſtributio, item vocabula ac notæ partium in rebus pecuniariis, pondere, numero, menſura.

the very ſongs with which women uſed to lull little children to ſleep; but here he did not draw very juſt conſequences from them, as we ſhall ſee. Nuper, ſays he (7), non in Pannonia ſolum, atque adeo apud Septentrionales pleroſque populos, verum etiam ultra Sauromatas, non ſine admiratione audivimus, ad ſuadendum nutricio more infantibus ſomnum, dici, Li lu, Li lu; tum, & La lu, La lu, & La, la, La, la. Quod noſtrates ferè Nan na, Nan na, & Nin na, Nin na, etiam mora quadam vocem ſuſpendentes paſſim dicere conſueverunt. Movit porro nos majori quadam admiratione, quod infantes ipſi & horriduli & ſordiduli vix dum fari incipientes, Mammam atque Tatam Latinè balbutiunt, ipſis quoque matribus non intellecti. Ut videri poſſint & hæ quoque voces naturales magis quam arbitrariæ. i. e. "Lately, ſays he, not only "in Pannonia † and among moſt of the people in the "Northern parts of the world, but even beyond the "Sauromatæ (Scythians or Tartars) I very much wondered to hear children lull'd to ſleep, as is the cuſtom with nurſes, with Li lu, Li lu, La lu, La lu, "and La, la, La, la, which thoſe of our country "generally expreſs Nan na, Nan na, and Nin na, Nin na, in a drawling kind of voice. But our wonder was greatly encreaſed, when we heard little "dirty chits who could ſcarce ſpeak, ſtammer out in "Latin Mamma and Tatta, which their mothers don't "underſtand, ſo that one would imagine, that theſe "ſounds were natural rather than arbitrary." Accurſius was miſtaken, when he fancied the mothers did not underſtand this infant language, for 'twas they taught it them.

(7) Diatrib. in Auſon.

† Pannonia contained anciently the eaſtern part of Auſtria, Stiria and Carniola, with the lower Hungary and Sclavonia.

[E] His edition of Ammianus Marcellinus has five books more than the preceding ones.] Toppi was wrong informed on this occaſion; he has not declared what he ought to have done, and has advanced what he ought not to have ſaid. He does not tell us that Accurſius added five new books to thoſe which were already extant, and mentions only the ſixth, whereas the ſixth is not yet found. The thirteen firſt books of this Hiſtorian are ſtill wanting. Leonardo Nicodemo has cenſured Nicholas Toppi ſeverely upon this account (8).

(8) Leon. Nicodemo. Addizioni alla Biblioth. Napolet. p. 170.

[F] In a very facetious Dialogue publiſhed in 1531.] Since all who have my work, will not be poſſeſſed of that of Leonardo Nicodemo, I ſhall give the title of that Dialogue at large. Oſco, Volſco, Romanoque eloquentia interlocutoribus, Dialogus ludis Romanis actus. In quo oſtenditur verbis publica moneta ſignatis utendum eſſe, priſca verò nimis & exoleta tanquam ſcopulos eſſe fugienda. Si quid itaque, lector optime, antiquitatem amas, ut ſanè debes, libellum hunc ingenti quamvis pecunia à bibliopola te tibi redimiſſe non pœnitebit. Nam præter quam quòd vocibus partim Oſcis, partim Volſcis conſcriptus eſt, Latina quoque iſtuc verba exoletiora nimiſque priſca quibus Aborigenes, Picus, Evandrus, Carmentaque ipſa loquebantur, affatim collata ſunt. Quæque omnia apud Ennium, Pacuvium, Plautum, alioſve hujus notæ priſcos authores abſtruſiora leguntur. Itemque recentiorum cacatas Apuleii & Capellæ chartas, hujuſmodive aliorum. Quæ ut certè ſunt evitanda, ita tamen ab eo qui docti nomen ferat agnoſcenda ſunt, ut cum aliquando in eas offenderit, de illorum ſenſu ei turpiter hæſitandum non ſit (9). i. e. "A Dialogue ſpoke at the Roman "games, an Oſcian, a Volſcian and a Roman being "the interlocutors; in which is ſhewn, that we "ought to employ ſuch words as are current and "commonly received, and ſhun as rocks, ſuch expreſſions as are too antiquated and obſolete. If "therefore, courteous reader, you have any affection "(as you ought to have) for antiquity, you won't "be ſorry that you purchaſed this book, tho' you "pay ever ſo extravagant a price for it. For not to "mention that it is written, partly in the Oſcian, "and partly in the Volſcian Dialect; a great number of thoſe very ancient obſolete words are "introduced in it, which were uſed by the Aborigines, by Picus, Evander, and even by * Carmenta herſelf; and all the abſtruſe terms, which "are found in Ennius, Pacuvius, Plautus, and other "ancient authors of the ſame character. Alſo the "more modern, contemptible writings of Apuleius "and Capella, and ſuch like; all which, tho' they "ought to be avoided, ſhould yet be ſo far underſtood by him who pretends to the name of a ſcholar, that he may be able whenever any of theſe occur, to explain their ſenſe, without ſhamefully hesitating on them." Andreas Scottus forms the following judgment of this work: De Apuleio metamorphoſeos ex Lucio Patrenſi, ſeu Luciano, ſcriptore audi, amabo, quæ in Dialogo olim ante hos ipſos octoginta annos à Mariangelo Accurſio (homine, ut illis temporibus pererudito, quique Naſonem, Auſonium ac Solinum, Diatriba illuſtravit.) Oſcè ac Volſcè conſcripto, ut ſæculi degenerantis nimium à prima eloquentia inſaniam veluti aceto aſperſa ſatyra perſtringeret, audi inquam, & riſum contine ſi potes, &c. (10). That is, "Hear, I intreat you, the account that "is given of Apuleius who writ the Metamorphoſis "from Lucian Patrenſis, or Lucian, as introduced in "a dialogue, compoſed above fourſcore years ſince, "by Mariangelus Accurſius, a man of vaſt learning "for the age, who alſo illuſtrated Ovid, Auſonius and "Solinus; a Dialogue, I ſay, written by Accurſius "in the Oſcian and Volſcian dialect, purpoſely to "laſh in a very ſevere manner the folly of the writers of that time, who degenerated too much from "the ancient eloquence; Hear, I ſay, and then refrain "from laughter if you can &c."

* A Propheteſs and mother to Evander.

(9) Extracted from Leonardo Nicodemo, Addizioni alla Bibl. Napolet. p. 170.

(10) Andr. Schottus, lib. 1. Quæſt. Tullianar. pag. 59. Apud Leon. Nicodemum, Addizion. alla Bibl. Neap. p. 170.

We are to obſerve, that this work of our Accurſius is in 8vo; but the following remarks which Mr. de la Monnoie ſent me, merit particular notice. "The Dialogue of Mariangelus Accurſius, ſays he, "which was levelled againſt thoſe who corrupted the "Latin tongue, was perhaps printed in 1531; but "then we may naturally ſuppoſe that it had been "made public ſome years before, ſince Geoffry Tory "quotes it in his Champ fleuri, (Flowry field) which "he himſelf printed in 4to, anno 1529. In like "manner, ſays he, a thouſand other forms of ſpeech, "which Hieronymus Avacinus, a native of Verona, "gives us in the beginning of his elaborate annotations on the works of the ancient Poet Lucretius; "which I leave to the curious, who are lovers of "antiquity; and which may be ſeen and read at "large, in a dialogue entitled Oſci & Volſci Dialogus "ludis Romanis actus. This piece is hinted at by "Paulus Jovius in the Elogium of Battiſta Pio, againſt "which it was chiefly levelled. The title of this "Dialogue is whimſical enough, and of a decent "length; but I ſcarce underſtand the conſtruction of "the firſt words of it, Oſco, Volſco, Romanoque eloquentia interlocutoribus: methinks it ſhould be, "& eloquentia, &c."

[G] A work on the Invention of Printing.] I don't pretend to have ſeen it, and advance this only on the teſtimony of Toppi (11); however, I am very certain

(11) Toppi, Biblioth. Napolet. p. 206.

gard to his Auſonius, it being reported that he had appropriated to himſelf the labours of Fabricio Varano Biſhop of Camerino; however, he took an oath to the contrary, and proteſted he had never borrowed any embelliſhments from other authors. The tenor of his oath is remarkable [H]. Had his ſon Caſimir, who was a ſcholar [I], lived longer (b), ſeveral more of Accarſius's works would have been publiſhed.

(b) Toppi, Biblioth. Napolet. p. 206.

tain of what follows. 'Twas thought that our Accurſius had writ with his own hand, in the firſt leaf of Donatus's Grammar printed on vellum; that this book and a work entitled Confeſſionalia, were the firſt books ever printed; and that John Fauſtus, citizen of Mentz inventor of the art, had put them to preſs in 1450 (12). Mr. Chevillier obſerves, that this Accurſius lived in 1500 (13); and yet he makes ſome difference between his teſtimony, and that of Ulric Zel, Bookſeller at Cologne in 1499; he makes, I ſay, ſome difference between them with regard to the time. Donatus, ſays he, had been printed longer, when Accurſius wrote this, than when Zel ſpoke of it (14). 'Tis plain that a year more or leſs, is of no conſequence on this occaſion. Beſides, can we ſay that a man who ſpent thirty three years in the Emperor Charles the fifth's court, lived in 1500?

(12) Chevillier, Origin. de l'Imprimerie de Paris, p. 21. He cites the book de Bibliothecâ Vaticanâ, written by Angelus Roccha, and printed in Rome 1591. Boxhornius in his Theatr. Holl. pag. 138. cites this paſſage of Angel. Roccha at length.

(13) Chevillier, Origin. de Imprimerie de Paris, p. 21 and 281.

(14) Idem, p. 284.

[H] The tenor of his oath is remarkable.] 'Tis this; Quod dii hominesque, fas, fidesque audiat, ſacramenti religione, ac ſi quid eſt jusjurando ſanctius, affirmo, idque rite pariter ac ſine dolo malo dici, cæteriſque accipi volo, me nec ullius unquam ſcripta perlegiſſe ac ne conſpexiſſe quidem, unde vel tantillum lucubrationes noſtræ redimiri juvarique datum fuerit. Quin immo laboraſſe, quoad ejus fieri licuerit, ut ſi quippiam alterius, poſt obſervationem quoque meam, editum occurrerit, è noſtris protinus aboleverimus. Quod ſi pejerem, tum Pontifex perjurio, malus autem genius Diatribis contingat, uſque adeo ut ſi qua bona aut ſaltem mediocra in ipſis fuerint, imperitorum turbæ peſſima, bonis leviuſcula, triciſque viliora cenſeantur, famæ ſi quæ manent munera, vento evolent proque vulgi levitate ferantur (15). That is, "I ſolemnly ſwear, before God, men, juſtice and ſincerity, or if any "thing be more holy than an oath, I affirm upon it "and declare what I now atteſt is pure, unfeigned "truth, and deſire it to be received as ſuch by others; "that I never read or even ſaw the compoſitions of any "one perſon, whence I could borrow the leaſt hint "or aſſiſtance for my own writings. So far from it, "that I endeavoured, to the utmoſt of my power, "whenever I found any thing publiſhed like what "I had before written, I expunged it from my "own works. And in caſe I am forſworn, may "the Pope puniſh me for it, and ſo evil a fate "attend my Diſcourſes, that whatever may be valuable or at leaſt indifferent in them, may be judged "abominable by the ignorant many, and very inconſiderable, and even below trifles, by the learned "and judicious; and if I have any fame left, may "the winds carry it away, and may it be declared, "that I ow'd it entirely to the injudicious vulgar.

(15) Mariang. Accurſius in Teſtudine, ad calcem Diatrib.

[I] His ſon Caſimir was a man of letters.] 'Tis he, very probably, whom Vincente Pinelli the learned and celebrated Protector of the Literati, entertained for ſome time in his houſe; for tho' Gualdo gives the name of Francis to the ſon of Accurſius; he is afraid, at the ſame time, of being miſtaken when he calls him by that name. Theſe are his words; Præter hos domi habuit Benedictum Octavium, res philoſophicas theologicaſque doctum. . . . Mariangeli Accurſii filium Franciſcum ni fallor, inſignem moribus & doctrinâ (16). i. e. "Beſides thoſe, he had in his houſe "Benedictus Octavianus, skill'd in Philoſophy and Di- "vinity—Francis ſon to Mariangelus Accurſius, if I "miſtake not, famous for his morals and his learn- "ing."

(16) Gualdus, in Vita Vincent. Pinelli.

☞ACEPHALI, a Sect of Heretics, who were called ſo, becauſe they had no head or leader, from the Greek word ἀκέφαλος. Some authors have given this name to thoſe who refuſed to adhere either to John Patriarch of Antioch, or St. Cyril of Alexandria, during the conteſt which they had with each other [A], in the time of Pope Sixtus III. after the meeting of the council at Epheſus. But the Acephali were properly that party, which appeared about the year 482, and followed the errors of Peter Mongus Biſhop of Alexandria (a). But they abandoned him, when they found that he had ſubſcribed to the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, which they abhorred (b) [B]. Their doctrine was in general the ſame with that of the Eutychians [C], and directly

(a) Forbeſ. Inſtruct. Hiſtorico-Theologic. lib. 3. cap. 14.

(b) Liberatus in Breviario, c. 18. Nicephorus Calliſt. l. 16. c. 13, 17, 20.

[A] Who refuſed to adhere either to John Patriarch of Antioch, or St. Cyril of Alexandria, during the conteſt which they had with each other.] The origin and progreſs of this diſpute were as follows. This John of Antioch had been educated in the monaſtery of St. Euprepius near Antioch, where he had Neſtorius and Theodoret for his fellow-pupils. Upon the death of Theodotus in the year 427 he was raiſed to the Biſhoprick of Antioch; and about two years after he was prompted by his friendſhip for Neſtorius to oppoſe St. Cyril's writings and anathema's againſt him.

When the council of Epheſus was called together by the Emperor Theodoſius in the year 431, he endeavoured as much as poſſible, that they might not fall upon Neſtorius's opinions, and that no other confeſſion but that of Nice ſhould be ſubſcribed, and that St. Cyril's Capitula might be cenſured as contrary to that confeſſion. Five days after the council was opened he came to Epheſus, and finding that Neſtorius was already condemned by them, he held a little council of the Biſhops of his party in his own apartment the ſame day, and depoſed Cyril and Memnon Biſhop of Epheſus. Upon this he was cited before the council, and refuſing to appear, they excommunicated him. At his return to Antioch he continued to defend Neſtorius with the greateſt vigour for a long time, though he ſeemed to reject his opinions; and the reaſon which he alledged why he could never be induced to condemn him, was becauſe he thought that Neſtorius was orthodox in his real ſentiments, though he had expreſſed them a little incautiouſly. At laſt he was reconciled to St. Cyril by means of the Emperor, and condemned Neſtorius (1).

(1) See Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Literaria, p. 265, 266, edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[B] But they abandoned him when they found that he had ſubſcribed to the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, which they abhorred.] Liberatus (2) tells us, that when Peter Mongus had obtained the Biſhoprick of Alexandria, he wrote to Acacius and Simplicius, that he would agree to the council of Chalcedon; but on the other hand, in order to ſecure his intereſt with thoſe of Alexandria, who were enemies to that council, he aſſured them that he would not ſubmit to the decrees of it. But when this artful conduct of his was diſcovered, a great many of thoſe perſons, who were averſe to the council of Chalcedon, ſeparated themſelves from him, and refuſed any communion with him, even when he had anathematized that council. Nay, they carried their reſentments ſo far, as to divide themſelves from thoſe of his ſucceſſors, who had his name in their Dipticks. Leontius (3) likewiſe tells us, that when Athanaſius ſucceeded Peter Mongus in his Biſhoprick, though he had anathematiz'd the council of Chalcedon, the Acephali refuſed to communicate with him, becauſe he had entertained his predeceſſor. Τὸν δὲ Πίτρον διεδέξατο Ἀθανάσιος. Καὶ οὗτος δεχόμενος τὸ ἑνωτικὸν, ἀνεθεμάτιζε τὴν σύνοδον. πλὴν οὐδὲ τούτῳ ἐκοινώνησαν οἱ Ἀκέφαλοι, διότι τὸν Πίτρον ἐδέχετο. A Deacon of Paleſtine, whoſe name was Eſaias, was ordained their Biſhop and ſent to Alexandria, but he was rejected by ſome of them (4).

(2) Loco ſupra citato.

(3) Leontius Scholaſtic. Byzant. Libro de Sectis, Act. 5.

(4) Liberatus ubi ſupra.

[C] Their doctrine was in general the ſame with that of the Eutychians.] We find that they were charged rectly contrary to the deciſion of the council of Chalcedon, which had condemned that opinion (c). But there were four ſeveral ſubdiviſions of this ſect, which were diſtinguiſhed by ſome peculiarity in their notions [D].

(c) Forbeſ. ubi ſupra.

charged with this doctrine in the council of Conſtantinople, which was held by Monnas Patriarch of that city in the year 536. The Monks of Jeruſalem and Syria preſented a long petition to that council, wherein they gave a full account of the many evils which the church ſuffered from the Acephali; they informed them, that thoſe Heretics had ſpoken in the moſt blaſphemous manner againſt the council of Chalcedon; committed the moſt ſhocking acts of violence, and even murders; had reordained and rebaptized ſeveral perſons, and been guilty of the moſt ſcandalous immoralities. They deſired therefore the council to anathematize in particular Severus of Antioch, Peter of Apamea, Zoaras and their followers. This was immediately complied with, and the Emperor Juſtinian commanded by his edict, that the judgment of the council againſt them ſhould be put in execution; he baniſhed them from Conſtantinople, condemned their writings to be burnt, and prohibited any of the copiers to tranſcribe them, under pain of loſing his right hand. He likewiſe publiſhed a very ſtrict order, that no perſon who was engaged in the opinions of Neſtorius, Eutyches, Severus, or any other Heretics, ſhould dare to raiſe any tumult, or in the leaſt diſturb the peace of the church (5).

(5) Du Pin, Bibliotb. des Aut. Eccleſ. tom 5. p. 188. edit. de Mons 1691.

John Damaſcenus (6) calls theſe Heretics Egyptians, and Schematici, and Monophyſitæ.

(6) Libro de Hæreſ.

There is a long diſcourſe of Ruſticus a Deacon, who lived in thoſe times, againſt the Acephali; wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that "our Saviour "has two perfect and intire natures united in one "perſon; and that he is conſubſtantial with God the "Father with reſpect to his Divinity, and conſubſtan-"tial with us with reſpect to his humanity." Chriſtum neque Deo Patri, neque nobis eſſe comperſonalem, ſed pro duabus in una perſonâ integris ſeu perfectis naturis, Chriſtum eſſe Deo Patri conſubſtantialem ſecundum Deitatem, & eundem Chriſtum eſſe nobis conſubſtantialem ſecundum humanitatem (7). Leontius likewiſe, whom we have quoted above, has given a very accurate confutation of the opinions of that ſect (8). Cardinal Baronius tells us (9), that this writer lived in the time of Juſtinian the Elder; but we may obſerve that Leontius himſelf mentions Eulogius the Patriarch of Alexandria, who was undoubtedly contemporary with Pope Gregory the firſt of Rome, and was raiſed to the Biſhoprick of Alexandria under the Emperor Tiberius in the year 581, and died under Phocas in 608, as Baronius himſelf informs us.

(7) Forbeſ. ubi ſupra.

(8) Libr. de Sectis, Action. 607, and 809.

(9) Apud Spondanum. A. D. 553. § 3.

(10) Libr. de Sect. Action. 3.

[D] But there were four diſtinct ſubdiviſions of this ſect, which were diſtinguiſhed by ſome peculiarity in their notions.] They were divided into the Corrupticolæ, the Incorrupticolæ, the Agnoetæ, and the Tritheitæ. The Corrupticolæ were the followers of Severus of Antioch abovementioned; who being ask'd whether our Saviour's Body before the reſurrection was corruptible or not? anſwered that it was corruptible, and liable to the ſame neceſſities of nature as ours are, and required the ſame ſupplies of food and reſt. Upon this anſwer of Severus, ſome of the Alexandrians deſired Julian the Biſhop of Halicarnaſſus to give his opinion on that point; who replied, that our Lord's Body was incorruptible before the reſurrection, and was not in reality but only in appearance affected with hunger, ſleep, &c. From this Julian ſprung the Sect of the Incorrupticolæ, Phantaſiaſtæ, or Aphthardocetæ, who founded their notion upon this argument, that if we allow that our Saviour's Body was corruptible, we muſt then acknowledge two natures in him, one incorruptible, and the other corruptible (11). Whereas Severus on the other hand aſſerted, that the unity of Chriſt's nature might be maintained, notwithſtanding his Body was obnoxious to corruption. The notion of the Incorrupticolæ was confuted by ſeveral of the ancient fathers, as particularly by Juſtin Martyr (12), Athanaſius (13), St. Baſil (14), Gregory Nyſſen (15), St. Chryſoſtom (16), St. Gregory Nazianzen (17), St. Ambroſe (18, and St. Cyril of Alexandria (19).

(11) Leont. ibid. Actione 5.

(12) Oratione contra Gentes.

(13) De Incarnatione.

(14) De Gratiar. Actione.

(15) Contra Eunomium.

(16) Hom. 86. in Joannem.

(17) Orat. in Sancta Lumina.

(18) De Fide ad Gratianum.

(19) Epiſt. ad Succeſſum.

While this diſpute concerning the corruptibility and incorruptibility of Chriſt's Body was agitated among the Eutychians, Themiſtius a Deacon, (not Themiſtius the Pagan Philoſopher, who lived in the fourth Century, as Nicephorus falſely ſuppoſed (20) asked Timotheus Aſterius Biſhop of Alexandria, who was one of the Acephali, whether Chriſt was ignorant of any thing, ſince he was obnoxious to corruption? Timotheus determined upon the negative; upon which Themiſtius left his communion, and ſet up the Sect of the Agnoetæ, who were likewiſe called Themiſtiani from him, and who aſſerted that our Saviour was ignorant of ſome things, and particularly of the end of the world, and the laſt judgment, as Sophronius Patriarch of Jeruſalem affirms in his letter to Sergius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, which was read in the eleventh ſeſſion of the ſixth general council of Conſtantinople in the year 680. He maintained likewiſe, that Chriſt did not know where Lazarus's ſepulchre was, ſince, according to St. John the Evangeliſt (21), he asked his ſiſters, Where have ye laid him? This notion of the Agnoetæ was confuted by Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, as appears from Photius (22), and his book was declared by Pope Gregory the Great (23) to be agreeable to the ſenſe of both churches.

(20) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 18. c. 49.

(21) c. 11. v. 34.

(22) Biblioth. cod. 230.

(23) Lib. 10. Epiſt. 35.

The ſect of the Tritheitæ was derived from John Grammaticus, ſirnamed Philoponus, an Eutychian. The foundation of his opinion was this; that he confounded the nature with the hypoſtaſis or perſon, in conſequence of which he argued, that ſince there is but one hypoſtaſis or perſon in Chriſt, there muſt neceſſarily be but one nature, which is his Divine Nature; nay, he carried his reaſoning ſtill further, and aſſerted, that ſince there are three hypoſtaſes or perſons in the Trinity, conſequently there are three natures. He likewiſe denied the reſurrection of the body, and wrote a book againſt it, which was anſwered by Theodoſius, Conon, Eugenius and Themiſtius, who were all of them of the Eutychian party (24).

(24) Photius Biblioth. cod. xxi, xxii, and xxiii. See likewiſe Franc. Ignat. Hyacinth. Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 59, 60.

☞ACESIUS, a Novatian Biſhop, who was called by the Emperor Conſtantine the Great to the council of Nice in the year 325 (a). Socrates the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian has given us an account of ſome diſcourſe, which paſs'd between that Emperor and Aceſius [A], and cenſured Euſebius and other writers for omitting it [B]. The ſame ſtory

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 2. p. 317. edit. Paris 1693.

[A] An Account of ſome diſcourſe, which paſs'd between that Emperor and Aceſius.] He tells us (1), that he cannot omit mentioning a remarkable fact, which ſhewed Conſtantine's hearty deſire for the peace of the Church; for which purpoſe he ſent for Aceſius to the council. And when the creed, which was drawn up by that council, came to be ſign'd by all the members, he ask'd Aceſius whether he would give his conſent to that creed, and to the determination of the council concerning the time of the celebration of Eaſter; who replied, that there was nothing new determined by that council; ſince this was the faith, which he had received from his anceſtors even as high as the age of the Apoſtles; and with regard to the celebration of Eaſter, he had always obſerved it at the time which the council had appointed. Upon this the Emperor asked him, why he therefore ſeparated himſelf from the communion of the Church? to which he replied, by giving him an account of what paſſed in the time of the perſecution under Decius, and inſiſting upon the ſeverity of the rule then obſerved, that no perſon who had fallen into any crimes after Baptiſm, ſhould ever be received into the communion of the Church; but ſhould be exhorted to ſincere repentance, and warn'd to expect abſolution and forgiveneſs not of the Prieſts, but of God, who alone has the power of remitting ſins; ἐλπίδα δὲ τῆς ἀφέσεως, μὴ παρὰ τῶν ἱερέων. Upon this the Emperor ſaid to him with a great deal of pleaſantry, "Then ſet up a ladder for your ſelf, Aceſius, and "aſcend to heaven alone." Θὲς, ὦ Ἀκέσιε, κλίμακα, καὶ μόνος ἀνάβηθι εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν.

(1) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 1. cap. 10.

[B] . . . and cenſured Euſebius and other writers for omitting it.] He tells us, that neither Euſebius, nor ſtory is likewiſe related by another Hiſtorian [C]; but the truth of it is very much doubted by a critick of great eminence [D].

nor any other writer had mentioned this ſtory; but that he himſelf was inform'd of it by a man of veracity, παρὰ ἀνδρὸς ἄκρως εὐδοκίμου ψευδομένου, who was very aged, and related what he ſaw tranſacted in that council. From hence, ſays Socrates (2), I conjecture, that the writers, who have omitted this fact, acted upon the ſame views with many other hiſtorians, who are guilty of ſeveral important omiſſions, merely out of prejudice againſt ſome perſons, or affection to others.

(2) Ibid.

[C] The ſame ſtory is likewiſe related by another hiſtorian.] This hiſtorian is Sozomen, who ſeems to have taken it from Socrates, as the learned Valeſius obſerves (3), tho' he has made ſome little alterations in the manner of relating the fact. He quotes no authority for it, as Socrates has done, but begins his account with alledging only a report concerning it: λέγεται δὲ τὸν βασιλέα, i. e. "It is reported that the "Emperor &c. (4)." He informs us that Aceſius urged for a reaſon of his not communicating with the church, the conteſt which had been between Novatus and Cornelius in the time of the Emperor Decius, about excluding thoſe, who had committed a mortal ſin after Baptiſm, from all right to church communion. And he tells us, that Conſtantine's reply to Aceſius was not deſigned as any compliment to him, but rather as a piece of raillery upon him for ſuppoſing that his party were exempt from ſin, ἀναμαρτήτους, tho' they were men as well as others.

(3) Annotat. in lib. 1. c. 10. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Socratis.

(4) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 1. c. 22.

[D] The Truth of it is very much doubted by a critick of great eminence.] This critick is no leſs than the learned Henry Valeſius. His reaſons for doubting of this ſtory are as follows (5); 1. Becauſe we have no authority for it in any ancient writer; 2. Neither Socrates nor Sozomen tell us of what city Aceſius was Biſhop; which circumſtance was neceſſary to render the account credible: 3. It is improbable, that a Biſhop of the heretics ſhould be called by Conſtantine to a council of the church; for if that Emperor ſent for Aceſius in order to reſtore a general conſent and tranquillity in the church, for the ſame reaſon he would have called the Biſhops of other ſects of heretics to the council of Nice: 4. What Socrates affirms, that he had this account from a man who was very aged, and had been preſent in the council, is abſolutely incredible. This old man was Auxano, a Presbyter of the Novatians, who went with Aceſius to the council of Nice, and told him the ſtory of Aceſius, and lived to the time of Theodoſius the Younger, as we find by Socrates himſelf (6). Now it is very certain, that there were eighty three years from that council to the beginning of Theodoſius's reign. If we ſuppoſe therefore that Auxano was twenty years of age, when he was preſent at the council of Nice, and add them to the eighty three years abovementioned, it will appear that he was above an hundred years old, when he told Socrates this ſtory. Let the reader judge then, ſays Valeſius, what regard is to be paid to the teſtimony of a man who was ſuperannuated, and withal an heretic. Æſtimet igitur lector, quanti faciendum ſit teſtimonium hominis DECREPITI & HÆRETICI. However we ſhall leave the learned and impartial to determine upon the ſtrength of theſe exceptions to the truth of Socrates's ſtory; tho' we cannot but obſerve with regard to Valeſius's laſt objection, that tho' Auxano was an heretic, yet his teſtimony ought not therefore to be abſolutely rejected, as that critick ſeems to ſuppoſe; ſince Socrates aſſures us, that he was a man of veracity, ἀνδρὸς . . . οὐδαμῶς ψευδομένου, as we obſerv'd above (7); and Valeſius himſelf owns that this hiſtorian was not of the Novatian ſect (8).

(5) Annotat. in l. 1. c. 10. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Socratis.

(6) L. 1. c. 13.

(7) See Note [B].

(8) De Vitâ & Scriptis Socratis & Sozomeni, præmiſſâ editioni ſuæ Hiſt. Eccleſ. Socratis, &c.

☞ACHAIÆ PRESBYTERI (a), or the PRESBYTERS OF ACHAIA, were thoſe who were preſent at the martyrdom of St. Andrew the Apoſtle, in the year 59, and are ſaid to have written an epiſtle concerning it. This epiſtle is inſerted in Latin in Lipomannus, and Surius in his Hiſtory of the Lives of the Saints (b). Several eminent writers of the church of Rome, as Bellarmin (c) and father Labbe (d) receive it as genuine; while Baronius (e) on the other hand ſeems to doubt of its authority; and Tillemont (f) and Du Pin (g) expreſly reject it. A German author (h) has very accurately collected the opinions on both ſides of the queſtion. A late writer (i) has attempted to evince the genuineneſs of this epiſtle; but with what ſucceſs, we ſhall ſee in the note hereunder [A].

(a) Dr. Cave, Hiſtoria Literaria, p. 17. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720. and Olearius, Biblioth. Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. p. 6. edit. Jenæ. 1711.

(b) Ad D. 30 Novembris.

(c) De Scriptor. Eccleſ.

(d) Tom. 1. Diſſert. p. 4, ſeq. & in Append. p. 677.

(e) Ad Ann. 44. Sect. 42. ſeq. & ad Ann. 69. Sect. 34.

(f) Memoires Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1.

(g) Biblioth. des Aut. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 18. edit. Paris 1693.

(h) Chriſtoph. Hendreich in Pand. Brandeb.

(i) Natalis Alexander. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sec. 1. cap. 10. art. 8.

[A] . . . but with what ſucceſs we ſhall ſee in the note hereunder.] The main argument which he uſes in proof of his aſſertion, is the authority of the fathers. But he produces no teſtimonies prior to the latter end of the eighth Century, as that of Etherius Axamenſis in the year 789, Remigius Antiſſiodorenſis in 880, Petrus Damianus in 1057, Lanfranc of Canterbury in 1070, St. Bernard in 1115, Ivo Carnotenſis in 1092, who muſt infallibly be very incompetent witneſſes of what was done ſeven hundred or a thouſand years before they were born. But he alledges that the church of Rome reads this epiſtle in the office of St. Andrew; which may be true, and yet no argument for the genuineneſs of it, ſince there are a great many fabulous and ſpurious writings inſerted even in the moſt correct Roman Breviaries (1). The ancients indeed had ſome acts of St. Andrew's martyrdom extant among them, but they had been extremely corrupted by the Manicheans, as appears from St. Juſtin (2), Philaſtrius (3), and Pope Innocent (4); and Gelaſius (5) places them among the Apocryphal books. Nay Euſebius himſelf tells us (6), that the Heretics had forged ſeveral books under the names of the Apoſtles, as particularly the goſpels of Peter, Thomas and Matthias, and ſeveral others, and the Acts of Andrew, John and other Apoſtles; ἢ ἀπὸ Ἀνδρέου καὶ Ἰωάννου καὶ τῶν ἄλλων Ἀποστόλων Πράξεις. Theſe books, continues he, none of thoſe who ſucceeded the Apoſtles regularly in the church ever thought proper to cite in their works. Beſides, the very manner of writing in them is extremely different from the ſimplicity of the Apoſtles; and the doctrines contained in them are ſo inconſiſtent with the Catholic faith, that they ſhew them to be the forgeries of Heretics. Epiphanius likewiſe tells us (7), that "the Encratitæ, among their other hereſies, "ranked in their canon of Scripture the Acts of "Andrew and John, and Thomas, and other Apo"cryphal writings." κέχρηνται δὲ γραφαῖς ἀπροσκόποις ταῖς λεγομέναις Ἀνδρέου καὶ Ἰωάννου Πράξεσι, καὶ Θωμᾶ, καὶ Ἀποκρύφοις τισί. But theſe acts of St. Andrew were very different from thoſe which we have extant now; for the latter ſeem to have been forged by ſome Monk or other of the middle age. There are ſome things in them, which are by no means agreeable to the Apoſtolic ages; nay, the very form of the addreſs is extremely new and ſingular; Ab univerſis Eccleſiis, quæ ſunt in Oriente & Occidente, & Meridiano, & Septentrione; i. e. "From all the churches in the "Eaſt, and Weſt, and North, and South." Beſides it is incredible, that St. Andrew in his ſpeech to the Proconſul ſhould make uſe of ſo many florid antitheſes concerning the Tree of tranſgreſſion and the tree of paradiſe; the immaculate earth out of which the firſt man was created, and the immaculate Virgin, of whom Chriſt was born a perfect man; or that he ſhould ſay ſo many affected and abſurd things to his croſs. It is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that ſuch a multitude of people would flock together out of the whole Province to kill Ægeas, and reſcue St. Andrew from his impriſonment. Nor can we imagine that this Apoſtle would have uſed ſuch harſh terms to Ægeas the Proconſul, as he ſat upon his tribunal, by calling him the ſon of death, and ſtubble prepared for eternal

(1) Dr. Cave's Hiſt. Literaria, p. 18. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(2) Libro de Fide contra Manichæos.

(3) De Hæreſ. num. 40.

(4) Ep. ad Exuperant.

(5) In Conc. Roman.

(6) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 3. c. 29.

(7) Adverſus Hæreſes, lib. 2. tom. 1. p. 400. edit. Colon. 1682.

ACHAN [A], the ſon of Carmi of the Tribe of Judah, was preſent at the taking of the city of Jericho [B]. He concealed part of the ſpoils in direct contradiction eternal fire, Filium mortis & ſtipulam æternis paratam incendiis, and have reproached him with impudence. This is abſolutely irreconcileable with the meekneſs of an Apoſtle. I ſhall not inſiſt upon the ſtrange circumſtances, which are there ſaid to have attended his crucifixion; but ſhall obſerve, that the myſtery of the Trinity is explained in ſuch a manner, as renders it ſuſpicious, that theſe acts were invented after the council of Nice. The author ſeems to have embraced the ſame opinion with the modern Greeks concerning the Holy Ghoſt, which he affirms to proceed only from the Father, and to reſt upon the Son. Theſe diſputes were never thought of till ſeveral ages after the Apoſtles time. Baronius indeed tells us, that this clauſe about the Holy Ghoſt is not in ſeveral ancient manuſcripts. But who can tell, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (8), whether that paſſage was not rather eraſed in ſome MSS. than interpolated in others? And then he adds, with his uſual candor, that this epiſtle ought to be conſidered as a piece of doubtful authority, which never can be made uſe of, as St. Jerom ſays, to prove any article of faith. In ſhort, we find that the learned Dr. Cave was induced, by the reaſons abovementioned, to reject the whole as a mere pious fraud, and the abſurd production of ſome zealous Monk. Tota horum actorum compages piam fraudem, & ineptum Monachorum ingenium & zelum manifeſto ſapit (9).

(8) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 18.

(9) Dr. Cave, ubi ſupra.

[A] Achan.] Achan was the ſon of Carmi, the ſon of Zabdi, the ſon of Zerah, as the ſcripture tells us (1). Judah had by Thamar two ſons, Pharez and Zerah. Zerah was the father of Zabdi; and Zabdi the father of Carmi, whoſe ſon was Achan. We ſee here, that there were but five perſons in a ſucceſſion in this family for the ſpace of 265 years; ſo that it is plain neither of them could have had children before the age of fifty or fifty five years. This Achan is called in the Chronicles (2) Achar, and there is ſome alluſion made to this particular action of his, for he is ſtiled עכר עכר Achar Ocher, the Troubler of Iſrael; and there is the ſame alluſion, tho' expreſs'd more obſcurely in the 25th verſe of the vii. chapter of Joſhua, where the word Achor ſignifies Trouble (3).

(1) Joſhua vii. 1.

(2) 1 Book ii. 7.

(3) See Le Clerc. in locum.

[B] Achan . . . was preſent at the taking of the city of Jericho.] God gave a particular command to the Iſraelites to uſe the utmoſt ſeverity againſt the inhabitants of this city. He ordered that the city and all that were therein ſhould be accurſed (4). This ſhews that it was devoted to abſolute deſtruction without any reſerve. There were ſeveral kinds of theſe devotions in uſe amongſt the Jews; ſometimes all the inhabitants of a city, and all the cattle in it were deſtroyed; at other times the women and children were ſpared; and very often the riches and ſpoils of the city, as well as the people, were preſerved; in ſhort the extent and manner of theſe devotions depended entirely upon the will of him, who had the right of devoting. The Canaanites, who were enemies to God, were all appointed by him for deſtruction (5). He commanded, that they ſhould be exterminated, and put to the ſword; that no alliance ſhould be contracted with them. However we do not find that they were univerſally treated with the ſame rigour as Jericho was; for their cities and the ſpoils of them were preſerved. Tho' Moſes had devoted the Cities of Sihon King of Heſhbon, yet the cattle and the ſpoils were reſerved for the conquerors (6). But in the caſe of Jericho the ſeverity was carried to the utmoſt extent; all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and ſheep, and aſs, were deſtroyed with the edge of the ſword (7); only the SILVER and GOLD, and the veſſels of braſs and iron were put into the treaſury of the houſe of the Lord (8). Nay the curſe was perpetuated upon that city; for the ſcripture informs us, that Joſhua adjured the people in the following form, never to rebuild it: Curſed be the man before the Lord, that riſeth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he ſhall lay the foundation thereof in his firſt-born, and in his youngeſt ſon ſhall he ſet up the gates of it (9). We find in the ancient Hiſtory ſeveral inſtances of ſuch imprecations as theſe againſt rebuilding the cities of enemies, whoſe power they were jealous of, or whoſe perfidiouſneſs and violence they deteſted. The Romans made a decree full of the moſt ſolemn execrations (10) againſt thoſe, who ſhould rebuild Carthage, which had been the rival of their empire, and the ſituation of which was ſo advantageous, that it muſt inevitably give them the moſt formidable apprehenſions, if ever it was rebuilt. Agamemnon made the ſame imprecations againſt thoſe who ſhould rebuild Troy, and Crœſus againſt thoſe, who ſhould rebuild Sidene; and this was agreable to the ancient cuſtom, as Strabo aſſures (11). Ἔτι καὶ κατηραμένην ὑπ' Ἀγαμέμνονος κατὰ παλαιὸν ἔθος, καθάπερ καὶ ὁ Κροῖσος ἐξελὼν τὴν Σιδήνην εἰς ἣν ὁ τύραννος κατέφυγε Γλαυκίας, ἀρὰς ἔθετο κατὰ τῶν τειχούντων πάλιν τὸν τόπον. The Ionians devoted thoſe perſons to the ſevereſt vengeance, who ſhould attempt to rebuild the temples, which had been demoliſhed by the Perſians; the ruins of them might continue to poſterity as an eternal monument of the impiety of thoſe Barbarians, and ſhew how little confidence was to be placed in thoſe people, who had been preſumptuous enough to war even againſt the Gods themſelves (12). The Greeks likewiſe prohibited the rebuilding of the temples, which had been burnt down by the Perſians in their country; and ordered them to continue for ever in the ruins, as a public monument of the hatred between thoſe two nations (13).

(4) Joſh. vi. 7.

(5) Deut. vii. 2.

(6) Idem, ii. 35.

(7) Joſh. vi. 21.

(8) Ver. 24.

Ver. 26.

(10) Zonar. l. 2.

(11) Lib. 13.

(12) Iſocrates in Panegyr.

(13) Diodor. l. 11. Pauſan. in Phocius.

Theſe imprecations of Joſhua were not in vain. In the time of King Ahab Hiel the Bethelite undertook to rebuild Jericho (14); but he loſt his eldeſt ſon Abiram, when he laid the foundation; and his youngeſt ſon Segub, when he ſet up the gates. In ſome copies of the Septuagint the hiſtory of Hiel is inſerted in the 26th verſe of the 6th chapter of Joſhua; but the names are alter'd: And Ozan (or Azozan) of Bethel having done this, he loſt Abirom his eldeſt ſon when he laid the foundations, and his youngeſt ſon, whom he had remaining, when he ſet up the gates: Καὶ ἐποίησε οὕτως Ὠσὰν (vel Ἀζαΐζαν) ὁ ἐκ Βαιθὴλ, ἐν τῷ Ἀβιρὰμ τῷ πρωτοτόκῳ αὐτοῦ ἐθεμελίωσεν αὐτὴν, καὶ ἐν τῷ διασωθῆναι ἀλλαχόσε ἐπέστησε τὰς πύλας αὐτοῦ. This is a very faulty tranſlation of the paſſage above cited in the firſt Book of Kings, where that fact is related.

(14) 1 Kings xvi. 34.

However it does not appear, that Jericho was entirely abandoned till the time of this Hiel; for we find by ſeveral paſſages of ſcripture, that there were inhabitants there before. Thoſe writers, who ſuppoſe that the city of Palm-trees was the ſame with Jericho, muſt neceſſarily acknowledge, that it was in being ſoon after Joſhuah's time, ſince the children of Jethro, the Kenite, went up out of the city of Palm-trees to ſeek a better ſettlement at the beginning of the government of the Judges (15). King Eglon took the city of Palm-trees from the Iſraelites (16). David's Embaſſadors having been ill treated by the King of the Ammonites, who had ordered half of their beards to be ſhaved off, and their garments to be cut off in the middle, ſtaid at Jericho till their beards were grown (17). So that there was from that time a city of Jericho; but it ſtood very probably near the ruins of ancient Jericho (18). This is confirmed by Joſephus, who obſerves, that there was to be ſeen in his time near the ancient Jericho, which was deſtroyed by Joſhua, a fountain, which was ſufficient to water the whole country: Παρὰ μὲν τὸν τὴν Ἰεριχοῦντα, ἥτις πηγὴ διαψιλήσει, καὶ πρὸς ἀρδείας λιπαροτάτη, καρὰ τὴν παλαίαν ἀναβλύζουσα πόλιν, ἣν Ἰησοῦς πρώτῳ εἶλε δορίκτητον (19). It is plain from this author's mentioning ancient Jericho, near which the ſource of this fountain was, that he conſiders it as diſtinct from the new city, which was ſituated in the middle of the country.

(15) Judges i. 16.

(16) ch. iii. 13.

(17) 2 Sam. x. 4, 5.

(18) Doubdan Voyage de la Terre Sainte, ch. 37.

(19) Joſeph. de Bello Judaic. l. 5. c. 4.

The ancient city was never rebuilt till the time of Hiel the Bethelite; and tho' the vengeance of God had appeared very eminently againſt him, who had engaged in that work, yet we do not find that any perſon ſcrupled to go and live there, when once it was rebuilt. The Prophets Elijah and Eliſha were there for ſome time: nay our Saviour himſelf honoured it with his preſence; and in the latter times of the Hebrew Republic it was a place of conſiderable importance. At preſent Jericho is almoſt entirely abandoned; diction to God's expreſs command; which ſin of his was attended with very fatal conſequences to the Iſraelites [C], for three thouſand men whom Joſhua had ſent againſt the city of Ai, were defeated and put to flight by the enemy. Joſhua in this dreadful exigence, proſtrated himſelf upon the earth before the Lord, and deſired him in the moſt moving terms to have mercy upon his people. God immediately acquainted Joſhua with the cauſe of this misfortune, which was their taking of the accurſed thing, and commanded him to ſanctify the people. Upon this Joſhua aſſembled the people together; doned; it conſiſts of not above thirty or forty wretched cottages, which ſerve for a retreat to ſome poor Turks. The plain of Jericho, which was ſo much extolled by the ancients for its beauty and fertility is now abſolutely uncultivated, and produces nothing but a few wild trees and fruits (20).

(20) Calmet, Comment. ſur Joſué, ch. 6.

It will not perhaps be improper to conſider here ſome objections, which have been ſtarted with regard to the ſevere treatment of the Canaanites. A late author (21) inveighs very ſeverely againſt the Jews invading them (by God's command, tho' he does not mention it here) who were a free and independent nation . . . and on pretence of their being idolaters, deſtroying not only the men and women, but infants incapable of idolatry. This he repreſents as an unparallel'd piece of injuſtice and cruelty, and therefore he would be glad to know what our Divines ſay . . to ſhew it is not contrary to the law of nature. In anſwer to this an ingenious writer (22) obſerves, that altho' a viſible temporal Prince has no authority to puniſh or deſtroy his ſubjects, merely for being idolatrous, the inviſible ſpiritual Lord undoubtedly has. Idolatry is a direct and immediate rebellion againſt God, who might according to the laws of juſtice and equity, extirpate any nation for an incorrigible impiety of this kind. And 'tis the very ſame thing with reſpect to natural reaſon and equity in the caſe, whether God deſtroy'd thoſe nations (whoſe iniquities were full and call'd for puniſhment) by fire, water, plague, peſtilence, or famine, or by the ſword of another nation, raiſed up and commiſſioned immediately by himſelf for that purpoſe. The author of Chriſtianity &c. offers three arguments to evade the force of this anſwer to his objections.

(21) Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, p. 271, 272.

(22) Mr. Jackſon's Remarks on a book entitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, p. 49, & ſeq.

1. To the plea of the Jews having God's immediate command to deſtroy the Canaanites, he alledges, That no man could be as certain he had any ſuch poſitive command from God, as he was, that God had forbid it to him by the light of nature. In anſwer to which it is urged, that it is abſurd to ſay, that God cannot by his immediate power give men as great a certainty of his will revealed to them, as by the moſt demonſtrative reaſon; and if he can, then, as reaſon tells every man that human life is the undoubted property of God to diſpoſe of as he thinks fit, the ſame reaſon will tell them, that when God commands it to be taken away, it is no more a breach of the law of nature, or revelation, forbidding men to kill one another without cauſe, (for that alone is murder,) than it is a breach of the ſame law for a Civil Magiſtrate to command a man to be put to death for the moſt heinous crime committed againſt the law of the land. It cannot reaſonably be ſuppoſed that God by revelation will command one man or body of men to deſtroy another man or body of men without cauſe; but to ſuppoſe, that on no account he can give men a certainty of ſuch a command coming from him, is highly unreaſonable and abſurd. Nay the objector might be challenged to ſhew a caſe to juſtify any human Governour in executing death upon a criminal, that will not juſtify the providence of God, as plainly and ſtrongly in his commanding by expreſs revelation a criminal offending againſt the divine laws to be put to death. It is unreaſonable therefore to deny that power to God, which is allow'd to men. The infants ſuffering with their idolatrous wicked parents, muſt be reſolved into the wiſe and good diſpenſation of God, who knew it would be better for them to die, tho' guiltleſs, than to live.

2. The objector urges, that God has a thouſand ways of puniſhing wicked nations with death, without commanding men to do any thing, which by the law of nature he had forbid them — If God deſigned what he did to be a terror to others, would he not act after ſuch a ſignal and ſupernatural manner, as all ſhould ſee it was his own doing? In anſwer to this, 'tis ſaid, that God might deſign what he did by the hands of the Jews, to be a teſtimony to them of his diſpleaſure againſt idolatry, by making them the ſignal inſtruments of puniſhing it in another nation, in order more effectually to deter them and their poſterity from it by the memorial of ſo miraculous a judgment, executed by their hands againſt the enemies of true religion and the worſhippers of falſe Gods. So that the reaſon of the deſtruction of the Canaanites was evident; and the effecting it by the Jewiſh armies tended to fulfil the end for which God deſigned it: And the proner the Jews themſelves were to idolatry, which is made another objection in the caſe, the more likely was the method of God's making them the inſtruments of extirpating it, to reform their pronenеſs to it; when they both ſaw the vengeance, which God by their hands executed againſt it, and were alſo at the ſame time aſſured from God himſelf that no leſs vengeance in like manner ſhould fall upon them and their children, if they ſhould forſake the worſhip of him the true God, and devote themſelves to the ſervice of idols.

3. The third argument of the author of Chriſtianity &c. (23) in ſupport of his objection, is, If the Iſraelites had a Divine commiſſion to extirpate the Canaanites, the Canaanites ought to have known it, to prevent their reſiſting men acting by a divine commiſſion; otherwiſe there would be two oppoſite rights at the ſame time; a right in the Jews to take away the lives of the Canaanites, and a right in the Canaanites by the law of nature to defend their lives. In anſwer to this it is ſaid (24), that this argument is exactly of the ſame form with the following one, viz. If God by any immediate or providential judgment from himſelf, deſigned to kill any one, as by fire, water, plague, &c. he ought to let him know it, that he might not reſiſt, by endeavouring to eſcape the fire or water, or by taking medicines to cure the plague; otherwiſe there would be two oppoſite rights at the ſame time; a right in God to take away the life of a man his creature, when and how he pleaſed, and a right in man by the law of nature to uſe all reaſonable means in his power for the preſervation of his life. The caſe is parallel; and it ſeems unreaſonable to urge an argument from two oppoſite rights, which is apparent in the daily thoughts and actions of men. Have not I a right to think for my ſelf, and to act according to my judgment? And has not another perſon the ſame right to think for himſelf, and to act in oppoſition to me, according to his judgment alſo?

(23) P. 274, 275.

(24) Mr. Jackſon's Remarks, &c. p. 52.

[C] ..... which ſin of his was attended with very fatal conſequences to the Iſraelites.] We are told in Scripture, that the children of Iſrael committed a treſpaſs in the accurſed thing, becauſe Achan had taken of it; and that the anger of the Lord was kindled againſt them (25). Now it will be asked, how it can be properly ſaid, that the Iſraelites had committed a treſpaſs, ſince Achan only was guilty of it? and how the anger of the Lord could juſtly be kindled againſt all Iſrael, ſince there was but one man who had offended? To this it is anſwered, I. That it is an uſual manner of expreſſion in the Scripture as well as in common converſation, to aſcribe that to the whole community which belongs only to one or a few perſons. Thus St. Matthew (26) tells us that the Diſciples murmured at Mary Magdalen's pouring out the precious ointment upon our Saviour's head, though it was Judas only who was diſpleaſed at it; and the ſame Evangeliſt applies that to both the thieves who were crucified with Chriſt, which related only to one of them (27). The ſame manner of ſpeaking is frequently uſed by the moſt exact profane authors, as appears from Donatus upon Terence (28).

(25) Joſh. vii. 1.

(26) xxvi. 8. compared with St. John xii. 4. and St. Mark xiv. 3.

(27) xxvii. 44.

(28) Hecyr. Act. 2. Scen. 1.

II. Achan's crime was conſidered as that of the whole people, as long as the people permitted it to go unpuniſhed. It is true, neither the magiſtrates nor the people knew any thing of it at firſt, and conſequently gether; and Achan was taken out from all the tribes by God's appointment [D], and confeſſed that he had ſtolen [E] a rich Babyloniſh garment [F], and two hundred ſhekels of ſilver, and a wedge of gold of fifty ſhekels weight, and had hid them in the ground in his tent. Having made this open acknowledgment of his ſin, Joſhua ordered him quently it could not be imputed to them, as if they had neglected to puniſh it. But God was willing to ſhew them the danger of violating his commandments by the ſeverity with which he treated them, by inflicting the puniſhment, which was due to Achan only, upon the whole nation. There is no injuſtice in this conduct of his; for the external evils which he chaſtiſes us with, are generally the effects of his mercy rather than of his juſtice; by this means he exerciſes our patience, raiſes our zeal for his ſervice, and awakens our attention to our own behaviour. This manner of reaſoning is juſtified by the good effects, which the misfortune, that attended a few particular perſons had upon Joſhua, and the elders, and the whole nation; and it ſhews the advantages which men of virtue receive from publick evils and calamities (29).

(29) Calmet, in locum.

The judicious Monſieur Le Clerc obſerves, that it is probable that a great many perſons were privy to this crime of Achan, or had neglected to prevent the command of God from being broken. It was ſomething of this nature that kindled his anger againſt all the Iſraelites; for though they were guilty of many other ſins which deſerved his vengeance, yet we muſt ſuppoſe, that he had a particular regard to this crime in his puniſhment of them (30).

(30) Comment. in Joſ. vii. 1.

[D] Achan was taken out from all the tribes by God's appointment.] St. Jerom is of opinion that this was done by caſting lots, and renders theſe words in our tranſlation; And it ſhall be that the tribe which the Lord taketh; Quancumque tribum ſors invenerit. i. e. "Whatever tribe the lot ſhall fall upon." And Joſephus has repreſented this fact in the ſame manner; κατὰ φυλὴν ἐκλήρου; i. e. "they caſt lots by "tribes (31).

(31) Joſeph. Antiq. l. 5. c. 1.

It is plain that there is no mention made of lots in the original; and Le Clerc is of opinion that they were not uſed in this caſe, but that Eleazar ſtood in his pontifical garments, and pronounced what God ſuggeſted to him. The Rabbis tell us, that every tribe was made to paſs before the ark, and that the tribe which was guilty ſtood ſtill before it, without being able to move themſelves out of the place. Others aſſert, that every tribe paſſed ſeparately before the High-Prieſt, who had his breaſt plate on, and that the tribe of Judah was diſcovered to be guilty, becauſe the ſound of the ſtone, on which the name of that tribe was engraven, ceaſed immediately (32).

(32) See Vatablus, Muſ. Druſ. Bonfr.

But it is moſt probable that the uſual method was taken upon this occaſion; they caſt lots to diſcover firſt the tribe, then the family, next the houſhold, and laſtly the particular perſon. This method was obſerved in the election of Saul for King (33), and in the caſe of his ſon Jonathan, who had eaten honey contrary to his father's expreſs command (34). The land of Canaan was divided amongſt the people by Lot (35); and the ſcape-goat appointed for an atonement, was choſen in the ſame manner (36).

(33) 1 Sam. x. 20, 21.

(34) xiv. 41, 42.

(35) 1 Chron. xxiv. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, & ſeq.

(36) Levit. xvi. 8.

The uſe of lots is very common in ſcripture; nay it ſeems to be authorized even in things which relate to religion; and God himſelf appears to have approv'd of it upon many occaſions. He directed the lots to diſcover Achan and Jonathan in the caſes above mentioned. And this method ſucceeded when the mariners were in danger of ſhipwreck on account of Jonah (37); and the ſame was obſerved, when the Apoſtles wanted to chuſe a perſon in the room of Judas (38). In ſhort Solomon tells us, that the lot is caſt into the lap; but the whole diſpoſing thereof is of the Lord (39); and that the lot cauſeth contentions to ceaſe, and parteth between the mighty (40).

(37) Jon. i. 7.

(38) Acts i. 26.

(39) Prov. xvi. 33.

(40) xviii. 18.

But neither theſe examples nor authorities, as Father Calmet obſerves (41), can abſolutely juſtify the uſe of lots; and nothing but the expreſs command of God, and an authority ſuperiour to human laws, could vindicate the conduct of Joſhua with regard to the diſcovery of Achan, or that of Saul with regard to Jonathan. As God has never abſolutely promiſed to diſcover ſecret crimes by that method; we can never make uſe of it for that purpoſe, without a preſumptuous tempting of him, unleſs we had his direct command for it. The uſe of lots is ſtill leſs allowable in the choice of perſons for the government either in civil or religious affairs. We have indeed two inſtances of this kind, one in the choice of the firſt King of Iſrael, and the other in that of an Apoſtle, who was to ſucceed Judas; but this was done by the particular appointment of God. The former election was made by a Prophet, and the latter by the Apoſtles; beſides, the Apoſtles did not proceed to this method till they had before tried all the human means which prudence could ſuggeſt, by fixing upon two men of undoubted merit, and addreſſing themſelves to God in prayer that he would direct them: Nobis ab Apoſtolis ſors ducta deſignat, quia ubi ex fide integrâ & oratione præmiſſâ ſors ducitur, ea, quæ Dei voluntas continet in occulto, ſors hominibus declarat in manifeſto (42). The laws of the ancient church condemned very ſeverely the uſe of lots in the election of Biſhops: Sortis uſum in electionibus perpetuâ damnatione prohibemus, ſays Pope Honorius. And it is certain, that it would be the ſource of great confuſion, to truſt to chance a point of ſuch importance as the choice of thoſe, who are to fill that character, eſpecially, ſince there are other methods of examining whether they are ſufficiently qualified or not. With reſpect to the caſe of the mariners, who ſucceeded in diſcovering Jonah by caſting of lots; we cannot conclude from thence, that this action of theirs was approved of by God, but it appears to be merely the effect of ſuperſtition; and it is very certain, that the external ſucceſs of any act can never prove the intrinſic goodneſs of it. To conclude, the diviſion of the promis'd land by lot, was made by the command of God, and therefore we cannot doubt the reaſonableneſs and equity of it; and it is acknowledged by Divines, that upon ſuch occaſions the uſe of lots is very juſtifiable.

(41) Comment. ſur Joſue vii. 14.

(42) Origen, Homil. 23. in Joſ.

[E] Who confeſs'd that he had ſtolen &c.] As ſoon as the lot fell upon Achan, Joſhua exhorted him in the mildeſt terms imaginable to confeſs his crime. My ſon, ſays he (43), give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Iſrael, and make confeſſion unto him &c. The gentleneſs, with which he treats Achan as his ſon, tho' he knew him to be the cauſe of all the diſtreſs and confuſion, which they were involved in, is the characteriſtic of a great and generous ſpirit. Grotius (44) obſerves upon this paſſage, that we may draw from hence ſome proofs in favour of the immortality of the Soul. For it is not probable, that Achan would be induced by any other apprehenſion to confeſs a crime, which would inevitably expoſe him to capital puniſhment. For it is the opinion of the Jews, that God will pardon ſuch crimes, when the guilty perſon has confeſſed them and ſuffer'd death for them: Videtur hinc rectè colligi ſpes aliquâ de animorum permanſione poſt mortem. Quâ enim aliâ ſpe adductus hic homo eſt, ut crimen capitale fateretur? Eſt autem ſententia Judæorum, confeſſione & morte criminum talium veniam à Deo impetrari.

(43) Joſh. vii. 19.

(44) In locum.

[F] A Babyloniſh garment.] The Hebrew expreſſion is אַדֶּרֶת שִׁנְעָר i. e. "a garment of Sinhar." Aquila calls it φόλην Βαβυλωνικὴν, i. e. "a long Babylo-"niſh garment." Symmachus renders it ἔνδυμα Σενναὰρ, i. e. "a garment of Sennar; and the Septuagint ψίλην ποικίλην, i. e. "a garment of divers co-"lours." Babylon was built in the plains of Shinar, as it is called in our tranſlation (45). We find Σενναὰρ τῆς Βαβυλωνίας, i. e. "Sennaar of Babylon," in Hiſtiæus Mileſius, Singara in Ptolemy and Pliny, and Singarana in Sextus Rufus. The cloths of Babylon are celebrated amongſt the ancients. The ſcripture ſometimes diſtinguiſhes the garments which are called Adoret, by the epithet hairy; which would incline one to think, that they were like Turkiſh tapeſtry, which is a very ancient manufacture, and came originally from the Eaſt. Moſes compares Eſau to an Adoret or hairy garment (46); and Zechariah (47) ſays, that for the future the Prophets ſhall not wear a rough garment, (or as it is rendered in the margin of our

(45) Geneſ. xi. 2.

(46) Ibid. xxv. 25.

(47) xiii. 4.

him and his children to be ſeized [G], and carried into the valley of Achor, where he was ſtoned to death, and then burnt to aſhes [H]; and a great heap of ſtones was raiſed over him [I]. This expiation being made, Ai was immediately taken by ſtratagem, and twelve thouſand of the enemies were put to the ſword (a).

(a) Joſhua vii, viii, ix.

tranſlation a garment of hair) to deceive. We find likewiſe by other paſſages, that this garment was ſometimes very magnificent, and was worn by Princes. Thus the King of Niniveh laid his robe or Adoret from him, and covered himſelf with ſackcloth, at the preaching of Jonah (48). Joſephus tells us, that the garment, which Achan took, was a royal garment all woven of gold, χλαμύδα βασίλειον ἐκ χρυσοῦ πᾶσαν ὑφασμένην (49).

(48) Jon. iii. 6.

(49) Antiq. l. 5. c. 1.

With reſpect to the Babyloniſh garments; the antients agree, that they were of divers colours (50): but ſome writers are of opinion, that they were weaved of different colours; others, that theſe colours were embroidered upon them; and others again, that they were died. Silius Italicus is of the firſt opinion;

(50) See Bonfrer. in Joſ. c. 7. v. 21.

Veſtis ſpirantes referens ſub tegmine vultus
Quæ radio celat Babylon (51).

(51) L. 14.

Martial favours thoſe, who ſuppoſe them to be embroidered:

Non ego prætulerim Babylonica picta ſuperbè
Texta, Semiramiâ quæ variantur acu (52).

(52) L. 8. Epigr. 28. Vide eundem in Apophoretis.

Pliny ſeems to be of the laſt opinion. Colores diverſos picturæ intexere Babylon maximè celebravit, & nomen impoſuit (53). And Apuleius (54) expreſſes himſelf to the ſame purpoſe. The Vulgate tranſlation calls this garment, pallium coccineum, i. e. "a "ſcarlet robe," which ſeems not to be very agreeable to the words of the original.

(53) L. 8. c. 48.

(54) Florid. l. 1.

[G] Joſhua order'd him, and his children to be ſeiz'd.] The Scripture tells us, that Joſhua and all Iſrael with him took Achan the ſon of Zerah and the ſilver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his ſons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his aſſes, and his ſheep, and his tent, and all that he had; and they brought them into the valley of Achor. . . . And all Iſrael ſtoned him with ſtones, and burned them with fire, after they had ſtoned them with ſtones (55). This paſſage may admit of this explication, that Achan's ſons and daughters were brought forth in order to receive Joſhuah's exhortations, with the reſt of the people, that they ſhould take care to avoid all ſuch attempts as that, for which Achan was to be puniſhed; and not with any deſign, that they ſhould be put to death with their father. Thoſe writers, who maintain this opinion, underſtand the words, that immediately follow, And they ſtoned them, (as it is in the Hebrew, and not him, as in our tranſlation,) of Achan and his cattle (56). But it is probable, that his children were privy to his crime, and conſequently deſerved puniſhment. For it would undoubtedly have been a very ſhocking example in ſuch a public judgment as this, to have involved Achan's ſons and daughters in his puniſhment, if they had been innocent; and it is certain the Moſaic Law has expreſly determined the contrary, where it tells us, that the Fathers ſhall not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers: but that every man ſhall be put to death for his own ſin (57). The Talmudiſts aſſure us, that Achan's children were accomplices in his crime, ſince it was impoſſible to hide what he had ſtolen in his tent, without their knowing of it. But St. Auſtin (58), and ſeveral other eminent interpreters (59, are of opinion, that tho' the children were innocent of their father's crime, yet the putting them to death may be vindicated from injuſtice, ſince God, who is the ſovereign Judge of all his creatures, and who is determined in his whole conduct by the eternal and invariable rules of juſtice and truth, has always a right to reſume our life, which he has only entruſted us with during his pleaſure, without any preciſe limitation of time. Beſides, the ſeverity of this puniſhment was neceſſary at firſt in order to keep the people in awe, and oblige them to a perfect ſubmiſſion to God's commands.

(55) Joſh. vii. 24, 25.

(56) See Grotius in locum.

(57) Deut. xxiv. 16.

(58) Qu. 8. in Joſuam apud Calmet in locum.

(59) Maſ. Cornel. Juni. Menoch. Bonfrer.

[H] He was ſton'd to death, and then burnt to aſhes.] He was ſtoned firſt in order to mitigate the rigour of his puniſhment; which would have been perhaps more ſevere, if he had been burnt alive. The Rabbins indeed tell us, that the manner of burning was by burying the criminal up to the neck in the ground, then ſtrangling him, and afterwards pouring hot lead into his mouth (60). They tell us likewiſe, that Achan was burnt as a ſacrilegious perſon, and ſton'd to death for having broken the ſabbath, by ſtealing and concealing his theft on that day (61). It is true the breach of the ſabbath was puniſhed in the wilderneſs with ſtoning to death (62); and ſacrilege with the fire: but there ſeems to be no occaſion for theſe ſubtilties; the caſe of Achan was a very ſingular one; and it is highly probable that God commanded Joſhua to inflict this particular puniſhment upon him, without any regard to the ordinary laws.

(60) Joan. Henr. Hottingeri. Jus Hebræorum, Leg. 224.

(61) Munſter. ex Hebr. apud Calmet, Comm. in locum.

(62) Numb. xv. 32, 35.

[I] A great heap of ſtones was raiſed over him.] Joſephus calls it τάφον ἄτιμον, i. e. "a monument "or ſepulchre of infamy (63). Some commentators (64) ſuppoſe that the ſtoning of Achan, which was mentioned above, was nothing elſe but this heap of ſtones, which was raiſed over his aſhes. But it is much more probable, that he was firſt ſtoned to death, then burnt, and at laſt this heap of ſtones was thrown upon his aſhes as a mark of the deteſtation which the Iſraelites had for his crime. The ſame was done to the King of Ai (65), and a long time after to Abſalom, who died in rebellion againſt his Father David (66) Perhaps Achan might be bound to a ſtake, in order to be burnt, and ſtoned to death in the ſame place, ſo that he was burnt and ſtoned at the ſame time. This is the common method among the Turks to this day (67). When any perſon is condemned to be burnt, they place a great fire near the ſtake, to which he is tied, on that ſide from which the wind blows: ſo that the wind carries the flame and ſmoke directly upon the criminal. In the mean time all the people, who are preſent, caſt ſtones at him; ſo that he is burnt and ſtoned to death at the ſame time.

(63) Antiq. l. 1.

(64) Serar. Bonfrer.

(65) Joſ. viii. 29.

(66) 2 Sam. xviii. 17.

(67) Roger, Terre Sainte, l. 2. c. 17. p. 326. apud Calmet in locum.

☞ACHARD [A] Biſhop of Avranches in Normandy, flouriſhed in the twelfth Century. There is a great diſpute among authors of what country he was [B]. He was a Canon-regular of the order of St. Auguſtin, and the ſecond Abbot of St. Victor at Paris. He ſucceeded Gilduin in the year 1155 (a), and was preferred to the Biſhoprick of Avranches in 1162 (b) [C]. He had a great ſhare in the favour of King Henry II. of (a) Oudini Commentar. de Scriptoribus Eccleſiæ Antiq. tom. 2. col. 1298.

(b) Id. ibid. c. 1299.

(1) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Latin. l. 2. c. 52.

(2) In his Index Auctorum prefixed to his Gloſſarium mediæ & infimæ Latinitatis, col. 79.

(3) Hiſt. Literaria Scriptor. Eccleſiaſtic. p. 579. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

[A] ACHARD.] Arnoul Wion in Ligno Vitæ calls him erroneouſly Archardus (1). The learned Monſieur du Freſne (2) tells us of another perſon, whoſe name was Archard, and who was a Monk of the abbey of Clairvaux, and flouriſhed in the year 1140. And Dr. Cave (3) only mentions the latter, and aſcribes to him two books which are generally ſaid to have been written by the former.

[B] There is a great diſpute among Authors of what country he was.] Voſſius ſays that he was Bridlingtonenſis, of Bridlington in England (4) Cæſar Egaſſius du Boulay (5) writes that he was of Northumberland. But the Sammarthani Fratres (6) tell us, that he was a Norman by birth, of a noble family in the Earldom of Domfront; and this might give occaſion to his being ſuppoſed an Engliſhman, becauſe Normandy was then ſubject to the King of England.

(5) Univerſitat. Pariſienſis in Catal. p. 715.

(6) In Galliâ Chriſtianâ tom. 4. p. 925. in Abbatibus Sancti Victoris Pariſienſis.

[C] He was preferred to the Biſhoprick of Avranches in 1162.] He was raiſed to this dignity by the favour of King Henry II. of England; but his promotion diſpleaſed Lewis King of France, who immediately ſent him away, and forbid him for the future to exerciſe of England, and was godfather to Eleanor, daughter to that Prince, and afterwards wife of Alphonſus IX. King of Caſtile. He died the twenty ninth of March 1172, and was interred in the church of the Holy Trinity belonging to the Abbey of Luzerne, in the Dioceſe of Avranches. His epitaph, which is ſtill remaining, is as follows: Hic jacet Achardus Epiſcopus, cujus charitate ditata eſt paupertas noſtra: i. e. "Here lies Biſhop "Achard, by whoſe charity our poverty was enriched." He was a perſon of great eminence for piety and learning. His younger years he ſpent in the ſtudy of polite Literature and Philoſophy, and the latter part of his life he employed in a very intenſe application to Divinity (c). He wrote ſeveral books, of which a catalogue ſhall be given hereunder [D].

(c) Pitſ. de Script. Angl. ex Lelando & Boſtono MSS. Auctoribus.

ciſe any authority in the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris; as appears by the following letter to the Prior and Brethren of that Monaſtery. Ludovicus Dei gratia Francorum Rex, Prieri & univerſis Fratribus Sancti Victoris ſalutem & dilectionem. Eccleſia iſta & beneficio prædeceſſorum noſtrorum & eccleſiæ Pariſienſis fundata eſt, unde & ſpecialius eam diligimus. Vocatus eſt Abbas veſter ad aliam eccleſiam. Non volumus quod res eccleſiæ, cujus cura ad nos ſpecialiter ſpectat in aliquo minorentur, ſed creſcant. Unde & regiâ authoritate vobis præcipimus, ut Abbas Achardus de cætero nullam alienandi vel accipiendi res eccleſiæ iſtius habeat facultatem, neque eo præſente verbum aliquod electione incipiatis. Valete (7).

(7) Oudin. Comment de Scriptorib. Eccleſ. tom. 2. col. 1299.

[D] He wrote ſeveral books of which a catalogue ſhall be given hereunder.] De Tentatione Chriſti, i. e. "Of the Temptation of Chriſt;" which is preſerved in MS. in the library of St. Victor at Paris, and begins thus; Ductus eſt Jeſus in deſertum, ut tentaretur a diabolo, &c. De ſerie lectionis evangelicæ ſuffitit hucuſque. In ſermone præſenti non oportet peregrinari, ſed etiam tantillum &c. He wrote likewiſe another work De diviſione animæ & ſpiritûs, which is in MS. in the library of St. Victor, and which begins thus; Subſtantia interior, quæ una cum corpore conſtituit hominem, &c. There is likewiſe a copy of it in the library of the univerſity of Cambridge Cod. 1558, and another in Bennet College library Cod. 291, num. 9. with this title, Magiſtri Achardi Tractatus de diviſione animæ & ſpiritus. In the library of the Abbey of Clairvaux is a MS. intitled, Sermones Magiſtri Achardi (8). He left likewiſe the Life of St. Geſelin the Monk, which Bayle has omitted (9). This life was publiſhed at Doway in 1626. in 12. by Arnold Raiſius, but it is aſcribed to Achard or Archard a Monk of Clairvaux by Du Freſne (10), Dr. Cave (11) and Mr. Du Pin (12) who ſay, that he was a Monk of the Ciſtercian Order, and Maſter of the Novices in the abbey of Clairvaux in the time of St. Bernard.

(8) Id. ibid.
(9) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Latin. l. 2. c. 52.
(10) Ubi ſupra.
(11) Ubi ſupra.
(12) Bibliotheq. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 9. p. 196. edit. Paris 1697.

☞ACHAYUS (or rather ACHAIUS) ſon of King Ethfine (or Ethwin) was raiſed to the crown of Scotland [A] after the death of Soluatius A. D. 788 (a). When yet but a private man he uſed to converſe familiarly with the Nobles. This gave him an opportunity of being well acquainted with all the cauſes of the hatred and animoſity, which the Nobles had a long time fomented among themſelves; and being apprehenſive leſt they ſhould occaſion new broils, and involve the whole kingdom in a civil war, he was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, but he carefully employed every thing he judged might conduce to reconcile all the Nobles; for this purpoſe he called them together, and by his liberality he firſt ſoftened their hatred, and at laſt entirely ſuppreſſed it (b). Having thus united the hearts of his ſubjects, he endeavoured to prevent a war which was likely to break out between the Scots and the Iriſh; the occaſion of it was this. A body of Iriſh robbers having infeſted the county of Cantyr had been entirely defeated by the Hebridians; this was ſo highly reſented by the Iriſh nation, that they reſolved to be revenged. Achaius to pacify them ſent them an Embaſſador, who repreſented to them the dangers of war, and the great benefits of peace; and told them, that the Scots were inclined to preſerve conſtantly the friendſhip and good underſtanding that had long been eſtabliſhed between the two nations: that the intention of making war ſhould be to obtain a laſting peace, which they could now procure without bloodſhed. But the Iriſh depending upon their ſtrength would not ſubmit to the Embaſſador's reaſons: they anſwered, that they would not hearken to any conditions of peace, till they were either revenged of the injury done to them, or till the Scots had made amends for it; hereupon the Embaſſador withdrew, but before he could reach Scotland, a prodigious number of Iriſh landed on an Iſland, called Yla (c); plundered and laid it all waſte; but returning home with a large booty, they were all drowned in the ſea. Achaius hearing this, and the anſwer of the Iriſh to his Embaſſador, reſolved not to ſend again to a nation who had acted ſo perfidiouſly as to attack him, at the very time that he courted their friendſhip. He was perſuaded, that after their laſt providential overthrow they would of themſelves ſue to him for peace, in which he was not miſtaken, for after a few days, the Iriſh ſent an embaſſy to him, acknowledging their fault, and humbly requeſting him to make peace with them. The King granted their requeſt [B] to (a) Joan. Læſleus, de Origine & Moribus Scotorum, p. 173.

(b) Boetius Scotor. Hiſt. lib. x. fol. 184. verſo.
(c) The moſt meridional of thoſe Iſlands ſituated on the Weſt of Scotland; it abounds in wheat and cattle, and has alſo very good lead-mines.

[A] Was advanced to the crown of Scotland.] Thus Hollingſhead tranſlates theſe words of Boetius, Achaius ad Reipublicæ curam eſt aſſumptus (1). Læſleus's words are ſtill more remarkable, Achaius, ſays he, unus ex omnibus, & propter prudentiam, qua pollebat acerrima, & propter pietatem, qua excellebat ſingulari, dignus eſt judicatus, qui Scotiæ ſceptra moderaretur (2). That is, "Achaius alone "who by his great wiſdom and great piety excelled "all others, was thought worthy to ſway the ſcepter "of Scotland." This is a very great encomium on that Monarch; and one might infer from the words of Boetius and Læſley, that the crown of Scotland was at that time not hereditary but elective.

(1) Bœtius, Hiſt. Scotor. lib. 10. fol 184.
(2) Læſleus, de Morib. & Reb. geſt. Scotor. pag. 173.

[B] The King granted their requeſt.] He firſt paſſed a very ſevere cenſure on the Iriſh Nation; telling their Embaſſadors that they were a very obſtinate people; who would not learn to be wiſe, except they were laſhed; that they often deſpiſed what was for their intereſt, and wilfully ran into great inconveniencies; that they were ſilly, paſſionate and haughty, at a time they ought to be modeſt and humble. He added, that their laſt defeat was the effect of Divine vengeance, and ſhew'd that God would not permit thoſe to eſcape unpuniſhed, who, without the leaſt provocation, made an unjuſt war upon their neighbours, at the very time that their neighbours ſued to them for peace. That nevertheto the great joy both of the Iriſh and of the Scots. A little after this peace was concluded, the Emperor Charlemain ſent an embaſſy to Achaius, deſiring that King to enter into a ſtrict alliance with him againſt the Engliſh [C], whoſe pyrates ſo infeſted the ſeas, that the merchants could not carry on their trade (d). As this alliance was an affair of the greateſt importance to the whole kingdom, the King called a council of the chief men of the nation in order to take their advice. In this council the affair of the alliance was warmly debated, ſome oppoſing it, ſome voting for it [D], at laſt it was carried almoſt unanimouſly for the alliance. The King hereupon ſent William his leſs he would forget their old as well as late affronts, and conclude a peace with them, to ſhew that he was a true worſhipper of Chriſt. But the reader may perhaps be pleaſed to find here Achaius's own words as they are related by Boetius (3); we having only given the ſenſe of them. Ad hæc Achaius Hibernicos gentem contumacem non niſi verberibus affectos ſapere, quod conducit, averſari frequentibus, ultroque eligere incommoda, ineptire, furere, inſultare, quum minime oporteret, reſpondit. Vulnus, quo non hominum, ſed æquiſſima Dei ultione recenter eſſent afflicti, documento eſſe mortalibus, quam ſuperos reddat infenſos nulla laceſſitos injuria proximos ſuppliciter petentes pacem impio bello laceſſere. Verum injuriis, & veteribus, & recentibus poſthabitis, ut ſe verum Chriſti cultorem, qui pacem adeo laudavit, extulit, & commendavit tanto opere oſtenderet mortalibus Hibernicoque populo (tametſi id parum merito) petitam pacem libenter concedere.

(d) Læſleus, ubi ſupra.

(3) Ubi ſupra, fol. 185.

[C] Againſt the Engliſh.] Theſe were the people who had ſome time before ſettled in England. They were originally of Saxon extraction, as appears by the following paſſage from the harangue of Charlemain's Embaſſador to Achaius. Tentant plerique populi Galliam, eam impiis armis infeſtantes, Saxones, Friſones, Normani & omnium maximè Angli, qui Saxonici ſanguinis viri nuper in Britannia incolis exactis, aut ſubactis regnum adepti, & maria & terram rapinis piraticis, ac cruentis incurſibus fœdiſſime adimplent (4). That is, "Moſt "nations attack France and infeſt it with their impi- "ous armies; theſe are the Saxons, the Friſons, the "Normans, and eſpecially the Engliſh, who, (ſprung "from the Saxon blood,) have lately invaded Britain, "and after driving out or ſubduing the inhabitants "have eſtabliſhed a Kingdom there: Theſe fill both "ſea and land with their piracies, and their cruel in- "vaſions."

(4) Ap. Boet. ubi ſupra, fol. 185. verſo.

[D] Some oppoſing the alliance, ſome voting for it.] Boetius gives us two fine ſpeeches, as delivered on this occaſion, tho' 'tis very probable he himſelf compoſed them in imitation of the ancient hiſtorians; but as 'tis very likely theſe ſpeeches contain at leaſt the ſubſtance of what was offer'd in the King's council, the reader will perhaps not be diſpleaſed to ſee an abſtract of them here. Coleman Governor of Marr (Culmanus Præfectus Marriæ) a man famous for his integrity, repreſented to the King, that the preſent advantages, which might accrue from the intended alliance were not ſo much to be conſider'd, as the evils which were likely to attend it. "For what, "ſaid he, will be the conſequences of this alliance "with the French who are at a great diſtance from us, "againſt the Engliſh, who are our neighbours, "and whoſe friendſhip may be very ſerviceable to "us? Thus we ſhall have an enemy at home, "and as it were within doors; and a friend far off be- "yond the ſeas, at whoſe will and pleaſure we ſhall "be obliged to make war againſt a neighbour. For "we muſt fight for a ſtranger; for his ſake we muſt "go far from home to expoſe ourſelves to blows "and wounds; for his ſake we muſt hazard the loſs "of the whole Kingdom, of our eſtates, and even "our lives. The alliance with the French will in- "deed make the name of the Scots famous thro' all "the world. But in my humble opinion we ſhould "take care when we thus eagerly ſeek after an empty "fame, a frivolous kind of glory, not to bring eternal "ſhame upon our ſelves by provoking the Engliſh, "and loſing that liberty which our anceſtors pur- "chaſed with their own blood; and for which they "ſo often fought againſt the Britons, the Romans, "the Picts, and finally againſt the Saxons themſelves. "What can be more pernicious to a free people, "than to ſubmit tamely to the yoke of a foreigner, "and to make our fortunes and our liberties, for "which the brutes themſelves fight till they die, de- "pend entirely upon the will and pleaſure of a fo- "reign nation? If the French ſhould break their "promiſes; if in the midſt of a war, we ſhall un- "dertake for their ſake, they abandon us and enter "into an alliance with our enemies, to what ſuperi- "or judge muſt we have recourſe? When this al- "liance with France ſhall be ſworn to, we ſhall always "have to deal with enemies, and very ſeldom with "friends. And as to trade, we ſhall receive from "France, Spain and Germany not ſuch goods and "commodities as we deſire, but ſuch only as the "Engliſh will permit to paſs thro' to us. And in a "ſtorm no port will be open to our trading veſſels, "they muſt either be loſt at ſea, or become the prey "of our enemies." For theſe reaſons Coleman maintained that the Scots ought to reject the alliance with France, and entertain a conſtant friendſhip with the Picts and the Engliſh their neighbours. Theſe reaſons of Coleman were anſwer'd by Albian (Albianus) Governor of the Hebrides (5). He ſaid, that if the four nations, that then inhabited Albion (6), viz. the Engliſh, Scots, Picts, and Britons, could be ſtrictly and inviolably united; and if the Engliſh would be faithful in their promiſes and covenants, he would come over to Coleman's opinion. "But, ſaid he, ſince the Scots, the Picts, and "the Britons have ſuffered conſtantly from the "treachery and perfidiouſneſs of the Engliſh, we muſt "chuſe either to be perpetually fighting againſt the "treachery of the Engliſh, or to have ſuch allies "and confederates, whoſe powerful aſſiſtance may en- "able us to reſiſt our falſe and forſworn neighbours. "Behold their faith, or rather their treachery! The "Britons invite the Saxons to aſſiſt them againſt their "enemy; they receive them in an hoſpitable manner; "they load them with preſents; and theſe perfidious "allies become enemies inſtead of being deliverers; "they turn their ſword againſt thoſe they came to "aſſiſt; and having ſlain a great number of them "they drive the reſt out of their country, and poſ- "ſeſs it themſelves. What treaty has ever been ſa- "cred to that nation, when it was their intereſt or "in their power to break it? And how can we ex- "pect that they will be faithful to us, ſince even "among themſelves they uſe fraud rather than fair "dealing? If they don't attack us at preſent, 'tis "not owing to their fidelity, to their love of ju- "ſtice, to the ſacredneſs of treaties, but only to their "domeſtic broils and diviſions. Let them be quiet "at home, and you will ſoon find by ſad experience, "that trampling under their feet all treaties and co- "venants, they will again turn their arms againſt "us. I know therefore of no other remedy againſt "their perfidiouſneſs, but the alliance which is now "propoſed to us. The Embaſſadors of the French "offer us, what we could ſcarce hope for. That "King to whom Spain, France and Germany obey, "courts our alliance againſt the Engliſh. What man "in his ſenſes could deſpiſe ſuch an offer? Muſt we, "who live in the remoteſt part of the world, reject "an alliance with the French, who of their own ac- "cord offer it to us? the French! a people, who, "for their faith towards God and men, have obtain- "ed the empire of the world. This alliance, in "caſe we enter into it chearfully, will alſo unite us "with the Spaniſh, the Germans, and with all the "other nations ſubject to Charles; whence we ſhall be "able to carry on our trade ſafely and ſecurely (7)."

(5) Iſlands ſituated on the Weſt of Scotland.

(6) Great Britain.

(7) Boetius ubi ſupra, fol. 186, 187.

Theſe were Albian's arguments, we leave the reader to judge whether he anſwered pertinently to Coleman's objections, and eſpecially thoſe relating to the diſtance of France, and to the trade of the Scots, which could eaſily be interrupted by the Engliſh. We will add but one reflexion on this occaſion: What a happineſs is it both for the Engliſh and the Scots (for the former at leaſt) to be now united under the ſame Sovereign, ſince their union prevents wars which antiently occaſioned ſuch frequent and great havock among them?

his own brother, and Clement, John *, Raban, and Alcuin, four of the moſt eminent men of the nation [E], attended by a body of 4000 men (e), with Charlemain's Embaſſadors into France, where the alliance was concluded, upon conditions that were very advantagious to the Scots [F]. Achaius, to perpetuate the memory of ſo ſacred an alliance, added to the arms of Scotland a double field ſowed with Lilies (f). Some time after Achaius ſent a ſubſidy of ten thouſand men to Hungus King of the Picts, to aſſiſt him againſt Athelſtan King of the Weſt-Saxons, who had attacked him unjuſtly, and laid waſte a great part of his dominions (g): Hungus, thus aſſiſted by the Scots, gained ſo complete a victory over the Saxons, that himſelf and Achaius paſt the remaining part of their reign in perfect peace (h); Achaius having reigned thirty two years, died A. D. 819 (i).

* Sirnamed Scotus.

(e) Id. p. 175.

(f) Boetius, ubi ſupra, fol. 185, 188.

(g) Læſleus, ubi ſupra, p. 176.

(h) Boetius, ibid. p. 191.

(i) Idem, ibid. Læſleus, ubi ſupra. p. 178. Buchanan. Rer. Scot. Hiſt. lib. 5. p. 166.

[E] Four of the moſt eminent men of the nation.] Mezeray ſpeaks only of Alcuin and Clement, whom he calls Claude Clement (8), but as he differs eſſentially from Boetius and Læſley it is proper to give his own words. Cette même année (790) ſays he, commença, à ce qu'on tient, l'alliance indiſſoluble d'entre la France & l'Ecoſſe, Charles ayant envoyé un ſecours de quatre mille hommes au Roye Archaye lequel lui fit preſent (diſent les auteurs de ce pais là) de Claude Clement, & d'Alcuin Anglo-Saxon, deux ſavans perſonnages pour le temps. Ils ajoutent, qu'ils vinrent à Paris, & qu'ils y dreſſerent des Ecoles publiques, commencement de cette fameuſe Univerſity mére de toutes celles qui ſont dans l'Europe. That is, "It is "thought that this year began the indiſſoluble alli- "ance between France and Scotland, Charles hav- "ing ſent four thouſand men to aſſiſt King Archayus "(9), this King in return (ſay the Scots Hiſtorians) "made Charles a preſent of Claude Clement and "Alcuin an Engliſh-Saxon, two learned men, conſi- "dering the age in which they lived. It is added "that they came to Paris, where they founded publick "ſchools, which gave riſe to that famous Univerſity, "the mother of all thoſe which are in Europe." We ſhall obſerve upon this paſſage, 1. That we cannot find whence Mezeray has it, that Charles ſent four thouſand men to Achaius; neither Boetius nor Læſley ſay any thing of it; but the former tells us, that Achaius ſent a ſtrong body of troops to Charles, together with the Embaſſadors (10); and Læſley adds, that this body conſiſted of four thouſand men, which Achaius ſent to aſſiſt Charles, who at that time was engaged in a war againſt the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion (11). 2. Boetius and Læſley tell us, that Raban and Alcuin returned into Scotland, but that Clement and John continued in France (12). Læſley adds, that when theſe two were deſirous of returning home, Charles prevailed with them to ſtay, and that he ſent one of them to Pavia, and the other to Paris, (where he had already laid the foundations of two Univerſities) in order that they might there inſtruct youth in the languages and the ſciences: whence, ſays Læſley, it appears, that if polite literature and the more ſolid ſciences flouriſh in thoſe Univerſities, it is owing originally to the Scots (13). But theſe authors don't ſay, as Mezeray pretends, that the learned men we mentioned, founded ſchools in Paris, which gave riſe to the Univerſity of that city. Boetius tells us alſo, that Alcuin had been Preceptor to Charlemain (14); but Buchanan ſays, it was John Scot (Scotus, or Albinus) (15): we will examine in another place (16) who is in the right. 3. What can Mezeray mean, by ſaying that Achaius made a preſent to Charles of Clement and Alcuin? ſince it appears by what we have quoted from Læſley, that the two learned men who ſtayed in France, were prevailed upon by Charles himſelf. Had Mezeray quoted his vouchers, as an Hiſtorian ought to do, we then ſhould be able to know whether he or they are miſtaken; but as he cites no body through his whole Hiſtory, he is juſtly chargeable with all the errors he may fall into.

(8) Mezeray, Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, t. 1. p. 242.

(9) Thus he calls our Achaius, if it be not an error of the preſs.

(10) Boetius, ubi ſupra, fol. 188.

(11) Læſleus, ubi ſupra, p. 175.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Læſley, ibid.

(14) Boetius, ubi ſupra, fol, 191.

(15) Buchan. Hiſt. Scotor. p. 166.

(16) See the article ALCUINUS.

[F] Upon terms very advantagious to the Scots.] This will appear from the moſt eſſential articles of that alliance, which are as follow. "I. The friend- "ſhip between the Scots and the French is not to "be limited to a certain time, but ſhall ſubſiſt eter- "nally. II. The injuries and wars, which the En- "gliſh may attempt againſt either nation, ſhall be "accounted common to both. III. If the French "are aſſaulted by the Engliſh, the Scots ſhall ſend an "army to aſſiſt the former, but that army ſhall be "maintained in every thing at the expence of the "French. IV. If the Scots are attacked by the En- "gliſh, the French are to aſſiſt them, and defray the "expence of the troops ſent to their ſuccour. "V. Any private or publick perſon of the two con- "federate nations, who ſhould aſſiſt the Engliſh a- "gainſt either of them, with armour, counſel, am- "munition, or in any other way or manner, ſhall be "reputed a traitor againſt both nations. VI. Nei- "ther of theſe two nations ſhall conclude a peace or "a truce with the Engliſh, without the conſent of "the other (17).

(17) Boetius, ubi ſupra, fol. 188. Læſleus, ubi ſupra, p. 174, 175.

ACHÆMENES, if Herodotus may be credited (a), was father of Cambyſes, and grandfather of Cyrus the firſt King of Perſia. This author ſeems to ſpeak in ſome part of his works of an Achæmenes, of a much older date than him whoſe article we now write; for he informs us, that the Perſian nation was divided into ſeveral branches, the moſt illuſtrious of which conſiſted of the Paſargadæ, among whom the Achæmenides are included, whence the Kings of Perſia deſcended (b). Herodotus mentions in another place (c) Cambyſes ſon of Cyrus, exhorting on his death-bed the principal Lords of Perſia, and the Achæmenides in particular, never to ſuffer the Medes to reaſcend the throne. This ſeems to hint at an Achæmenes, the ſtock of theſe Achæmenides, of a much more antient date than him whom we now write of, grandfather of Cyrus. Stephanus Byzantinus ſpeaks of one Achæmenes ſon of Ægæus; and tells us that Achæmenia, a Province in Perſia, received its name from him. Others ſay that this Achæmenes was the ſon of Perſeus (d); others infer this, becauſe the Kings of Perſia were deſcended from Perſeus [A]. Moſt of the commentators on Horace are of opinion,

(a) Herodot. lib. 7. cap. 11.

(b) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 125.

(c) Idem, lib. 3. cap. 65.

(d) Nicholaus, lib. 2. Hiſt. apud Etymol. magni Auctor.

[A] Becauſe the Kings of Perſia were deſcended from Perſeus.] According to Mr. Chevreau, Herodotus ſays, that the Perſides, i. e. thoſe of the family of Perſis or Perſeus, ſprang from the Achemenides who were related to the Paſargadæ (1). He aſſures in the ſame page, that according to the teſtimony of Herodotus, the Kings of Perſia deſcended from Perſeus or Perſis, and that the Perſides deſcended from the Achæmenides; that is to ſay, from the firſt of that family whoſe name was Achæmenes. All this is very much confuſed. Herodotus does not ſay in general, that the Perſides ſprang from the Achæmenides; but mentions this only of the Kings of Perſia (2), i. e. of Cyrus and his ſucceſſors (3). He divides the Perſians into ſeveral claſſes, one of which he ſpecifies particularly by the name of Perſians; another, which he calls the Paſargadæ, among whom he includes the Achæmenides. He obſerves, indeed, in another place (4), that the Perſians were called by that name, from the time that Perſeus, ſon to Jupiter and Danae, left his ſon Perſes whom he had by Andromeda, among them; but then he does not ſay, as Mr. Chevreau ſuppoſes,

(1) Chevreau's Hiſt. of the World, Book 1. chap. 5. pag. 95, 96. Dutch edition of 1687.

(2) Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 125.

(3) Παρσέων Βασιλέες . . . Ἀχαιμένης ἔσχονοι, i. e. "The Kings of "the Perſians.. "ſprang from "Achæmenes.

(4) Herodot. lib. 7. cap. 61.

nion, that the Achæmenes, whom that Poet mentions in the twelfth Ode of his ſecond book as a man of prodigious wealth, was one of the Perſian Monarchs [B]; but if that were true, he muſt neceſſarily have reigned before the Medes ſubdued the Perſians; for we don't hear of any King of that name from the time that the Perſians founded that great monarchy, which is looked upon as the ſecond univerſal one. Cyrus has generally been reckoned their firſt Sovereign; and ſuch as tell us that two Kings ſwayed the ſcepter before him, diſtinguiſh them very clearly, both from Cambyſes his father, and Achæmenes his grandfather (e). However this be, the epithet Achæmenians is frequently given to the Perſians in the old Latin Poets; and Perſia is called Azemia (f) and the Perſians Agemis to this day (g).

(e) Marſham, Can. Chron. p. 605. edit. Lipſ.

(f) Bizari, Hiſt. Perſ. lib. 1. p. 5.

(g) Teixera in Itiner. Indiæ, cap. 6. apud Pinedo, in Steph. Byz. p. 145.

ſuppoſes, that the Kings of Perſia were deſcended from Perſeus. Mr. Chevreau's reaſoning amounts to this viz. that Cyrus was not inferior in birth to the Kings of Media, or of Perſia, ſince theſe as well as Cyrus ſprang from Achæmenes: he proves that they deſcended from him, becauſe the Perſides did. Beſides the falſities I have already obſerved, he ſuppoſes farther, that the firſt who bore the name of Achæmenes, was prior to Perſeus ſon of Jupiter. Mr. Dacier had retained perfectly the particulars he cites of this paſſage from Chevreau (5), merely by ſtrength of memory.

(5) Dacier on Horace, vol. 2. pag. 243.

[B] Was one of the Perſian Monarchs.] Moreri is ſo wiſe as to tell us, that Achæmenes was the firſt King of Perſia, and that all the Princes who governed that Kingdom, to Darius, ſprung from him. But in the firſt place I would ask him, why, when he ſpeaks of Cyrus, he makes him Founder of the Perſian Monarchy; and why, in his catalogue of the Kings of Perſia, he does not place Achæmenes before Cyrus, but the latter at the head of all the Monarchs? A man ſhould not pretend to miſtake, or he ſhould do it conſiſtently. Then, I wiſh he had told us which of the Darius's he means; for two or three of that name reign'd in Perſia. Does he mean him who was vanquiſhed by Alexander the Great? But in that caſe he'd be too deciſive; for the Ancients are not agreed that this Darius was of the royal family. If he means Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes, he has not expreſſed himſelf juſtly; the words all the Princes are improper, when one ſpeaks of only two out of above twelve. I don't know why Mr. Dacier confines the epithet Achæmenides to the time of Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes, when he tells us, that the deſcendants of Achæmenes, King of Perſia, bore his name till that Darius (6). I don't doubt but they bore it ſtill after him; for beſides that his ſon Xerxes traces his deſcent in a direct line to Achæmenes (7); we find, that in the ſame period one Tigranes General of the Medes, was call'd Achæmenides (8): and we meet with one Achæmenes hereunder mentioned, who was brother to Xerxes. I ſay nothing of Sapor, called Achæmenes in Ammianus Marcellinus, that paſſage being corrupted (9). Mr. Chevreau, ſurpriz'd doubtleſs to find five generations between this Xerxes and Cyrus, imagin'd that this Monarch enumerates his paternal anceſtors on one ſide, and his maternal on the other; ſo that he makes himſelf ſpring from Achæmenes, only on the mother's ſide; however, this is not found in Herodotus, unleſs we alter the Greek text, agreeable to the very probable conjecture of Salmaſius (10).

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Herod. lib. 7. cap. 11.

(8) Ibid. cap. 62.

(9) See de Valois, in Amm. Marcel. book 19. cap. 2. p. 240.

(10) Salmas. Exercit. Plinian. pag. 1183.

ACHÆMENES, ſon of Darius I. King of Perſia, and brother of Xerxes both by the father and mother's ſide (a), had the government of Egypt beſtowed upon him, after Xerxes had forced the Egyptians, by the power of his arms, to return to their allegiance (b). He ſometime after commanded the Egyptian fleet, in the celebrated expedition which proved ſo fatal to all Greece (c). Hiſtory does not relate what other employments he poſſeſſed in his brother's life-time, but it is ſaid, that the Egyptians having again taken up arms after the death of that Monarch, Achæmenes was ſent into Egypt to ſuppreſs the rebellion (d). This was an unfortunate enterprize, for he was vanquiſhed by Inarus, chief of the Rebels, ſuccoured by the Athenians.

(a) Herodot. Hiſt. lib. 7. cap. 97.

(b) Ibid. cap. 7.

(c) Ibid. cap. 97.

(d) Ibid. lib. 3. cap. 12. Diod. Sicul. lib. 11.

ACHERI (Luke D') a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at Saint Quintin in Picardy, anno 1609. He made himſelf famous by printing ſeveral works, which till then were in manuſcript, and lay buried in Libraries. The firſt piece he publiſhed (in 1645) was the epiſtle aſcribed to St. Barnabas. Father Hugh Menard, a Monk of the ſame congregation, intended to publiſh the abovementioned epiſtle, and for that purpoſe had illuſtrated it with ſeveral notes; but having been prevented by death, father Luke d'Acheri gave an edition of it in Greek and Latin, with father Menard's notes in 1645, as was before obſerved. Three years after, d'Achery publiſhed the Life and Writings of Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Chronicle of the Abbey of Bec. In 1651, he gave an edition of the Life and Writings of Guibert Abbot of Nogent, and ſome other pieces. Having afterwards collected ſeveral ſcarce and curious pieces, and being in hopes of recovering more of the ſame kind, he had a deſign to compile as large a body of theſe as he could get together, and to publiſh them under the modeſt title of Spicilegium (a gleaning). He obliged the publick with the firſt volume in 1655; and this was followed by twelve more, the laſt of which was printed in 1677 (a). This collection in thirteen volumes Quarto, is highly eſteemed by thoſe who are deſirous of conſulting the moſt minute particulars relating to eccleſiaſtical affairs; but moſt of the pieces in it were written after the decay of the Roman Empire in the Weſt. Our author publiſhed the Rule for Anchorites written by father Grimlaic; and ſome Aſcetic pieces [A]. His prefaces and ſhort notes prove him to have been a perſon of ſome abilities. He had ſome ſhare in the critical pieces, inſerted in the firſt volumes of the Acts of the Saints of the Order of St. Bennet; and the title of them informs us, that they were collected and publiſhed by him and father Mabillon.

(a) See the Journal des Savans of Feb. 28, 1678, where the reaſon is given why the Spicilegium was not continued.

[A] And ſome aſcetic pieces.] He did not put his name to the collection which he publiſh'd of them, the title of which I ſhall give, as I find it in Father Labbe's Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum. Aſceticorum vulgò ſpiritualium, opuſculorum, quæ inter patrum opera reperiuntur, Indiculus Chriſtianæ pietatis cultoribus ab Aſceta Benedictino congregationis ſancti Mauri digeſtus. i. e. "A catalogue of the Aſcetic, generally call'd ſpiritual tracts, found among the works of the Fathers; digeſted for the uſe of devout Chriſtians, by a Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur." Pariſiis 4to, 1648. Mr. Teiſſier in his additions to this work of Father Labbe, tells us that Luke d'Acheri publiſh'd St. Auſtin's Life in Paris the ſame year.

Mabillon. Luke d'Acheri died at Paris the 29th of April 1685, in the Abbey of St. Germains in the Fields, where he had been Librarian (b).

(b) See the Journal des Savans, Nov. 26, 1685, and Baille, Jugem. des Sav. p. 518.

ACHEUS, in Latin ACHÆUS, couſin-german to Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great [A], Kings of Syria, became a very powerful Monarch, and enjoyed the dominions he had uſurped for many years; but at laſt he was puniſhed for his uſurpations in a moſt dreadful manner. He at firſt adhered with wonderful fidelity to his Sovereigns, and did them very ſignal ſervices; for having attended upon Seleucus Ceraunus in his expedition againſt Attalus, he put to death the two Captains who had bereaved this Seleucus of his life; recovered the ſeveral Provinces which Attalus had conquered, and refuſed the title of King, when it was offered him by the army, and although he had the moſt favourable opportunity of maintaining it (a). Acheus reſiſted theſe temptations with great generoſity, and reſolved that his conqueſts ſhould be only for the lawful ſucceſſor of the Monarch whoſe death he had revenged; that is for Antiochus younger brother of Seleucus. But at laſt his proſperity blinded him; for he no ſooner found himſelf poſſeſſed of all Attalus's dominions, the city of Pergamus excepted, but he aſſumed the title of King. Having thus ſeized upon the crown, he conducted himſelf with the utmoſt prudence and bravery; inſomuch, that no Monarch, on this ſide of Taurus, was ſo formidable as Acheus (b). As the ſpacious rich Provinces he poſſeſſed in thoſe parts, could not ſatisfy his ambitious thirſt, he reſolved to attempt the conqueſt of Syria, upon hearing that Antiochus was ſet out to engage Artabazanes (c), flattering himſelf that either Antiochus would loſe his life in that expedition, or that the length of it would give him an opportunity of conquering Syria, before that Monarch ſhould return back; not to mention that he had fed himſelf with the hopes that ſeveral Provinces would rebel; a circumſtance on which he laid very great ſtreſs. Accordingly he ſet out for Lydia, at the head of a very numerous army, and being upon his march, he wrote to the ſubjects of Antiochus; but when he was come to the confines of Lycaonia, he perceived that the ſoldiers would not turn their ſwords againſt their lawful King; upon which he declared, that he would lay aſide his enterprize. He thereupon marched back, and having plundered Piſidia, he divided among his ſoldiers the rich ſpoils he there ſeized, by which means he regained their affection (d). From what was juſt now ſaid, we may infer that thoſe are miſtaken, who relate that he aſſumed the title of King of Syria. Antiochus having gloriouſly put an end to the war in which he had been engaged againſt Artabazanes, ſent Embaſſadors to Acheus, to complain of his having uſurped the title of King, and his favouring the Egyptians openly (e). This reproach was not altogether ineffectual; for we find that Antiochus concluded a truce with their Sovereign (f), he being ſenſible that Acheus, his ally in outward appearance, was certainly in their intereſt. This ſhews that the Uſurper paid ſome regard to Antiochus's complaints, and entered ſpeciouſly into a confederacy with him, againſt Ptolemy King of Egypt. The latter endeavoured, in vain, to include him in the alliance, for Antiochus rejected conſtantly the propoſal, and was exaſperated, that the King of Egypt ſhould preſume to addreſs him in favour of rebels (g); ſo that he had no ſooner extricated himſelf from all his difficulties, but he vigorouſly attempted to recover all that Acheus had ſeized upon. His deſigns were ſucceſsful, for he obliged the Uſurper to fly to Sardis, where, blocking him up, he took the city after a long ſiege (h). Some perſons in Sardis laid a ſnare for Acheus, which proved fatal to him; for theſe having prevailed with that Uſurper to come out of the citadel, they immediately delivered him up to Antiochus, who put him to a moſt cruel and ignominious death, which was as follows. That Monarch firſt cauſed the extremities of Acheus's limbs to be cut off, and afterwards his head, which was ſowed up in an aſs's ſkin, and then he commanded the remaining part of the body to be fixed to a croſs (i); all which was executed the 540th year of Rome. Two excellent maxims might be drawn from this example [B]. I ſhall not ſpecify Moreri's miſtakes, ſince they may be (a) This happened about the end of the 139th Olympiad, and the 533d year of Rome, Calviſii Chronol. p. 278.

(b) Extracted from Polybius book 4. chap. 13. pag. 322.

(c) The dominions of this Monarch lay near the Caſpian Sea. See Polyb. book 5. chap. 13. pag. 408.

(d) Polyb. Hiſt. lib. 5. chap. 13.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Idem, ibid. cap. 15.

(g) Idem, ibid. pag. 418.

(h) Idem, ibid. lib. 7. cap. 3.

(i) Idem, ibid. lib. 8. cap. 5. and 6.

[A] Couſin-german to Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great.] He was ſon of Andromachus, brother to Laodicea wife of Seleucus Callinicus, and mother to thoſe two Princes (1). We are to obſerve that he was a dutiful ſon; for hearing that Andromachus was impriſoned in Alexandria, he did all that lay in his power to releaſe him from his captivity. The Rhodians being informed of his inclinations in this particular, ſent Embaſſadors to King Ptolemy, to demand Andromachus of him. Their view in this was to preſent him to Acheus, in order to engage him to break the promiſe he had made, to aſſiſt the Byzantines, who were then engaged in a fierce war with the Rhodians. The King of Egypt made ſome difficulty to deliver up Andromachus, well knowing that a priſoner of his conſequence, might be of advantage to him, at a proper time and place; for he was ſtill at variance with the King of Syria, and ſenſible that Acheus was very formidable. However, to oblige the Rhodians, he at laſt reſolved to deliver up his priſoner, with liberty to ſend him to his ſon, in caſe they thought proper. They did ſo, and by that and ſome other means, ingratiated themſelves with Acheus, and deprived the Byzantines of their principal hopes (2). Take notice that Acheus was married to Laodicea daughter of King Mithridates (3), who had been perfectly well educated by Logbaſis, an inhabitant of Selge, a city in Piſidia (4). This Lady held out the ſiege of Sardis with her husband, and was obliged to ſurrender, after he had been put to death (5).

(1) Polybii, Hiſtori. lib. 4. cap. 13. pag. 324. and l. 8. c. 6. p. 531.

(2) Polyb. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(3) Idem, lib. 8. cap. 6. p. 531.

(4) Idem, lib. 15. cap. 17. p. 425.

(5) Idem, lib. 8. cap. 6. pag. 532.

[B] Two excellent maxims might be drawn from this example.] Firſt, that it is good to be diffident, and ſecondly, that we ſhould not abuſe the favours of fortune. But we ſhall give Polybius's own words, to whom we owe theſe moral reflections. Κατὰ δύο τρόπους οὐκ ἀνωφελὲς ὑπόδειγμα γινόμενος τοῖς ἀκουομένοις· καθ' ἕνα μὲν, πρὸς τὸ μηδενὶ πιστεύειν ῥαδίως· καθ' ἕτερον δὲ, πρὸς τὸ μὴ μεγαλαυχεῖν ἐν ταῖς εὐπραγίαις, πᾶσι δὲ προσδοκᾶν ἀνθρώπους ὄντας (6). That is, "An example that may "be doubly uſeful to poſterity; firſt, that we ſhould "learn not to believe any one raſhly; ſecondly, that "we ſhould not be too much puffed up with proſ"perity, but as men, not be ſurpriſed at any accident, "to which mankind is obnoxious.

(6) Idem, lib. 8. pag. 528. edit. Caſauboni.

be ſo eaſily diſcovered by comparing his account with mine; but as for the errors of Franciſcus Patricius, I will point them out particularly [C].

[C] As for the errors of Franciſcus Patricius, I will point them out particularly.] He pretends, that Acheus having overburthened his ſubjects with taxes, they rebelled, and murthered him with his whole family, and threw his body into the Pactolus, that he might drink of its gold-abounding waters. Achæus, Lydiæ, Mæoniæque rex, gentilitio avaritiæ crimine ardebat; is ſiquidem crebra ac gravia populis tributa ſemper imperabat, in quibus exigendis ſævus, improbus, atque inexorabilis erat; verùm cùm tantam injuriam diutiùs populi ferre nequirent, nocturnâ teſſerâ inter ſe datâ, ſubito hominum concurſu illum cum omni familiâ trucidaverunt, & regiâ incenſâ ejus cadaver unco tractum in Pactolum flumen dimerſerunt, ut auriferas aquas ſemper potaret (7). That is, "Acheus, King of Lydia "and Mæonia, was inflamed with avarice, a vice "hereditary to him. As he was perpetually loading his ſubjects with taxes, in collecting of "which he was cruel, unjuſt, and inexorable; his "ſubjects at laſt could not bear ſuch tyrannical uſage "any longer, upon which they conſpired together in "the night, when the watch word being given, a "multitude of men aſſembling, they immediately "murthered the King, and all his family, and ſetting fire to the palace, they dragged his body, and "threw it into the river Pactolus, that he might for "ever drink of the gold-bearing waters." Obſerve firſt, that Franciſcus Patricius is miſtaken in making Acheus a Lydian, deſcended from the antient Kings of that country, and that he inherited their avarice. This author was then thinking on the wealth of Crœſus, and Midas's wiſh (8); but he ſhould rather have called to mind that Acheus was a Syrian: however, this is a trifling error in compariſon of the reſt; for all the circumſtances he relates are falſe. Mr. de Boiſſieu is of opinion, that the erroneous expoſitions which have "been given of the following words of Ovid,

Morte vel intereas capti ſuſpenſus Achæi,
Qui miſer auriferâ teſte pependit aquâ (9).

In Engliſh,

"Or may'ſt thou hang aloft, as once Acheus,
"Whom rich Pactolus from his bed ſurvey'd.

led Patricius into an error, Mr. de Boiſſieu obſerves very juſtly, that they ſignify, that Acheus's body was hung up near the banks of the Pactolus (10). He adds, that Zarottus firſt had a glimpſe of the Poet's meaning, and that Leopardus diſcovered it perfectly, and therefore that Lipſius ſhould not have boaſted that he firſt found out the true ſenſe of that paſſage. Hanc eſſe poëtæ noſtri mentem primus vidit Zarottus, ſed quaſi per nebulam; & omninò Paulus Leopardus emendat, lib. 1. cap. 20. ideo non erat quò Juſtus Lipſius, lib. 1. de Cruce, cap. 4. principem ſibi hujus loci explanationem tribueret. Valeat autem Alciatus cum ſua illa explicatione, quam libro 9. capite 24. Parergon Juris inſeruit (11). That is, "Zarottus "firſt diſcovered, but through a cloud as it were, "that this was the Poet's meaning, which Leopardus "ſaw perfectly into, in book 1. chap. 20. of his "Emendat. Juſtus Lipſius ſhould not therefore have "declared in book 1. chap. 4. de Cruce, that he was "the firſt, who explained it. But away with Alciat "and his explication in book 9. chap. 24. of his "Parergon Juris." Be this as it will, Francis Patricius applies his examples wrong; Acheus was puniſhed for his ambition, not for his avarice. Aquilius, who is joined with Acheus (12), becauſe Mithridates commanded melted gold to be poured down his throat, has no affinity with Antiochus's revenge.

(7) Franciſc. Patric. de regis inſtitutione, lib. 4. Tit. 9.

(8) Ovidii Metamor. lib. 11. ver. 103.

(9) Ovidius in Ibin, ver. 301.

(10) Dionyſ. Salvagnii Boeſſii Notæ in libellum Ovidii in Ibin, p. 63.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Patricius de Reg. Inſtit. lib. 4. tit. 9. p. 243.

ACHILLEA, an Iſland in Pontus Euxinus, which alſo was called the Iſland of Heroes; the Iſland Macaron (a), or the Iſland of Happy Souls, Leuce, &c. was ſituated, according to ſome writers, oppoſite to the Boryſthenes, and according to others, oppoſite to the Danube. It was called Achillea, from the monument of (b) Achilles erected therein, and becauſe it was conſecrated to that hero; it was given him by Thetis or Neptune (c). Divine honours were there paid to Achilles, and his memory was alſo honoured with a temple, an oracle, an altar, ſacrifices, &c. Some authors relate that this iſland was uninhabited, and that it was not ſafe to paſs the night in it (d); for which reaſon, ſuch as uſed to viſit it, returned always on board in the evening, after having viewed the antiquities of the place, the temple, and the ſeveral gifts offered to Achilles. Our hero was not alone in this iſland, it being inhabited alſo by the Manes of ſeveral other illuſtrious warriors [A]; but with regard to Achilles, he muſt have been there both ſoul and body, ſince he married Helen in it, and had a ſon by her called Euphorion, whom Jupiter loved, with a criminal affection, but in vain, and whom the God ſlew, with a thunderbolt, becauſe he refuſed to gratify his wiſhes (e). Other writers tell us, that Achilles was there married to Iphigenia, whom Diana had conveyed thither, after having beſtowed upon her immortal youth and Divine Nature (f). Others again aſſure, that the celebrated Medea was the wife he married in the other world (g); but the moſt general opinion was for Helen, which Philoſtratus and Pauſanias have followed (h). The former relates, that ſuch ſtrangers as landed in that Iſland who would not ſet ſail in the day time, were obliged to paſs the night on board of their ſhips, where they were viſited by Achilles and Helen, who carouzed with them, and ſung not only their own amours, but the verſes of Homer (i). This author adds, that Achilles here cultivated with ſo much the greater aſſiduity, the poetical genius with which Calliope had inſpired him [B], as he was not diverted from (a) Plinii Hiſt. Natur. lib. 4. cap. 12 and 13. Pauſan. lib. 3. p. 102.

(b) Mela, lib. 2. cap. 7. Scylax p. 28.

(c) Autor Periplî Ponti Euxini ab Iſ. Voſſio editus. Quintus Calaber, ſub fin. lib. 3.

(d) Amm. Marcell. lib. 22. cap. 8. The reader will meet with his words in the remark [A].

(e) Ptolem. Hephæſt. apud Photium, p. 480.

(f) Anton. Liberalis, cap. 27.

(g) Tzetzes in Lycophr. Scho. Apollon. lib. 4.

(b) Pauſanias, lib. 3. p. 102.

(i) Philoſtrat. in Heroic.

[A] It being inhabited alſo by the manes or ſouls of ſeveral other illuſtrious warriors.] (1) This appears from a paſſage in Pauſanias, where 'tis related that Leonymus General of the Crotoniatæ, having made a voyage to the iſland of Leuce, in order to learn the remedy which was to cure his wound; declar'd, that he had ſeen Achilles there, the two Ajax's, Patroclus, Antilochus, &c. (2) I wonder that Ammianus Marcellinus ſhould forget this particular, where he tells us that this iſland was a dangerous place. In hac Taurica, ſays he (3), inſula Leuce ſine habitatoribus ullis Achilli eſt dedicata; in quam ſi fuerint quidam fortè delati, viſis antiquitatis veſtigiis temploque & donariis eidem heroi conſecratis veſperi repetunt naves, aiunt enim non ſine diſcrimine vitæ illic quemquam pernoctare. i. e. "In this Taurica, ſays he, the uninhabited iſland of Leuce is conſecrated to Achilles; "where, whoever happens to go aſhore, after having viewed the remains of antiquity, the temple and offerings conſecrated to the abovemention'd "Hero, they return on board their ſhips in the evening; for 'tis related that no one can paſs the night "there without running the hazard of loſing his life." Perhaps too he never heard of that particular.

(1) Dionyſ. Perieget.

(2) Pauſan. lib. 3. pag. 102.

(3) Ammi. Marcellin. lib. 22. cap. 8.

[B] The poetical genius with which Calliope had inſpired him.] Some writers are of opinion, that when Plutarch relates, that Minerva the Goddeſs of the ſciences, dropp'd Nectar and Ambroſia into Achilles's mouth, from that ſtudy by affairs of war; and farther, that thoſe who ſailed by this coaſt, heard muſic, which filled them with admiration intermixed with horror; and alſo heard a neighing of horſes, a claſhing of arms, and the cries as of ſoldiers engaged in battle. Maximus Tyrius and Arrianus inform us of particulars equally wonderful [C]. We are not to doubt but that it was in this iſland Achilles wrought the miracle mentioned by Tertullian [D]. He likewiſe performed ſeveral others, whereof that which he employed againſt the impious Amazons [E], when they attempted to plunder his temple, was mouth, when he refus'd every kind of ſuſtenance; he would thereby inſinuate, that our Hero poſſeſs'd the whole circle of knowledge. Ἡ Ἀθηνᾶ τῷ Ἀχιλλεῖ νέκταρός τι καὶ ἀμβροσίας ἐνέταξε μὴ προσιεμένῳ τροφήν (4). Lorenzo Craſſo (5) has employed this as one of his authorities, to prove that Achilles ought to be rank'd among the Greek Poets. This, among the admirers of witty conceits would be look'd upon as infuſed knowledge, if there ever was any ſuch thing. But be this as it will, the abovementioned words of Plutarch no ways prove what Lorenzo Craſſo would infer from them; they ſpeaking of a real bodily ſuſtenance, as is manifeſt from the 19th book of the Iliad, whence they were taken. Homer tells us, that Jupiter perceiving Achilles would neither eat nor drink after the death of Patroclus, bid Minerva infuſe nectar and ambroſia into him, to prevent his dying of hunger.

(4) Plutarch de facie in orbe Lunæ p. 938. edit. Paris, A. 1624.

(5) Iſtoria de' Poëti Greci, p. 6. where he quotes the Latin verſion, as if aluit and not alluit, were there, aluit is full as proper.

—— Οἰ νέκταρ, τι καὶ ἀμβροσίην ἐρατεινὴν·
Στάζον ἰὴ σήθεσσ' ἵνα μὴ μιν λιμὸς ἵκηται (6).

That is,

" E'en thirſt and want his forces have oppreſt,
" Haſte, and infuſe Ambroſia in his breaſt. Pope.

(6) Homer. Iliad, lib. 19. ver. 347.

Philoſtratus muſt be conſulted to prove our Hero a Poet (7); and indeed he expreſſes himſelf very clearly on this head.

(7) Philoſtrat. Heroic. in Achille. fol. 319. & in Neoptol. fol. 338.

[C] Maximus Tyrius and Arian relate things which are altogether as ſurprizing.] The former tells us, that Achilles inhabited an iſland near Pontus Euxinus, oppoſite to the Danube; and that altars and temples had been erected to his honour there; that it would be very difficult to go on ſhore in it, till after having offer'd up ſacrifices; that mariners had often ſeen Achilles in the form of a fair youth, dancing, in his golden armour, a warlike dance: Some heard him ſing, but did not ſee him, while others both heard and ſaw him. It happen'd that a certain perſon having fallen aſleep inadvertently in this iſland was awak'd by Achilles, and conducted to a tent, where he was entertain'd at ſupper; Patroclus ſerv'd the wine, Achilles play'd on his lyre, and Thetis and the reſt of the Gods were preſent (8). Arrian has been told, and believ'd, that thoſe who were caſt on that iſland by a ſtorm, went and conſulted the oracle of Achilles, in order to know whether it was proper to ſacrifice to him the victim which they themſelves ſhould ſelect in the meadows; that at the ſame time they laid the money which they ſuppos'd it to be worth, upon the altar; that in caſe the oracle rejected their propoſal, they added more money, till by its acquieſcing, they knew the full value of it was depoſited; that this being done, the victim preſented itſelf before them in the temple, and no longer attempted to eſcape; that Achilles appeared in a dream to ſuch as drew near the iſland, and directed them to that part of it, which was moſt convenient for landing; that he ſometimes revealed himſelf to perſons awake, &c. (9). Arrian concluded this to be worthy of credit, and among other reaſons, becauſe Achilles died young, was extreamly handſome, and ſo conſtant in love and friendſhip, that he would even die for the object of his paſſion, ὡς καὶ ἐπαποθανεῖν ἐλέσθαι τοῖς παιδικοῖς. The ambiguity of this laſt word, and the leaſt reflection on the danger to which he expos'd himſelf, in order to revenge the death of Patroclus, will be ſufficient to make many perſons rank Arrian among thoſe, who relate that the paſſion of thoſe two Heroes exceeded the bounds of friendſhip (10). See the remark (P) of the article ACHILLES, and one of the wonders related by Arrian hereunder (11), viz. that of thoſe birds, who every day ſwept the temple of the iſland Achillea.

(8) Maximus Tyrius, Oratione 27.

(9) Arian in Periplo Ponti Euxini.

(10) Some learned men think that Arrian praiſes Adonis, under the name of Achilles, in order to make his court to the Emperor Adrian. Vide Caſaubon. in Spartianum, Vit. Hadriani, cap. 14. and Triſtan, Comment. Hiſtoriques, tom. 1. in Adrian.

(11) In the remark [F].

(12) Tertull. lib. de Anima, cap. 46.

[D] The miracle mentioned by Tertullian.] Tertullian, as Moreri obſerves, tells us that Achilles cur'd one Cleonymus an Athletic Champion in a dream (12); that is to ſay, very probably, that Cleonymus fancied he ſaw Achilles in a dream, who taught him the proper remedy. Tertullian employs this incident, and ſeveral others of the ſame caſt, againſt the Epicureans, who would not allow of any thing ſupernatural in dreams. This ſtory is very little known; it not being mentioned in a great many authors, who treat at large of Achilles. Pamelius, in his commentary on Tertullian, only refers us to Homer, who, if I forget not, does not once mention this dream. A paſſage cited by Leo Allatius (13), gives ſome light into this matter: 'Tis there declared, that Leonymus, General of the Crotoniatæ in the war againſt the Locri, was wounded without knowing by whom, in attacking a body of the enemy, who never entrench'd themſelves, becauſe they were conſecrated to the Heroes, whoſe bare protection was thought ſufficient; that this general not being able to get his wound heal'd, conſulted the oracle of Delphos, which told him, that Achilles who had wounded him would cure him; that upon this he went to the iſland of Leuce, and there offer'd up his prayers to that Hero; that he ſaw ſome Heroes in a dream, but that Achilles healed his wounds; that the other Heroes commanded him to declare certain particulars to men, and that Helen in particular charged him to tell Steſichorus, that his blindneſs was owing to his having writ againſt her, and therefore that he muſt recant what he had ſaid, if he wiſh'd to have his ſight reſtored. 'Tis plain that this ſtory, and that which Pauſanias (14) and Conon (15) relate, are the ſame as to the principal circumſtances; but in Pauſanias, Ajax ſon of Oïleus wounds Leonymus, and afterwards heals his wounds. In Conon, Ajax does not wound and heal Leonymus, but Autoleon. There are ſome other variations, which I paſs over, and ſhall content my ſelf with conjecturing, that this Cleonymus of Tertullian is derived from Leonymus. To conclude, the author cited by Leo Allatius (16), obſerves one particular which I muſt not omit, viz. that Homer tending his ſheep near the ſepulchre of Achilles, prevailed, by his offerings and ſupplications, upon that Hero to reveal himſelf to him; but he appeared ſurrounded with ſo much ſplendor, as not only dazled the eyes of Homer, but alſo ſtruck him blind.

(12) Tertull. lib. de Anima, cap. 46.

(13) Allatius de Patriâ Homeri, pag. 145.

(14) Pauſan. lib. 3. p. 102.

(15) Photii Biblioth. Codice 186, Narrat. 18. See Mezeriac on Ovid's Epiſtles, p. 332. where he rectifies ſome miſtakes which Vigenere had made, in the paſſage of Pauſanias.

(16) His name is Hermias. The paſſage which Leo Allatius quotes, on this ſubject, is taken from a manuſcript Commentary in Phædrum Platonis.

[E] That which he employed againſt the impiety of the Amazons.] Give me leave to relate this incident according to Vigenere's tranſlation. It has its graces and beauties tho' in old French. In this manner therefore this author ſpeaks, after having told us that the Amazons had got ſhips built, in order to go and plunder the temple of Achilles. Eſtans abordées en l'iſle, dit-il (17), la premiere choſes qu'elles firent fut de commander a ces eſtrangers de l'Helleſponte d'aller coupper tous les arbres plantez en rond aultour du temple; mais les coignées ſe venans rembarrer contr' eux-meſmes les exterminerent là ſur la place, & tomberent tous roiddes morts au pied des arbres. Et là deſſus les Amazones s'eſtans eſpandues à l'entour du temple, ſe mirent à vouloir preſſer leurs montures; mais Achille les ayant regardées felonneuſement & d'un mauvais œil, de la meſme ſorte que quand devant Ilion il s'alla ruer ſur le Scamandre, donna un tel eſpouvante a leurs chevaux, que ceſte frayeur ſe retrouva aſſez plus forte que la bridde, ſi que cabrans ils rebondirent en arriere, eſtimans que ce qu'ils portoient ſur leur dos fuſt une charge extraordinaire & eſtranges; & à guiſe de beſtes ſauvages ſe retournerent contre leurs cavalcatrices, les jettans par terre & foullans aux pieds, les creins heriſſez de la furie où ils eſtoient & les oreilles dreſſées encontremont, ainſi que de cruels lyons les desmembroient, à belles dents, & leur devoroient bras & jambes, faiſans un fort piteux carnage de leurs entrailles. Apres donques qu'ils ſe furent ſaoullez de cette chair, ils ſe prindrent à bondir & à galop-

(17) Philoſtrat. in Neoptol tranſlated by Vigénere, tom. 2. fol. 341. ed. 4.

was not the leaſt remarkable. The miracle relating to the flight of birds [F], has been falſly related by Moreri, who, beſides, makes a ſeparate article of a fountain called Achilleus [G], in which Achilles bathed, and was ſaid to have a wonderful property. Achilles was not the only perſon who wrought miracles in this iſland, his wife Helen having per à travers l'iſle pleins de rage & forſenerie, & les habines teintes de ſang, tant qu'ils parvindrent au hault d'un cap, d'où deſcouvrans la marine aplanie en bas, & cuiddans que ce fuſt une belle large campaigne, ils s'y jetterent à corps perdu & ainſi perirent. Quant aux vaiſſeaux des Amazones, un impetueux tourbillon de vents eſtant venu donner à travers, d'aultant meſmes qu'ils eſtoient vuiddes & deſtituez de tout appareil pour les gouverner, ils venoient à ſe froiſſer l'un contre l'autre, ny plus ni moins qu'en quelque groſſe rencontre navalle, dont ils ſe briſoient & mettoient à fonds, ſpecialement ceux qui eſtoient inveſtis & choquez en flanc de droit fil par les eſperons & proues des autres, comme il advient ordinairement en des vaiſſeaux desgarnis de leurs conducteurs, de maniere que le bris de ce naufrage ſe venant rencontrer vers le temple où il y avoit force perſonnes à demy mortes reſpirantes encore, & pluſieurs membres horriblement diſperſez çà & là avec la chair, que les chevaux inaccoutumez à telle pature avoient rejettée, ce lieu ſainct devoit eſtre bien prophané : mais Achilles l'eut bientoſt purgé, reconcilié, & expié comme il eſtoit aiſé à faire en une iſle de ſi peu d'eſtenduë où les flots battoient de toutes parts à l'environ, ſi qu'Achilles y ayant attiré le ſommet des ondes tout fut lavé & nettoyé en moins de rien. i. e. "Being come, ſays he, aſhore on this "iſland, the firſt thing they did, was to command "thoſe ſtrangers of the Helleſpont, to go and cut "down the trees which were planted round the "temple; but the axes recoiling upon themſelves, "killed them on the ſpot, and they fell ſtone dead "at the foot of the trees. Upon this the Amazons "who were diſpers'd round the temple, began to "puſh forward their horſes, but Achilles looking at "them with a cruel and evil eye, in the ſame man-"ner as when before Troy he ruſhed upon Sca-"mander, put their horſes into ſuch a dreadful "fright, that their fear proved ſtronger than the "bridle; ſo that prauncing about, they caper'd "backwards, imagining that what they carried up-"on their backs, was a ſtrange and extraordinary "weight; and like wild beaſts, they turn'd upon "their riders; throwing them off and treading them "under their feet; and their manes briſtling up "from the fury they were in, and their ears prick-"ing up, they, like ſo many cruel lions, tore them "to pieces, and devoured their arms and legs, "making a woful ſlaughter of their entrails. "And after having glutted themſelves with this "fleſh, they began to caper and gallop up and "down the iſland, ſwell'd with rage and madneſs, "and their mouths all ſtained with gore, till they "came to the top of a promontory, whence diſ-"covering the ſmooth ſea, and thinking it to be a "beautiful, ſpacious plain, they plung'd headlong "into it, and were drown'd. With regard to the "ſhips of the Amazons, an impetuous whirlwind "riſing, when they were disburden'd, and had no "body to ſteer them; they therefore bulg'd one "againſt the other as in a terrible ſea-fight; where-"upon ſome of them ſunk, particularly ſuch as "were ſurrounded and beat againſt, by the beaks "and prows of the others, as generally happens, "when ſhips have no pilots on board them; ſo "that the wrecks meeting at that part of the "temple, where a great number of perſons were "lying half dead, and ſeveral limbs being horribly "diſpers'd up and down, with the fleſh which the "horſes, unuſed to ſuch paſture, had diſgorged; "this holy place muſt needs have been very much "prophaned. However, Achilles ſoon purg'd, re-"concil'd and expiated it, which it was eaſy for "him to do, as the iſland is of ſo little extent, "and the billows beating on all ſides; ſo that "Achilles having drawn up the ſuperficies of the "waves into it, every thing was waſh'd and made "clean in an inſtant."

[F] The miracle relating to the flight of birds.] Moreri has quoted Pliny wrong, when he makes him ſay, that no bird is ſeen to fly there. Pliny's words are theſe; Perdices non tranſvolant Bœotiæ fines in Attica, nec ulla avis in Ponto, inſula qua ſepultus eſt Achilles, ſacratam ei ædem (18). That is, "Par-"tridges don't fly beyond the confines of Bœotia "in Attica, nor any bird beyond Achilles's temple, "which ſtands in an iſland of Pontus Euxinus where "Achilles was buried." Salmaſius pretends, that by theſe words is to be underſtood, that no bird ever raiſed his flight above this temple; and proves from a paſſage of Antigonus Caryſtius, that this was anciently aſſerted (19). And moreover, he proves by an expreſs paſſage from Arrian, that birds came every morning into this temple, in order to ſcatter the water in it with which they had wetted their wings, and to ſweep it afterwards with them (20). He inveighs againſt Solinus for having ſaid, that no bird comes into the temple of Achilles; and that in caſe any happens to come near it, it flies off from it, as ſwift as it can. Salmaſius pretends that whatever we meet with in Solinus is borrow'd from Pliny; and that the latter has ſaid the ſame thing as Antigonus Caryſtius; but 'tis more probable, that Pliny had not the thought of Antigonus Caryſtius in view, and that Solinus elſewhere had met with this incident, related more circumſtantially than Pliny tells it. For how negligent would the laſt nam'd author have been, had he, to denote that birds never flew over a certain temple, uſed an expreſſion, which ſignifies, that they never flew beyond it? Theſe two circumſtances differ very widely, ſince a bird may fly beyond a houſe, and yet not fly over it; and may fly as high as a houſe, and yet not paſs beyond it. Beſides, the ancients were ſo fond of diverſifying miracles, that 'tis ſcarce probable, (after what was given out in the age of Antigonus Caryſtius) that the ſtory, viz. that birds flew away the inſtant they ſaw the temple of Achilles, ſhould not have been invented till the age of Solinus. But however this be, it cannot be proved from Pliny, in oppoſition to Solinus, that birds enter'd it; and after all Moreri will make Pliny ſay more than he really did, and muſt have been miſled by the following words of Charles Stephens in the two editions abovecited (21). Achillis inſulam nulla avis tranſvolat. Pliny 10. 29. i. e. "No bird flies beyond Achilles's iſland." But then Moreri may cenſure Hofman (very advantageouſly to himſelf) for having likewiſe aſcribed the ſame particulars to Strabo, which error proceeded, undoubtedly, from Hofman's ſeeing Moreri cite Strabo immediately after Pliny; and not obſerving, that this quotation from Strabo, and that from Pomponius Mela which follows it, relate to other particulars contained in that article. Nullam hic avem volare, (ſays he) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 19. habet & Strabo lib. 13. (22). i. e. "No bird "flies here, (ſays he) Plin. Book 10. Ch. 19. Strabo ſays the ſame thing, Book 13.

[G] A ſeparate article of a fountain call'd ACHILLEUS.] I at firſt ſight thought this article a fit ſubject for criticiſm; and imagin'd that this fountain was not ſo call'd as a ſubſtantive proper name, or ſubſtantively; but as an epithet, or noun adjective, common to all things that relate to Achilles; in a word, I look'd upon fons Achilleus, and the fountain of Achilles, as the ſame thing. Now, as it would be ridiculous to draw up an article of Jacobeus, for Jacob's well or fountain mentioned in the fourth chapter of St. John's Goſpel (23), which a Latin tranſlator might, if he thought proper, call fontem Jacobeum; I ſuppos'd in like manner, that 'twas not proper to form an article of the epithet Achilleus, which Freinſhemius uſes in ſpeaking of Achilles's fountain. However, after having conſulted Athenæus (24), I found that this critique would be doubtful, becauſe it appear'd to me that it might be diſputed, whether this fountain was call'd Ἀχιλλεῖον ſubſtantively or adjectively; and whether it may not as juſtly appear in its alphabetical order, as the iſland Achillea. We meet with it in Ortelius's Theſaurus Geographicus (25), under the word Achillæum, and afterwards under the word Achilleus fons; which, however,

(18) Plinii Hiſt. Nat. lib. 10. cap. 29.

(19) Salmaſ. Exercit. in Solin. cap. 19. p. 215.

(20) In Periplo Ponti Euxini. Philoſtratus ſays much to the ſame purpoſe. In this iſland, ſays he, according to the tranſlation (Vigenere, vol. II. fol. 337. verſo, of the 4to edition) there is a certain ſpecies of birds, quite white, but of the watry kind, and taſting of the ſea, which Achilles employs to clean his ſacred grove, ſweeping it with the wind of their wings, and watering it from their plumage, which is wet with ſea-water, and for that purpoſe they fly but a little above the ground.

(21) About the middle of the note [L] under the article ACHILLES.

(22) Hofman, Voce Achilles.

(23) Thoſe who tranſlate, There was a fountain of Jacob there, ſhould rather ſay, Jacob's fountain was there; or as the Port-Royal, There was in that place a well which was called Jacob's well.

(24) Ἐν Μιλήτῳ χώρην εἶναι Ἀχιλλέιον καλουμένην. Athenæus, lib. 2. cap. 6.

(25) Edit. Hanov. an. 1611, in 4°.

having alſo exerted her power this way (k), as will be ſhewn under the article STESICHORUS. It is better to be ſhort than diffuſive on this occaſion [H].

(k) See the remark [D].

however, is better than the Achillea, fons Mileti, i. e. "Achillea a fountain of Miletum," of Hofman.

I don't examine whether Freinſhemius has given a juſt explication of the paſſage of Athenæus, relating to the ſingularities of this fountain (26); all I ſhall obſerve is, that at leaſt Athenæus ought to have been cited, as Freinſhemius has done, that is, the ſixth chapter, and not the ſecond of Book ſecond. Hofman cites after the ſame manner as Moreri, which is as Ortelius had done before. But this is a trifling overſight, when compared to that of Moreri, who gives us Ariſtobulus ſon of Caſſander, inſtead of Ariſtobulus a native of Caſſandria.

(26) Freinſhem. Supilem. in Q. Curt. 2. 7. 24.

ADVICE to thoſe who enlarge Dictionaries.

We cannot complain too much of the negligence of thoſe who enlarge Dictionaries; for theſe often interweave particulars, directly repugnant to thoſe which were originally inſerted; and, in general, they don't take care to ſuit their additions to the foundations on which they build them, ſo as to make no diſſonance reſult from them,

Primo ne medium, medio ne diſcrepet imum (27).
That is,
"That all ſeem uniform and of a piece.
Roſcommon.

(27) Horat. de Arte Poetica, verſ. 152.

As for inſtance, thoſe who enlarg'd Charles Stephens's Dictionary, have not ſcrupled to thruſt, under the word Achillea, the following paſſage of Ortelius, directly as he left it, without the leaſt alteration: Video à Nebriſſenſi Cicearium, & à Carolo Stephano Cacariam in ſuis Dictionariis poni, ſed pro Ponti inſula, quam dicunt apud Melam Colliſaria dici, ex depravata forte lectione, &c. i. e. "I find Cacearia in the "Dictionary of Nebriſſenſis, and Cacaria in that of "Charles Stephens, for an iſland of Pontus, which, "they ſay, is call'd Colliſaria in Mela, perhaps "from a corrupt reading, &c." This period is pleaſant enough, for it makes Charles Stephens ſpeak of his own Dictionary in the very Dictionary it ſelf, as tho' he quoted another work; not to mention that he appears doubtful when he quotes himſelf, of things he had related without the leaſt appearance of uncertainty, in the place which he cites.

[H] 'Tis better to be ſhort than diffuſive on this occaſion.] If the reader ſhould meet with the relation of ſeveral prodigies, and miraculous traditions in the courſe of this work, he is not, therefore, to ſuppoſe that I look upon them as true. I am not afraid that this will be objected to me, otherwiſe I ſhould inſert but a very few of that caſt. I am very ſenſible, that in ſubjects of this kind, credulity is the ſource of multiplication, and that there is not a better nurſery for them, than the foible abovemention'd (28); but as 'tis ſo much abus'd, that all are undeceived, who are not incapable of being ſo. Credulity is a mother, who is ſure one time or other to be ſtifled by her own fruitfulneſs, in the minds of thoſe who make uſe of their reaſon. It would therefore have been to the advantage of the Heathens, in the deification of their Heroes, to have aſcribed but few miracles to them. The maxim πλέον ἥμισυ παντός, i. e. "The half is more than the whole;" and that other, Ne quid nimis, i. e. "Too much of one thing is good "for nothing," would have been ſeaſonable on this occaſion. They who have ſo greatly multiplied the holy handkerchiefs, the images of the bleſſed Virgin made by St. Luke, the hair of that Saint, the heads of St. John Baptiſt, the pieces of the true Croſs, and an hundred things of this nature, ought alſo to have called to mind the two maxims abovementioned. For theſe, by ſtrengthening the doſe, have thereby weakned the force of their venom, and adminiſtred at one and the ſame time the poiſon and the antidote. Ipſa ſibi obſtat magnitudo (29), i. e. "Its greatneſs is a prejudice to itſelf." Achilles, in the iſland of Leuce, had the ſame fate as in his going to Troy: thoſe very miracles which impoſed upon the readers, may have undeceiv'd them, as the ſame ſpear with which Achilles wounded Telephus, furniſh'd him with a balſam which completely heal'd the wound, (28) Prodigia eo anno multa nunciata ſunt, quæ quo magis credebant ſimplices ac religioſi homines, eò etiam plura nunciabantur, T. Livius, lib. 34. cap. 45. That is, "Many prodigies were told "that year; and "the more theſe "were credited "by the ſimple "and ſuperſtitious, the more "were ſpread.

(29) Florus, in Procm.

Vulnus Achillæo quæ quondam fecerat hoſti,
Vulneris auxilium Pelias haſta tulit (30).
Nyſus & Æmonia juvenis qua cuſpide vulnus
Senſerat, hac ipſa cuſpide ſenſit opem (31).
In Engliſh,
"Such was the cure th' Arcadian hero found,
"The Pelian ſpear, that wounded, made him ſound.
Tate from Ovid.
"The valiant Telephus a balſam found,
"From the ſame ſhining ſpear that gave the wound.

(30) Ovid. Remed. Amor. lib. 1. ver. 47.
(31) Propert. lib. 2. Eleg. 1. ver. 64.

But I don't conſider that the number of thoſe who undeceive themſelves by the multiplication of prodigies, is ſo ſmall, when compared to ſuch as do not, that 'tis not worth a writer's while to change his courſe, and to make the two maxims abovementioned his Poleſtar, in ſteering the fleet of his merchandize (32). In remark [Q] of the article of PYRRHUS, King of Epirus, we ſhall take notice of an error of Camerarius, concerning a pretended miracle of our Achilles.

(32) The reader will excuſe the harſhneſs, or rather nonſenſe of this metaphor.

ACHILLES. There are a great many of this name. The firſt who was ſo called had no other mother but Terra or the Earth, and did Jupiter a very ſignal piece of ſervice; for Achilles having ſheltered the goddeſs Juno in his cave, when ſhe fled from the amorous purſuits of the abovementioned God, he addreſt her in ſuch perſuaſive language, that ſhe conſented to conſummate their marriage [A]. We are not told in what manner ſhe rewarded the hoſpitable Achilles, for inſpiring her with ſuch tractable ſentiments; but it is related that Jupiter, in return for the favour which Achilles had done him, promiſed, that from this period, all perſons of his name ſhould be celebrated in the world. For this reaſon the ſon of Thetis became very famous. Chiron had one Achilles for his tutor, which made him beſtow that name on his pupil the ſon of Thetis. This circumſtance alone is ſufficient to deſtroy the ſeveral trifling and forced etymologies of the word Achilles, which are made to depend on the perſonal qualities of the ſon of Thetis [B]. The inventor of the Oſtraciſm among the Athenians was

(1) Father Schottus tranſlates them wrong, when he tells us they ſignify ad Jovem redire.
(2) Græcia Mendax (Lying Greece) Juvenal Sat. 10. ver. 174.
(3) Μυθοτόκος Ἑλλας Fabularum parens Græcia (Greece the parent of fictions) Nonn. Dionyſ. lib. 1.
* One who whiles away his time unſeaſonably.

[A] She conſented to conſummate their marriage.] Theſe words of Photius, συνελθεῖν τῷ Διΐ, bear that ſignification (1), as appears from what follows; καὶ πρῶτην μίξιν Ἥρας καὶ Διὸς ταύτην γένεσθαι φασὶν; and 'twas then, we are told, Jupiter firſt enjoy'd Juno.

[B] Etymologies.... which are made to depend on the perſonal qualities of the ſon of Thetis.] Nothing can poſſibly be more whimſical, than what the Greeks have invented on this occaſion. Their wild flights merit not only the epithet of lying (2), and of fabulous (3), but alſo that of malè * feriata, which our French word oiſeuſe, (idle, unemployed) does not yet fully ſignify.

If we enquire of the Greek Grammarians why this Hero was called ACHILLES; ſome will tell us 'twas, becauſe he filled his mother and his enemies with great diſquiet; others, becauſe he very much exaſperated the Trojans; others, becauſe having learnt the ſecret of Phyſic, he ſooth'd pain; others, becauſe he had but one lip; others, becauſe he had the qualities requiſite for commanding; others, becauſe he had never ſuck'd; and others again, becauſe he had never eat of the fruits of the earth, till after he was gone from under Chiron's tuition. Were I to ſhew by what grammatical analyſes, theſe diſcover ſo many different etymologies in the word Achilles, the page would ſwell was called ACHILLES. A ſon of Jupiter and Lamia bore the ſame name, and was ſo exquiſitely handſome, that by the judgment of the God Pan, he won the prize of beauty from all his rivals; but Venus was ſo exaſperated at this deciſion, that ſhe made Pan fall in love with Echo, and wrought ſuch a change in his whole perſon [C], that he became a moſt frightful object. Another Achilles ſon of Galatea was born with white hair. We are told of fifty four Achilles's beſide, all very renowned, though two of them were diſtinguiſhed only for their groveling, ſcandalous actions (a). We ſhall give an article apart of that Achilles who acquired the greateſt glory among thoſe who were ſo called.

(a) Extracted from the 6th book of Ptolomy ſon to Epheſtion, Novæ ad variam eruditionem hiſtoriæ apud Photium, num. 190. p. 488, 489.

ſwell extravagantly with Greek; and therefore I ſhall refer my readers to the great Etymologicum, to Euſtathius (4), to Tzetzes (5), &c. Lloyd and Hofman in imitation of Fungerus and many others, crouded the article of the ſon of Peleus with ſo many etymologies; they ſhould at leaſt have inform'd us, that great pains had been taken to no purpoſe by thoſe who will abſolutely have it that the word Achilles depended on the perſonal qualities of the hero of the Iliad. They might at once have refuted this, by ſhewing that there were other Achilles's before him in queſtion; and have given us a reaſon infinitely more natural than thoſe above, why he was call'd Achilles, I mean that I gave in the text, viz. becauſe the preceptor of his preceptor was ſo called.

(4) Euſtath. in Iliad, lib. 1.
(5) Tzetzes in Lycophron.

[C] Wrought ſuch a change in his whole perſon.] Photius, who has preſerv'd a few fragments of the ſeven books, which Ptolemy ſon of Æpheſtion had fill'd with the moſt curious trifles concerning the fabulous ages; has maim'd what relates to Achilles ſon of Jupiter and Lamia (6) in ſuch a manner, that we are forc'd to conjecture, that it was with Venus he diſputed for the prize of beauty. This conjecture is grounded on the indignation of Venus, againſt him (Pan) who decreed the prize to Achilles; Venus, to puniſh Pan, the Judge, on this occaſion, inſpired him with a paſſion for Echo; and at the ſame time made him ſo ugly, that his bare aſpect created averſion. Thus Schottus underſtood the words of Photius: but Mr de Meziriaç divides the effect of Venus's anger between Pan and Achilles; the former, ſays he, fell violently in love, and the latter was changed to the ugliеſt man in the world (7). 'Twould be to no purpoſe to conſult the original, to ſee whether Schottus's tranſlation is better than that of Meziriac; for if on one ſide it may be ſaid, that the rules of juſt Grammar favour Schottus's verſion; it may be ſaid on the other, that the Greek writers did not ſubject themſelves to ſuch rules; and that 'tis not ſo uncommon, when ſeveral perſons are mentioned in the ſame period, for the pronoun he or him do refer indifferently either to the perſon who is neareſt it, or to that furtheſt off: nor are the Latins more accurate on this head. The Grammar of the French tongue is wonderful exact in this caſe; for it requires us to repeat the ſame proper name two or three times, in the compaſs of a very few lines, rather than to perplex and embarraſs the reader. If we conſult reaſon, either for or againſt Meziriac and Father Schottus, we ſhall ſtill find it difficult to ſettle the point. It may happen, that a perſon upon loſing his cauſe, may revenge himſelf upon his judge only; for Apollo was contented to puniſh Midas for cenſuring the ſentence of ſuperiority which had been pronounced in his favour, and in prejudice of Pan (8), which would make againſt Meziriac. But then, ſometimes a perſon revenges himſelf both on his judge and his rival (9); in which caſe Schottus's tranſlation would be wrong; for, according to him, Venus, upon her being exaſperated, does not injure him who is declared victorious. 'Tis true indeed, that according to the other interpreter, ſhe does no great harm to the unjuſt judge, but is ſatisfied with inſpiring him with love for a nymph, who, according to the traditions of the ancients (10), brought him a daughter. On the whole, Meziriac ſeems to be in the wrong; but in caſe he were not, then either Photius or the Ptolemy he quotes, would be to blame, for not declaring that the ſame Venus who inſpired Pan with a paſſion for Echo, made him unhappy in his love. This circumſtance ought abſolutely to have been mentioned, which would have been agreable to the opinion of ſome, who take notice of the cruel returns that nymph made to Pan's fond paſſion. There is not perhaps a more difficult province in the republic of letters, than to epitomize juſtly; and a great diſcerment is required to know the circumſtances, the ſuppreſſion whereof render an epitome obſcure or not. Juſtin is not the only writer who wanted this diſcerning faculty. I have employ'd this reflexion in another part of this work.

(6) Photius, Bibliothecæ, num. 190.

(7) Meziriac, Ovid's Epiſt. pag. 253.

(8) Ovid. Metam. lib. 11. ver. 175.

(9) Arachne, Marſyas, Thamyris, the daughters of Pierus, prove that vengeance is ſometimes taken of a competitor.

(10) There is a tradition different from this, which we mention under the article PAN.

* Theſe are Mr. Bayle's words, inſerted by him in the ſecond edition of his Dictionary, printed 1702.

* In the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I had inſerted a kind of preface to the following article, containing an elogium of the late Mr. DRELINCOURT, Profeſſor of phyſic at Leyden, which I now ſuppreſs with regret. The public was ſo unanimous in their opinion, that I deviated ſo ſtrangely from the general practice, and placed a piece of this kind ſo very improperly, that I am forc'd to omit it, in order to put a ſtop to this general cenſure. But I declare it my intention, that this teſtimony of my gratitude and eſteem for him, ought to be conſidered here in the ſame manner as if that elogium had been repeated verbatim.

ACHILLES, the ſon of Peleus and Thetis, was one of the greateſt heroes of antient Greece. He was a native of Phthia in Theſſaly (a), and being dipt when a child in the Styx, in order to make him invulnerable, he would have been ſo in every part, had his mother but firſt held him by one heel, and then by the other (b); but as ſhe was not ſo cautious as to do this, one of her ſon's heels became obnoxious to wounds; and it was by this part that death made him his prey. However, we are not to believe that authors are univerſally agreed in this particular; for ſome relate that Achilles was wounded in ſeveral parts of his body (c). I ſhall relate in the remarks, another precaution which Thetis employed in order to render him immortal, viz. her anointing him with Ambroſia, and ſetting him under burning coals (d). He was brought up under Chiron the Centaur, whoſe diſcipline was the beſt in the world at that time. Chiron gave him a very ſingular kind of diet, for inſtead of milk, bread, and ſuch like aliments, he fed him with the marrow of lions, or other wild beaſts [A]. Etymologiſts

(a) Servius, in Æneid, lib. 2. ver. 197.
(b) See the remark [A], num. (V).

(c) Dictys Cretæ lib. 2. Dares; Ptolom. Hephæſt. lib. 6. apud Photii Bibliotb. num. 190. Euſtath. in Odyſſ. 11.
(d) See the remark [A] num. V.
(7) Statii Achilleid, lib. 2. ver. 382.
(8) Philoſtrat. in Heroic. p. 705. B. and in Icon II. p. 181. C.
(9) Tertullian de Pallio; Vide hereunder, N° VIII.
(10) Euſtath. in Iliad. lib. 1 pag. 11. verſ. 28.
(11) Suidas, verbo χιλὼν.

[A] With the marrow of lions and other wild beaſts.] Libanius in three places (1), and Priſcian in one (2), mention only the marrow of lions; Gregory Nazianzen adds that of ſtags (3); the Scholiaſt on Homer, that of bears (4); the author of the great Etymologicum, ſpeaks only of ſtags marrow (5); and Apollodorus of that of wild boars and bears, and the entrails of lions (6); Statius ſays he fed on the marrow and entrails of lions; or, according to the reading of ſome old manuſcripts, the entrails of lions, and the marrow of ſhe-wolves (7). Vide N. II. hereunder. Philoſtratus adds to honey and milk, the marrow of young fawns and of roe-bucks (8). Tertullian barely mentions, and that after an indeterminate manner, the marrow of wild beaſts (9): Euſtathius ſpeaks in a more general and looſe way, ſpeaking only of the marrow of animals (10): Suidas ſays marrow only (11).

(1) Liban. Progymn. p. 70. D; P. 97, C; p. 129, A; &c.
(2) In Præexerc. Rhetor.
(3) Orat. xx. P 324.
(4) In Iliad. lib. 16.
(5) In Ἀχιλ.
(6) Apollod. Bib. lib 3.

mologiſts have exerciſed their talents on this occaſion, and made an advantage of this tradition

I. Girac has, without any reaſon, denied that Achilles was fed with lions marrow.

By the way, the ancient tradition, viz. that Chiron fed Achilles with the marrow of lions, is ſo well known, that 'tis very ſurprizing a man of Mr. Girac's learning ſhould accuſe Mr. Coſtar of the groſſeſt ignorance (12), for having writ theſe words: You had fed, from your infancy, on the juice, the ſubſtance and ſoul of good books, in the ſame manner as Achilles, on the marrow of lions. Upon this, Mr. Girac makes a query which is far from being agreable to the rules of juſt criticiſm, ſince it changes the ſtate of the queſtion, and makes Coſtar ſay more than he really did. Where did he find it written, ſays he, that Achilles fed upon the MARROW OF LIONS ONLY? But what follows is much worſe. Having aſſerted among other reaſons, to ſupport his opinion, that according to Plutarch, Achilles was nouriſhed with ſubſtances which have no blood, he adds, that he does not believe any author of credit relates, that Achilles fed on the marrow of lions; and yet he himſelf cites St. Gregory Nazianzen immediately after, obſerving that St. Baſil never had, like Achilles, a centaur near him to give him the FABULOUS MARROW OF LIONS AND OF STAGS. Which ſhews, ſays Girac, that St. Gregory look'd upon this as a fictitious and impoſſible thing. Be it ſo. But ſtill this will not make him a leſs authentic witneſs, for in order to be ſo in things of this kind, it is not neceſſary that the author ſhould himſelf be perſuaded of the truth of the incidents he relates, nor that they ſhould really exiſt, nor even be poſſible; it is enough that what he advances is not a chimera of his own. Now this doubtleſs is St. Gregory Nazianzen's caſe. He does not advance thoſe particulars, he relates of Achilles, and of the centaur Chiron, without having read them ſomewhere. I confeſs that he does not believe them, but then neither does he invent them, which is ſufficient to make him worthy of credit. On this occaſion, neither a moral or phyſical, but only a relative truth, is neceſſary. Mr. Girac, who thinks that Homer's Hero fed upon ſtag's marrow only, according to the common opinion of the ancients, doubtleſs look'd upon ſuch authors as relate this particular to be worthy of credit; tho' there is no reaſon to think, either that they believed it themſelves, or that the thing was true. He undoubtedly conſiders St. Gregory of Nazianzen in the ſame light, with regard to the marrow of ſtags. He therefore cannot cavil at him with reſpect to that of lions; and conſequently he himſelf cited an author worthy of credit, immediately after having ſaid that he did not believe there were any ſuch.

(12) Reply to Coſtar, ſect. 7. p. 59. Dutch edition in 8°.

II. Proofs that Achilles fed on lions marrow.

I am, however, leſs ſurprized at his quoting St. Gregory of Nazianzen on this occaſion, than to find him ignorant of what two modern writers, whoſe works are in every body's hands, have proved invincibly. The one is Meziriac, who has proved by the teſtimony of the Scholiaſt of Homer on the XVI Iliad; by that of Libanius in his two ſpeeches, the one in favour of Achilles, and the other in oppoſition to him; and by that of Statius in the ſecond book of his Achilleis: that our Hero was fed with lions marrow. The other writer is Barthius, who, on this paſſage of Statius, has cited for the ſame incident, beſides the two texts of Libanius, the following words of Priſcian; Deinde ſequitur victus, ut in Achille, quod MEDULLIS LEONUM paſtus eſt (13), i. e. "That "Achilles was fed with the marrow of lions." Theſe teſtimonies are as good, as thoſe which Girac brings, in order to prove that another kind of food was given to Achilles.

(13) In Progymn. Rhetor. ex Hermogene.

We muſt not however omit, that Barthius deprives us of Statius's teſtimony, with regard to the marrow of lions; for he, inſtead of lubens, pretends we are to read lupæ, in the paſſage where Achilles ſpeaks thus;

Dicor & in teneris & adhuc creſcentibus annis
Theſſalus ut rigido ſenior me monte recepit,
Non ullas ex more dapes habuiſſe, nec almis
Uberibus ſatiaſſe famem, ſed ſpiſſa leonum
Viſcera, ſemianimeſque lupæ traxiſſe medullas (14).

(14) Stati Achill. lib 2. ver 382. others read lubens or lilens, in this laſt verſe.

Engliſh'd,

"'Tis ſaid that in my infant, blooming years,
"Chiron (great Sage) receiv'd me on a mountain.
"That I ne'er taſted there of common food,
"Nor ſooth'd my hunger from the balmy Teat;
"But fed on the tough fleſh of furious Lions,
"And ſuck'd th'expiring Wolf's ſtill quiv'ring mar-
"row.

III. A paſſage of Plutarch wrong tranſlated.

The words which Girac makes Plutarch ſay, ſhow that he did not conſult the original Greek; and as he there mentions ſome of the remarks employed by Vigenere in his notes on Philoſtratus; 'tis very poſſible that the following words of Vigenere only, miſled him on this occaſion. Plutarch relates, that Chiron fed Achilles from his birth with aliments, in which there was no blood (15). Meziriac ſhewed ſeveral years ſince, in his commentary on the epiſtle of Briſeis to Achilles, that Amiot miſled Vigenere on this occaſion; and that inſtead of ſaying with Amiot, But this Philinus, like another Chiron, fed his ſon after the ſame manner as Achilles was nouriſhed from his infancy, with aliments whence no blood was drawn, that is to ſay, with the fruits of the earth (16); we are to ſay, But this new Chiron fed this youth in a quite contrary manner from Achilles, (ἀνατιτρόφως τῷ Ἀχιλλεῖ) viz. with meats in which was no blood (17). Xylander might alſo be ſaid to have committed the ſame miſtake, for his Latin verſion is as follows; Noſtrum autem quo pacto Achillem Chiron nutriens iſte ſtatim à natalibus SANGUINE CARENTIBUS. There is a chaſm in this paſſage of Plutarch; but the word ἀνατιτρόφως muſt ſtill be as unintelligible when uſed in the ſenſe quite contrary, as 'tis generally explained in Dictionaries.

(15) Vigenere, Comment ſur Philoſtrat. de la Nourrit: d'Achille, edit. in 4° p. 544.

(16) Plutarque des Propos de Table, liv. 4. ch. 1.

(17) Meziriac, Epiſtres d'Ovide, p. 249.

IV. Property of lions bones. If they really have no marrow in them.

What I have here taken notice of, in proving the validity of St. Gregory's teſtimony, ſhows that Girac has improperly cited Ælian, Pliny and Ariſtotle, to prove that lions have no marrow in their bones; or ſo ſmall a quantity as is next to nothing. He might likewiſe have cited Galen, in XI book De Uſu partium, Chap. xviii. And we wou'd think this fact ſhould not be doubted of, ſince the moderns generally allow it to the ancient naturaliſts, even when they accuſe them of committing ſeveral miſtakes with regard to lions. Conſult Voſſius on the 52d chapter of his 3d book de Origine & Progreſſu Idololatriæ; Franzius & Bochart de Animalibus Sacræ Scripturæ; father Hardouin's Commentary on the 37th chapter of the 11th book of Pliny, &c. (18). Were we to believe Voſſius, Athenæus has cenſur'd Ariſtotle on this head; but if we look into Athenæus, we find that he does not ſay any thing concerning marrow, and only animadverts on the hardneſs of the bones of lions (19), which Ariſtotle affirms will emit ſparks like a flint, when they ſtrike one againſt the other. A perſon might deny this, and yet believe they have marrow in them. This then might really be matter of fact, and which Furetiere ſhould have inſerted among his other remarks under the word LION, had not the contrary been proved. Borrichius tells us of two lions that were anatomized at Copenhagen; the one, ſixteen years, and the other two, before the time of his writing; and aſſures us that a great quantity of marrow, copioſam medullam, was found in moſt of their bones; and he quotes Severinus, who tells us that Tiberius Caraffa brought up a lion, whoſe bones were hollow and full of marrow, like thoſe of other beaſts (20). But had it been proved that lions have no marrow, yet Girac ſhould not have employed that reaſon, ſince ſuch incidents as are borrow'd from the Pagan mythology, are not refuted in this manner; and eſpecially when it has been ſaid that 'tis not mentioned by any authentic writer. The bare teſtimony of ſome ancient authors would be ſufficient to make ſuch aſſertors loſe the cauſe, tho' naturaliſts ſhould even prove the impoſſibility of the thing.

(18) Note that Hofman, Continuat. Lexic. Univerſal. tom. 1. p. 1002, declares this only of the teeth of lions, and of their emitting ſparkles when they ſtrike againſt one another.

(19) Athenæi Deipnoſoph. lib. 8. cap. 11.

(20) In his treatiſe pro Hermetis, Ægyptiorum, & Chemicorum Sapientiâ, printed in Copenhagen in 4° ann. 1674.

V. Remarks againſt Barthius. Deciſive, promptory writers are ſometimes catched.

From this it appears, that Barthius engages in a ſuperfluous refutation, when in commenting on the above-cited verſes of Statius, he cries in a moſt ſerious ſtrain; 'Tis a ſtrange fiction, ingens fabula; ſince a child who ſhould take any ſuſtenance of this kind, even in ſucking, would infallibly die; for the very breath of lions is poiſonous, particularly to children of that age. After which, he quotes a paſſage from Ariſtotle, intimating that lions have no marrow. But all this is labour in vain, ſince ſuch of the ancients themſelves as had examined a little into things, look'd upon all theſe tales as ſo many witty conceits.

tradition; for they declare that the name Achilles owes its derivation to that circumſtance [B].

Muſt not that man have very little to do, who ſhould undertake to refute phyſically, the ſeveral particulars that are told us of Achilles's heel, and his burnt lip? 'Tis related that his mother having plung'd him in the waters of Styx, in order to render him invulnerable, could not procure that advantage to the heel, becauſe ſhe held him by that part. Fulgentius in the 7th chapter of his 3d book, and the Scholiaſt of Horace, on the 13th Ode of book the 5th, obſerve that ſhe held him by the heel. Such as relate that he died of a wound in his heel, as Hyginus in the 107th chapter; and Quintus Calaber in the 62d verſe of Book 3d, agree in the main with the other two authors. Servius on the 57th verſe of the 6th Book of the Æneid, tells us, in general, that he was invulnerable, excepta parte qua à matre tentus eſt; i. e. "in that part excepted by which his mother held "him." Others tell us, that Thetis, in order to conſume every part of her ſon's body that was mortal, us'd to lay him every night under live coals, and in the day time, anointed him with ambroſia; and that no part of him was burnt but one of his lips, occaſioned by his having lick'd that part.

Several authors relate theſe particulars of Thetis, and tell us farther, that by theſe chimerical experiments ſhe had kill'd ſix of her children, and that Achilles who was the ſeventh, would have met with the ſame fate, had not her husband ſurpriz'd her in the fact, and ſaved the child (21). Nevertheleſs, Tzetzes declares this to be a fiction, and ſays, that he cannot imagine whence Lycophron drew that falſhood, viz. that Thetis had ſeven children by Peleus (22). This is another example to add to that of Girac, to ſhew the danger to which thoſe writers expoſe themſelves, who decide of matters with too confident an air; for Meziriac cites four very grave authors who all agree with Lycophron. A man has great reaſon to ſay, when he hears ſome uncommon phraſe or expreſſion, or a ſtrange and unheard of ſtory, that theſe are a good bait to catch wagerers, that is to ſay, certain raſh Literati, who are always ready on theſe occaſions, to lay a wager, that ſuch and ſuch an incident is not to be met with in any authors. However, theſe Gentlemen are generally loſers. But the moſt aſtoniſhing circumſtance, is, that they ſometimes deny the exiſtence of ſuch particulars as are eaſieſt met with, of which I ſhall give ſeveral examples in the courſe of this Dictionary.

(21) Apollodor. Biblioth. lib. 3. Scholiaſt. Homeri Iliad. 2. ver. 36; Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. p. 184.

(22) Meziriac's Ovid's Epiſtles, p. 248.

I muſt not leave Barthius without obſerving, that he pretends the correction lupæ inſtead of lubens, is very much to Statius's honour, ſince he thereby is not found to claſh with Ariſtotle, but obſerves the ſame diſtinctions with Apollodorus, ſince the latter tells us, that Chiron fed Achilles with the entrails of lions, and the marrow of wild boars and bears (23). But a little lower, Barthius aſſuming an air of refutation, rejects the wolf's marrow as a palpable abſurdity; and declares, that were a child to eat of it but once, he would infallibly die the next day. Wherefore, continues he, Gregory Nazianzen orders matters much better, when he adds ſtag's marrow to that of the lion. Barthius does not here ſeem to be conſiſtent with himſelf, he having declared in the preceding page, that it was judicious in Statius to reject lion's marrow; and that the bare approach of lions is of a very dangerous conſequence to children.

(23) Barth. Comment. in Achill. lib. 2. vol. 3. p. 1753.

VI. It was proper to feign that Achilles was fed with lions marrow.

We are alſo to take notice, that what prompted Apollodorus and ſome other writers to mention Achilles's being fed with the entrails, rather than with the marrow of lions, ſeems to proceed from their having heard that thoſe animals have very little marrow in their bones; otherwiſe it would have been more natural to ſuppoſe, that our Hero was nouriſhed with lion's marrow, rather than with any other food, conſidering the character under which he is imaged by the Poets; for theſe don't make valour, (tho' he is ſuppos'd to have been eminently brave) ſo much his characteriſtic, as that of an invincible anger. Homer propoſes chiefly to draw him under that idea in the Iliad, the ſubject of which, according to the obſervation of Horace, is,

(24) Horat. Od. 6. lib. 1. ver. 5.

Gravem Peleidæ ſtomachum cedere neſcii (24),
That is,
" The fierce Pelides haughty rage
" That ſtill preſt forward to engage,
" And knew not how to yield: Creech.

and which begins as follows;

Μῆνιν ἄειδε θεὰ Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος.

That is,
" Achilles' wrath, O heavenly Goddeſs, ſing.

Now 'tis certain, that if we trace backward to the cauſe of this character, by ſuch fictions as are adapted to poetry, and ſtampt with the marvellous of thoſe remote ages; it will be found that lions marrow was abſolutely the moſt proper food that could have been thought of; for marrow contains the moſt ſucculent parts of the animal; and even, as we are aſſured, the ſpecific and ſeminal parts. Homer inſinuates by the example of Aſtyanax, that this was the dainty morſel, that was given to ſuch children as were ſpoiled with fondling.

Ἀστυάναξ, ὃς πρὶν μὲν ἐπὶ γούνασι πατρὸς
Μυελὸν οἷον ἔδεσκε καὶ οἰῶν πίονα δημόν (25).
That is,
" Aſtyanax ———
" He, who with tender delicacy bred,
" On marrow and the choiceſt dainties fed. Pope.

(25) Homer. Iliad. lib. 22. ver. 500.

And wags ſay ſometimes to mothers, that 'tis the kick-ſhaw of the ſon-in-law of the family. Beſides, the lion is the moſt choleric of all animals; and 'tis ſuppoſed, that Prometheus had borrowed from that noble beaſt, the principle which ſubjected the firſt man to the paſſion of anger.

Fertur Prometheus addere principi
Limo coactus particulam undique
Deſectam, & inſani leonis
Vim ſtomacho appoſuiſſe noſtro (26).
That is,
" When bold Prometheus firſt began,
" As ſtory goes, to make a man,
" From every thing he ſnatch'd a part
" To furniſh out his clay,
" And to compleat his rude eſſay,
" And plac'd a lion's fury in the heart. Creech.

(26) Horat. Od. xvi. lib. 1. ver. 13.

However, authors might with great propriety have ſuppoſed, that Achilles was nurs'd by a lioneſs. Virgil preſents us with this idea, in a reproach of cruelty.

——— Duris genuit te cautibus horrens
Cauſacus, Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera Tigres (27).
That is,
" Falſe as thou art, and more than falſe, forſworn;
" Not ſprung from noble Blood, nor Goddeſs-born,
" But hewn from hardned entrails of a rock;
" And rough Hyrcanian Tygers gave thee ſuck. Dryden.

(27) Virg. lib. 6. ver. 366. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 11.

And the ſwaggerer in the comedy des Viſionnaires, delivers himſelf in much the ſame ſtrain in the following Rhodomontade:

Le Dieu Mars m'engendra d'une fiere Amazone,
Et je ſuçai le lait d'une affreuſe lionne.
Engliſh'd,
" On a ſtout Amazon, God Mars begot me,
" And a fierce lioneſs's blood I ſuck'd.

VII. The reaſon why ſtag's marrow was ſuppoſed to have been Achilles's food. Swiftneſs of foot was anciently an heroic quality. (28) See the prodigious ſwiftneſs which Virgil gives to Camilla, a young Amazon, in the 7th book of his Æneis, ver. 807. and father la Cerda's remarks on it.

The reaſon why ſome authors have choſen ſtag's marrow for the food of Achilles preferable to any other, is, becauſe tradition declared him to have been very ſwift-footed, a circumſtance which occaſioned Homer to honour inceſſantly, either with the elogium of πόδας ὠκὺς, ſwift-footed, or with ſome other epithet of the ſame import, ποδώκης, ποδάρκης, πόδας ταχὺς, ποσὶ ταχέεσσι, κραιπνοῖσι, &c. A quality which would now be applauded in Biſcayan lacquey; tho' it was anciently an heroic quality (28); ſo that Homer could not be cenſured on this occaſion, but only for having too frequently brought it in by way of expletive, merely to eke out the verſe. 'Twas therefore thought proper to feign, that a Hero who was circumſtance [B]. Chiron not only inur'd his body to the moſt painful exerciſes, but likewiſe informed his ſoul with ſuch ſciences as are moſt worthy of it. However, if we are to believe Homer, Phœnix and not Chiron [C] was Achilles's tutor and foſter-father.

ſurprizingly ſwift-footed, had been fed with ſtag's marrow; and writers were ſo far carried away with this notion, that it prevented their reflecting how ill ſuch kind of food ſuited to this thunder of war, this lion-hearted Hero Ἀχιλλῆα ῥηξήνορα θυμολέοντα (29); who, to ſhew his extreme contempt for the General of the army, among other injurious expreſſions uſes the following,

(29) Homer. Iliad. lib. 7. ver. 228.

" O monſter mix'd of inſolence and fear,
" Thou dog in forehead, but in heart a deer.
Pope.

Οἰνοβαρὲς, κυνὸς ὄμματ' ἔχων, κραδίην δ' ἐλαφοῖο.

Which is thus tranſlated by Vigenere (30):

(30) Vigénere, Comment. ſur Philoſtrat. de la Nourriture d'Achille, p. 544.

Va ſac à vin, yeux de chien, cœur de cerf.
Engliſh'd.
" Thou wine-bag, dog's-eye, ſtag's-heart; get " thee gone.

VIII. Errors of ſome interpreters of Tertullian.

I believe, that were this matter decided by a plurality of voices, it would not be declared that Achilles was fed with the marrow of ſtags; nor that Girac could confirm what he aſſerted too inadvertently, viz. that according to the moſt generally received opinion of the ancients, Homer's hero fed upon no other kind of marrow but the laſt mention'd. But granted this were true, yet the author of an old French verſion of the treatiſe de Pallio (31), ought not to paſs uncenſur'd, for having reſtrained to this peculiar marrow, what Tertullian had declared of that of wild beaſts in general: Tranſlators are not allowed ſuch liberties. Ille ferarum medullis educatus (unde & nominis conſilium) (32), quandoquidem labiis vacuerat ab uberum guſtu: i. e. " He who had been fed with the marrow " of wild-beaſts, when he was purpoſely named as " having never ſuck'd at the teat with his lips." Lui, qui avoit eſté nourri de mouelle de CERF , (d'où il fut nommé à deſſein, attendu qu'il n'avoit jamais ſuccé mammelle de ſes levres,) &c. Theodorus Marcilius likewiſe ſtumbled at theſe words, he pretending that Tertullian points out the etymology fine chilo, ἄνευ χειλῶν (33), without chile, which is manifeſtly falſe, as Salmaſius has ſhewn. Another miſtake of the ſame author might alſo have been taken notice of, which is this, that Achilles, according to Velius Longus cited by Caſſiodorus, had his name given him from the word χεῖλος; as tho' he had been of thoſe who are called Chilones or Labeones, that is, " Blubber-lipp'd." Theſe are called Labioſi by Lucretius (34), who obſerves that a lover to excuſe the imperfections of his miſtreſs, ſays, Labioſa, φίλημα, a fat, blubber-lipp'd girl is a beautiful and ſpacious field for kiſſes. But then it is not juſt to aſſert from hence, that Achilles was ſo called from χεῖλος lip; it being rather for his having been hurt in that part; though, Salmaſius is of a contrary opinion, notwithſtanding Photius whom I have already mentioned, has a paſſage directly to that purpoſe; as alſo Agameſtor (35), an old Poet cited by Tzetzes. Salmaſius's words are as follows. Si Chilones dicti à magnis & improbis labris, Achilles dictus fuerit quaſi ἄνευ χειλέων, non quod ſine labris fuerit, ſed quod labiorum miniſterio non uſus fuerit infans (36). i. e. " If the Chilones are ſo " called from their large, monſtrous lips, Achilles " was ſo nam'd quaſi ἄνευ χειλέων, not that he had no " lips, but becauſe he made no uſe of them in his infant " years." I don't deny but Apollodorus tells us, that the ſon of Thetis, who before had the name of Ligyron, was afterwards by Chiron call'd Achilles, becauſe he had never put his lips to the teat. Ὅτι τὰ χείλη μαστοῖς οὐ προσενήνεγκε (37).

(31) Edmund Richer, who publiſhed his tranſlation at Paris in 8°, anno 1600.

(32) Salmaſius would have it read concilium.

* Here the French tranſlator ſays marrow of ſtags, inſtead of ſaying the marrow of wild beaſts, as the original Latin has it.

(33) Not. Crit. in Tertull. de Pall. p. 77. edit. Pariſ. an. 1614. in 8°.

(34) Lucret. l. 4.

(55) In his Poem on the Nuptials of Thetis and Peleus; which is ſuppoſed to have been written before that of Heſiod on the ſame ſubject. This Poet is not mentioned either by Voſſius, or Lorenzo Craſſo.

(36) Salmaſ. in Tertull. de Pallio, p. 281. edit. an. 1656.

(37) Apollodor. Biblioth. lib. 3. p. 235.

[B] That the name Achilles owes its derivation to that circumſtance.] We have taken notice of the etymologies of this name, in the remark (B) of the preceding article; but muſt here ſpeak particularly of that in queſtion. This is always inſeparable from the tradition which declares, that Achilles had no other food but fleſh and the marrow of animals. What occaſioned the joining of theſe two things, is, that the Greek word χιλὸς, ſignifies properly the nouriſhment which the earth affords. But ſome writers have a whimſical notion on this head; which is this, as Father Gautruche expreſſes it in his Poetical Hiſtory; a book I chuſe to quote preferably to any other, becauſe it has gone thro' many impreſſions; has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and is thought to be of general uſe (38). Now no errors ought more to be animadverted upon, than ſuch as may miſlead a great number of people. Inſtead of milk, ſays Gautruche (39), and other common meats, Chiron gave him no other food than the marrow of lions or wild-boars, in order to inſpire him with the ſtrength and bravery of thoſe animals. Whence according to ſome authors, from his not having fed upon any kind of meat, he was call'd Achilles; i. e. WITHOUT CHYLE. Altho' the laſt period of this paſſage is not inſerted in the latter editions, I ſhall nevertheleſs obſerve firſt, 'Tis an error to ſay, when a perſon has had no other food but the marrow of animals, that he never fed on meat of any kind; marrow being indiſputably included under the head of meat, even in oppoſition to ſuch aliments as are allowed to be eat in Lent. Secondly, 'Tis falſe to ſay that marrow is not converted into chyle; and that thoſe who ſhould have no other food but marrow, would have no chyle. Theſe remarks will not be thought ſuperfluous by thoſe who recollect, that this doctrine of Gautruche is found in a multitude of copies of his work, and in other writers (40); and that in the edition which is purged of the errors, no reaſon is given why they were ſuppreſt.

(38) An edition of this work was printed at Utrecht in 1690, with Latin and Fleminſh tranſlations. The Latin verſion had been publiſhed before, and an Engliſh verſion of it was publiſhed in 1671.

(39) Hiſtoire Poët. book 2. ch. 15. p. 158; Hague edition, which is the 4th, printed in 1681.

(40) Among others in de Juſſgné's Dictionaire Hiſtorique.

What gave occaſion to this miſtake, was, that the word χιλὸς, (us'd by Euphorion in ſome verſes cited by the author of the Etymologicum magnum, and by Euſtathius,) has been miſtaken for that ſoft, whitiſh ſubſtance, into which the ſtomach converts aliments, and which is call'd by Phyſicians chyle, from the Greek word χυλὸς: whereas by χιλὸς, according to Meziriac (41) after Euſtathius, is to be underſtood, the nouriſhment that is produced from ſuch ſubſtances as are ſow'd in the ground. Natalis Comes tranſlates Euphorion wrong, when he makes him ſay that Achilles never taſted milk (42). Vigenere and Fungerus, ſupporting themſelves falſly on the authority of Gregory Nazianzen, fall into the ſame miſtake: for theſe aſcribe words to St. Gregory, which are met with only in the Latin verſion of the commentaries of Nicetas Serro, Archbiſhop of Heraclea, in the eleventh Century, on the orations of that Father (43). Fungerus concludes that Achilles was fed ſine cibo, (without meat) becauſe ſtag's marrow was his only food. The other declares that χιλὸς ſignifies juice; and that Achilles was fed without juice, becauſe he was nouriſhed, not with meats which men uſe to eat, but with the raw fleſh of wild beaſts (44). Franceſco Alunno adopts half this laſt error. Fu nutrito, ſays he (45), nel monte Pelio da Chirone Centauro, ne mai in quel tempio, mangio cibo cotto, perche fu nominato Achille, perche a in Greco ſignifica ſenza; & chilos CIBO COTTO. i. e. " He was fed, ſays he, on mount " Pelion, by Chiron the Centaur, and as he never at " that time, eat of dreſs'd meat, he was call'd Achil- " les; a, in Greek, ſignifying without; and chilos, " DRESS'D MEAT." Some writers, taking the word χιλὸς, ſimply for food, ground the etymology of Achilles upon this circumſtance, viz. that Chiron his Preceptor, at the expiration of a certain time, ceas'd to provide him either with the marrow of wild beaſts, or with any kind of food, inſomuch that he was obliged to ſubſiſt on what he could get by hunting (46). But can this be called living without food? This explication is perhaps worſe than thoſe we have already taken notice of.

(41) Meziriae on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 248. where the Poet Euphorion, is miſcall'd Euphoron.

(42) Natal. Comes, Mythol. l. 9. cap. 12.

(43) This verſion is printed with St. Gregory's works.

(44) Vigénere's Commentary on Philoſtratus, of Achilles's food, p. 543.

(45) In his Fabrica del Mondo, which is a Dictionary drawn from Boccace, Dante, Petrarch, &c. printed at Venice in folio, an. 1588.

(46) Commentary on Alciat's Emblems, p. 624. of Thuilius's edition, publiſhed in Padua in 4°, an. 1661.

(C) If we are to believe Homer, Phœnix and not Chiron &c.] Many people don't conſider this. Decimator declares, that Achilles after having been educated by Chiron, who taught him the ſcience of war, muſic and moral philoſophy; was afterwards put under the direction of Phœnix, who taught him to ſpeak father. Thetis was ſo anxious about her ſon's welfare, that ſhe could not ſuffer him to continue ſo long in Chiron's cave, as ſhe otherwiſe could have wiſhed he had, and took him from thence when he was but nine years of age (e). The inſtant Thetis heard of the warlike preparations which were making for the ſiege of Troy, ſhe cloathed him in ſpeak well, and inſtilled the principles of virtue into his mind, as he himſelf boaſts (47). He proves his aſſertion with regard to muſic and morality by theſe verſes of Ovid, Lib. 1. verſ. 11. de Arte amandi.

(e) Apollodor. Biblioth. lib. 3. p. 235.

† Phyllyrides puerum citharæ præfecit Achillem,
Atque animos molli contudit arte feros.
That is,
" As Chiron mollify'd his cruel mind
" With art; and taught his warlike hands to wind
" The ſilver ſtrings of his melodious lyre. Dryden.

(47) Decimator in Theſauro Linguarum. This work is a large folio; firſt printed at Leipſic, an. 1606.
† Chiron was called Phyllirides from his mother Phyllira.

I don't change the orthography in theſe verſes, nor the citharæ præfecit, which ſhould be citharâ perfecit. 'Tis manifeſt that muſic only is hinted at in theſe lines, and that there is nothing in them relating to morality. He endeavours to prove his aſſertion with regard to Phœnix from theſe lines of Homer.

Τοὔνεκά μοι προέηκε διδασκέμεναι ταῦτα πάντα,
Μύθων τε ῥητῆρ' ἔμεναι, πρηκτῆρά τε ἔργων (48).
That is,
" He bade me teach thee all the ways of war,
" To ſhine in councils, and in camps to dare.
Pope.

(48) Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 442.

But if we read with ſome little attention that book of the Iliad whence this authority is borrowed, 'twill appear that Decimator is miſtaken. The words which Phœnix is made to ſay, ſhew that he was the firſt Preceptor of Achilles. You would not, ſays Phœnix to our Hero, eat a morſel, unleſs I ſet you upon my knee, and cut your victuals for you. The wine which you uſed to ſpew on my breaſt, in your ſtubborn infancy, often bedawb'd my coat.

——— Ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἐθέλοισκες ἅμ' ἄλλῳ
Οὔτ' ἐς δαῖτ' ἰέναι, οὔτ' ἐν μεγάροισι πάσασθαι·
Πρίν γ' ὅτε δή σ' ἐπ' ἐμοῖσιν ἐγὼ γούνασι καθίσας,
Ὄψα τ' ἄσαιμι προταμών, καὶ οἶνον ἐπισχών,
Πολλάκι μοὶ κατέδυσας ἐπὶ στήθεσσι χιτῶνα
Οἴνῳ, ἀποβλύζων ἐν νηπιέῃ ἀλεγεινῇ (49).
That is,
" Thy infant breaſt a like affection ſhew'd,
" Still in my arms, (an over-pleaſing load)
" Or, at my knee, by Phœnix would'ſt thou ſtand,
" No food was grateful but from Phœnix hand.
Pope.

(49) Id. ibid. ver. 482.

I was obliged to quote the Greek lines, for theſe convey ſuch ſtrange images, that the reader might naturally imagine I had not given a juſt verſion of them. See the XI paragraph hereunder. But be this as it will, it is manifeſt hereby, that if we will make uſe of Homer's authority, with regard to Phœnix, we then muſt reject what others write concerning Chiron; at leaſt, we muſt not allow that Achilles imbibed the firſt principles of education under Chiron; much leſs can we ſuppoſe that he continued to be his pupil, till he had learnt the ſcience of war, muſic and moral philoſophy. A perſon who is capable, by his age, of learning theſe ſciences, does not eat upon his foſter-father's lap, nor throw up wine upon his clothes. Add to this, that thoſe who declare Achilles to have been Chiron's pupil, relate that he was taken from under his tutorage, in order to be ſent, (in female apparel) to the court of King Lycomedes; where his diſguiſe ſoon gain'd him very cloſe acceſs to the King's daughter, as was plain from the child ſhe was deliver'd of. Now, we cannot with any probability believe, that a tutor was ſet over him after he was a father; conſequently, we cannot ſuppoſe that Phœnix taught him after Chiron. The errors of Decimator are found in the laſt edition of the Theſaurus Scholaſticæ Eruditionis, notwithſtanding that this work had been frequently corrected by men of learning (50). Dempſter likewiſe aſſerts, that Achilles having been educated by Chiron during his childhood, was brought up by Phœnix in his riper years (51). The reader will obſerve, that I don't deny but that, after Achilles was a father, Phœnix might have been deſired to inſtruct him in the maxims of war, and how to behave in the field (52); but I don't call this appointing him a tutor.

(50) This Theſaurus was firſt publiſhed by Baſilius Faber, Soranus. He was Rector of a college in Erford, and publiſhed his work in 1571, afterhavingtaught Latin 36 years. The Theſaurus was reprinted in 1625, corrected and enlarged by Buchnerus, who died in 1661, aged ſeventy years; having been poetical profeſſor at Wirtemberg, during 45 years. and that of eloquence 30. He likewiſe corrected and enlarged this Dictionary for the edition printed in 1655. Laſtly, Chriſtopher Cellarius corrected it anew; firſt for the edition publiſhed in 1686; 2dly, for that of 1692. and laſtly, for that of 1696.
(51) Dempſteri Paralip. ad Roſinum lib. 2. c. 11.

(52) Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 440.

I cannot ſay whether Malherbe had ever made this obſervation; but it is manifeſt he expreſſes himſelf in ſuch a manner, as ſhews he was perſuaded that Achilles had but one preceptor. That Poet ſpeaks of our Hero in the following manner, Book IV, pag. 106. of his Poems:

De quelque addreſſe qu'au giron,
Ou de Phenix, ou de Chiron,
Il eut fait ſon aprentiſſage.
The ſenſe is,
" How happily ſoe'er, the brave Achilles,
" Might have been taught by Phœnix or by Chiron.

Achilles had no other tutor than Phœnix, if Homer may be credited, who does not once mention Chiron in that quality; but if we rather join with the croud of authors, Achilles was educated by Chiron only. Menage nevertheleſs, declares, in his note on this paſſage of Malherbe, that Chiron was Achilles's firſt tutor, and Phœnix his ſecond. I ſhall not lay any ſtreſs on the authority of Tzetzes, who, becauſe he had ſomewhere read that Phœnix having been blinded by his own father, was brought to Chiron, who reſtored him to his ſight, explains this incident allegorically, by ſaying that Chiron put young Achilles into his hands; for not to mention that nothing can be flatter or more forced than this turn, we are to obſerve that Tzetzes does not in any manner prove what he advances. He endeavours to reconcile Homer with Lycophron by his chimerical allegories; but how will he reconcile Homer, who declares that Achilles, in his moſt tender years, was under the direction of Phœnix; how, I ſay, will he reconcile this aſſertion with what ſome writers tell us, viz. that Achilles was educated by Chiron from ſix years of age till he arrived at puberty (53), till he had not only learnt to ſit aſtride on his tutor's back (54), but alſo till he had inured himſelf to the moſt violent exerciſes (55); not to mention ſo many other things which Chiron taught him, viz. the ſcience of War, Muſic, moral Philoſophy, (as Decimator juſt now obſerved) Phyſic, and particularly Botany and Law, as Staphylus, an antient author (56), and ſeveral others inform us? Statius in the ſecond book of his Achilleis, Claudian in his Panegyric on the third conſulate of Honorius; Sidonius Apollinaris in his ninth Poem, ſpecify the ſeveral things Achilles learnt of Chiron. We are to obſerve, that in the Commentaries on Alciat's Emblems, ſeveral things are aſcribed to Chiron, and that on Homer's teſtimony, which ſuit only with Phœnix, if Homer is to be credited. Nothing is more common among writers, than ſuch qui-pro-quo's.

(53) Pindar. Nem. Od. 3.
(54) Τῷ αὐτῷ παλῳ καὶ διδασκάλῳ χρώμενος. Eodem utens & pullo & præceptore. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 23.
(55) Statii Achill. lib. 2. ver. 382.
(56) He is cited by Natal. Comes, book 9. c. 12. and in the commentaries on Alciat's Emblems.

IX. Examination of a paſſage in which Homer mentions Chiron.

As I have aſſerted that Homer does not mention Chiron to have been Achilles's tutor, it will be objected, what conſtruction are we to put on theſe words of Eurypylus to Patroclus in the eleventh book of the Iliad.

. . . . Ἐπὶ δ' ἔπια φάρμακα πάσσε
Ἑσθλὰ, τά σε πρότι φασιν Ἀχιλλῆος διδάχθαι,
Ὃν Χείρων ἐδίδαξε δικαιότατος Κενταύρων (57).
That is,
" With healing balms the raging ſmart allay;
" Such as ſage Chiron, ſire of pharmacy,
" Once taught Achilles, and Achilles thee. Pope.

(57) Homer. Iliad, lib. 11. ver. 829.

To this I anſwer, that they ſignify only, that Chiron gave Achilles ſeveral medicinal receipts, but not that he was his preceptor. It is plain that there is a very wide difference between theſe two things. Monconis in his Travels, mentions the names of a great number of perſons who gave him ſeveral medicinal receipts and noſtrums; but then thoſe were not his tutors, nor had brought him up from his infancy. Such profeſſors of Phyſic, as either publickly point out in female apparel, and hid him among the maidens, at the court of Lycomedes, King of the Iſland of Scyros. The reaſon of her acting in this manner was as follows; in the firſt place ſhe was ſenſible, that in caſe her ſon went to the ſiege of Troy, he would never return back from it; and ſecondly, ſhe knew Calchas had foretold, that Troy would never be taken unleſs Achilles were preſent at it. However, Thetis's ſtratagem proved ineffectual, for Calchas the Soothſayer told the Greeks where Achilles was in diſguiſe (f), after they had long ſought for him to no purpoſe, in a great many places, and thereupon, Ulyſſes having been deputed to the court of King Lycomedes, he ſoon diſcovered Achilles [D], and got him very eaſily from among the girls, though the ſon of Thetis ſo far inſinuated himſelf into the affections of Deidamia out an hundred valuable medicinal receipts to their auditors, or diſcloſe ſome very choice ſecrets in Phyſic to their diſtinguiſhed friends, are not therefore called their preceptors or tutors. And, to confine our ſelves to the paſſage above of Homer, is it not declared, that Achilles had taught Patroclus ſome medicinal remedies, though it is well known that he had never been Patroclus's tutor? To enter therefore into Homer's thought, we muſt ſuppoſe that Phœnix educated Achilles from three or four years of age to that time, when a youth is capable of learning the propriety and beauty of ſpeech, and to perform fine actions; but that nevertheleſs, he, during this interval or afterwards, was taught alſo by Chiron. 'Tis in this ſenſe an old Scholiaſt underſtands Homer; for he obſerves that Apollonius, who feigns that Chiron went to the ſea-ſide, in order to wiſh the Argonauts a good voyage; and that his wife followed him with Achilles in her arms, and ſhewing him to Peleus; he obſerves, I ſay, that Apollonius has followed the Poets who came after Homer; and ſuppoſes with them that Chiron brought up Achilles when an infant; a circumſtance that Homer had not once mention'd. Ἠκολούθησεν Ἀπολλόνιος τοῖς μετ' Ὅμηρον ποιηταῖς, ὑπὸ Χείρωνος λέγων τὸν Ἀχιλλέα τραφῆναι. Ὅμηρος δ' οὐδὲν τοιοῦτον λέγει (58).

(f) Statius, Achilleid. lib. 1. ver. 493. ſeq.

However, Apollodorus is very excuſable, ſince he does no more than follow the multitude; for which of them has not mentioned Chiron as the tutor of Achilles? Have not Orpheus (59), Pindar (60), Euripides (61), and a great many more Poets (62) declar'd this in their poetical compoſitions? As alſo Xenophon (63), Plato (64), Apollodorus (65), Pliny (66), Plutarch (67), Pauſanias (68), Clemens Alexandrinus (69), Philoſtratus (70), Libanius (71), Gregory Nazianzen (72), and ſeveral other leſs ancient authors (73)? But on the other ſide, as great a number mention Phœnix (74) in quality of Preceptor to Achilles. We are therefore not to wonder ſo much even that ſeveral authors ſhould mention both Phœnix and Chiron as Preceptors to Achilles, but content ourſelves with ſaying, that theſe authors either had not examined the matter thoroughly; or had not reflected on the inconſiſtency which reſults from the circumſtances of the tutorage of Phœnix, and thoſe of Chiron's preceptorſhip.

I therefore might aſſert in the Specimen of this Dictionary, that the paſſage in Statius, where he ſpeaks both of Phœnix and Chiron as tutors to Achilles, does no way favour Decimator and thoſe who follow his opinion; for, beſides that Statius does not tell us whether they exerciſed this employment jointly, or one after another, or which began to inſtruct Achilles firſt; he cannot be reconciled with Homer, who, in caſe of a competition, ought to be preferr'd infinitely to Statius. Let the reader conſider attentively the two enſuing paſſages of Statius:

Non tibi certaſſet juvenilia fingere corda
Neſtor, & indomiti Phœnix moderator alumni,
Quique tubas acres lituoſque audire volentem
Æacidem, alio frangebat carmine Chiron (75).

Engliſh'd,

" Nor Neſtor, fam'd of old, with thee contended
" To faſhion, tender, wav'ring minds to virtue;
" Nor Phœnix tutor of th' unconquer'd youth;
" Nor Chiron, who with ſofteſt notes beguil'd
" Achilles heart, that lov'd the Clarion's voice.

Here follows the other paſſage,

——— Tenero ſic blandus Achilli
Semifer Æmonium vincebat Pelea Chiron.

Nec ſenior Peleus natum comitatus in arma
Troica, ſed caro Phœnix hærebat alumno (76).

That is,

" Thus the fond Centaur Chiron lov'd Achilles
" Much more than Peleus from whoſe loins he ſprung.
" Nor did the ſire attend his mighty ſon
" To Troy's fam'd ſiege, but ſent the prudent Phœnix,
" Who never mov'd from his lov'd pupil's ſide.

As Xenophon (77) and Lucian (78) declare that Achilles had both theſe for his pupils, they are thereby obnoxious to the ſame cenſure, as Statius; but when all comes to all, are theſe authors Homer, whom Decimator calls upon for his voucher? Obſerve farther, that tho' Statius tells us that Phœnix accompanied Achilles to the ſiege of Troy (79), it does not follow from thence that he aſſures him to have been Chiron's ſucceſſor; for he declares clearly enough, that Phœnix had been with Achilles before that expedition: he calls the latter the Alumnus (pupil) of Phœnix (80). With regard to Tzetzes, who tells us in his Commentary on Lycophron, that Peleus having carried Phœnix to the cave of Chiron, where Achilles was brought up, ſaid to him, Here is your ſon, teach him as a good father ought to inſtruct his child; this, I ſay, is no proof againſt what I advance; nor does it any way favour thoſe who would make a diſtinction between the words Governor and Preceptor, which is ſo clear in Plutarch with regard to the ſon of Philip of Macedon. See the article LYSIMACHUS. I believe the Poets can't ſhew us ſuch diſtinctions in ages of ſo remote antiquity; but be this as it will, it does not appear that Peleus made Phœnix aſſiſtant with Chiron in the education of his ſon; and in caſe Tzetzes meant this, but expreſt himſelf quite wrong, he would not deſerve the leaſt credit. Tzetzes is a writer of too modern a date, to merit being followed in a fact which cannot be reconciled either with Homer, or with thoſe ancient authors, who relate that Achilles was educated in his infant years by Chiron.

I ſhall conclude this too long remark with an aſſertion which will be thought a very bold one; however, I can't forbear making it. 'Tis this: We need only read the diſcourſe of Phœnix in the 9th book of the Iliad, to wonder at thoſe who ſtill admire that Poem. Are ſuch diſcourſes worthy the Majeſty of the Epic Poem? And Horace, whom Moreri tells us (81); boaſts in the ſixth Satyr of book 1ſt, his having learnt the Iliad by heart, had undoubtedly forgot this ſpeech, which is clogg'd with ſo many trifling, empty particulars, when he gave Homer this commendation, viz. that he always runs directly to his mark; that he haſtens to the end *: Semper ad eventum feſtinat (82). Were this true, would he amuſe a Deputy of the Grecian army, who had a very important commiſſion which requir'd the utmoſt diſpatch, with an account of his former adventures, fit only for little children to hear?

[D] He ſoon diſcover'd Achilles.] Moreri aſſerts, but with little accuracy, that Ulyſſes diſcovered Achilles, by cauſing a merchant to offer him trinkets and military weapons; for if we may believe what Ulyſſes ſays in his ſpeech to the Generals of the army, he himſelf preſented thoſe trinkets and military weapons (83), not only to Achilles but to all the young Ladies of the court. Hyginus and the younger Philoſtratus relate alſo, that they were preſented by Ulyſſes, who was one of the Embaſſadors ſent by the Greeks to Lycomedes, in order to demand Achilles. According, indeed, to Statius, Ulyſſes, who was at the head of the Grecian embaſſy, did not himſelf preſent trinkets and other things that were brought

(58) Schol. Apoll. in 1 lib. ver. 558.

X. Authors who mention Chiron and Phœnix as tutors.

(59) Argonaut. ver. 379.
(60) Nem. Od. 3.
(61) Iphigen. in Aul. ver. 209, 709.
(62) Senec. Troad. Act. 3. ver. 833. Stat. Silv. 1. lib. 2. ver. 89; Achil. lib. 1. ver. 196, & paſſim alibi; Val. Flaccus, lib. 1. ver. 254 and 407; Auſon. Protrept. ver. 20; Claudian de 3. Conſul. Honor. ver. 61.
(63) De Venat. p 973 A, and 974 C.
(64) Hipp. tom. 1. p. 371 C, 3 de Repub. tom. 2. p. 391 B.
(65) Biblioth. lib. 3.
(66) Hiſt. Natur. lib. 25. cap. 5.
(67) Sympoſ. lib. 4. c. 1. p. 660. F; & de Muſic. p. 1146, A.
(68) In Lacon. p. 197.
(69) Stromatωn. lib. 1. p. 306 B.
(70) In Heroic. p. 682, A, and 705, A.
(71) Progymn. p. 71, A; p. 97, C; p. 129, A; p. 142, C; p. 143, A; & Declamat. 4. p. 259, D.
(72) Orat. 20. p. 324.
(73) Euſtath. in Homer. p. 11. 34 and 840; Scholiaſt. Homeri in Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 50, and lib. 16. ver. 14 and 36.
(74) Here follow the principal; Scholiaſt. Homeri in Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 168 and 448. Dictys, lib. 2. Xenoph. Conv. p. 897 A. Plato lib. 2. de Repub. tom. 2. p. 390, E. Cicero de Orat. lib. 3. cap. 15. Strabo, lib. 9. p. 297. Quintil. lib. 2. cap. 3. Statius, Silva 3. lib. 5. ver. 191. Plutarch. tom. 2. p. 4, 26 and 72. Lucian. Dialog. Mort. Philoſt. Lemn. p. 136. Libanius Progym. p. 99.
(75) Statii lib. 5. Silva 3. ver. 191.

(76) Idem, lib. 2. Silva 1. ver. 88.

(77) In Conviv.
(78) In Dial. Achil. & Aut.

(79) Statius, lib. 2. Silv. 1. ver. 88; and lib. 3. Silv. 2. ver. 96.

(80) Meurſius and Canterus underſtand by the word χειροτροφος, which Lycophron gives to Phœnix, that the latter was Achilles's foſter-father.

XI. Homer cenſured with regard to the diſcourſe of Phœnix.

(81) Under the article HORACE, but it is a miſtake.
* Properly to the principal action.
(82) Horat. de Art Poët. ver. 148.

(83) Ovid. Met. lib. 13. ver. 179.

Deidamia the King's daughter, that she had let him get her with child [E]. This child was Neoptolemus or Pyrrhus as we shall shew in its place. Achilles was engaged in a numberless multitude of glorious combats during the long siege of Troy, and before the Greeks were encamped before the city. The mighty quarrel which broke out between Agamemnon and our hero, about their Wenches (for Agamemnon having restored Chryseis who was his, carried off Briseis, Achilles's darling (g), made the latter keep in his tent, and resolve not to concern himself in any manner with the war; all endeavours possible were used to make Achilles change his resolution; but he was inexorable, till news was brought him that Hector had killed his dear friend Patroclus, and stript him of the armour which he had lent that hero (b). Vulcan, at the request of Thetis, made a new suit of armour for her son (i) [F]. The death of Patroclus was soon revenged brought; but then it cannot be said that he got a merchant to do this. Some moderns relate, that Ulysses himself did it in the disguise of a merchant (84). I won't presume to say this is a chimæra of their own; but 'tis certain they have no good authority for it. Langius asserts, that Lycomedes employed the strongest entreaties and tears to prevent Achilles from following Ulysses (85); and censures Cicero for mistaking the son for the father in the following passage: Nec enim — Trojam Neoptolemus capere potuisset, si Lycomedem, apud quem erat educatus, multis cum lachrymis iter suum impedientem audire voluisset. i. e. "Nor could — Neoptolemus have taken Troy, "could Lycomedes, at whose court he was educated, "have prevailed upon him by his tears." But Langius, and not Cicero, is mistaken. See the remark [A] of the article PYRRHUS son of Achilles.

(g) Homer. Iliad, lib. 1. ver. 323. & seq.

(b) Ibid. lib. 16. ver. 818.

(i) Ibid. lib. 18. ver. 462. seq.

(84) Textor, Officin. lib. 2. cap. 32; Nat. Comes, Mythol. lib. 6. cap. 1. Vigenere on Philostratus, in the summary of Achilles's food; Pomey, in Pantheo Mythico, &c.

(85) Cicero de Amicit. cap. 20.

• [The passage of Langius which Mr. Bayle refers to is as follows; Quod de Neoptolemo Lælius ait, omnes de Achille narrant. Itaque vel errat per memoriam Cicero: vel, quod potius credo de industria Lælio, ut illa ætate, Græcanicarum fabularum ignorationem concedit. Mr. Bayle observes that Langius is here mistaken, and not Cicero; and refers us to the article PYRRHUS, Remark [A], where he tells us again that Langius is mistaken. However, such an omission as this is very excusable in a great work. What Mr. Bayle has neglected, I will endeavour to do for him. What Lælius says of Neoptolemus, is what all others relate of Achilles: These words of Langius are somewhat ambiguous. Lælius says three things of Neoptolemus: 1. That he took Troy. 2. That he was educated by Lycomedes. 3. That Lycomedes intreated him with many tears not to leave him and go to the siege of Troy. But none of these things can be said of Achilles. For, 1. It is well known, that no one ever said that Achilles took Troy. 2. Nor was it ever said that he was educated by Lycomedes, or in his court. He was educated by Chiron or Phœnix. He was indeed afterwards concealed for some time, under the disguise of a woman, in the court of Lycomedes, where he learned, perhaps, to spin and sew with the girls; nor did he stay there long: so that he could not in propriety of speech be said, apud Lycomedem educatus. 3. That Lycomedes was so importunate with Achilles, and endeavoured to keep him from going to Troy, is another piece of unknown history. Statius speaks of Deidamia's tears upon that occasion †. I take it to be very probable, that Cicero had in view some Latin Tragedy, wherein Lycomedes was introduced endeavouring by tears and persuasions to detain Pyrrhus. Such a scene was natural, in character, and probable. Lycomedes was an old man; his son-in-law Achilles had been killed at the siege of Troy; his grandson Pyrrhus, who had been bred up with him, was going to Troy; Lycomedes had no son; his affections must be supposed to have been fixed on Pyrrhus. How then could he be willing to let him go upon so dangerous an expedition? 'Tis possible that such a Tragedy was written by Ennius, and called Neoptolemus. Cicero De Orat. II. 37. — ut Neoptolemus apud Ennium. And so again, Tusc. Disp. II. 1. A. Gellius V. 15. Ennianum Neptolemum probamus.] CRIT. REM.

• Communicated by the learned author of the Miscellaneous Observations.

† Achill. II. 255.

[E] She had let him get her with child.] Achilles was then so young that we have very few examples of a generative faculty, being so forward and ripe as his was. And yet, virtuous principles had been instilled into him before he was engaged in this amour; and the dissoluteness which Montagne complains of in the 25th chapter, book 1st of his Essays, did not prevail on this occasion. We are taught to live, says he, when we are past living. A hundred Students get the pox, before they come to Aristotle upon temperance. But had we a mind to moralize on the Poetical History, we should tell Montagne, that this adventure of Achilles shews, that nature will prevail over education.

I shall observe by the way, that the fictions of the ancients would not appear in so ridiculous a light, had they taken care not to contradict one another so much; but one would think they consider'd their fabulous history as a country, where every man might act as he pleas'd, independent on every body else. Apollodorus relates, that Achilles was but nine years old when he was carried to the island of Scyros; and that the Trojan expedition was spoken of at that time (86). Statius declares, that the military preparations of the Greeks had continued during a year, when Ulysses was sent to the island of Scyros, in order to inveigle Achilles from thence. Before Ulysses was arrived there, Achilles had got a son (87); judge therefore whether nature had not indulged him manhood very early, and if it was long before he exerted it upon fair Deidamia. Statius did not dare to follow the calculation of Apollonius, but supposes that Achilles was twelve years old, at least, before he was taken out of Chiron's cave (88). I can't imagine why Barthius asserts, that according to Statius's calculation, Achilles's son must have been upwards of a year old, when Ulysses arriv'd on his embassy (89); for had our young Hero enjoyed the fair one the very first day, yet his son could have been but three months old, at most, when Ulysses came on shore there. Some authors tell us, that Achilles engaged in wanton dalliance with his mistress after her delivery; and had another son by her (90). But since he was born before the expedition of the Argonauts (91), between which and the Trojan expedition, chronologers tell us there was an interval of thirty years at least (92). Judge, whether the ancient Poets had well settled their chronology.

(86) Ὡς ἠγόρευε γυμνάς. Barthius cites these words, p. 1579, and in the 1685th of Tome 3d of his Commentary on Statbius; and yet he tells us, pag. 1584. that Apollodorus does not declare Achilles's age.

(87) Stat. Achill. lib. 2. ver. 234.

(88) Ibid. ver. 396.

(89) Barth. in Statium, tom. 3. p. 1684, 1736.

(90) See Eustathius in Iliad. 11. and Ptol. Hephæst. apud Photium.

(91) Apollon. Argon. lib. 1. ver. 558. Valer. Flaccus, Argon. lib. 1. ver. 256.

(92) See Calvisius on the year of the world 2727 and 2767; and father Labbe's Chronol. Franc. tom. 1. p. 127.

[F] Vulcan . . . made a new suit of armour for her son.] No one ought to censure Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hofman, &c. for telling us that Thetis got Vulcan to make a suit of impenetrable armour for her son, against he went to the siege of Troy. For, altho' she had before rendred his body invulnerable, by dipping it in the river Styx, yet this was not thought sufficient; few precautions appearing superfluous to maternal tenderness. Malherbe intended to express this double precaution of Thetis in these verses:

Bien que sa mere eût à ses armes
Ajouté la force des charmes (93).

(95) Malherbe, book 3. p. 75.

Englished,

"Tho' his mother, to his armour,
"Had join'd the mighty force of charms.

However, he has not exprest them; for by these verses one would conclude, that Thetis had given him a suit of fairy armour, rather than imagine, that she not only enchanted his body, but that his armour was impenetrable. Menage justly censures this equivocal expression, but at the same time acknowledges that Thetis employed the double expedient, which in the main is not improbable (94). Besides, a Dictionary-writer is not to suppress a circumstance, upon pretence that it was needless:

(94) Menage's Observations on Malherbe, p. 372.

revenged [G]; Achilles fought with Hector (k), and having killed him, he fastened the corps to his chariot, and dragg'd it round the walls of Troy [H]. King Priam went in person, and desired Achilles to deliver him the corps of his son, which was restored to him, upon paying a large ransom (l). Authors are very much divided on the manner of Achilles's death; some relate that he was slain by Apollo (m), or that this (k) Homer. Iliad. lib. 22. ver. 312.

(l) Ibid. lib. 24. ver. 555.
(m) Quint. Calaber. lib. 3. ver. 62. Euripid. in Philoctet.

'Tis enough for him if it occurs in books, he being at liberty to arm us with his prudent reflexions upon occasion. Now 'tis certain that an ancient author call'd Philarchus or Phylarchus, had written, that Thetis finding it impossible for her to prevent Achilles from going to the siege of Troy, went to Vulcan, and entreated him to make a suit of armour that should be proof against human force (95). Vulcan forg'd the suit of armour, but protested that Thetis should not have it, unless she would indulge him the most precious favour she cou'd grant. Thetis would not comply, but offered him any other service in her power; but finding the God would accept of personal service only, she promis'd to deliver up herself to his embraces, provided the armour would fit Achilles; and for that purpose said that it might be tried on her, her son and she being of a like stature. Vulcan approving the bargain, gave the suit of armour to Thetis, who put it on, and immediately run away; when the limping God knowing he could not overtake her, flung his hammer after her, and wounded her in the heel.

(95) Apud Natal. Comitem, Mythol lib. 9. cap. 12. Tzetzes upon Lycophron, p. 36. has something of this. What I have quoted (which is not taken notice of by Natal. Comes) is found in the Scholiast of Pindar in Nem. Ode 4.

It may then have been asserted in general, that Thetis procured her son a suit of impenetrable armour for his first campaign. But since Homer is chiefly to be consulted upon this article, it should not have been forgot, that after the death of Patroclus, whom Hector stript of Achilles's armour, Thetis prevailed with Vulcan to forge him another suit. This is one of the most beautiful episodes in the Iliad; and the copy which Virgil took of it, forms one of the finest passages of the Æneid; it deserves therefore to be touch'd upon. Observe that according to Servius, the armour which Patroclus wore when he was kill'd, had been forged by Vulcan for Peleus (96).

(96) Servius in Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 483.

[G] The death of Patroclus was soon reveng'd.] Moreri is in the right to say, that Achilles soon unsheathed his sword, which the loss of Briseis had made him put up. And indeed, since the whole Iliad takes up but a year (97), according to Father Mambrun, in his Treatise on Epic Poetry; but a few months must have past between Achilles's withdrawing from the army, to his return to it after the death of Patroclus: consequently Malherbe is guilty of a strange oversight, in declaring as certain fact, that Achilles lay nine years before the city of Troy, without fighting.

(97) Menage's Observations on Malherbe, pag. 441, is of opinion that it does not include near so much time.

Achille, à qui la Grece a donné cette marque,
D'avoir eu le courage aussi haut que les cieux,
Fut en la même peine, & ne pût faire mieux,
Que soupirer neuf ans dans le fonds d'une barque (98).

Englished,

" Renown'd Achilles, whom the Greeks declar'd
" In valour high, as is the starry way;
" Puzzled as much, nine years as hardly far'd,
" And deeply-sighing in a cabbin lay.

(98) Malherbe's Poetical Works, book 5. p. 125.

Sarazin, who probably was misled by this passage in Malherbe, whom he attempted to imitate, has said in a very beautiful Ode,

Achille, beau comme le jour,
Et vaillant comme son épée,
Pleura neuf ans pour son amour.
Comme un enfant pour sa poupée.

Englished.

" Achilles, beautiful as light;
" Brave as the sword that grac'd his thigh;
" Bewail'd, nine years, his soul's delight,
" Just as a child for doll wou'd cry.

But Menage corrected this error (99), in the edition he procured of Sarazin's works, and inserted nine months instead of nine years. By the way, this comparison of Achilles to a child who is sobbing and crying for its doll, has its foundation in the Iliad, (99) Menage's Observations on Malherbe, pag. 441.

where Achilles, after his concubine Briseis was taken from him, runs, with eyes brimful of tears, to complain to his mother, who comforts him just as tho' he had been a baby.

Χειρὶ τέ μιν κατέρεξεν, ἔπος τ' ἔφατ' ἐκ τ' ὀνόμαζε,
Τέκνον, τὶ κλαίεις; τὶ δέ σε φρένας ἵκετο πένθος;
Ἐξαύδα, μὴ, κεῦθε νόῳ ἵνα εἰδόμεν ἄμφω (100).

(100) Homer. Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 361.

" She seiz'd his hand, ——
" And thus the sorrow of his soul explores.
" Why grieves my son? Thy anguish let me share,
" Reveal the cause and trust a parent's care.
Pope.

In those ages, such plain and unaffected strokes, suited the majesty of the Epic-poem, and therefore we shall not animadvert upon them; let us allow Homer to have had a very fine genius, and that his Muse was fruitful and eloquent, but let us observe at the same time,

—— —— Sed ille,
Si foret in nostrum fato dilatus in ævum, &c. (101).

(101) Horat. Satyr 10. lib. 1. ver. 68.

" But did he live in this corrector age, &c.

[H] Dragg'd him round the walls of Troy.] Virgil was, perhaps, the first who takes notice that Hector's body was dragged thrice round the walls of Troy.

Ter circum Iliacos raptaverat Hectora muros (102).

(102) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 483.

" Thrice round the Trojan walls Achilles drew
" The corps of Hector. Dryden.

Homer took notice of three tours, only with regard to Patroclus's tomb; and it is not improbable, that Virgil changed the three rounds which Homer (103) expressly mentions to have been made about the sepulchre into three rounds about the walls; that Virgil, I say, changed these after this manner, either out of forgetfulness, or to give the greater beauty to his verse. Very few authors have followed Virgil in this particular: nor do the writers who lived after Virgil, mention the three rounds any more than those who were prior to him. Sophocles (104), Euripides (105), Ovid (106), Seneca (107), Statius (108), Dictys Cretensis (109), Plato (110), Cicero (111), Hyginus (112), Philostratus (113), Libanius (114), Servius (115), Tzetzes (116), Eustathius (117), all these mention Hector's having been dragg'd round the walls, but don't tell us how many times. To the best of my remembrance, none but the author of the little Iliad in Latin verse, mentions expressly three turns about the walls, and as many round the tomb. This author was called Pindarus Thebanus, and is cited by the old Scholiast upon Statius; a circumstance Vossius did not know (118). Barthius mentioned him often in his Adversaria and elsewhere (119). I am not ignorant that Ausonius, in the summary of the 22d book of the Iliad, relates that Hector was dragg'd thrice round the walls of Troy; but then he has been censured for it; which made one of his commentators think, that Ausonius did not write all the summaries which pass under his name (120). To conclude; the dragging of Hector's body, the opprobrious words with which Achilles branded him in his dying moments; the liberty he allowed every one, to insult and strike his dead body; his venal soul, which at last was prevailed upon by rich presents, to restore the body to his father Priam; all these circumstances are so repugnant, not only to heroic virtue, but even to the most common generosity; that we must conclude, either that Homer had no idea of heroism, or that he designed to draw the character of a brutal wretch. He represents Achilles, wishing himself brute enough, to devour Hector's raw flesh.

(103) Homer. Iliad. lib. 23. ver. 13; and 24. ver. 16.
(104) In Ajace, ver. 1045.
(105) In Andromed. ver. 108, 399.
(106) Metam. lib. 12. ver. 501. Amor. lib. 2. Eleg. 1. ver. 32. and in Ibin, ver. 333.
(107) In Troad. Act. 3. ver. 413; and in Agam. Act. 3. ver. 447.
(108) Achilleid. lib. 1. ver. 6.
(109) Lib. 3.
(110) De Repub. lib. 3. tom. 2. p. 391. B.
(111) Tuscul. 1.
(112) Cap. 106.
(113) In Heroic. p. 697.
(114) Progymn. p. 100, D.
(115) In Virgil. Ecl. 9. ver. 6.
(116) Pag. 75.
(117) In Homeri Iliad. χ. ver. 401.
(118) Vossius, Histor. Lat. pag. 819.
(119) Vide his Commentary on Statius, tom. 1. p. 340. and tom. 3. p. 393, 1609.
(120) See the Diatribes of Mariang. Accursius on Ausonius.

this God assisted Paris in killing him (n), by directing the arrow to the vulnerable part of him; others again say, that Paris murthered him treacherously, in a temple whither Achilles was come, in order to treat about his marriage with Philoxena daughter of Priam (o). The Greeks solemniz'd his funeral with great magnificence, some particulars of which Moreri has related in his Dictionary, but very inaccurately [I], not to say worse. He was buried on the Promontory of Sigæum [K]; and after Troy was taken, the Greeks sacrificed Philoxena on his tomb as his ghost had requested. This warrior, the most fiery that ever drew sword, and so brave, that his name was used to denote supreme valour [L]; was

(n) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 57. Ovid. Metam. lib. 12. ver. 580. seq.

(o) Dictys Cretens. lib. 4. Dares Phryg. Hygin. cap. 110. Servius in Æneid. 6. ver. 57.

Αἲ γάρ πως αὐτόν με μένος καὶ θυμὸς ἀνίπ
Ὧ μ' ἀποδαμνόμενον κρέα ἐδμεναι (121).

(121) Iliad χ. ver. 346.

" Cou'd I my self the bloody banquet join!
" No! — to the dogs thy carcase I resign. Pope.

Homer did not even consider, that his Hero would have appeared in a much more honourable light, had his enemy been represented less weak and mean-spirited.

[I] His funeral . . . some particulars of which Moreri has related in his Dictionary, but very inaccurately.] This writer says, that the Gods wept the death of Achilles during seventeen days; but he ought not to have quoted Homer, without citing the place where this circumstance is mentioned. It cannot be in the Iliad, the author having so well observed that law, which will not allow the Hero of an Epic Poem to be buried in the Poem it self. Virgil has also observed this law. He therefore should have said, that Homer mentions the interment of Achilles in the 24th book of the Odyssey, where this episode is introduced, upon occasion of Penelope's wooers whom Ulysses killed. In the Amsterdam edition of Moreri, the continuators of Homer are wrongly substituted for Homer himself. But this is not all: they should not have said the Gods in general, without specifying what Homer observes, viz. that Thetis accompanied by the sea-goddesses, came to the camp of the Greeks, in order to assist with them at the obsequies of her son; and that the nine Muses also bore a part in the solemnity by singing in mournful strains. Pindar might have been cited for this last circumstance.

Τὸν μὲν οὔτε θανὼν' ἀοιδαὶ ἐλίπον'. ἀλλά οἱ
παρά τε πυρὰν, τάφον θ' Ἑλικάνιαι παρθένοι ἔσαν, ἐπὶ θρῆνοις πε-λώφαμον ἔχευαν, ἔδο-ξεν ἄρα δ' ἀθανάτοις ἐσλόν γε φῶτα καὶ φθίμεν' ὑ-
μνοις Θιᾶν διδόμεν (122).

(122) Pindar, Isthm. Od. 8. p. 753.

Imitated,

" Tho' death had clos'd the Hero's † eyes,
" Prais'd by the Muse his virtues rise;
" For round his pile, his silent tomb,
" The Heliconian Virgins come:
" With down-cast eyes, they weep, they groan,
" And pour forth memorable moan,—
" To brave Achilles snatch'd from earth
" The Gods thus gave a second birth,
" Bid the Pierians sound his fame,
" And mid' the stars inscribe his name.

† Achilles.

What is added in the Dictionary, on the authority of Homer also, viz. that at the expiration of these seventeen days, The Thessalian youth, crown'd with garlands of amaranths, performed the obsequies of Achilles, and wept over him; should naturally be found in that part of the Iliad, where the seventeen days lamentation is mentioned, and yet we don't meet with any thing like it. I therefore am very much afraid, that Moreri made use, on this occasion, of some book, that gave a wrong account of the ceremony related by Philostratus in the picture of Neoptolemus: viz. That the Oracle of Dodona having commanded the Greeks, to celebrate the anniversary of Achilles every year; the Thessalians first appointed the wearing crowns of amaranth.

[K] He was buried on the promontory of Sigæum.] Most Dictionaries take notice of this circumstance. Lloyd rejecting the other citations of Pliny, which he had found very incorrect in Charles Stephens, preserves that of chap. 12th, book 4th, which however he should not have done: for Pliny does not speak there of the tomb which was erected in Sigæum, but of that which was said to be in an island of Pontus Euxinus. 'Tis in chapter 30th of book 5th, that he tells us, a city called Achilleon had stood, near the sepulchre of Achilles, on the coast of Sigæum. 'Tis surprizing that after this passage was thus corrected, Isaac Vossius should take it into his head to censure Pliny, as having placed the tomb of Achilles on the shore of Rhoeteum, and the sepulchre of Ajax on that of Sigæum (123): for Pliny declares the very contrary. Solinus, thro' an error he too often is guilty of, has convey'd this sepulchre to another neighbouring promontory, viz. that of Rhoeteum, where the tomb of Ajax stood (124). This mistake often occurs in Alciat's Emblems:

(123) Vossius in Melamp. p. 98.

(124) Solini Polyhistor. cap. 40.

Æacidæ tumulum Rhoeteo in littore cernis (25).

(125) Alciati Emblemata 135.

" Achilles' tomb is seen on Rhoeteum's shore.

His commentators confess that he is mistaken, except Pignorius, who maintains the contrary. 'Tis manifest however from the unanimous testimony of authors, that the sepulchre of Achilles stood on the shore of Sigæum. We have already observed, that people used to resort thither every year, in order to offer up sacrifices in his honour; and a tradition was current, that his shade dress'd in armour, used to appear here, standing in a threatning posture; notwithstanding which, Apollodorus attempted to speak to it (126). To the best of my remembrance, it is related that miracles were wrought at this tomb. See the foregoing article.

(126) Philostrat. in Vitâ Apollon. lib. 4. cap. 3 and 4.

[L] His name was used to denote supreme valour.] Moreri pretends that Aulus Gellius (but without citing either the book or the chapter) asserts, that it was a common phrase to denote a brave soldier, by saying he was an Achilles; but Aulus Gellius does not relate any thing like it; all he observes is, (chap. xi. book 2.) that * Sicinius Dentatus was called the Roman Achilles, from his having performed several surprizing actions in the field. Moreri relates some circumstances of it, taken from this part of Aulus Gellius, but does not tell us whence they were borrowed; so that he does not quote Aulus Gellius when he should, but when he should not; not, when he borrows from him, but when he ascribes words to him which he never wrote. Had he cited Servius (127), he would have found better proofs. Now, the name of Achilles was bestowed, not only on those who were famous for martial vigour, but on such as distinguished themselves in the feats of Venus, as is manifest from the Debauchee in Petronius, who finding that part of him dead, which shall be nameless, crys out, Funerata est illa pars corporis quâ quondam Achilles eram. i. e. " The part of me, by " which I once was Achilles, is buried." He, probably, was more sensibly touched at this loss, than Milo was when the vigour of his arm was gone; and Cicero would have thought him more worthy of censure than that Athletic Champion, for very substantial reasons. Quæ vox potest esse contemptior quàm Milonis Crotoniatæ, qui cum jam senex esset, athletasque se in curriculo exercentes videret, adspexisse lacertos suos dicitur, illachrymansque dixisse; at hi quidem jam mortui sunt? Non verò tam isti quàm tu ipse nugator, neque enim ex te unquam es nobilitatus, sed ex lateribus & lacertis tuis (128). i. e. " What words ought " sooner to raise our indignation than those of Milo " of Crotona, who, in his old age, seeing the Ath- " letic Champions exercising themselves in the ring, " is said to have looked upon his arms, and to have " cried out with tears, but these are already dead! " These men are less triflers than you; for you ne- " ver was ennobled from your self, but from your " loins and your arms.

* So we read it in the last Amsterdam edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary printed in 1730; but it should be Siccius Dentatus.

(127) Servius in Virgilii Eclog. 3. ver. 79. and in Eclog. 4. ver. 34.

(128) Cicero de Senectute, cap. 9.

The

was a great lover of Muſick [M] and Poetry (p); and was looked upon as the handſomeſt

(p) See the remark [B] of the article ACHILLEA.

The Paris edition of Charles Stephens's Dictionary printed in 1620, reviſed and corrected by Francis Morel, Regius Profeſſor; and that of Geneva of 1662, corrected of a numberleſs multitude of faults, as the title declares, aſcribes to Aulus Gellius, who is duly quoted, the following particular, viz. That Captains greatly renowned for their bravery (not generous ſoldiers) were called Achilles; and that money was called Achilleon, becauſe it was inſuperable, and indiſſolvable. Tantæ fortitudinis, fuiſſe fertur (Achilles) ut teſte Gellio, lib. 2. cap. 2. inſigni fortitudine duces Achilles appellentur; & argentum vocetur Achilleum, quod ſit inſuperabile & inſolubile. The Latin text of Charles (129) Stephens may be underſtood theſe two ways; and I even own, that the author of this period, which is viſibly confuſed, and very inaccurate, might clear himſelf from the imputation, of having aſcribed to Aulus Gellius, the particulars relating to this pretended Achillean money. But neither Charles Stephens nor his correctors, nor Lloyd, nor Hofman, who have followed him cloſe, can plead any excuſe for miſtaking argentum for argumentum: For the epithet Achillea is made uſe of, to denote an indiſſoluble objection; and in the ſchools, the principal argument of a ſect is generally called its Achilles: which does not proceed ſo much from Achilles's being an invincible warrior, as from the puzzling difficulty which Zeno of Elea propoſed in oppoſition to the exiſtence of motion (130). He compared a tortoiſe to Achilles, to ſhow that a body which moves ſlowly got ever ſo little before a quick one, could never be outſtrip'd by it. Calepin, who otherwiſe cites Aulus Gellius very wrong, writes argumentum and not argentum; which plainly ſhows that the error is of ancient date, whence two branches, as it were, of Copiſts have ſprung. The one having in the midway loſt the word argumentum, probably by the miſtake of the printer, who had put argentum inſtead of it, occaſioned all their ſucceſſors to preſerve the latter word; the other branch have not degenerated in this reſpect; ſo that thoſe who have recourſe to them, as the correctors of Calepin have done, don't commit the miſtake which the other Branch have fallen into.

(129) Car. Stephan. Diction. Voc. Achilles.

(130) Ariſtol. lib. 6. Phyſic. cap. 9. & ibi Simplicius & Themiſtius. Diogen. Laert. lib. 9. in Zenone.

[M] Was a great lover of Muſick.] Moreri is very inaccurate on this head. He tells us, That Homer often ſhews that the ſound of the lyre had a wonderful power over Achilles's anger, and in calming that furious paſſion which had proved ſo troubleſome to the Trojans. He adds, that Athenæus had alſo taken notice of this circumſtance after Theopompus. However, it is certain that Homer tells us only this, viz. that the deputies of the army found Achilles, diverting himſelf with ſounding the actions of illuſtrious men on his lyre.

* Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 186.
(131) Idem, ib. ver. 189.

Τὸν δ' εὗρον φρένας τερπόμενον φόρμιγγι λιγείῃ *
Τῇ ὅγε θυμὸν ἔτερπεν ἄεισε δ' ἄρα κλέα ἀνδρῶν (131).

" Amus'd at eaſe, the God-like man they found,
" Pleas'd with the ſolemn Harp's harmonious ſound.
Pope.

" With this he ſooths his ſoul and ſings
" The mighty acts of Heroes.

Achilles, having been offended by Agamemnon, had at that time abandoned the common cauſe out of anger and ſpight, which is all Homer tells us of it. But he does not make any reflections on Achilles's being found entertaining himſelf with his lyre, when the deputies came to him. Athenæus indeed concludes from thence, that Homer would thereby denote, that the lyre of Achilles was of great advantage to him, as it aſſwaged the exceſſive violence of his anger (132). But it is falſe to ſay, that Athenæus makes this remark after Theopompus; and I am very much miſtaken, if Moreri was not miſled by a paſſage in Voſſius's treatiſe on Muſic. This learned man having quoted Athenæus for the obſervation abovementioned, ſays immediately after, that the Embaſſadors from the Getæ, who were commiſſioned to conclude a treaty of peace or a truce, with a people whoſe anger was to be ſoothed, came before them ſounding the lyre (133); and cites Athenæus for this purpoſe, who quotes this particular from the 46th book of Theopompus's Hiſtory. Hofman has almoſt committed the ſame error. But Philoſtratus had better have been referred to on this occaſion; for he obſerves that Chiron, finding that Achilles could not conquer his anger, inſtructed him for that reaſon in Muſic (134).

(132) Athæn. lib. 14. p. 624.

(133) Voſſius Muſice, p. 45. The paſſage o Athenæus is 627.

Some authors are of opinion, that Achilles did not ſing to his lyre, the mighty exploits of Heroes, but the pangs which love made him ſuffer.

(134) In Hero p. 705, C. V etiam Ælian Hiſt. Var. l 14. C. 23.

Talis cantata Briſeide venit Achilles
Acrior, & poſitis erupit in Hectora plectris (135).

(135) Statius, Silv. 4. lib. 4. ver. 35.

Engliſhed,

" Achilles thus grew fiercer, having ſung
" The bright Briſeis (charmer of his ſoul)
" Then flinging down his lyre, on Hector ruſh'd.

Ille Pelethroniam cecinit miſerabile carmen
Ad citharam, citharâ tenſior ipſe ſuâ (136).

(136) Priapeior. Carm. 69.

Engliſhed,

" He ſang ſad ſtrains to the Theſſalian lyre,
" His — more ſtretch'd than the reſponſive ſtrings.

But this I take to be mere calumny, which may be refuted by the anſwer that Alexander the Great made to the perſon, who offered him the lyre of Paris: I don't value it, ſays he; but I would very willingly ſee that of Achilles, on which he uſed to celebrate the acts of heroes of paſt ages. Plutarch who relates the thing thus in the life of that Prince, aſcribes (137) another anſwer to him elſewhere. It is this. I don't want the lyre of Paris, for I have that of Achilles, to the ſound of which he uſed to ſleep in ſinging the praiſe of Warriors: but the harmony of that of Paris, to which he ſung love-ſongs, was too ſoft and effeminate. This is not the only inſtance which ſhews that Plutarch could alter and apply the ſame circumſtance different ways. Certainly Alexander did not make both theſe anſwers; and in all likelihood the latter was invented by the hiſtorian. With regard to thoſe words, for I have that of Achilles, we may naturally ſuppoſe that Alexander would willingly have had it; but can any perſon believe that he was really poſſeſſed of it? Ælian relates this incident according to the firſt quotation from Plutarch (138). A commentator upon Ælian declares, that Achilles is often repreſented in Homer, celebrating the acts of illuſtrious commanders (139): but he is miſtaken, for Homer mentions this but once. However, as this error was committed by a man of much greater learning than Moreri, this would be ſome conſolation to the latter, were he now living. Kuhnius does not correct this miſtake (140). Statius, who in oppoſition to the expreſs words of Homer, ſuppoſes that Achilles in his retirement, ſung his amours and his Briſeis; declares in other places, that from his infancy, he had employed his muſical inſtruments in the cave of Chiron, to celebrate the mighty acts of ancient Heroes.

(137) Plutarch of the Fortune of Alexand. book 1. ch. 6.

(138) Æliani Hiſtor. Var. lib. 9. cap. 38.

(139) Scheff. in hunc locum Æliani.

(140) Kuhnius in Ælian. ibid.

——— Nec major in iſtis
Sudor, Apollineo quàm fila ſonantia plectro
Cum quaterem, priſcoſque virûm mirarer honores (141).

(841) Statius, Achill. lib. 2. ver. 442.

" Nor more I toil'd in theſe, than when I ſtruck
" (Strong with the bow) the loud-reſounding ſtrings
" And ſang th' immortal praiſe of ancient Heroes.

They were the combats of Hercules, of Pollux, and of Theſeus, which he ſung before his mother, when ſhe came to viſit him in the cave above mentioned; to which he added his father's celebrated nuptials:

——— Canit ille libens immania laudum
Semina, qui tumidæ ſuperarit juſſa novercæ
Amphitryoniades; crudum quo Bebryca cæſtu
Obruerit pollux: quanto circumdata nexu
Ruperit Ægides Minoi brachia tauri,
Maternos in fine thoros, ſuperiſque gravatum
Pelion (142).

(142) Idem, ib. lib. 1. ver. 188.

ſomeſt man of his age [N]. As Achilles's beauty won him the affection of the Fair, he on his part was a ſlave to their charms [O]; and it is even ſaid, that he was alſo fond of perſons of his own ſex [P]. We have taken notice in the foregoing article of his actions after death; and of a miracle he wrought, mentioned by Tertullian. In caſe the reader is deſirous of peruſing the moſt ample collection of Literature (q) relating to this Hero of heathen ſtory, I muſt refer him to a work entitled Homericus Achilles, written by the late Mr. Drelincourt.

(q) Printed at Leyden in 1693. See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, May 1693. p. 511.

Engliſh'd,

" Well pleas'd he chaunts the praiſe of glorious men.
" Fam'd Hercules, who at the ſtern command
" Of Juno, undertook his mighty labours.
" He ſings the Cœſtus with which Pollux ſlew
" Stout Bebryx; and how valiant Theſeus circling
" The dreadful Minotaur, broke all his ribs.
" Laſtly his mother's ſoft, connubial joys,
" And Pelion's tow'ring head with Gods oppreſt.

I will nevertheleſs own, that Philoſtratus makes him ſing, whilſt he was under the tuition of Chiron, ſeveral ſubjects which are infinitely more relative to love than to war; ſuch as Hyacinthus, Narciſſus, Adonis, Hilas &c. (143).

(143) Philoſtratus, in Heroic. p. 705. calls them, τὰς ἀχαιὰς ἥλικας, which Vigenere tranſlates, the antients who were in the ſame (age) with Achilles. This is a very equivocal expreſſion; and he had better employed the word ſiecle (Century) than that of age. And Philoſtratus undoubtedly meant that theſe were cotemporary with one another, but not with Achilles.

We ſhall conclude this remark with a word or two concerning the lyre itſelf of Achilles. According to ſome, Corybas ſon of Jaſus and Cybele, being in Phrygia with his uncle Dardanus, eſtabliſhed the worſhip of Cybele there; gave his name to the Corybantes, who were the Prieſts of that Goddeſs; and carried Mercury's lyre thither (144). It was kept in Lyrneſſus, whence Achilles carried it, when he took that city; however, Homer is not of that opinion, ſince he tells us, that our Hero's lyre was found in the city of Eetion, that is in Thebes of Phrygia, when the Greeks plundered it (145).

(144) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 6.

(145) Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 188.

[N] The handſomeſt man of his age.] Inſtead of this particular, of which here are ſuch authentic proofs, Moreri obſerves only, that Achilles, according to Philoſtratus was of a fine ſtature. Achilles boaſts his own beauty and ſtature in the 21ſt book of the Iliad, καλός τε μέγας τε. And Homer ſpeaking of Nireus, tells us that he was the handſomeſt among the Greeks, Achilles excepted;

Νιρεὺς, ὃς κάλλιστος ἀνὴρ ὑπὸ Ἴλιον ἦλθε,
Τῶν ἄλλων Δαναῶν, μετ' ἀμύμονα Πηλείωνα (146).

" Nireus, in faultleſs ſhape, and blooming grace,
" The loveliеſt youth of all the Grecian race
" Next to Achilles. Pope.

(146) Ibid. lib. 2. ver. 673.

See the Scholiaſt on ver. 131ſt, book 1ſt of Homer, where he tells us, that Achilles, the handſomeſt of all Heroes, had ſo effeminate a face, that he might very eaſily paſs for a girl, in the court of Lycomedes (147).

(147) Vide Plato's Banquet.

——— —— Plurimus illi
Invicta virtute decor fallitque tuentes
Ambiguus tenuique latens diſcrimine ſexus (148).
That is,

" Lovely he was, and had a dauntleſs ſoul:
" Ambiguous, he deceiv'd the curious eye,
" And hid ſo well his ſex he ſeem'd of both.

(148) Statii Achill. lib. 1. ver. 335. Dictys Cretenſis, lib. 1.

With regard to his ſtature, I ſhall not obſerve what Philoſtratus relates in the life of Apollonius, viz. that this Philoſopher having called up the ghoſt of Achilles, it firſt appeared to be five cubits high, and afterwards twelve, and was inexpreſſibly beautiful (149). Neither ſhall I ſay with Lycophron, that Achilles was nine cubits high, which is not what we call a fine ſtature. Such a ſtature is fit only for Quintus Calaber, who has magnified him to a giant (150); and this would not be the way to juſtify Moreri. The truth is, that the author he cites (151) declares, that Achilles was of a beautiful and advantagious ſtature, and that rays ſhot from his face; that * his noſe was neither Roman nor hooked, but ſuch as it was ever to continue. 'Tis thus Vigenere tranſlates, probably from the Latin verſion, but I ſhould rather chuſe to tranſlate it, Tel qu'il devoit etre, i. e. " Such as it ought to be," and give this ſignification to the verb μέλλω.

(149) Philoſtratus in the Life of Apollonius, book 4. ch. 5. Vigenere cites Book 3. and relates the ghoſt firſt appeared ſeven cubits in ſtature.

(150) Quint. Calaber, lib. 1. ver. 514; lib. 3. ver. 716, 722.

(151) Philoſtrat. in Heroic. p. 705. * The French is, Un nez, ni aquilin, ni crochu, mais tel qu'il devoit tous jours demeurer.

[O] He on his part was a ſlave to their charms.] The laſciviouſneſs of Achilles was a laſting, as well as forward fruit. The reader has heard how he got Deïdamia with child, at ten years of age; and his future exploits were worthy ſo early a ſetting out. It was not long before he played the ſame part with Iphigenia (152); and if Diana imagined that a virgin was offered up to her in the perſon of this daughter of Agamemnon, the Goddeſs was impoſed upon; for Achilles had before taken care, (let the worſt come to the worſt,) not to permit Iphigenia to leave the world, till ſhe had taſted the pleaſures of conception, and the pains of child-birth. Achilles ſaw Helen on the walls of Troy, when he fell ſo furiouſly in love with her, that he could not ſleep; upon which he ran to his mother, and beſought her to find out ſome expedient, that he might enjoy that celebrated beauty (153). A fine employment for a mother! Thetis however accepted of it, and invented a new kind of bawding, which was, to make her ſon fancy he had enjoyed Helen, but then it was in a dream; and yet this viſionary poſſeſſion ſoothed his pangs. It was to no purpoſe that they forced away Briſeis from him, he would not lie alone for all that. He had taken too much care to provide females for his bed, and had always ſupplies enough of that kind at home, in caſe of need. Diomeda ſupplied the place of Briſeis (154); and the inſtant he ſaw Polyxena, daughter of Priam, he wanted to marry her; but not being able to do this in his life time, he required that, after his death, ſhe ſhould be ſacrificed to him that he might enjoy her in the Elyſian fields (155). He had ſo juſtly deſerved to be called, in this world (156), ἱμερόεις, ἀσέλγης, ἀκρατὴς, ἐρωτικώτατος (157); i. e. " amorous, laſcivious, intemperate, exceedingly amorous," that it was ſuppoſed he would want women even in the other, for which reaſon authors have married him there to Medea and to Helen. He was accuſed of falling in love with Penthefilea the Amazon a little after he had kill'd her; and of ſatiating his brutal paſſion on her body juſt after ſhe expired (158). We ſhall take notice of this in the article THERSITES. See alſo the article TENES.

(152) Vide Tzetzem in Lycophron.

(153) Tzetzes, in Lycophron.

(154) Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 660.

(155) Seneca in Troad. ver. 945.

(156) Libanius, Progymn. p. 101. B, and p. 127. A, Declam. 4. pag. 256, B; and Orat. 9. p. 258, C.

(157) Plutarch. in Amator. pag. 761, D.

(158) Tzetzes in Lycophr. Libanius, Progymn. p. 101, C; and p. 153, A.

[P] That he alſo was fond of his own ſex.] According to ſome writers, Troilus ſon of Priam, was ſtifled in the arms of the luſtful Achilles, who would have forced him to his criminal embraces, but met with too great a reſiſtance (159). A very malicious turn has been given to the choice which Ajax adviſed Menelaus to make, viz. to ſend the beautiful Antilochus to Achilles, in order to acquaint him with the death of Patroclus. Philoſtratus, who hints plain enough at the ſtrict intimacy which might have been between our Hero and the choſen meſſenger, is miſtaken with regard to the perſon who appointed the latter (160); for it was not Menelaus as he ſays, that fixed upon Antilochus, but Ajax who propoſed him to Menelaus (161). But it is principally with Patroclus, that Achilles is ſaid to have indulged a criminal flame. Plato defends him on this head againſt Æſchylus (162), and Xenophon agrees with Plato in this particular (163). Sextus Empiricus treats this ſubject like a profeſſed ſceptic as he was (164); but Lucian and Philoſtratus (165), diſcharge their utmoſt venom on this occaſion. The former pretends that Achilles was a little too unguarded, in bewailing the death of his friend; and ſuffered truth to eſcape him in theſe words, μηδὲν τε τῶν σῶν ἐυσεβὴς ὁμιλία καλλίων (166), femorum & tuorum ſancta converſatio melior. What ſhall we ſay of theſe lines of Martial in Epigram 44th, book 11th?

(159) Servius in Æneid. Lycophr. ver. 307, & ibi Tzetzes.

(160) In Antil. p. 670, and Icon. p. 789, D.

(161) Homer. Iliad. lib. 16. ver. 628, 651, 653, 655.

(162) In Conviv. tom. 3. p. 180, A.

(163) In Conviv. pag. 898, A.

(164) Sext. Empir. Pyrrh. Hyp. 3. p. 152, A.

(165) Philoſtrat. in Epiſt. p. 903. A.

(166) Lucian. in Amorib. p. 1071. tom. 1. edit. Salmurienſis.

Bryſeis multum quamvis averſa jaceret
Eacidæ propior levis amicus erat.

" The Fair neglected lay (how hard her caſe!)
" Whilſt a young, ſmooth-fac'd He, ſupply'd her " place.

☞ ACHILLES TATIUS [A] was of Alexandria in Egypt, and author of a famous Romance. The time when he lived is very uncertain [B]. He appears to have been a Pagan when he wrote his Romance, from ſeveral paſſages of it, and particularly that where he indulges himſelf in a very looſe digreſſion concerning the love of boys [C]. But at laſt he became a Chriſtian, as we are informed by Suidas, and was even raiſed to a Biſhoprick. We ſhall give the reader the judgment of Photius, and of an ingenious modern author upon his Romance [D]; and ſome remarks upon the title and editions of it [E]. He wrote ſeveral other works [F].

[A] Achilles Tatius.] Perhaps he was the ſon or freedman of one Tatius, as Voſſius ſuppoſes (1).

(1) De Hiſt. Latin. l. 3. p. 151. edit. Amſt. 1690. in fol.

[B] The time when he lived is very uncertain.] Voſſius places him among the writers of a doubtful age. The learned Mr. Huet (2) tells us that Photius places Heliodorus after Jamblichus, and before Damaſcius, who lived in the time of the Emperor Juſtinian, and that according to this account, Achilles Tatius muſt have preceded; though he owns, that he can find no certain account to juſtify his opinion.

(2) Original of Romances.

[C] And particularly that, where he indulges himſelf in a very looſe digreſſion concerning the love of boys.] This paſſage has been retrenched in the Engliſh tranſlation of that Romance, which was publiſhed at London in 24° in 1720, and intitled, The Amours of Clitophon and Leucippe illuſtrated in ſix Novels. 1. Force of Love deſcribed. 2. The diſappointed Bride. 3. The diſtreſs'd Lovers. 4. Virtue its own Reward. 5. The laſcivious Widow. 6. The happy Conſummation.

[D] We ſhall give the reader the judgment of Photius, and of an ingenious modern author upon his Romance.] The former tells us, that the diction and compoſition of it is excellent, and the periods clear and flowing. But the ſentiments are extremely obſcene and groſs, ſo that the reading of this romance is very dangerous. But if we except the names of perſons, whoſe adventures are related, and the ſhocking obſcenity that runs through it, it has a great affinity with Heliodorus's Æthiopics with reſpect to the conduct of the ſtory (3). He acquaints us likewiſe in another place (4), that Jamblichus's Romance, which was intitled the Babylonicks, Βαβυλωνικὰ (5), was written with a little more decency than Achilles Tatius's, though with much leſs than that of Heliodorus. For theſe three writers had very near the ſame deſign in view in the compoſition of their Love-Tales. But Achilles Tatius's ſtyle and manner of writing are very ſoft and flowing, though too luſcious.

(3) Photii Biblioth. Cod. 87. pag 206. edit Rhotomag. 1653.

(4) Ibid. Cod. 94. p. 235.

(5) See Suidas.

The modern author is no leſs than the celebrated Mr. Huet Biſhop of Avranches, who has obliged the polite world with a curious diſcourſe concerning the original of Romances. He tells us, that Achilles Tatius is not to be compared to Heliodorus, either for the regularity of his manners, the variety of events, or the artifice of unravelling his plots. His ſtyle indeed is preferable to that of Heliodorus, becauſe it is more ſimple and natural, whereas the other's is more forced and affected. Some ſay, that he was a Chriſtian, and a Biſhop. It is ſtrange that the obſcenity of his book ſhould be ſo eaſily forgot; and more ſo, that the Emperor Leo ſirnamed the Philoſopher ſhould commend the modeſty of it in an epigram, which is yet extant; and not only permit but recommend the reading of it with the cloſeſt application to all thoſe who profeſs the love of chaſtity. Thus far Mr. Huet. But Voſſius is in doubt, whether to aſcribe this epigram to Photius the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, or to the Emperor Leo (6).

(6) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

[E] . . . and ſome remarks upon the title and editions of it.] Suidas tells us, that he wrote Ἐρωτικὰ, i. e. Love-Tales; and amongſt them τὰ κατὰ Λευκίππην καὶ Κλειτοφῶντα, i. e. The ſtory of Leucippe and Clitophon. The title of that work is, περὶ Λευκίππης καὶ Κλειτοφῶντα λόγος, i. e. The Hiſtory of Leucippe and Clitophon. This work was tranſlated into Latin by Annibal Cruccius of Milan, but very erroneouſly, as appeared when the Greek was publiſhed by Commeline at Heidelberg from a MS. in the Palatine Library. The learned Salmaſius publiſhed a more correct edition of it at Leyden in 1640, with notes and emendations in 12°.

[F] He wrote ſeveral other works.] As particularly a Miſcellaneous Hiſtory, Ἱστορίαι σύμμικτοι, in which he gives an account of a great many illuſtrious men; and likewiſe a work upon Etymology, and a book concerning the Sphere (7). There is a fragment of this laſt work ſtill extant, and publiſhed with Hipparchus Bythynus by Petrus Victorius from the Medicean Library at Florence. The title of this fragment ſhews that it was part of his book of the Sphere, and is as follows: Ἐκ τῶν Ἀχιλλέως πρὸς εἰσαγωγὴν εἰς τοῦ Ἀράτου φαινόμενα, i. e. Extracts from Achilles by way of introduction to the Phænomena of Aratus.

(7) Suidas.

☞ ACHILLINI [A ALEXANDER] born at Bologna, of an ancient and noble family [B], ſon of Claudius Achillini, was Doctor of Philoſophy and Phyſic, and one of the College of the ſaid Faculties in that Univerſity. He was the moſt celebrated Philoſopher in the fifteenth and ſixteenth Centuries [C], a ſtedfaſt follower, and accurate interpreter

[A] Achillini.] In Latin Achillinus, by the Italians is commonly called Achillini; but (1) Leandro Alberti (2), Hippolito Orio, and Pompeio Vizani call him Achillino, which variety of terminations of the ſame name is very familiar to the Italians in the names of families. I cannot but take notice, that Alberti's deſcription of Italy printed at Bologna 1550, in fol. which is the firſt, and the moſt curious edition, inſtead of Achillini, or Achillino has by a groſs fault of the Printer Achlino; but the edition of Venice in 4to by Lorenzo degli Avanzi 1567, has Achilino with a ſingle l; and ſo he is alſo called by Vizani (3). I find him alſo called by the name of de Achillinis, in the title of a book of Bartholomæus Cocles, viz. Chiromantiæ ac phyſionomiæ Anaſtaſis cum approbatione magiſtri Alexandri de Achillinis.

(1) Deſcript. of Italy.

(2) In his tranſlation of the Eleg. of Jovius.

(3) Hiſt. of Bologna. l. 10. p. 511.

[B] Of an ancient and noble family.] I ſay this upon the authority of John Vittorio Roſſi, known by the name of Janus Nicius Erythræus (4), who in the life of Claudio Achillini, ſpeaking of the gifts of nature beſtowed upon him, among others he mentions antiquam generis nobilitatem, utpote in Achillina familia nato; i. e. "the ancient Nobility of the "family, as being born in that of the Achillini."

(4) Pinacoth. 1. p. 100.

[C] The moſt celebrated Philoſopher in the 15th and 16th Centuries.] Philip Thomaſinus (5) calls him, Primi nominis Philoſophus, i. e. a Philoſopher of the firſt rank. Simler (6), Philoſophus eminentiſſimus, i. e. a moſt eminent Philoſopher. Jo. Ant. Bumaldus, whoſe true name is Ovidius Montalbanus, in his Bibliotheca Bononienſis ſays of our Achillini, that he got the name of the great Philoſopher, Magni Philoſophi cognomentum adeptus; and that all the writers of the laſt age give him, without all diſpute, the pre-eminence among the Philoſophers; omneſque anteacti ſæculi ſcriptores eidem palmam Philoſophorum facile concedentes. And Caſius quoted by the ſaid Montalbanus, calls him another Ariſtotle, un altro Ariſtotele. Leandro Alberti gives him the ſame epithet, that Alexander King of Macedon is known by quel magno Aleſſandro Achilino, nobil Filoſofo, i. e. that great Alexander Achilino, a noble Philoſopher. By Orlandi (7) he is ſaid to have been Filoſofo famoſo, acerrimo Cattedratico, & acutiſſimo Argomentatore, i. e. "a famous Philoſopher, a moſt quick Modera-"tor, and a moſt acute Diſputant." Roſſi gives him this elogium; Vidit paulo hac noſtra ſuperior ætas Alexandrum Achillinum docentem Patavii philoſophiam, & admiruta eſt hominis ingenium, eruditionem, doctrinam. i. e. "The age juſt before ours ſaw A-interpreter of Averroes upon Ariſtotle's Philoſophy [D]: but what he was admired for as a prodigy, was the accuteneſs and ſtrength of his arguing in private and public diſputations [E]. He made ſuch a quick progreſs in his ſtudies, that he was very early promoted to a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity [F], in the diſcharge of " lexander Achillini, teaching philoſophy at Padua, " and admired the wit, erudition and learning of " that man." And Comnenus (8), Vir doctiſſimus, & inſignis utroque ſæculo 15mo & 16mo Philoſophus. i. e. " A moſt learned man, and a famous Philoſopher in " the 15th and 16th Century.

(5) Illuſt. Vir. Vit. p. 114. in the Life of Ludi Buccaferr.

(6) Biblioth.

(7) Notizie degli Scritt. Bologn.

(8) Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Patav. tom. 1. lib. 3. Sect. 2. c. 8.

[D] A ſtedfaſt follower and accurate interpreter of Averroes.] Averroes was the firſt, that made a commentary on upon all the works of Ariſtotle; hence it is, that Dante in his Inferno, cap. 4. ſaid of him,

Averrois, ch' il gran commento feo.
That is,
" Averroes, who made the great commentary.

By this he acquired in the Schools an authority almoſt, nay with ſome equal to that of Ariſtotle himſelf. Quem, ſays Ludov. Vives (9), Philoſophi de noſtra ſchola, qui poſt eum ſcripſere, ita ſunt amplexati, ut pene auctoritate Ariſtoteli adæquarint. i. e. " Whom the Philoſophers of our ſchool, who wrote " after him, ſo followed, that they made him almoſt " equal in authority to Ariſtotle." And in another place (10): Hic eſt Averroes, quem aliquorum dementia Ariſtoteli parem fecit. i. e. " This is Averroes, " whom the madneſs of ſome people has made equal " to Ariſtotle." Among his followers, who from his name were called Averroiſts, none has been ſo much renowned as our Achillini; he was by the teſtimony of Jovius (11), Accuratus Averrois interpres, i. e. " an exact interpreter of Averroes," to whoſe opinions he ſtedfaſtly adhered, by which he became ſo famous: Secutus, ſays the ſame Jovius, opiniones Averrois, quibus totius ingenii ſui fama nitebatur. The literal ſenſe of which words is, that the fame of all his judgment was built on the opinions of Averroes; that is to ſay, that all the renown he had of an ingenious man was for adhering to the opinions of Averroes; but the Italian tranſlator Hippolito Orio has given them another ſenſe by rendring them thus: Haveva ſeguito Averroe, con le cui opinioni ei difendeva la chiara fama del nobile ingegno ſuo. That is, " He followed Averroes, with " whoſe opinions he defended the ſhining fame of " his ſublime judgment." As if Jovius had ſaid, totius ingenii ſui famam tuebatur, it ſeems he did not underſtand the true meaning of the verb nitebatur. Claudio Achillini, grandſon to our Achillini's brother, in a letter to Giacomo Accariſio mentions him by the name of that great Averroiſt, quel grande Averroiſta. And Ghilini (12), Famoſo Averroiſta, che con tanta fama, e gloria del ſuo nome publicamente leſſe filoſofia nello ſtudio di Padoa. i. e. " A famous Aver- " roiſt, who in the univerſity of Padua read philoſo- " phy with ſo much fame, and glory of his name."

(9) Quoted by Poſſevinus in Bibliotb. Select. tom. 2. p. 52.

(10) Pag. 54.

(11) In Elog.

(12) Teatr. d'uom. Illuſtr. in Claud. Achillini.

[E] Arguing in private and public diſputations.] Achillini went wherever diſputations were kept, giving proofs of his extraordinary ability in arguing; but more particularly he frequented thoſe public diſputations, that are called the general chapters, or convocations among the Friars. Montalbanus is my author. Philoſophiam, ſays he, ſumma celebritate docuit Patavii, & Bononiæ, ubique diſputando, in capitulis præſertim generalibus Franciſcanorum, Dominicanorum, aliorumque. i. e. " He taught philoſo- " phy at Padua and Bologna with great applauſe, diſ- " puting every where, particularly in the general " chapters, or convocations of the Franciſcans, Do- " minicans, and others." Scholaſtic diſputations chiefly conſiſt in getting the better of the adverſary by puzzling and intangling him with a form of ſyllogiſm, and ſo obtaining the victory. To this ſort of Philoſophers and Diſputants may be juſtly applied what I remember to have read, but do not know where at preſent, of the Hibernians very much renown'd for able Logicians and Metaphyſicians.

Gens ratione furens, & mentem paſta chimeris.

Our Achillini was a perfect maſter of this way of arguing, for which he was admired as a genius ſuperior to human nature. I have this from Orlandi, who reports that he was a very acute Diſputant; on which account in the circoli (13), where he did argue, and was not known, there went current as a proverb that ſaying, Either the Devil, or Achillini. Fù acutiſſimo argumentatore, onde ne' circoli, dove argomentava, e non era conoſciuto, paſsò in proverbio qu'ell' aut Diabolus, aut Achillinus. He is not the only one, who for his extraordinary parts has been compared to the Devil. I have heard the ſame reported of Eraſmus the firſt time he met Sir Thomas More, to whom he was only known by fame; and the like of ſome others. That a ſubtil Diſputant as our Achillini, or a very cunning fellow ſhould be praiſed with this expreſſion, is no wonder to me; ſince the notion we have of the Devil, is of a ſpirit, who uſes all his knowledge, which is very far above the human, to deceive and to ſeduce us by ſubtil and fallacious arguments; and we know by a very dear bought experience, that his artifices and arguments ſeldom fail to get the better of our reaſon. According to this notion the ſerpent, that deceived Eve, of whom the ſcripture ſays, that he was more ſubtle than any beaſt of the field, is generally taken for the Devil. What I wonder at, is, that a man renowned for his excellency in a profeſſion, ſhould be rather honoured with the name of Devil, than Angel. True it is, that the Devil is of an angelic nature, and the ignorant people ſeem to give him a knowledge and power ſuperior to Angels; yet all know and agree, that his knowledge and power is to do evil. Why then ſhould a man endued with extraordinary gifts of nature, which are reputed heaven's bleſſings, and for which the poſſeſſors of them are admired, be rather compared to the Devil, whoſe nature is to do evil, than to an Angel whoſe nature is to do good? And what reaſon can be given of the origin of this expreſſion? either the Devil, or ſuch a man. I will propoſe to the reader a conjecture, which ſeems to me not altogether improbable. The ancients gave the name of Δαίμων to the Divinity, to ſpiritual beings, and to men admired for wiſdom, or virtue; but the ſignification of the word Δαίμων being afterwards changed, and by the Chriſtians given in a peculiar manner to the Devil, the expreſſion ſtill remained, tho' the ſignification of the word Δαίμων was applied to a bad Angel inſtead of a good one; or, the Divinity: ſo that, what formerly would have been expreſſed by either God, Angel, or ſuch a one, was changed into the preſent proverb, Either the Devil, or ſuch a one.

(13) Circoli are diſputes kept in the ſchools of thoſe monaſtical and regular orders, that teach Philoſophy and Divinity, to exerciſe the ſcholars. The Italian name anſwers the Latin Corona, both names expreſſing a number of people ſtanding, or ſitting round.

[F] To a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity.] If we give credit to Orlandi (14), our Achillini began to read lectures at Bologna in 1484; from which it appears, that he was then but twenty years old, ſince the ſame author tells us, that he died in the forty eighth year of his age in 1512. So that according to this account he muſt have been born in 1464. Jovius takes no notice of his being Profeſſor at Bologna before he went to Padua. At the end of his books de Intelligentiis and de Elementis, he is ſtiled a public and ordinary Profeſſor of the theory of phyſic: Publicè theoricam medicinæ, & ordinariè docente. And at the end of the book de Orbibus: Philoſophiam publicè & ordinariè docente. And in the book De ſubjecto phyſionomiæ & chiromantiæ: Ambas ordinarias & philoſophiæ & medicinæ theoricæ publicè docente. Montalbanus and Orlandi ſay only in general terms, that he was public Profeſſor of philoſophy in both places. But Tomaſinus * and Comnenus † do not agree about the chair he had at Bologna. Tomaſinus ſpeaking of him when called to Padua, ſays: Alexander Achillinus, qui diu Bononiæ docuerat primo loco philoſophiam. i. e. " Alexander Achillini, " who for a long while had taught philoſophy at Bo- " logna in, or from the firſt place," that is, the firſt chair. Comnenus on the contrary ſays, that he taught Ariſtotle's and Averroes's doctrine: Primùm Bononiæ è minoribus exedris, mox è prima philoſophiæ Patavii. i. e. " Firſt at Bologna from the inferior " chairs,

(14) Notizie degli Scritt. Bologn.

* De Gymnaſ. Patav.
† Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Patav.

of which duty he acquitted himſelf with general applauſe and admiration, ſo that his name became famous all over Italy. He continued at Bologna till the year 1506, when the Univerſity of Padua made choice of him to ſucceed Antonio Francatiano in the firſt chair of Philoſophy [G]. Achillini went to Padua, where his reputation drew a vaſt number of ſtudents to his lectures, which expoſed him to the envy of his collegue in the chair, Peter Pomponatius [H], a Philoſopher and Averroiſt too of very great repute, but ambitious of glory, who could not but look upon the number of ſcholars as a mark of the maſter's reputation, beſides the advantage that Achillini had over him in the diſputations; he therefore by practices underhand endeavoured to withdraw the ſcholars from him; and in the diſputations, to elude the force of his arguments, which he was not able to anſwer, he had recourſe then to an artifice, which never fails of ſucceſs with the multitude, but is a certain proof of the badneſs of his cauſe, who makes uſe of it; I mean to get himſelf off by raillery and ſharp jeſts. But the malice and artifices of Achillini's antagoniſt did not leſſen his reputation, or weaken the ſtrength of his arguments. He did not continue long at Padua, the dangerous war, in which the State of Venice was engaged againſt the league of Cambray, put a ſtop to the readings of the Profeſſors of that Univerſity [I]. This obliged Achillini to retire to his native country [K], where he was received with the ſame marks of honour and diſtinction, that he had before he left it, being made a ſecond time Profeſſor of Philoſophy in that Univerſity [L]. He ſpent the reſt of his

(15) Oper. & di. ver. 25.

(16) This ſeems to me the moſt natural and obvious ſenſe of Heſiod's words, tho' by the common opinion of interpreters they are underſtood not of envy, but of that laudable emulation of which Heſiod is ſpeaking. Indeed the connexion of the diſcourſe requires this ſenſe, but the words, as I ſay, do not expreſs it; and I am apt to think, that theſe two verſes are miſplaced, and ought to be put after the ſixteenth verſe, where he deſcribes that ſort of contention, which is the cauſe of war and diſſention among men. If the reader will take the trouble to look upon the whole paſſage, I believe he will not diſapprove my conjecture. I will add, that according to the common interpretation I can't underſtand what πτωχὸς has to do here, ſince it is very plain, that the Poet is ſpeaking of artiſts and induſtrious people among whom no body will reckon the beggar. I cannot but take notice alſo of the different way, that I find this paſſage quoted by Priſcian according to the edition of Hanow 1605, which was procured by Putſchius, who collected all the ancient Latin Grammarians, and corrected them according to the MSS. In this edition, which is reckoned the beſt, out of the two verſes is made one, and inſtead of φθονέει 'tis φθονέει· καὶ πτωχὸς πτωχῷ φθονέει καὶ τέκτονι τέκτων. But in a very ancient edition made at Venice in 1476, which I have now before me, both verſes with part of the antecedent, and the beginning of the ſubſequent are quoted as we read them in Heſiod.

" chairs, afterwards from the firſt of philoſophy at " Padua." By which words is to be plainly ſeen the difference he puts between the chair of Bologna and that of Padua; calling the firſt minor exedra, the ſecond prima exedra; and that Achillini, whilſt he profeſſed philoſophy at Bologna before his going to Padua, had not the firſt chair. He was indeed Profeſſor at Bologna for a great while, by which we might very probably ſuppoſe, that ſome time before he was called to Padua, he had the firſt chair at Bologna. This conjecture is very conſiſtent with what Tomaſinus ſays, but Comnenus's words will by no means admit of it. As for his being Profeſſor of Philoſophy even in the firſt chair at twenty years of age, it is not to be much wondered at, if we conſider, that in thoſe times the ſtudy of the Greek and Latin tongue, and in general good literature was neglected, and that a young ſcholar from the Latin Grammar was immediately ſent to ſtudy what they called Philoſophy.

[G] In the firſt chair of philoſophy.] I am ſurprized not to find Achillini mentioned among the Profeſſors of the univerſity of Padua by Antonius Riccobonus in his book De Gymnaſio Patavino. Tomaſinus, out of the regiſters of the ſaid univerſity, marks all what we have advanced on this particular Anno 1506, 7. Novembris, Alexander Achillinus, qui diu Bononiæ docuerat primo loco philoſophiam, ad hanc ſedem ſucceſſit Francatiano. That this chair was the firſt is evident by the title of the chapter, which contains a catalogue of the Profeſſors of Philoſophy in that chair. Profeſſores philoſophiæ ordinariæ in primo loco ab anno 1500 uſque ad 1653. The ſame is confirmed by Comnenus in the paſſage quoted in the precedent note.

[H] To the envy of his collegue in the chair, Peter Pomponatius.] What Heſiod ſays of the Artiſts, that

(15) Καὶ κεραμεὺς κεραμεῖ κοτέει, καὶ τέκτονι τέκτων,
Καὶ πτωχὸς πτωχῷ φθονέει, καὶ ἀοιδὸς ἀοιδῷ.

That is,

" The Artiſt envies what the Artiſt gains,
" The Bard the rival Bard's ſucceſsful ſtrains:
Cook.

the ſame may be ſaid of all profeſſions in general. A Philoſopher, a Divine &c. will envy (16) another of his profeſſion as much, nay more than a low mechanic will another of his trade. Which is not only becauſe Profeſſors are mercenary as well as tradeſmen, but alſo becauſe ambition and pride are paſſions common to mankind, which make men act againſt the rules of their own profeſſion. Philoſophy and Divinity ſhould inſpire their Profeſſors with meekneſs, charity, patience, and the reſt of moral virtues; but experience ſhews the contrary, and we ſee very often that thoſe Profeſſors are no better men than others, nay ſometimes worſe. Such is the power of human paſſions, which is not to be thought ſtrange, ſince they are the gifts of nature, altho' we pay very dear for them; but arts and profeſſions are acquired by application and induſtry; and as arts and profeſſions can never reach the perfection of nature, ſo they can never entirely ſubdue her paſſions.

Naturam expellas furca licet, uſque recurret.

[I] Profeſſors of the Univerſity of Padua.] Paulus Jovius, who had been a diſciple of Pomponatius, gives this account of Achillini: Quum Patavii, ſays he, philoſophiam profiteretur, ſolidæ, conſtantiſque doctrinæ famam obtinuit, vel ipſo Pomponatio acri æmulo inſidioſa ambitione ſcholam ejus depopulante. i. e. " When he was Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Padua, " he gained himſelf the reputation of a man of ſo" lid and real learning, tho' Pomponatius himſelf " was his rival, and endeavoured to leſſen his ſchool " by all the artifices imaginable." And ſpeaking of Pomponatius. In coronis, conſeſſuque doctorum, quem exercitatione perutili ad prætoriam porticum diſputaretur, ita mirus evadebat, ut ſæpe ancipiti, & cornuto Achillini enthymemate circumventus, ſuperfuſo facetiarum ſale adverſarii impetum ex illis, gyris & mæandris explicatus eluderet. i. e. " In the circles " and meetings of the men of learning, when the " uſeful exerciſe of diſputing was held as the præ" torian porch, he exerted himſelf wonderfully, ſo " that very often, when he was ſurprized by " ſome ſubtle argument of Achillini, he would readily " elude the force of it by ſome merry jeſt or other." But notwithſtanding this, the ſame Jovius ſays of Achillini: Sed æmulum, (that is, Pomponatius) in corona veteratorie diſputantem, & riſum ſalſa dicacitate ſæpius excitantem, ipſo invicto doctrinæ robore ſuperabat. i. e. " But he gained the advantage over " his rival Pomponatius by the invincible ſtrength " of his learning, tho' the latter uſed to diſpute " in a very artful manner, and raiſe mirth in the " audience by his agreeable jeſts." Mr. Bayle in the article POMPONATIUS has a remark upon this conduct of his anſwering Achillini's arguments, which the reader may conſult.

[K] To retire to his native country.] Achillini continued at Padua in the firſt chair of philoſophy from the latter end of 1506 till 1509, in which he left it. I fix this date by what Jovius ſays: Concidente autem Patavius gymnaſio inter exorti belli ſtrepitum Bononiam reverſus. i. e. " But on the " ruin of the univerſity of Padua, as the noiſe of " the war then broke out, he returned to Bolog" na (17)." The year 1509, was the firſt of the war, that the Venetians had with the confederates of Cambray, when Padua was in a very dangerous condition, ſome time in the hands of the Germans, then recovered by the Venetians, and after beſieged and attacked but without ſucceſs. So that it cannot be ſuppoſed, that the Profeſſors then continued to read lectures. A particular account of this war may be ſeen in an Italian book written by Andrea Mocenico, intitled La guerra di Cambrai, and printed at Venice 1562, in 8vo.

(17) Jo. Bapt. Verus rer. Venet. lib. 3.

[L] A ſecond time Profeſſor of philoſophy in that univerſity.] Jovius in the elogium of Achillini does his life at Bologna, where he died [M], and was interred with great pomp in the church of St. Martin the Great, which belongs to the Carmelite Friars (a). John Vitalis made the verſes that were put upon his tomb-ſtone [N]. Peter Pomponatius his former collegue and antagoniſt ſucceeded him in the chair. I ſhall give in the notes his character [O], and the catalogue of his books [P], all which not mention his having been Profeſſor a ſecond time at Bologna, that is, after he retired thither from Padua; but in the elogium of Pomponatius he ſays, that the Venetian war being broke out, Pomponatius taught philoſophy at Bologna after the death of Achillini. Exorto bello Veneto poſt Achillini mortem Bononiæ profeſſus eſt. The import of which words is, that he ſucceeded Achillini in the profeſſorſhip, which is confirmed by Comnenus in expreſs words, as you'll find in the next note.

(a) Geand. Albert. Deſcript. of Italy. Orland. loc. cit.

(b) Jov. Pomponat. Comnen. Hiſt. Gym. Pat.

[M] Where he died.] Orlandi expreſly tells us, that he died in 1512, the forty eighth year of his age; but Simler makes him a year older. Ætatis ſuæ quadrageſimo nono, i. e. "in the forty ninth year "of his age. And Jovius ſays, that he died, quum nondum quinquageſimum expleviſſet annum, i. e. "not "having yet completed his fiftieth year." Comnenus has ſaid the ſame thing: Nondum quinquagenarius obiiſſe dicitur; but he places his death about the year 1525, which if true, he muſt have been born about the year 1475, and then he could not have begun to read philoſophy in 1484, as Orlandi relates, being then but nine years old, an age incapable of it. Comnenus is certainly miſtaken, and ſeems to contradict himſelf. Patavino gymnaſio, are his own words, ſilere juſſo per bellorum, & fœderis Cameracenſis tumultus ſe recepit in patriam, in qua iterum aliquandiu docuit, nempe ad annum 1525, circa quem nondum quinquagenarius obiiſſe dicitur. i. e. "The univerſity of Padua having been forced "to be ſhut up on account of the troubles of the "war, and the league of Cambray, Achillini "retired to his own country, where he taught again "for ſome time, that is, till the year 1525, about "which time it is reported he died, being not yet "fifty years of age." The word aliquandiu imports a ſhort ſpace of time; and indeed Jovius, whom Comnenus follows, expreſſes himſelf ſo as to make us believe, that Achillini died a little time after his retirement to Bologna. Bononiam reverſus exceſſit è vita, i. e. "having gone back to Bologna he "died." He went back to Bologna in 1509, as we have proved in the note [K]. Now if Achillini had lived till the year 1525, he would have been Profeſſor thirteen or fourteen years at leaſt, ſuppoſing either that he was not made Profeſſor immediately after he returned to Bologna, or that he did not leave Padua till after the year 1509. Which long ſpace of time cannot be properly underſtood by the word aliquandiu, "for ſome "time." Neither is it to be ſuppoſed, that ſo renowned a Profeſſor as Achillini ſhould have been for ten or twelve years without a place in the univerſity of his native country. I am confirmed in this opinion by Orlandi's expreſſion, that he was publico lettore in Padoa, e in Bologna dall' anno 1484, ſino al 1512; i. e. "public reader at Padua and "Bologna from the year 1484 till 1512." Which manner of ſpeaking imports, that Achillini was Profeſſor all that time; he would not have ſaid this, had he been without a profeſſorſhip ſo many years within that ſpace of time. But there is no reaſon to doubt of Orlandi's date. Vizani a Bologneſe, who wrote an accurate hiſtory of his own country, confirms it. In quel tempo (1512) morì Aleſſandro Achilino Bologneſe, filoſofo di gran fama, e di acutiſſimo ingegno. i. e. "At that time (1512) died Alexander "Achillino of Bologna, a Philoſopher of great fame, "and moſt acute genius *."

* Creſcimbeni out of Caferro (Synth. Vetuſt. p. 411.) not only fixes his death to this year, but alſo mentions the very day of it, viz. Septemb. 29.

[N] The verſes that were put upon his tomb-ſtone.] The verſes are related by Jovius, and are as follows:

Hoſpes, Achillinum tumulo qui quæris in iſto,
Falleris, ille ſuo junctus Ariſtoteli
Elyſium colit, & quas verum hic diſcere cauſas
Vix potuit, plenis nunc videt ille oculis.
Tu modo, per campos dum nobilis umbra beatos
Errat, dic longum, perpetuumque vale.

"Reader, in vain you here attempt to find "Immortal Achillini in this tomb:
"Join'd with his Ariſtotle now he dwells
"In ſweet Elyſium; and diſcovers fully
"All nature and its cauſes, which before
"In this low ſphere, he knew to leſs perfection.
"Then reader, whilſt this mighty ſhade's employ'd
"In this bleſt manner, bid a long farewell."

[O] His character.] Jovius, who knew him, and had heard his lectures, aſſures us, that Achillini was a man, who by his exceeding honeſty and ſimplicity was entirely unacquainted with addreſs and flattery; inſomuch, that he was a laughing-ſtock of the pert and ſaucy young ſcholars, altho' eſteemed on account of his learning; but he never ſo much expoſed himſelf to their laughter, as by his ſhambling gate when he walked, wearing a ſcarlet gown of an uncommon faſhion, that is, with cloſe ſleeves, and no folds behind, welted with otter's skin; and by a conſtant ſmile upon his countenance and unpoliſhed language diſcovered himſelf to be either of a ſimple or contemplative diſpoſition. This is the character, that Jovius gives of Achillini, which I have rendred into Engliſh the beſt I could. His words are: Erat enim à ſumma ingenii ſimplicitate ambiendi, adulandique prorſus imperitus, uſque adeo, ut ſalſæ, petulantique juventuti, quanquam doctrinæ nomine in honore eſſet, ridendus videretur; & tum maxime, quum deambularet undulatis paſſibus, coccina in toga exoleti moris, aſtrictas ſcilicet habente manicas, & nullis à tergo defluentibus rugis, lutrina pelle fimbriatas: renidentique ſemper fronte, & ſermone pingui vel inepti, vel contemplantis ingenii vitia fateretur. By this it appears, that it was an eaſy matter for a cunning and witty man, as Pomponatius was, to ridicule Achillini, and expoſe him to the laughter of the ſcholars and the aſſemblies, and by this means to come off of the argument with credit. Achillini's manners and ſingularities were of great diſadvantage to him, who had to do with young ſcholars generally inclined to ridicule, and to deſpiſe their maſters; and with an adverſary who had all the qualities neceſſary to a Profeſſor. You may ſee his character in Jovius. But it is a great mark of Achillini's eſtabliſhed reputation, that altho' under ſo great a diſadvantage, he yet did not loſe it among the young people, who like the multitude are more taken with ridicule, altho' a falſe one, than with real merit, of which they are not proper judges. Merit, except it is ſupported by a general reputation, will not withſtand ridicule, which by making upon the mind a deeper and more agreeable impreſſion than merit, as being the food of the ſtrongeſt of all human paſſions, ſelf-love and pride; Ridicule, I ſay, is ſo powerful as to make us forget the merit of the perſon, and look upon him only as an object of our diverſion and laughter; nay very often merit itſelf is turned into ridicule. A man of poinant wit, who has the gift of agreeably expoſing his adverſary to ridicule is a more formidable enemy, than a bitter ſatyriſt, or a warm declaimer; and I would rather have a Swift on my ſide, than all the Scaligers, Salmaſius's, Grevius's, Gronovius's, and Bentley's put together. As for his merit and reputation, Achillini, as well as many other authors, owe both to the ignorance of the age he lived in, when all philoſophy conſiſted in vain and uſeleſs ſpeculations, and words without real ſignification; not ſearching after truth with ſolid reaſon and accurate experiments, but after the ſentiments of others in order to follow them with an implicite faith. Had not Ariſtotle and Averroes been then in veneration, what would have become of Achillini's merit and fame? I am ſure, that in our days a great Philoſopher and Averroiſt as Achillini was, would make a very different figure in the world from what he did in his time. That ſcholaſtic philoſophy deſerves no better name, than what Rabelais very pleaſantly gives to the doctrine of Scotus, Barbouillamenta Scoti; ſo we may ſay Barbouillamenta ſcholaſtica.

[P] Catalogue of his books.] His Philoſophical books are the following: De intelligentiis, lib. 5. De orbibus, lib. 4. De univerſalibus. De phyſico auditu.

which he dedicated to John Bentivogli [2].

De elementis lib. 3. De ſubjecto phyſionomiæ (17), & chiromantiæ. De ſubjecto medicinæ. De prima poteſtate ſyllogiſmi. De diſtinctionibus (18). De proportione motuum. All theſe were printed in one volume in fol. at Bologna per Benedictum Hectorem 1494, and afterwards reprinted at Venice in 1545. in fol. per Hieronymum Scotum, cum annotationibus excellentiſſimi Doctoris Pamphili Montii Bononienſis ſcholæ Patavinæ publici Profeſſoris. Which laſt edition I have ſeen, and am ſure of the date. But I find in Simler, Montalbanus, and Orlandi this edition with the year 1568; very probably the ſame Printer made two editions, the firſt in 1545, the ſecond in 1568. I have ſeen another edition printed at Venice in 1508, fol. per Bonetum Locatellum preſbyterum Bergomenſem, which contains only De intelligentiis, De orbibus, De univerſalibus, De elementis, De principiis chiromantiæ & phyſionomiæ, De poteſtate ſyllogiſmi, De ſubjecto medicinæ. The little book De chiromantiæ & phyſionomiæ principiis had been before printed at Bologna, per Jo. Antonium de Benedictis, 1503, fol. This is the only book, that I find mentioned by Geſner in his Bibliotheca, which he publiſhed in 1545, at Zurich.

(17) Montalbanus has Philoſophiæ by miſtake.

(18) Orlandi has de diſtributionibus.

His books of Phyſic are: In Mundini anatomiam annotationes, which are printed in the Faſciculus medicinæ Johannis de Ketam, at Venice 1522, apud Cæſarem Arrivabenum in fol. and at Bologna in 1524, per Hieronymum Benedictum.

Vander Linden mentions another book, which I do not find taken notice of by Montalbanus, Orlandi, and the reſt, who have given us an account of Achillini's works, which is; De humani corporis anatomia, apud Johannem Antonium, & F. de Sabio 1521, in 4to. He does not mention the place, where it was printed, but from the Printers names I am apt to think it to be at Venice. He left ſome other works, which are not publiſhed (19): De ſubſtantia orbis, De mixtis, lib. 12. Metaphyſices, Rhetoricæ Ariſtotelis correctæ lib. 1. Tractatus de anima.

(19) Montalbanus and Orlandi.

Orlandi mentions ſome of his Poems, which are in the collection made upon the death of Serafino dall'Aquila, whereby he gives him the name, and ranks him among the Poets of Bologna. But as I never ſaw but one * Sonetto of his, I cannot pretend to paſs a judgment upon all. However, if his poems are no better than his philoſophy, I think he hardly deſerves the name of a Poet.

* In Creſcimbeni.

As for his ſtile, it is like the reſt of the ſchoolmen. Stilus barbarus, ſays Geſner; and Comnenus tells us, that he ſo cloſely inſiſted upon the interpretations of Averroes, that the reader often wants a nomenclator, to underſtand his philoſophy. In his (libris) palam peripateticam ſectam profeſſus, ita obſcuris Averrois interpretationibus inhæret, ut ſæpe nomenclatore opus ſit, quò eum philoſophantem intelligas. And Montius, who took the pains to make notes upon his philoſophical works, in his dedication to Sebaſtian Foſcarini, tells him: Et quatenus author locis non paucis obſcurus eſt, quibus intelligendis non parum torqueretur juventus in hujus viri lectione non ſatis verſata, nos ſcholia noſtra in margine adjecimus, quibus rem ipſam quanta potuimus brevitate explicavimus.

To his obſcurity, as Comnenus rightly obſerves, Latomus had an eye in his epigram upon him, which we read in Jovius. Eò reſpexit Latomus apud Jovium hoc diſticho (20):

(20) He ſhould have ſaid more properly tetraſticho.

Quiſquis Averroem cenſes habuiſſe cerebrum,
Falleris; haud eſt me paſſus habere meum.
Regula non fallit, propter quod quodlibet unum
Taliter affectum eſt, ſed magis illud erat.

I can't forbear obſerving, that the epigram appears as obſcure to me as the Philoſopher he ſpeaks of.

[2] All which he dedicated to John Bentivogli.] This particular I have from Claudio Achillini, in a letter of his quoted before, to Giacomo Accariſio. He ſpeaks of Cardinal Bentivoglio: Rinuovo alla memoria di ſua Eminenza l'humiliſſima, & antica ſervitù principiata fin al tempo di quel grande Averroiſta Aleſſandro Achillini, fratello di mio avo, che indrizzò tutte le opere ſue al nome di Gio. Bentivogli. i. e. "I renew to his Eminency's me-"mory the humble and ancient ſervice, which be-"gan from the time of that great Averroiſt Alex-"ander Achillini my grandfather's brother, who "dedicated all his works to John Bentivogli."

(a) Bumald. Biblioth. Bonon. p. 136, 137. Orlandi Notiz. Iſtor. de Scrit. Bologn. p. 162. Creſcimbeni Coment. intorno all' iſtor. della Volg. Poes. vol. 2. p. 2. lib. 3. N° 78.

☞ACHILLINI (a), JOHN PHILOTHEUS [A], a younger brother of Alexander beforementioned, was Profeſſor of polite learning. Although he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Divinity, yet having a natural inclination for Poetry, and a facility in rhiming, he cultivated them, and writ ſome Poems, for which he is reckoned among the Poets of the fifteenth Century [B]; but his reputation in Poetry did not equal that of his brother in Philoſophy, though both were indebted for it to the bad taſte of that age [C]. He was a great promoter of learning among his countrymen,

[A] John Philotheus.] In Italian, Giovanni Filoteo; Bumaldus, or Montalbanus calls him in Latin Joannes Philoteus, he ſhould have ſaid Philotheus with an aſpiration, according to the import and orthography of the Greek name. The Italians, who are no friends to aſpirations, have changed it to Filoteo; but this does not excuſe Montalbanus, who wrote in Latin.

[B] He is reckoned among the Poets of the fifteenth Century.] Although our Achillini lived a few years after 1500, that is, in the beginning of the ſixteenth Century, yet on the account of his ſtile, which is like that of the Poets of the fifteenth Century, he deſerves to be reckoned among the Poets of that age, which was the reaſon why Creſcimbeni (1) placed him among them. Quantunque il ſuo ſtile, ſays he, il dichiari Poeta del detto ſecolo (xv) e dentro eſſo noi il ponghiamo; nondimeno viſſe alcuni anni ancora del ſeguente. And adds, Quindi addiviene, che il mentovato Bumaldi metta il ſuo fiorire negli anni 1513 i. e. "Hence it is that the abovementioned "Bumaldus dates the time of his reputation in the "year 1513;" but I do not find any mention of this in Bumaldus's Bibliotheca, which he quotes. Bumaldus only gives a catalogue of his works with the date of their editions, among which the Poem of Vividarium printed in 1513, is mentioned *.

(1) loc. cit.

* The edition I have of Bumaldus is of 1641, Bononiæ, typis hæredis Victorii Benatii, in 24. and I do not know any other edition of it.

[C] Indebted for it to the taſte of that age.] In what degree of reputation our Achillini was in his time for Poetry, I cannot poſitively ſay. I don't find him mentioned by Gyraldi. Leandro Alberti ſpeaks of him with commendation, but in general terms, calling him huomo d'elegantiſſimo, & curioſiſſimo ingegno, come facilmente dall' opere da lui laſciate ſi può giudicare: that is, "A man of a moſt elegant, "and moſt exquiſite genius, as may be eaſily judged by "the works he has left." But ſuppoſe his reputation to have been very great in thoſe times, certain it is, that in the following age he loſt it, when Italian Poetry was revived, and brought to the height of perfection. Ebbe, ſays Creſcimbeni, ſpeaking of him, altresì feconda vena nelle rime volgari, le quali arricchì largamente colle ſcienze, che profeſſava. Contuttociò non molto applauſo eſigè dalla poſterità; perche, ſiccome egli fiorì nel colmo della barbarie del ſecolo xv. cioè circa gli anni 1490, quando i ſeguaci del Tibaldeo avevano anche deformata quella ſpuria maniera; così camminando per entro quella, andò ſpargendo gemme tra'l fango. i. e. "He had alſo a copi-"ous vein of Italian Poetry, which he largely en-"riched with the ſciences he profeſſed; but yet he "did not get much applauſe from poſterity, becauſe "as he flouriſhed in the height of the ignorance of "the fifteenth age, that is about the year 1490, "when the followers of Tibaldeo had even deform-"ed that ſpurious manner (of Poetry); ſo he going "through it, went on throwing here and there "gems among the dirt." I have never ſeen any of his countrymen, for whom he founded an Academy [D]. I could not meet with any other particular of his life, neither can I fix the date of his death; only I find that he was buried in the ſame church with his brother [E]. Beſides the Poems, he compoſed other books, of which we ſhall ſpeak in the remark [F]. He is not to be confounded with the author of the Somnium Viridarii, who concealed himſelf under the name of Philotheus Achillini [G].

his Poems, but by what I can judge by ſome of his verſes quoted in different places by Montalbanus in his Appendix to the Bibliotheca Bononienſis, and the Specimen of a Sonetto given us by Creſcimbeni, he has no better pretenſion to be reckoned among the good Italian Poets, than the reſt of his cotemporaries. The language in which he wrote his Poems was no better than his ſtile; being, as the ſaid Creſcimbeni judges of it, not a little rough and incorrect. La lingua delle ſue poeſie e non poco incolta e ſcorretta. He made uſe of ſeveral words of the common dialect of Bologna, as may be ſeen in Montalbanus's book Diologogia (2), in which he is often quoted.

(2) Orlandi calls it Dialogogia, but the true title is as we have reported it. I have the book before me, ſo that I can't be miſtaken; it is printed at Bologna in 1652 in 4° by Carlo Zenaro. But let the title be Diologogia, or Dialogogia, the formation of it is ſtrange to me, altho' the author himſelf explains it thus. Diologogia, overo delle cagioni, e della naturalezza del parlare, e ſpetialmente del più antico, e più vero di Bologna, &c. i. e. "Diologogia, or "of the cauſes "and nature of "ſpeech, and "particularly of "the moſt anci- "ent and moſt "true, that of "Bologna, defen- "ded, prais'd, and "related to the "Star of Jupiter. But this explanation does not give me a better idea of the formation of the word Diologogia, or Dialogogia. It was Montalbanus's way to affect a mighty ſhew of learning, which he was not a great maſter of, by giving ſtrange titles to his books, and by numerous quotations of authors; ſo that he may juſtly deſerve in this regard the title of Dottor Bologneſe.

[D] He founded an Academy.] Among the Academies of Bologna, of which Orlandi has given us a catalogue in the beginning of his book, is reckoned the Academy del Viridario, which was founded by this Achillini in the year 1511, for the improvement of learning. It took for its device a laurel-tree with this motto: E ſpe in ſpem.

[E] He was buried in the ſame church with his brother.] Alberti informs us of this in his deſcription of Italy, where giving an account of Bologna, and ſpeaking of the church of the Carmelite Friars, he ſays, that there lie buried Alexander Achillini, and his brother John, whom I take to be our John Philotheus. Nella chieſa di S. Martino del Carmelitani ripoſano l'oſſa del magno Aleſſandro Achilino, & di Gio. ſuo fratello.

[F] He compoſed ſeveral books.] Here follows the catalogue of them which I have collected out of Montalbanus and Orlandi.

Epiſtole al Magnificentiſſimo Meſſer Antonio Rodolfo Germanico, oue ſi narrano tutte le ſorti di Pietre, di Sibille, la varietà dell'armi antiche, e moderne, i muſicali inſtrumenti, i Coloſſi, le nove Muſe, la diverſità degli Alberi, le Cavalcature, gli abiti antichi, e moderni, egli accidenti diverſi. This book is in 4° without date, or the name of the place where it was printed, or the printer's name. But Orlandi thinks it was printed at Bologna in 1500. Senza impreſſione, this is his expreſſion, ma ſembra ſtampa di Bologna del 1500.

Collettanee Greche, Latine, e volgari di diverſi moderni autori nella morte di Serafino dall' Aquila. Bologna 1504. by Caligula Bazaliero in 8°. In this collection are his brother's verſes. And I believe alſo the life of Serafino dall' Aquila, of which mention is made by Orlandi.

Viridario. Bologna 1513, by Girol. Plat. 4°. This book is a Poem in ſtanza's by the Italians called Ottava Rima. I do not doubt but he gave the name of Viridario to this Poem upon account of the Academy, which he had eſtabliſhed under that name. In it are mentioned the learned men, and famous painters, ſculptors, and artiſts of Bologna, and other cities. For this reaſon the book is more valuable than the ſtile, and therefore is very often quoted by Montalbanus in his Appendix Pictorum, atque Sculptorum, ſeu etiam machinamentariorum Bonon. antiquiorum; which as Orlandi atteſts, is a book quoted by many; Libro citato da molti.

Annotazioni della volgar lingua. Bologna 1536. By Vincenzio Bonardo. This book muſt be very ſcarce, ſince I find that Creſcimbeni, who has writ ſo much upon the hiſtory of the Italian Poetry, and who had all the advantages that a man can be ſuppoſed to have had for ſuch a work; Creſcimbeni, I ſay, acknowledges that he had not ſeen it.

Il Fedele, a Poem in five books, conſiſting of a hundred ſongs (3), and 15238 verſes. In this Poem the author ſpeaks of many things (4) under the veil of various metaphors as a Poet, as a Philoſopher, and a Divine. Montalbanus talks of it as a MSS. but Creſcimbeni declares he had ſeen it in print. Orlandi mentions alſo Eneide and Rimario MS. but I apprehend he is miſtaken, ſince by what I can gueſs, he advances this upon finding them quoted in the margin (5) of Montalbanus's Diologogia, together with Achillini's Poem Il Fedele. But I have obſerved, that Montalbanus very often quotes a rimario Bologneſe antico by itſelf, and that the quotation Æneid. 1. which comes immediately after Achillini's Fedele, is to be referred to this verſe of Virgil in the text, which is the 578. of the firſt book.

Tros, Tyriuſque mihi nullo diſcrimine agetur.

Beſides, the quotations in the margin being in great number, and without any mark of reference, and put all together one after another without order; all this conſidered, I ſay, it is very eaſy for the reader to be miſtaken in determining to which word of the text the quotation is to be referred; and whether one or more of thoſe quotations are for the ſame or different parts of the text. This gives me reaſon to ſuſpect the truth of what Orlandi ſays, who notwithſtanding all he reports of Achillini, brings no other authority but that of Bumaldus; that is, Montalbanus, who in his Bibliotheca Bononienſi (6) makes no mention of theſe two MSS. but only of the Poem Il Fedele. I muſt nevertheleſs acknowledge, that he puts an &c. by which it ſeems he gives us to underſtand, that there were other MSS. of Achillini, which either he had not ſeen, or did not remember the titles of them ſo as to ſet them down.

(3) Montalbanus calls them Cantilenas, and Orlandi after the ſame manner Cantilene; but whether the author himſelf gave them that name, or not, I can't tell, having not ſeen the book; neither am I ſure that Orlandi had ſeen it, it being not improbable that he tranſcribed Montalbanus: and I am rather inclined to think he uſed the name Cantici, a kind of Poem uſed by the ancients; even in the 16th Century Girolamo Britonio gave this name to a large Poem of his of the like nature. Vide Creſcimb. Coment. vol. 1. l. 3. c. 20.

(4) De omnibus ferè diſcurrit rebus, ſays Montalbanus, di varie coſe. Orlandi d'ogni genere di ſcienze. Creſcimb.

(5) Pag. 29.

(6) Pag. 137.

[G] The name of Philotheus Achillini.] In the Supplement of Moreri he is called John Philotheus Achillini, but I find in Placcius, and all the authors mentioned by him, that he is called only by the name of Philotheus, not of Jo. Philotheus.

☞ACHIOR, General of the Ammonites, who ſpoke with great freedom to Holofernes concerning the power of the Jews [A], and the peculiar protection, which God had always favoured them with (a). He told him that this people were deſcended of the (a) Judith, v. 5, & ſeq.

[A] . . who ſpoke with great freedom to Holofernes concerning the power of the Jews, and the peculiar protection, which God had always favoured them with.] When Holofernes found, that the Jews had ſhut their gates againſt him, and prepared to defend themſelves, he called the Princes of Moab, and the Captains of Ammon together, and ask'd them, who thoſe were, that had preſumed to reſiſt him: What are the cities, ſays he (1), that they inhabit, and what is the multitude of their army, and wherein is their power and ſtrength, and what King is ſet over them, or Captain of their army? This paſſage has been urged as an objection againſt the authority of the book of Judith. For how is it poſſible, ſay the objectors, that this General and his officers ſhould be ignorant of a people, againſt whom they had waged a war but a few years before, and whoſe King they had carried captive into Chaldea, as it is ſuppoſed, that the King of Aſſyria's Officers had done to Manaſſeh? Nay we are told in the book it ſelf (2), that they were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judea were lately gathered together; and the veſſels, and the altar, and the houſe were ſanctified after the profanation. This ſeems clearly to intimate, that they were juſt then returned from the captivity of Babylon; and conſequently it is abſurd to ſuppoſe that the Aſſyrians ſhould know nothing of this people. In anſwer to this objection two things are urged (3); 1. That Holofernes had never been before in that country, tho' the Aſſyrian Kings

(1) Ch. v. 3.

(2) Judith, iv.

(3) See Father Calmet, Comment. Litteral ſur le Livre de Judith. v. 4.

the Chaldeans, and that their anceſtors dwelt at firſt in Meſopotamia; but refuſing to worſhip the Gods of the Chaldeans, they were obliged to leave that country, and ſettled in the land of Canaan, which they were then poſſeſſed of. He proceeded likewiſe to inform him of Jacob's journey into Egypt, and the miracles which were performed by Moſes, in order to ſet the Iſraelites free, and of their conqueſt of the land of Canaan. His advice therefore was, that before they attempted the ſiege of Bethulia, they ſhould inform themſelves whether the Jews had offended their God, and provoked his indignation againſt them; for otherwiſe it would be in vain to attack them, ſince he had never failed of defending them againſt their enemies, when they ſhewed themſelves obedient to his laws. This advice of his was received with the utmoſt indignation, and all the principal officers of the army were ſo enraged, that they reſolved to deſtroy him. Holofernes himſelf likewiſe reproached him in the moſt blaſphemous terms [B], and commanded his ſoldiers to ſeize him, and carry him to Bethulia, and deliver him up to the Jews [C]. But finding it impoſſible to come near that city, becauſe of the ſlingers who caſt ſtones at them, they bound Achior, and left him at the foot of the hill, and returned to their Lord (b). But the Iſraelites when they ſaw him, came down, and looſed him, and brought him into the city. He then informed them of the occaſion of the Aſſyrians treating him in that manner, upon which Ozias, the ſon of Micha of the tribe of Simeon, one of the Governors of the city, received him into his houſe (c). Some time after this Judith having cut off Holofernes's head brought it to Achior, who was ſeized with a prodigious terror at the ſight, and fell down to the ground. But when he recovered, he expreſſed his joy and gratitude to Judith in the ſtrongeſt terms, and immediately abandoned his Pagan idolatry,

(b) Ch. vi.

(c) Ibid. vi. 21.

Kings might have carried on a war there more than once, either in perſon, as Tilgath-pileſer, Shalmaneſer, and Sennacherib did, or by their Generals, as Eſarhaddon. 2. That he might ask theſe queſtions, not out of ignorance, but raillery and inſult upon the Jews; as if he had ſaid, Who are theſe raſh people, that dare to reſiſt the orders of the King my Maſter, and to oppoſe my army? There are a great many queſtions, which by the manner of asking them, ſhew they they do not reſult from ignorance. However, after all we muſt confeſs, that the care which Holofernes took in calling together the Princes of thoſe countries, which border upon Judea, in order to inform himſelf of the ſtate of the Jewiſh Nation, and Achior's anſwer, ſhew that he was really ignorant of it. But perhaps he wanted to know whether that people were not in a league with the Arabians or Egyptians, and depended upon the aſſiſtance of a Nation, which was more formidable than themſelves.

[B] Holofernes himſelf reproached him in the moſt blaſphemous terms.] And who art thou Achior, ſaid he, and the hirelings of Ephraim, that thou haſt propheſied amongſt us as to day, and haſt ſaid, that we ſhould not make war with the people of Iſrael, becauſe their God will defend them? AND WHO IS GOD BUT NABUCHODONOSOR? . . . they ſhall utterly periſh, ſaith King Nabuchodonoſor, LORD OF ALL THE EARTH (4). We find likewiſe in the 3d chapter (5), that he had decreed to deſtroy all the Gods of the land, that all nations ſhould worſhip Nabuchodonoſor only, and that all tongues and tribes ſhould call upon him as God. This folly of that King was not peculiar to himſelf. Moſt of the Eaſtern Kings required of their ſubjects ſuch a kind of reverence, as approached very near to adoration. The flatterers of Darius propoſed to him a decree, whereby they prohibited any perſon to ask a petition of any God or man, except of the King for thirty days, under pain of being caſt in the lions den (6). Darius Codomannus marched in the midſt of his army, and was reverenced as a God, as Quintus Curtius tells us (7); Rex curru paulo ante vectus, & Deorum à ſuis honoribus cultus. Alexander the Great having reſolved to procure himſelf the ſame divine honours, which had been given to the Kings of Perſia his predeceſſors, found people about him baſe enough to extol his vanity and impiety, and to aſſert, that the cuſtom of raiſing Kings above the condition of mortality, and ranking them among the Gods, was not only pious, but even prudent and advantageous; Perſas non piè tantum, ſed etiam prudenter Reges ſuos inter Deos colere; Majeſtatem enim imperii ſalutis eſſe tutelam (8). The Egyptians had no leſs veneration for their Princes. They conſidered them as greatly elevated above the condition of other Men (9). But the Greeks had generally an abhorrence to theſe kinds of ceremonies. Religion perhaps had but a very little ſhare in this averſion of theirs; but their reaſon and the noble and generous turn of their minds, which were ſuperiour to all baſe and ſervile compliances, ſhewed them the injuſtice and danger of ſuch pretenſions in Kings. For what conſideration could poſſibly reſtrain a Prince, who ſaw himſelf adored as a God, from purſuing the utmoſt exorbitances of his paſſions? We find in hiſtory, that the Athenians condemned Timagoras to death for having adored the King of Perſia in the uſual form (10). And Plutarch tells us (11), that Cimon the Athenian could tranſact nothing with Artaxerxes, becauſe he would not conſent to proſtrate himſelf before him. The two Lacedemonians, Sporchius and Bulis, tho' they were captives, could never be induced to pay the adoration to that Prince, which was required of thoſe, who approach'd him (12). And Martial rallies thoſe, who uſed to give a mortal the appellation of God and Lord, by telling them, that ſuch mean flattery belonged only to the Perſians:

Fruſtra blanditiæ venitis ad me,
Attritis miſerabiles labellis;
Dicturus Dominum Deumque non ſum.
. . . . . .
Ad Parthos procul ite pileatos (13).

(4) Judith vi. 2 and 4.

(5) Ver. 8.

(6) Daniel, vi. 7.

(7) L. 5.

(8) Cleo in Quint. Curtius, lib. 8.

(9) Diodor. Sicul. l. 1. p. 57.

(10) See Suidas, and Valer. Maximus.

(11) In his Life of Artaxerxes.

(12) Juſtin. l. 6. Herod. l. 7.

(13) Epigram. l. 10. Ep. 62.

[C] And commanded his ſoldiers to ſeize him and carry him to Bethulia, and deliver him up to the Jews.] The noble freedom which Achior uſed in declaring his ſentiments and the ill uſage, which he met with for it, are not without example in hiſtory. We read in Quint. Curtius (14), that Darius being upon the point of engaging with Alexander the Great, asked Charidemus an Athenian General, what he thought of his army. He replied, that it was very proper to ſtrike a terror upon the neighbouring countries; but not ſufficiently diſciplined or ſtrong enough to combat with Alexander's forces; which he extolled at the ſame time on account of their admirable diſcipline. He concluded that it was neceſſary to oppoſe the Macedonians with troops of equal ſtrength; and that the beſt uſe, that Darius could make of the gold and ſilver, which ſhone upon the arms of his ſoldiers, would be to liſt other forces in Greece; Pari robore opus eſt; in illâ Terrâ, quæ hos genuit, auxilia quærenda ſunt; argentum illud atque aurum ad conducendum militem mitte. Darius, tho' he was naturally of a mild and generous temper, was ſo diſpleaſed with this free anſwer, that he immediately commanded Charidemus to be put to death. He ſoon after found his error, and repented of it. For he loſt the battle, and then had occaſion to regret the death of a General, who had given him ſuch faithful and prudent counſel.

(14) L. 3. See likewiſe Diod. Siculus, l. 14. p. 577.

latry, and became a proſelyte to the Jewiſh religion (d) [D]. This happened, according to ſome writers, in the time of Manaſſeh King of Juda, A. M. 3348, before Chriſt 652, and before the Vulgar Æra 656. But according to others after the return from the Captivity of Babylon (e).

(d) Ch. xiv. 6. & ſeq.

(e) See father Calmet Diction. de la Bible, in Verbo ACHIOR.

[D] He became a proſelyte to the Jewiſh Religion.] We are told in the hiſtory (15), that when Achior had ſeen all that the God of Iſrael had done, he believed in God greatly, and circumciſed the fleſh of his foreskin, and was joined unto the houſe of Iſrael unto this day. The Vulgate Tranſlation has repreſented this fact thus; Tunc Achior videns virtutem, quam fecit Deus Iſrael, relicto Gentilitatis ritu, credidit Deo, & circumcidit carnem præputii ſui, & appoſitus eſt ad populum Iſrael, & omnis ſucceſſio generis ejus uſque in hodiernum diem. That is, "Then "Achior having ſeen the miracle, which God had "done for Iſrael, abandoning his Pagan ſuperſtitions, believed in God, and circumciſed himſelf, "and was incorporated with the people of Iſrael, as "all his poſterity is to this day." We find that hitherto Achior had conſidered the God of the Jews only as the God of a particular people (16). He never doubted of his power, or of the miracles, which he had done in favour of Iſrael; but he did not imagine, that this power extended beyond the Nation, which he had choſen; or perhaps he thought that the God of Iſrael was one of thoſe common Deities, Dii communes (17), who receive the adoration of divers Nations, without requiring them to renounce the Gods of their own country. But when Achior ſaw this ſtrange event, he left his former ſuperſtition, and the worſhip of his Pagan Divinities, and applied himſelf to the God of Iſrael alone. Nor was he contented with the mere profeſſion of the true religion, but he ſubmitted likewiſe to circumciſion, which was the grand characteriſtic of the Jewiſh Nation. There were two kinds of proſelytes among the Jews; one of them continued uncircumciſed, and were not obliged to the obſervation of the Ceremonial Law: theſe were called Proſelytes of the Gate. We have a famous inſtance of this in Naaman the Syrian (18). Achior might have continued in this rank of proſelytes, if he had thought proper. The Elders of the Jews, when they received him into Bethulia, gave him his choice of it, or of that of a Proſelyte of Righteouſneſs (19), who received the circumciſion, and obliged himſelf to obſerve the whole Law; as appears from the Vulgate tranſlation, which is much fuller in the account of that affair, than the Greek, or Syriac, or our tranſlation. It will not be perhaps improper to give the two verſes of the Vulgate, which are omitted in the other editions, and immediately follow the 20th verſe of the 6th chapter of our Engliſh tranſlation, V. 17. Dicentes; Deus patrum noſtrorum, cujus tu virtutem prædicâſti, ipſe tibi hanc dabit viciſſitudinem, ut eorum magis tu interitum videas. V. 18. Cùm verò Dominus Deus noſter dederit hanc libertatem ſervis ſuis, ſit & tecum Deus in medio noſtri; ut ſicut placuerit tibi, ita cum tuis omnibus converſeris nobiſcum. i. e. "V. 17. Saying, The "God of our fathers, whoſe power thou haſt extolled, will reward thee with this ſatisfaction, "that thou ſhalt ſee the deſtruction of thoſe, (who "intended to deſtroy thee.) V. 18. And when the "Lord our God ſhall have thus ſet his ſervants "free, mayeſt thou then acknowledge him for thy "God in the midſt of us; ſo that, if it pleaſe thee, "thou and all that belong to thee may dwell with "us."

(15) Judith xiv. 10.

(16) See father Calmet in locum.

(17) See Servius upon Virgil, Æneid. l. 12. Et Diis communibus Aras Gramineas.

(18) 2 Kings v. 17.

(19) Judith vi. 17, 18.

But a queſtion may be ſtarted, how it was poſſible for Achior, who was an Ammonite, to be received into the number of God's people, when it is ſo expreſly commanded in the Law of Moſes (20), that an Ammonite or Moabite ſhall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation? I anſwer to this; it may be urged, I. That theſe words are capable of various ſenſes. Sometimes they mean only the entrance into the temple of God; as particularly in the Lamentations of Jeremiah (21); where we are told, that the Heathen entred into the ſanctuary of Jeruſalem, whom thou didſt command that they ſhould not enter into thy congregation. And Philo Judæus (22) is of opinion, that eunuchs, who were included under the ſame law with the Ammonites and Moabites, were not ſuffered to enter the porch of the temple with the other Iſraelites. In other places of ſcripture, to enter into the congregation of the Lord, ſignifies to be received into the ſociety and religion of the Jews, and to become a proſelyte; as appears from the Book of Exodus (23), where the words which are rendred in our tranſlation, When a ſtranger ſhall ſojourn with you, in the Vulgate tranſlation are, Quod ſi quis peregrinorum in veſtram voluerit tranſire coloniam. i. e. "If a ſtranger is willing to enter among "you, and become a proſelyte." The Septuagint, and the Chaldee, and Arabic verſions favour the ſenſe of the Vulgate. Nay the Hebrew original and our tranſlation muſt be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe, as appears from what follows; Let all his males be circumciſed, and then let him come near, and keep the paſſover; for no perſon was admitted to the Jewiſh ceremonies and privileges, till he was circumciſed. II. It is generally agreed, that neither the Ammonites, nor Moabites, nor even the Canaanites were ever forbid to turn to the true God, and to enter the congregation of the Lord. But the Jews were expreſly commanded never to give them any ſhare in the offices, or privileges, or honours of their nation. Nay ſome writers have affirmed, that they were not allowed to marry a Jewiſh woman. Achior's zeal therefore was very extraordinary, ſince he joined himſelf to a people, who were treated with general contempt amongſt mankind, and from whence he could expect none of the temporal advantages which were peculiar to that nation, either for himſelf or his poſterity. Oſtenditur magnus Ammonitæ fervor pro lege Dei, quod populo ſatis contempto ſe aggregavit, in quo ipſe poſterique ejus nihil aliud quam Dei favorem ſperare poterant, ab honoribus & connubiis excluſi (24). St. Thomas Aquinas (25), and ſeveral other authors imagine, that this law was diſpenſed with in favour of Achior, out of regard to the ſervices, which he had done to the Jews.

(20) Deut. xxiii. 3.

(21) Ch. i. 10.

(22) De Victim. offerentib.

(23) Ch. xii. 48.

(24) Grotius in Judith xiv. 6.

(25) 1. 2. Qu. 105. Art. 3. ad 1.

☞ACHISH, the ſon of Maoch, King of Gath. David being apprehenſive of Saul's deſigns againſt his life, fled to the King for refuge [A]. When the officers ſaw him, they told the King that this was that David who had been ſo much celebrated in

[A] Fled to this King for refuge.] It may ſeem very ſurprizing, that David, who was unqueſtionably hated by the Philiſtines as their greateſt enemy, ſhould truſt himſelf in the hands of Achiſh, and even carry the ſword of Goliath with him, which muſt neceſſarily be known on account of its uncommon ſize. It will be ſaid perhaps, that he had God's command to do ſo. But it ſeems very probable, that if he conſulted God, it was only in general, whether his journey ſhould ſucceed, and the deſign which he was about to undertake, ſhould proſper; and that the anſwer which he received from God was only in general, without mentioning any particular circumſtances of his journey: for otherwiſe the High-Prieſt and Doeg the Edomite would have known where he had concealed himſelf. It is highly unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he could imagine, that he ſhould not be known at Gath; but he rather thought, that Achiſh would be glad of the opportunity of ſhewing his generoſity to his enemy, and of attaching a man of his importance to his own party. And it is plain that David never had any thought of leaving that King, till he had found the Courtiers were endeavouring to work his ruin. We find that Achiſh knew in his own country for the repeated injuries which he had done to their nation in war [B]. This ſtruck David with prodigious terror, ſo that he counterfeited himſelf mad [C], till he had an opportunity of making his eſcape (a). This happened A. M. 2944, before Chriſt 1056, and before the Vulgar Æra 1060 (b). Three or four years after this he again ſent Achiſh an offer of his ſervice, and deſired him to grant him his protection [D]. The King, who was well acquainted with David's valour, and knew the enmity between him and Saul, gave him leave to come to Gath with ſix hundred men and their wives and children. When they had continued there for ſome time, David deſired him to give him a place in ſome town in the country [E], which requeſt knew what was his true intereſt upon another occaſion; for he gave David the kindeſt reception imaginable, when he fled to him the ſecond time. Hiſtory furniſhes us with divers inſtances of great men, who have been obliged to fly to their enemies for protection, and have been entertained with the utmoſt civility and confidence. Themiſtocles took refuge among the Perſians, Alciabides among the Lacedemonians, and Coriolanus among the Volſcians. And it is certainly the higheſt policy in any party to afford a ſanctuary amongſt them to the great men of the oppoſite ſide, ſince it is a means of ſtrengthening themſelves, and weakening their enemies.

(a) 1 Sam. xxi. 10, & ſeq.
(b) Calmet, Dictionaire de la Bible, in Verbo ACHISH.

[B] Who had been ſo much celebrated in his own country for the repeated injuries, which he had done to their nation in war.] Is not this, ſaid they (1), David, King of the land? &c. The word King in this paſſage, Grotius tells us (2), ſignifies General, and is ſometimes taken in an improper ſenſe, as in Deuteronomy xxxiii. 5. where he underſtands theſe words, And he was King in Jeſhurum, of Moſes, the Leader of the Jews. Father Calmet obſerves (3), that it is probable, that David's deſignation to the kingdom was not much known among the Philiſtines; but they might imagine, that ſince he had exerted himſelf in defence of that nation with ſo much valour and conduct, if ever the ſovereignty ſhould paſs from Saul's family, it would be conferred upon that of David. Others are of opinion, that the rejection of Saul, and the choice of David, was well known among the Jews, and had even reached the Philiſtines. Others ſuppoſe that theſe words only ſignify, that Saul executed every thing by the means of David, and ſo the Jews conſidered the latter as their King. Vatablus and Piſcator underſtand this paſſage in a quite different ſenſe, and imagine, that the words, Is not this David King of the land? mean King of the country of the Philiſtines; ſince they had promiſed by Goliath, that they would become the ſubjects of the Conqueror (4).

(1) 1 Sam. xxi. 11.
(2) In locum.
(3) In locum.
(4) 1 Sam. xvii. 9.

[C] He counterfeited himſelf mad.] He changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himſelf mad in their hands, and ſcrabled on the doors of the gates, and let the ſpittle fall down upon his Beard (5). The words, which our Engliſh tranſlation has render'd, He ſcrabled on the doors of the gates, are in the Hebrew ויתו על דלחות השער [vajjethau hal dalthoth haſchahar], i. e. "he drew figures upon the "doors of the gates (6)." The Septuagint render this paſſage, ἐτυμπάνιζεν ἐπὶ ταῖς θύραις πόλεως, i. e. "he drumm'd," (if we may uſe that word to expreſs the ſenſe) "againſt the gates of the city." Agreeable to this is what St. Jerom ſays (7), Tympanizabat ad portam civitatis, and the Vulgate tranſlation of this paſſage, impingebat in oſtia portæ. The learned Ludovicus Capellus (8) imagines, that they read the word in the original ויתף [vajjathoph] from the root תפף [thaphaph], i. e. "to beat a drum or tym-"panum." The Rabbins tell us (9), that David wrote the following words upon the door, Achiſh, King of Gath, owes me an hundred millions of pieces of gold (10). He likewiſe let the ſpittle fall down upon his beard. He appeared like an epileptic perſon, who foamed at the mouth; of which we have ſeveral inſtances in the Goſpel (11). The ancients were afraid of perſons in that diſtemper; they imagined that their ſpittle would communicate the diſeaſe; and therefore they treated them as mad-men, as we find Achiſh did David. We have a repreſentation of this in one of Plautus's comedies, intitled The Captives.

(5) Ch. xxi. 13.
(6) See Jonath. Rabbi Salomon. Munſter, Grotius, Junius and others.
(7) In præfat. in Pſ. xxxiii.
(8) Crit. Sacr. l. 4. c. 5, 34. apud Joan. Clericum in locum.
(9) Abrabanel, &c.
(10) In Miſdraſch.
(11) Mark ix. 18. Luke ix. 39.

Heg. Hic homo rabioſus habitus eſt in Aulide,
. . . . . .

Nam iſtic haſtis inſectatus eſt domi matrem & patrem,
Et illic iſti, qui ſputatur, morbus interdum venit (12).

(12) Act. 3. Scen. 4.

[D] He again ſent Achiſh an offer of his ſervice, and deſired him to grant him his protection.] The learned Dr. Patrick tells us (13), that it is not certain that this was the ſame Achiſh, mentioned before in the 21ſt chapter, with whom David took ſhelter at his firſt flight from Saul; but that he ſeems rather to have been another, who is diſtinguiſhed from the former by the name of his father. Father Calmet on the other hand ſuppoſes him to have been the ſame with the former (14). But whoever he was he had either invited David to come thither for his ſecurity, hoping to make uſe of his valour and prudence in his wars; or David ſent Embaſſadors before to treat with him, and had his royal word, that he ſhould be protected by him.

(13) Commentary upon the firſt book of Samuel, chap. xxvii. ver. 2.
(14) In locum.

But it may be asked here, how could David lawfully enter into an alliance with the enemies of his country and of his God? How could he in point of prudence truſt himſelf with the Philiſtines, who were a nation remarkable for their perfidiouſneſs and hatred to the Jews? He muſt neceſſarily expoſe his religion to the utmoſt danger. Where then is the confidence in God, which is ſo much recommended in his character? If it be allowed that he followed the maxims of human policy in this caſe, yet we ſhall be at a loſs to account for his conduct, as he was a man after God's own heart. And in reality we find a prodigious change in his behaviour, as ſoon as ever he came to the court of Achiſh. He acted with a great deal of artifice with regard to that King, who had repoſed the higheſt confidence in him; he went and invaded the Geſhurites, and the Gezerites, and the Amalekites by his own authority; he weakened his own Prince by engaging ſo many men of valour in his ſervice (15); in ſhort, he joined the army of the Philiſtines, and prepared to fight againſt his own King and Country. In anſwer to theſe objections, it is ſaid (16), that it is indeed no eaſy matter to juſtify all David's conduct, while he continued among the Philiſtines; tho' on the other hand it may not perhaps be juſt to condemn it in thoſe points, which the Scripture has not diſapproved, and of which we don't know the particular circumſtances. If David reſolved to go over to Achiſh of his own head, and without having conſulted God upon the affair, without doubt he expoſed both his religion and his life to danger. But it is by no means probable, that a man of his character for piety, who undertook nothing without having firſt enquired of God, would have neglected to do ſo upon ſuch an important occaſion as this, or to take the precautions by obtaining Achiſh's ſolemn promiſe for his ſecurity. With regard to the parts of his conduct, which relate to the colluſion with that King which is objected to him, and his invaſion of the Geſhurites and Gezerites, and his preparing to fight againſt Saul; theſe particulars ſhall be examined in the following notes, as they come in order.

(15) 1 Chron. xiii. 1, 2, & ſeq. and 1 Sam. xxvii. 2.
(16) See father Calmet Comment. Literal ſur le 1 Livre des Rois, xxvii. 1.

[E] To give him a place in ſome town in the country.] He asked this in order to avoid envy; for perhaps he might have too much of the port of a King, having ſo many men in his ſervice, and being attended very probably with a conſiderable number of them about his perſon. Beſides he might more freely exerciſe his own religion in a private town, without any offence to the Philiſtines, who worſhipped other Gods (17). To which Monſieur Le Clerc adds another reaſon, that he might the more eaſily make excurſions into the adjacent parts for the ſake of plunder; ſive prædarum de vicinis populis agendarum rationem habeas (18.)

(17) See Calmet and Biſhop Patrick in locum.
(18) Comment. in 1 Samuel xxvii. 5.

requeſt Achiſh immediately complied with, and gave him Ziklag [F]. While David dwelt in this country, he uſed to make excurſions with his men, and plunder the people who lived in the parts adjacent [G], putting all the men and women to the ſword, to prevent any diſcovery; though at the ſame time he made Achiſh believe, that he went out to plunder the land of Judah [H]. This induced that King to place the greateſt confidence in him, imagining that by theſe ravages he would render his own nation irreconcileable to him, and ſo he would be perpetually engaged in his ſervice (c). Two years after this, when the Philiſtines were going out to fight with the Iſraelites, Achiſh ordered David to attend him to the battle, and told him, that he ſhould even truſt his life with him [I]. But the Philiſtines were ſuſpicious of his fidelity to them, and deſired the King to diſmiſs him [K], which he did at laſt with great reluctance, and the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his confidence in him (d) [L]. David therefore (c) 1 Sam. xxviii.

(d) Ch. xxix.

[F] And gave him Ziklag.] In the diviſion of the land of Canaan it was firſt given to the tribe of Judah (19), and afterwards to that of Simeon, who had a portion out of the land given to Judah (20). But the Philiſtines having taken it, kept poſſeſſion of it, till by Achiſh's gift it became the peculiar inheritance of David and his ſucceſſors, as appears from the firſt book of Samuel (21), where we are told that Ziklag pertaineth unto the Kings of Judah unto this day; which paſſage ſhews, that the author of that Book lived after the diviſion of the Kingdom into that of Judah and Iſrael (22).

(19) Joſh. xv. 31.

(20) Ch. xix. 5.

(21) Ch. xxvii. 6.

(22) Le Clerc and Calmet in locum.

[G] He uſed . . . to plunder the people, who lived in the parts adjacent.] Theſe people were the Geſhurites, Gezerites, and Amalekites. We know but little of the former people, except that they were ſituated on the South of Paleſtine, in the country between the Nile, and the land of the Philiſtines from Sihor which is before Egypt (23). The Geſhurites and Gezerites were both of them relicks of the Canaanites, whom God commanded to be rooted out (24). The Amalekites, who were near, had been deſtroyed by Saul, but not thoſe, who were afar off; or perhaps theſe were ſome who fled into theſe remote parts, when they heard Saul was coming againſt them. And the following words of David's ſaving neither man nor woman alive (25), muſt be underſtood, that he left none alive, whom he found in theſe parts, for there were ſtill Amalekites in other places (26). Theſe people were likewiſe devoted by God to deſtruction. Abarbinel imagines all the people here mentioned were at enmity with Achiſh, and hated him and his people; ſo that when David ſmote them, he made no complaint about it (27).

(23) Joſh. xiii. 2, 3. and xvi. 3.

(24) See Grotius in locum.

(25) 1 Sam. xxvii. 11.

(26) Ch. xxx. 1.

(27) Biſhop Patrick in locum.

[H] He made Achiſh believe, that he went out to plunder the land of Judah.] When that King ask'd, Whither he had made a rode that day? he replied, Againſt the South of Judah, and againſt the South of the Jerahmeelites, and againſt the South of the Kenites (28). Theſe countries lay on the South of Judah; the Jerahmeelites were a part of Judæa, the Kenites of the family of Jethro, were their neighbours and confederates. We find that David's anſwer to Achiſh was very artful, and expreſſed in ſuch ambiguous terms, that he might underſtand him, as if he had invaded the land of Judah. Such equivocations are certainly very unjuſtifiable, and inconſiſtent with David's general character in Scripture. Grotius refers us to the following paſſage of Diphilus, a Comic-poet a little later than Menander, which he applies to David's conduct upon this and another occaſion:

(28) 1 Sam. xxvii. 10.

Ὑπολαμβάνω τὸ ψεῦδος ἐπὶ σωτηρίᾳ
Λεγόμενον οὐδὲν περιποιεῖσθαι δυσχερές (29).

(29) Apud Grot. ad lib. 1. Regum, xxi. 1.

That is,

"I think, the man,
"Who ſpeaks a falſhood to ſecure his life,
"Commits no crime."

He quotes likewiſe two verſes of Euripides to the ſame purpoſe. But as that excellent author obſerves, how culpable ſoever ſuch prevarication may be, ſome allowances ought to be made to thoſe ages, wherein a future ſtate was not ſo clearly revealed; condonandum aliquid illis temporibus, latente multùm vitâ æternâ (30).

(30) Idem, ibid.

[I] Achiſh ordered David to attend him to the battle, and told him that he ſhould truſt his life with him.] When he told David, that he and his men ſhould go with him to the battle, David anſwered him, Surely thou ſhalt know what thy ſervant can do (31). The natural ſenſe of theſe words is, that he would give the King a proof of his ſincere attachment to his intereſt, by exerting all the ſtrength and valour he was maſter of in the battle. In this manner Achiſh and every unprejudiced perſon muſt neceſſarily underſtand him. But the queſtion is, whether this was David's meaning, and whether he ſpoke ſincerely upon that occaſion? If he uſed any equivocation, or had any reſervation in his thoughts, and if by ſuch an ambiguous anſwer he intended only to amuſe Achiſh, at the ſame time that he was reſolved to do nothing, which the other might reaſonably expect of him; and to wait for ſome proper opportunity of diſengaging himſelf from the obligation of his promiſe, and ſaving his honour; if this was his deſign, where was his ſincerity in the mean while? If it be ſaid, that by theſe expreſſions David meant nothing but that he would engage on the ſide of his own nation, and abandon the Philiſtines, or at leaſt continue neuter in the battle, this is to repreſent David in a light, which is by no means honourable. The generoſity of Achiſh, and the confidence which he repoſed in him deſerved other returns from him. In ſhort, to ſay that David was reſolved to fight for the Philiſtines againſt his own countrymen, and to plead that this was lawful for him to do, becauſe it was in defence of his ally, in a juſt war, and becauſe he had a right to vindicate his claim to the kingdom of Iſrael againſt Saul, who had unjuſtly perſecuted him; this manner of reaſoning would juſtify him in breaking through the ſtrongeſt obligations of nature, in order to gratify his revenge, and merely to ſecure the honour of being faithful to his ally, it would give him a right to trample upon every thing which was due from him to his country, his brethren, his King, and his own conſcience. It appears evident therefore, that we cannot poſſibly excuſe David upon this occaſion, but muſt acknowledge, that he had engaged too raſhly with Achiſh in this war (32).

(31) 1 Sam. xxviii. 2.

(32) See father Calmet in locum.

[K] Deſired the King to diſmiſs him.] The Princes of the Philiſtines judged very reaſonably, that David might, in order to reconcile himſelf with Saul, abandon them in the heat of the battle, and go over to the Iſraelites. And here there appears to be a peculiar turn of providence in his favour, which reſcued him from the moſt ſhocking dilemma's imaginable. If he had continued in the army of the Philiſtines, tho' he had not drawn his ſword againſt his own countrymen, yet this would have been a great obſtacle to his obtaining the Kingdom. For is it probable, that the Jews would have acknowledged his claim to it, when he had made ſuch a ſtrict alliance with the enemy? or that the Philiſtines would have given him leave to depart, in order to take poſſeſſion of a kingdom, which they were continually at war with (33)?

(33) Biſhop Patrick, Le Clerc, and Calmet in 1 Sam. xxix. 4.

[L] With great reluctance, and the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his confidence in him.] He ſwore to David, as the Lord liveth (34), that he did not doubt of his integrity. This oath of his was a little extraordinary in him, conſidering he was a Philiſtine. He ſwore by the God, whom David worſhipped, that he might be the more believed; or perhaps he had learned ſomething from him of the true God, tho' he worſhipped other Deities with him. Thus the Prophet Zephaniah (35) reproaches the Jews with ſwearing by the Lord, and by Malcham, or Melchom, who was the God of the Ammonites. The Pagans uſed

(34) 1 Sam. xxix. 6.

(35) Ch. i. 5.

therefore returned the next morning to Ziklag, which had been plundered during his abſence by the Amalekites. He ſtaid but a ſhort time with that King after the battle of Gilboa, in which Saul and his ſons were ſlain, for he removed from Ziklag to Hebron in the tribe of Judah (e); and from that time we have no account of Achiſh in Scripture.

(e) 2 Sam. i. 1, 2, &c.

uſed to ſwear by the Gods of thoſe people whom they had to deal with. But L. Capellus (36) is of opinion, that the Scripture in mentioning the oath of Achiſh, has expreſſed it in theſe terms, as the Lord liveth, in order to ſhew, that this King ſwore in his own manner, but as ſolemnly and inviolably, as if a Jew was to ſwear by the name of the Lord or Jehovah. When David began to expoſtulate with him, for refuſing him leave to fight againſt his enemies; Achiſh told him, that he knew that he was good in his ſight as an Angel of God (37). The meaning of which is, that he thought David as incapable of betraying him, as if he were an Angel deſcended from heaven. The notion of good and bad angels was propagated over all the Eaſt among the Heathens as well as the Jews (38). And this expreſſion, Thou art as an Angel of God, is to be found in many places of Scripture, and intimates the moſt profound reſpect and veneration for a perſon, and the wiſdom, juſtice, and goodneſs of him, to whom it is applied. Thus Jacob tells Eſau (39), that he had ſeen his face, as tho' he had ſeen the face of God, or of an Angel. The woman who was ſent by Joab, to obtain Abſalom's return, told David that he was as an Angel of God (40), and that he was wiſe, according to the wiſdom of an Angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth (41). Mephibosheth likewiſe uſed the ſame compliment to him (42). Such is the genius of the Eaſtern Nations; whoſe expreſſions are generally very ſtrong, elevated, and figurative.

(36) Not. Critic. ad Exod. vi. 2. apud Joan. Cleric. in 1 Sam. xxix. 6.

(37) 1 Sam. xxix. 9.

(38) See Sanctius in locum.

(39) Gen. xxxiii. 10.

(40) 2 Sam. xiv. 17.

(41) Ibid. ver. 20.

(42) Ibid. xix. 27.

ACHMET, ſon of Seirim, has left a book concerning the interpretation of dreams, according to the doctrine of the Indians, Perſians and Egyptians, which was tranſlated out of Greek into Latin, about the year 1160, by Leo Tuſcus (a), who dedicated it to Hugo Echerianus [A]. It was publiſhed in Latin anno 1577 (b), from a very imperfect manuſcript found in the Library of Sambucus (c), as a work of Apomaſares (d); but the learned Leunclavius informed the public of this miſtake in his Annals of the Turks (e). Rigaltius firſt publiſhed this work in Greek, and annexed it (becauſe of the ſimi-litude of the ſubjects) to Artimedorus, which he printed at Paris in 1603, but did not make any alteration in the Latin verſion of Leunclavius, or gave any notes on the text (f). He is of opinion, that Achmet ſon of Seirim, is the ſame whom Geſner mentions. The latter was ſon to Habramius, and a Phyſician, and wrote a work divided into ſeven books, entitled, Peregrinantium Viatica, i. e. Proviſions for Travellers, which was in Greek in the Library of Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, the Emperor's Embaſſador at Venice, when Geſner was writing his book (g). John Anthony Sarrazin was poſſeſſed of the ſame work (h), as he himſelf aſſures us in his notes on Dioſcorides. In the two Greek manuſcripts in the French King's Library, from which Rigaltius publiſhed the book of Dreams, we don't meet with the name of Achmet ſon of Seirim, as author of this work; yet as the beginning is wanting, we may ſuppoſe, that when theſe manuſcripts were complete, our author's name was at the head of them. However, this is but mere conjecture, which may be ſtrengthened from this circumſtance, viz. that Achmet's name has been writ on one of the two copies in a freſher hand. This name was not inſerted in the copy from which Leo Tuſcus, in the twelfth Century, made his Latin tranſlation, which is inferred from Tricaſſo's (i) Italian verſion of this work. Rigaltius tranſlated the preface into Latin, although he ſuppoſes that it was written by Leo Tuſcus (k), and not by Achmet. Barthius had this Leo's verſion in his poſſeſſion, and thinks this copy was written in that tranſlator's time (l). The extracts he gives of this tranſlation, ſhew that it was not a literal one, and that a great many particulars had been omitted. The moſt remarkable circumſtance is, that we find the names of Achmet, and of Seirim, in the title of the manuſcript, with thoſe of Syrnacham, Baram and Tarphan. The firſt of the three laſt mentioned perſonages (m), was interpreter of dreams in the court of the King of the Indies; the ſecond in that of Saaniſan King of Perſia; and the third in that of Pharaoh King of Egypt (n); whence Barthius conjectures, that both Achmet and Seirim alſo interpreted dreams in the court of ſome barbarian Monarch. Be this as it will, the work in queſtion was compiled by a Chriſtian, for the author begins it in the name of the bleſſed Trinity (o). Rigaltius thinks, that the Greek text is only an old tranſlation of this work, and indeed, it was firſt written in Arabic.

According to Lambecius, Achmet lived in the ninth Century, in the court of Mamoun, Khalif of Babylon; but du Cange is of another opinion, for which conſult his Greek Gloſſary, under the word Μαμῶν.

(a) Rigaltii Præf. Libri Achmetis.

(b) By Leunclavius, at Frankfort, in 8°.

(c) Barthius, Adverſ. lib. 31. cap. 14.

(d) i. e. Abumaſher ſeu Albumaſur. Vide Catal. Oxoniens. p. 35.

(e) Rigaltii Præf. in Achmet.

(f) 'Tis however ſaid ſo in the Bodleian catalogue, p. 5.

(g) Geſn. Biblioth. fol. 2. verſo.

(h) Rigalt. Præf. in Achmet.

(i) Patrizio Tricaſſo di Ceresari, Mantuan: ſee the Bibliotheque de du Verdier, p. 940.

(k) Ex præfat. Rigaltii.

(l) Barthii Adverſar. lib. 31. cap. 14.

(m) Syrbacham, in editione Rigaltii.

(n) This is manifeſt from the beginning of the 2d, 3d and 4th chapters of the book.

(o) Vide the end of chapter II.

[A] Hugo Echerianus.] Barthius calls him Hugo Eteriarius, and ſays he was an excellent writer, Scriptorem ævo ſuo luculentum (1). There is a typographical error in Barthius, as alſo in the following words of Rigaltius, Hugoni Echeriano dedicavit; i. e. He dedicated to Hugo Echerianus, for it ſhould have been, Hugonem Eterianum, Hugoni Eteriano. Allatius in the eleventh chapter of the ſecond book de perpetuo conſenſu Eccleſiæ Occidentalis & Orientalis, writes Hugo Ætherianus, which is wrong. Baronius, Bellarmine, and ſeveral others write it Hugo Etherianus; but Eterianus is more correct. He was an Eccleſiaſtical writer in the twelfth Century. This was communicated to me by Mr. de la Monnoie.

(1) Barth. Adverſ. lib. 31. cap. 14.

☞ACHMET. The firſt Sultan of that name ſucceeded his father Mahomet III. in the year 1013 of the Hegira, A. C. 1604. Several happy circumſtances concurred to advance him quietly to the Imperial crown. The firſt was that his father did not die die ſooner, for whilſt Mahmud Achmet's elder brother was alive [A], he could have no hopes of aſcending the throne. Secondly, he was not obliged to ſpill the blood of the Royal Family, as is generally the cruel policy of the Sultans; for Achmet had only one brother, who was then but four years old, and whoſe life was ſpared [B], becauſe it was yet unknown whether Achmet could ever have any children, he having not yet converſed with women. The third circumſtance favourable for him was, that he was near at hand in the Seraglio when Mahomet his father died, and thus aſcended the throne, the very moment it became vacant. The firſt thing he did after being ſeated on it was, to remove out of the Seraglio the Sultaneſs his grandmother [C], who had enjoyed a great power during the reign of Mahomet Achmet's father. Achmet's

[A] Whilſt Mahmud his elder brother was alive.] Mahomet a little before he died ſacrificed Mahmud his eldeſt ſon to his jealouſy and to reaſons of ſtate; becauſe that young Prince, in concert with his mother, fomented the broils and troubles of the Empire, and ſtirring up the factious humour of the Janiſſaries, he might probably deſign to wreſt the ſcepter out of his father's hands. Mahmud's death was approved by the Muſti and by the grand Viſir, as neceſſary to prevent a civil war that was likely to break out. By his death, Achmet was advanced to the throne, at a time when he could expect nothing but to be killed by his elder brother, who himſelf periſhed unfortunately by the hands of the executioner (1).

(1) Sagredo, Hiſt. de l'Empire Ottoman, traduit de l'Italien, par Mr. Laurent. tom. 5. lib. 10. p. 240.

[B] Achmet had only one brother — whoſe life was ſpared.] This young Prince's name was Muſtapha; as he grew up, his brother began to be jealous of him; his jealouſy increaſed afterwards to ſuch a degree, that he at laſt commanded two Officers to ſtrangle him. He gave that order juſt as he was going to embark on a little pleaſure-boat, to divert himſelf upon the canal of the ſeraglio. But a great ſtorm ariſing ſuddenly, Achmet went aſhore again; and being perſuaded this ſtorm was a ſign that heaven would not approve the death of an innocent Prince, he countermanded the order he had given; thus young Muſtapha was ſaved providentially: and Achmet's fear of him was for ſome time ſuppreſſed. But ſtate-jealouſy can never be entirely eradicated: Achmet ſoon began again to ſuſpect his brother, and gave new orders to have him diſpatched; however he had no ſooner pronounced the words, but he was taken with a violent cholic; this he took again for a ſign, that heaven forbad him to be guilty of ſo cruel an action, and he repealed a ſecond time the command he had given. To this accidental cholic Muſtapha was indebted for his life, and we may affirm (ſays the author from whom we borrow this) that Muſtapha had more obligation to his brother's belly, than to that of his mother. The two accidents we have mentioned, made ſo deep an impreſſion on Achmet's mind, that the hatred and jealouſy he had conceived againſt his brother, were changed into ſo great and ſurprizing love and fondneſs, that Achmet choſe his brother to ſucceed him, preferring him to his own children; an inſtance unheard of in the Ottoman Empire (2).

(2) Id. ibid. p. 304.

[C] Remove out of the ſeraglio the Sultaneſs his grandmother.] Her name was Baffa; ſhe was born at Venice, of the family of the Baffo's. She was taken very young in a ſhip, which was to carry her father into the iſland of Corſou, of which he had been made Governor. As ſoon as ſhe was received in the ſeraglio, Amurath fell in love with her, and had ſeveral children by her, of whom Mahomet Achmet's father was one. As Baffa was exceedingly beautiful, ſhe for ſeveral years had a great aſcendant over Amurath, who during that time loved no other woman but her. But Valida Amurath's mother exaſperated at Baffa's power, reſolved to diſengage her ſon from her; for this purpoſe ſhe endeavoured to make him love ſome other women. There was at that time in the ſeraglio a ſlave, who ſeemed more artful and ſprightly, than beautiful: ſhe danced perfectly well, and had the art of making the harmony of her voice agree with the motions of her feet. Amurath ſhewed ſome inclination for her, but he ſeemed more pleaſed with her good qualities than with her perſon. This did not hinder Baffa to conceive a violent jealouſy againſt that ſlave; and fearing leſt this riſing paſſion ſhould deprive her of Amurath's love, ſhe left no means untried to hinder him from indulging it; ſhe engaged ſome Jewiſh women, with whom ſhe was intimate, to make certain charms which might diſable Amurath from gratifying his paſſion with his new miſtreſs. But unhappily for Baffa the whole intrigue was diſcovered by Valida, who acquainted Amurath with it. This exaſperated him againſt his wife to ſuch a degree that his love was changed into a mortal hatred, and he reſolved never to favour her again with his embraces. The charms, which Baffa made uſe of had a quite contrary effect to what ſhe expected. For Amurath having a mind to try whether theſe charms would prevent his enjoying other women beſides his wife, lay with ſeveral, which he had never done before, and he found ſo much pleaſure in it, that he ſometimes, in one night, gratified his paſſion with two or three women; and as the Mahometan religion does not allow a man to paſs from the embraces of one woman to thoſe of another, without being firſt purified in a bath, Amurath by going often two or three times in one night into it, entirely ruined his conſtitution, and became ſubject to epileptick fits. Thus Baffa loſt her husband's affection, by the very means, whereby ſhe thought to endear him to herſelf only: This made her loſe alſo her power and authority, which by all her arts and ſubtlety ſhe could never recover during the life of her husband (3). But when after his death Mahomet her ſon by him had aſcended the throne, ſhe again obtained great authority, and had the largeſt ſhare in the Government of the empire; ſo that the Sultan himſelf durſt not undertake the leaſt affair without her conſent (4). She had ordered all the Baſſa's to acquaint the Sultan only with good news, and never to let him hear of the misfortunes which befel the empire, leſt the grief it might occaſion ſhould impair his health; or rather leſt the danger of the ſtate ſhould oblige him to command the armies in perſon, by which means ſhe would loſe all her power and authority (5). Thus poor mortals are often delivered up to the ambition or the covetouſneſs of a woman; and the ſovereign power, which was eſtabliſhed for the good of the whole, is abuſed for the benefit of a few only, to the prejudice and often to the deſtruction of whole nations. However, this muſt not be always laid to the charge of Princes, for tho' ſome like Mahomet III, are indolent and neglect the affairs of ſtate, merely to indulge the moſt baſe and ſhameful paſſions, yet there are others, who would exert their authority for the good of their ſubjects, if it lay in their power: but being ſurrounded with ambitious Miniſters and crafty Courtiers they are often left unacquainted with the misfortunes of their people. "There is ſeldom a Prince ſo bad," ſays an ingenious author (6), "but his Miniſter is worſe ſtill: "If the Prince does an evil action, it is at the inſti- "gation of others; ſo that the ambition of Princes "is never ſo dangerous to a nation, as the baſe and "groveling ſouls of his Counſellors. — A Miniſter "acquainted with the paſſions of his Prince has the "art of making them ſubſervient to his own views: "Courtiers inſnare the Monarch with their deceit- "ful praiſes, and the Miniſter flatters him ſtill more "dangerouſly, by the advice he gives him, by the "deſigns and views he propoſes, and by the perni- "cious principles with which he inſpires him." This is particularly found in thoſe countries where the Government is arbitrary as it is in Turky: There an artful woman and an ambitious and covetous Miniſter frequently involve the ſtate in a thouſand calamities, under a laſcivious and indolent Prince. Happy therefore are the people, who have a national Council or a Parliament, who have the liberty

(3) Id. ibid. tom. 4. lib. 8. p. 238-241.

(4) Ibid. tom. 5. lib. 9. p. 2.

(5) Ibid. p. 12.

(6) Lettres Perſanes, tom. 2. Let. 112. p. 211.

met's own mother born in Boſnia ſucceeded her in the Seraglio [D]. The new Sultan to ingratiate himſelf with his ſubjects appeared every day in public, and it was given out that he would go and command in perſon the army which was then in Hungary, and the Mufti himſelf declared all thoſe heretics, who would not believe it, though he knew this was ſpread abroad only to amuſe the people. Achmet was circumciſed according to the cuſtom of the Mahometans, who circumciſe their children when they are thirteen years of age, in imitation of Iſhmael, who was circumciſed at that age, and from whom the Arabians pretend to be deſcended. As ſoon as Achmet was healed, ſeveral beautiful women were introduced to him to enjoy his firſt embraces, on which occaſion great rejoicings were made among the people [E]. The Turks were then at war with the Emperor of Germany, but they did not carry it on very vigorouſly. This with the great progreſs the rebels made in Aſia [F], and the weakneſs of the government, which was in the hands of a woman (a), gave the Sophi of Perſia (b) a fair opportunity of entering the provinces of the Sultan, and recovering the countries he had formerly loſt. He took the field with a powerful army, and joining with the Georgians, he conquered a great part of thoſe countries, which the Turks had uſurped from the Perſians. It is not to be expreſſed how much the Ottoman court was affected at this, at a time when the whole Empire was in a manner torn to pieces by domeſtic broils and diviſions. However, an able General was ſent againſt the Perſians, but he was ſo unfortunate as to be entirely routed by the enemy in the firſt battle. He acquaintad Achmet with this misfortune, and deſired him to come himſelf as far as Aleppo or Damaſcus, in order to retrieve the affairs of the Empire by his preſence; but the young Prince was ſo much taken with the pleaſures he enjoyed among the fair-ones of the Seraglio, that he did not concern himſelf with the State, and ſeemed to have entirely forgot the glory which his predeceſſors had acquired, and reſolved to follow his father's example, whoſe indolence had almoſt brought the Empire to the brink of ruin. However Achmet was at laſt prevailed upon to advance as far as Burſa, and to declare that he would go in perſon againſt the rebels. Accordingly ſome millions of money were ſpent in making the neceſſary preparations for that journey, as is always the cuſtom, when the Sultan himſelf intends to command his army. Achmet went to Burſa, where he continued four days; but as his bare preſence was not enough to vanquiſh the enemy, a ſtrong army being wanted for that purpoſe, which Achmet had not, he returned to Conſtantinople without having done any thing, except ſpending a large ſum of money. What rendred the condition of the Empire more miſerable and wretched, was that the money, which was levied on the people, inſtead of being brought into the treaſury, was embezzled by the receivers, who grew rich at the public coſt. To raiſe money the Mufti adviſed Achmet to borrow from the treaſurers

(a) Achmet's mother.

(b) Who was then Abas the Great, of whom we have given an account.

of approaching the throne, and can lay before the Sovereign the misfortunes and hardſhips of the people. But under a bad Prince "ſuch aſſemblies are "always importunate and odious: they addreſs Kings "only to acquaint them with ſad truths; and whilſt "a crowd of Courtiers make them believe that the "people are happy under their Government, they "contradict theſe flatteries, and lay before them "the ſighs and tears of the nation (7)."

(7) Id. ibid. Let. 124. p. 264, 265.

[D] Achmet's own mother ſucceeded her in the ſeraglio.] She was born in Boſnia; Mahomet Gira a Baſſa had made a preſent of her to the Sultan Mahomet. She was very beautiful, danced extremely well, and played admirably on ſeveral inſtruments: To acknowledge the favour which Gira beſtowed on her by introducing her to the Sultan, ſhe made him ſeveral rich preſents, particularly of jewels and ſumptuous veſts (8). She had almoſt the ſame aſcendant and authority, which Baſſa, whom ſhe ſucceeded in the ſeraglio, had enjoyed (9). When this latter was removed, ſhe could not conceal her grief and reſentment; but went away with her women who with her ſelf burſted into tears, and out of ſpite broke the windows of the ſeraglio. Baſſa earneſtly deſired leave to ſee the Sultan, but could not prevail upon the Prime-Viſir to let her enjoy that conſolation: The Viſir to prevent any interview between her and Achmet, perſuaded him that this Sultaneſs and all her women were witches; that by their enchantments and charms they had uſurped the Government of the empire, and had ruined the ſtate by their male-adminiſtration. And indeed this woman had ſold all the employments both civil and military; favouring only ſuch perſons as were rich, and neglecting men of merit. She had diſſuaded the Sultan from the practice of all military exerciſes, and rendred him effeminate by keeping him conſtantly ſhut up in the ſeraglio; in a word, ſays my author (10), ſhe had done great ſervice to the Chriſtians, and almoſt ruined the Ottoman empire.

(8) Sagredo, ubi ſupra, tom. 5. liv. 10. p. 245.

(9) Ibid. p. 247.

(10) Id. ibid. p. 244, 245.

[E] On which occaſion great rejoicings were made among the people.] Beſides bonfires and other public demonſtrations of joy, there was a kind of a town erected, which they called Vienna; this town was beſieged, ſtormed, and finally taken after ſeveral aſſaults; and the Sultan entered it through the breach, with great ſhoutings of all the ſoldiers and of the people, who looked upon this as a very good omen of the future victories of the Sultan (11): but they were unhappily diſappointed in their hopes, ſince the Sultan was unſucceſsful in moſt of his enterprizes.

(11) Vanel, Abregé nouveau de l'Hiſtoire generale des Turcs, tom. 3. p. 290, 291.

[F] The great progreſs the rebels made in Aſia.] They had begun to revolt in Aſia and Caramania under Mahomet III. They gave out that their General was a Prince of the Ottoman blood, called Selim, ſon of Amurath and brother of Mahomet. They were joined by a great number of malecontents, who love novelties, and ſubſiſt only in civil broils and troubles. Mahomet employed all poſſible means to ſuppreſs this rebellion in its infancy: Selim was betrayed and delivered up to the Sultan for a ſum of money. This unfortunate man was brought to Conſtantinople, where he was cloſely examined by the Sultan himſelf. He aſſerted conſtantly that he was the Sultan's brother; he told him how he had been ſaved by his mother, when Mahomet ordered nineteen of his brothers to be ſtrangled (12); he declared that he had been hid, and that the Viſir Mahomet had put ſecretly in his place another child, who was very much like him. The Sultan hearing this deſired to know the opinion of the Baſſa's, who anſwered that this ſtory of Selim was very probable; hereupon Mahomet reſolved to ſacrifice this young Prince to his own ſecurity: but this did not ſuppreſs the rebellion, which laſted ſeveral years longer, even till after the death of Achmet, and very much weakened the Ottoman empire (13).

(12) Sagredo, ubi ſupra, p. 3.

(13) Id. ibid. p. 104, 105.

rers of the Moſques all their ready caſh [G], which was deſigned for religious uſes, and of which they had vaſt ſums; this was complied with, but in a little time the Sultan again wanted money to carry on the war againſt Perſia; Deruis the Grand Viſir found out an expedient to get money, which coſt him very dear [H]. But this was not ſufficient to reſtore the affairs of the Empire, haraſſed at that time by three different wars, viz. againſt the Emperor, the Perſians, and the Rebels. However, Achmet at laſt reſolved to conclude a peace with the Emperor, who was prevailed upon by his Miniſters to accept the conditions offered him, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of Baſta [I], the Emperor's General in Tranſilvania. This peace with the Emperor, muſt probably have rendered Achmet more ſucceſsful againſt the Perſians; but what could armies ill-paid and worſe diſciplined perform under an effeminate and idle Prince, governed by a woman? The Perſians went on ſucceſsfully, and in the year 1615 they gained a great victory over the Turks, which however did not prevent the Sophi from making that very ſame year a peace with Achmet, after the war had laſted a hundred and fifty years, having been only now and then interrupted by a ſhort peace, or to ſpeak more properly, by a ceſſation of arms. It may ſeem ſurpriſing that the Perſians, though ſo proſperous at that time, could be prevailed upon to make peace with the Turks. But it muſt be conſidered that the countries belonging to the Sophi having been a long time the ſeat of the war, and conſtantly haraſſed either by the armies of their own party, or by the enemy, became barren and uncultivated, and were exhauſted of men; ſo that there was a neceſſity for the Sophi to put a ſtop to a war, which though carried on ever ſo ſucceſsfully, would at laſt ruin his [G] The Mufti adviſed Achmet to borrow from the Treaſurers of the moſques all their caſh.] The reaſons, which the Mufti gave for this extraordinary procedure was this, "It is juſt, ſaid he, that every "part ſhould contribute ſomething to the preſerva- "tion of the whole; and as all the houſes muſt ne- "ceſſarily be involved in the general ruin of a ci- "ty, ſo if the Monarchy be deſtroyed, the law and "the moſques cannot eſcape (14)." The Mufti himſelf did not ſcruple to ſign this opinion with his own hand. And indeed it is but reaſonable, that the Clergy as well as the Laity ſhould pay their quota of the public taxes neceſſary to maintain the ſtate.

(14) Id. ibid. p. 251, 252.

[H] Deruis the Grand-Viſir found out an expedient to get money, which coſt him very dear.] He obliged three Jews who were vaſtly rich, to pay a large ſum of money: the pretence he made uſe of to drain them thus was, that they had received ſome casks of oil, without paying the duty. The Jews in Turky were rich, becauſe they farmed ſeveral branches of the public revenue, and had a ſhare in the coining of money; not to mention the riches they amaſſed by trade. Deruis, who was very well acquainted with this, intended to ruin them; but the Jews having ſome hint of it, reſolved to prevent him. They began to cabal ſecretly againſt him; they exclaimed againſt his adminiſtration, and imputed to him all the misfortunes of the ſtate; and diſperſing money among thoſe who approached the Sultan, they gave him artfully to underſtand, that the Viſir was poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſures. Achmet eaſily believed it, and ordered the Viſir to come to him. Deruis obeyed, and immediately the Sultan commanded his head to be ſtruck off, and would be himſelf a witneſs of his death, by which he got eight hundred thouſand ſequins. The Jews rejoiced exceedingly at the death of that man, who had vowed their deſtruction (15).

(15) Ibid. p. 271, 272.

[I] The Emperor was prevailed upon by his Miniſters to accept the peace, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of Baſta.] Baſta was the ſon of Demetrius a Nobleman of Albania, but he was born in Montferrat*, where his father was Captain of a troop of light-horſe. From his youth Baſta had diſcovered great bravery, and was born for war: he firſt bore arms under the famous Duke of Alba in Flanders, and having paſſed through the ſeveral ſtations in the army, he at laſt was made General of all the forces of the houſe of Auſtria, in which poſt he greatly encreaſed his reputation, and that of the German ſoldiers (16). He commanded the Emperor's army againſt the Turks, over which he gained ſeveral victories; but the glory he acquired raiſed him a great many enemies at court. When the peace we have mentioned in the text of this article was propoſed to the Emperor, he deſired to have Baſta's advice on this occaſion, who anſwered in the following manner: "Chriſtendom "and Turky are two contrary elements; it is im- "poſſible they ſhould reſide near one another with- "out being at war. The Sultan ſees that your Impe- "rial Majeſty is in a condition to reſiſt him, he "therefore propoſes a truce, which is proper only "to damp and extinguiſh the courage of your ar- "mies: Now your ſoldiers are fired; now they ne- "ver fight the Turks without gaining the victory "over them; theſe would have them linger in idle- "neſs and forget the art of war, that they may "the more eaſily overcome them, when they will "be no more inured to the hardſhips of military "diſcipline." He afterwards adviſes the Emperor to ſolicit the Pope to ſend Legates a latere to all the Chriſtian Princes, entreating them to join all their forces towards maintaining the Chriſtian cauſe, and to compel them to it by eccleſiaſtical cenſures in caſe they will not readily comply. He then goes on in this manner: "Liberty, tho' bought at ever ſo dear a "rate, is more glorious than ſlavery, tho' it may "flatter us with enjoying peace and tranquillity. "Let us not ſuffer the infidels to oblige us to make "peace or war at their pleaſure: this is a kind of "dependance which will at laſt degenerate into a "perfect bondage. 'Tis not out of kindneſs for us "that they now propoſe a peace; thus they are "forc'd to from the miſerable ſtate of their affairs; "it is to the Perſians and not to them that we owe "the peace they offer us. The Sophi's ſoldiers, who "have gained ſo many victories over them, have "inſpired them with this pacific humour: but this "humour will laſt only as long as their domeſtic "broils and diviſions; when theſe are ſuppreſſed they "will attack us again, and that with ſo much more "fury and rage, that nothing will then reſtrain their "ambition. They ceaſe to make war only to take "breath, and will renew it, when their forces are "recruited, and that ours through indolence and "ſloth ſhall be impaired and weakened. But we "ſhould conſider that thoſe things which are agree- "able to the intereſt of our enemy are inconſiſtent "with our own. In caſe we will not betray it, we "then muſt puſh on the war vigorouſly againſt the "Turks, whilſt they are not in a condition to reſiſt "us (17)." Theſe were the reaſons which Baſta offered to the Emperor's conſideration, to diſſuade him from concluding the peace with the Sultan. But the Emperor's Miniſters, who, as we have ſaid, envied Baſta's reputation, miſrepreſented all his reaſons; they ſaid, That ſoldiers were always for war, and were never tired of it, becauſe it enriched them: That Baſta's advice was owing merely to a principle of ſelf-intereſt; and that in affairs of war, he would never ſay, it is enough. They alſo repreſented to the Emperor, that his treaſury was exhauſted, that the Turks were ſtill powerful, and that the peace was neceſſary for the eaſe of his ſubjects who had been harraſſed by a long war, and for that of his provinces, which were deſolate, as having been a long time the ſeat of war (18). What is very ſurprizing in this affair is, that the Emperor ſent preſents to the Sultan

(16) Id. ibid. p. 157.

(17) Ibid. p. 277-281.

(18) Ibid. pag. 282.

* In Italy.

his country. Before this peace was concluded, Naſuf, a very rich and proud man [K], and born in Albania, had been ſent againſt the Perſians, but he ſoon returned to Conſtantinople, where Achmet received him with great diſtinction. Naſuf had brought with him a million of money, and began to ſhew openly his haughtineſs and pride; he prevailed upon the Sultan to leave Conſtantinople, and made the people believe that it was to undertake ſome affairs of the greateſt importance; but all this vaniſhed into ſmoke, Naſuf's only view being to govern the Sultan more abſolutely, and probably that he might the eaſier prevail with him to conclude a peace with the Perſians, which he did accordingly, as we have ſaid above; on which occaſion the Sophi ſent an Embaſſador to the Sultan, who out of pride would make a ſhew of his magnificence before that Embaſſador; for which purpoſe he returned to Conſtantinople, and made his entry into that city on horſeback, being followed by all his children. This was a new thing with regard to the Turks, for it was never the cuſtom of the Ottoman Emperors to permit their children to appear in public. This was a contrivance of Naſuf, who then governed the Empire abſolutely and with an inſufferable haughtineſs, which at laſt drew upon him the ruin he deſerved [L]. Achmet's death ſoon followed that of this Viſir; he died in the year 1616, being then about twenty ſix years old. He was of a middle ſtature, of a weak conſtitution, and was pitted with the ſmall-pox; he ſquinted, and his countenance was very ſour and ſevere. He had no manner of education, and being very ignorant, was alſo very preſumptuous and vain. He was paſſionate and cruel to the utmoſt degree, which cauſed the death of ſeveral of his beſt officers. A ſlave to his mother and to his favourites, they alone governed or rather ruined the Empire in his name. He had a great depth of thought, and formed ſeveral extenſive projects; but he was always wavering, and wanted courage to proſecute his deſigns; he neglected the moſt important affairs to amuſe himſelf with trifles. In ſhort he degenerated from the glory and virtue of his anceſtors; he led a ſhort and inglorious life, and died in the prime of his years and in the ſtrength of his paſſions and vices (c). The only remarkable thing he did, was the building of a Moſque, which he intended to make more ſtately and magnificent than any built by his predeceſſors; for which purpoſe he employed a prodigious number of workmen, and ſpent five millions of gold, which however would have been better beſtowed upon his armies in Perſia and in Hungary. The Turks ſaid that there was a great deal of ſumptuouſneſs but no devotion in that building, becauſe the Sultan ſhould firſt have thought of a fund to maintain it; and ſhould not have built it, till he had won a kingdom from the Chriſtians, the revenue of which might be aſſigned to maintain that Moſque. The Mufti alſo publickly declared, that the prayers offered up in that Moſque would not be acceptable to God, in caſe the conqueſt abovementioned was not firſt made (d).

(c) Taken from Sagredo, Hiſtoire de l'Empire Ottoman, Traduit de l'Italien, par Mr. Laurent. tom. 5. liv. 10. p. 242---323.

(d) Ibid. p. 303.

Sultan to the value of fifty thouſand florins, tho' the Turks themſelves would have bought the peace very dear (19). But this probably was managed by ſome Courtiers who had their own private views, and court-intrigues are not always eaſily unravelled.

(19) Ibid.

[K] Naſuf a very proud man.] His pride was very much heightened by his alliance with the family of the Sultan, whoſe daughter he married, tho' ſhe was not five years old. Such an alliance is ſo glorious to Baſſas, and gains them ſuch immenſe riches, that they are all rivals with regard to a Sultan's daughter, and marry them very young, for fear another ſhould get the ſtart of them. Naſuf's view in marrying that young Lady was, that he might have an honourable opportunity of leaving the command of the army, and of being near the Sultan's perſon, in order to ſuperintend the affairs of the empire, which the weak and indolent Achmet could not manage himſelf.

[L] Naſuf's haughtineſs at laſt drew upon him the ruin he deſerved.] The other Baſſas, who could no longer bear with his pride, accuſed him of keeping the Sultan from being acquainted with the true ſtate of affairs: of concealing from him all bad news, and of telling him only what might be acceptable to him. They ſaid that his covetouſneſs and temerity had been ſo great, that he had reſerved to himſelf half of the hundred balls of ſilk which the Perſian Embaſſador had brought by way of a preſent for the Sultan. Theſe things obliged Achmet to order this greedy Miniſter to be immediately ſtrangled, for fear he ſhould poſſeſs himſelf of all the riches of the Empire. Naſuf died poſſeſſed of greater riches than any of the Viſirs his predeceſſors, becauſe he alone had been a greater tyrant than all of them put together. Above a million of ſequins were found hid in different parts of his houſe; beſides one thouſand and eighteen ſables ſet with precious ſtones; and among them one ſet with diamonds, and valued at fifty thouſand crowns. They alſo found in his houſe a vaſt many gold carpets, and all ſorts of rich Perſian ſtuffs. There were in his ſtables above a thouſand horſes, whoſe capariſons were embroidered with gold and pearls; and at his country-ſeats he bred ſix thouſand camels (20).

(20) Ibid. p. 321, 322.

☞ACHMET GEDUC a famous General under Mahomet II. and Bajazet II. was born in Albania (a), and lived in the fifteenth Century (b). Mahomet II. ſent him in the year 1480 to the coaſt of Apulia with a fleet of an hundred ſhips and twenty thouſand men, upon pretence, as it was then given out, only to plunder the country and to get ſlaves. This fleet coming before Otranto (c), and Achmet perceiving that the garriſon did not ſally out, but kept cloſe within the walls, concluded from thence that they were afraid; a circumſtance which encouraged him to land his forces, which he accordingly did, and got an immenſe booty in the adjacent country; and as he had found no reſiſtance, he reſolved to attack the town, being perſuaded that it might be taken at the expence of very little blood. The ſucceſs anſwered his expectation, for the Chriſtians ſcarce making any reſiſtance, the Turks ſoon overpowered them, and took the town ſword in hand (d). The Archbiſhop and Francis Zarlo the Governor having taken ſhelter in the Cathedral Church with the principal inhabitants, were all killed by the enemy; the women and children were carried into Greece, and there ſold to the higheſt bidder for

(a) Sagredo, Hiſt. de l'Empire Ottoman, traduit par Mr. Laurent. tom. 1. liv. II. p. 300.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) A Sea-port town in Apulia, in the kingdom of Naples.

(d) Sagredo, ibid. p. 288, 289.

for ſlaves. Achmet being willing to carry the news himſelf of this conqueſt to the Sultan, and to inform him of what was neceſſary in order to make a further progreſs in the kingdom of Naples, ſailed with his fleet to Conſtantinople, having left eight thouſand men at Otranto, and ammunition for a whole year. But Mahomet II. dying a little after, and great diviſions ariſing in the Ottoman Empire, Achmet could not return to Italy as he had propoſed; and the Duke of Calabria having beſieged Otranto, and taken ſome outworks, the garriſon finding they could receive no ſupplies from Turky, ſurrendred the town upon very favourable conditions. Mahomet II. dled in 1482, and left only two ſons, Bajazet and Zezim, Muſtapha his eldeſt ſon dying eight or nine years (e) before him [A]. Bajazet and Zezim both claimed the Imperial crown, and reſolved to decide their conteſt at the point of the ſword. Achmet ſided with the former [B], and by his bravery and conduct fixed the crown on Bajazet's head (f). But that brave General found by ſad experience, that too ſhining a virtue and too bright a glory are unpardonable crimes in the eyes of a Tyrant; for Bajazet forgetting how much he was indebted to Achmet, took away his life, by whom he had been raiſed to the throne [C] (g). We will (e) Id. ibid. p. 295.

(f) Id. ib. pag. 295. 297.

(g) Id. ibid. p. 300.

[A] Muſtapha his eldeſt ſon dying eight or nine years before him.] He died a little after the great victory which the Turks gained over the Perſians in the year 1473. This is all that Sagredo (1), and Vanel (2), who barely copies and abridges the former, tell us. And by their manner of expreſſing themſelves concerning the death of Muſtapha, no one would ſuppoſe, that he died a violent death. This however he did, if we may believe Abbé Vertot, who tells us alſo ſeveral curious particulars concerning our Achmet, which we will give in this remark and the next. The occaſion of Muſtapha's death was as follows, according to Monſieur Vertot: "That young Prince, ſays he (3), "the partner of his father's labours and of "his glory, the ſupport of the throne, and the hopes "of the people, was ſoon cut off in the bloom of "youth. Achmet Geduc, one of the principal "Baſſas of the Ottoman port had a very beautiful "wife. Muſtapha had the misfortune to meet her "as ſhe was going into the bath; and notwithſtanding the ſevere precaution preſcribed to the Turkiſh women, not to appear in public without being cloſely veiled, ſhe could not reſiſt the ſecret pleaſure of giving Muſtapha a glimpſe of her beauty. A corner of her veil ſlipt out of her hand, but ſhe got hold of it immediately again; and ſhewed the more reſervedneſs only to excite the young man's curioſity the more. The Courtiers, a ſlaviſh ſpecies of men, did not fail criminally to commend the riſing paſſion of the Prince, who ſince the great exploits he had atchieved thought himſelf above the laws. Muſtapha follows Achmet's wife to the bath, forces into a place forbidden to men, ſurprizes her in an indecent dreſs, and tranſported by his paſſion, gains a victory, which perhaps was not much diſputed. Achmet was ſoon informed of this; and being enraged at the injury, he runs to the ſeraglio, proſtrates himſelf at the Sultan's feet, plucks off his beard, tears his cloaths, and by his tears and cries acquaints the Sultan with his wife's misfortune, or rather with his own. Mahomet had before been uneaſy at the proud and haughty temper of his ſon; however he would not humble himſelf ſo far as to blame his conduct before a ſubject; he therefore diſſembled his reſentment, and looking ſcornfully on Achmet, Thy wife and thou, ſays he to him, are ye not my ſlaves; and is it not too much honour for you to contribute to the pleaſure of my children? With this hard anſwer he ſent away Achmet; but at the ſame time ordered his ſon to appear before him, when with an air that made the moſt reſolute men of his court tremble, he rebuked him moſt ſeverely, and drove him from his preſence; and hearing afterwards that this young Prince went out of the ſeraglio full of indignation, and murmuring at the hard uſage he had met with, he ordered him to be ſtrangled."

(1) Hiſt. de l'Empir. Ottoman, Traduit par Mr. Laurent. t. 1. lib. 2. p. 295.

(2) Abregé de l'Hiſtoire generale des Turcs, t. 2. pag. 169.

(3) Hiſt. des Chevaliers de Malte, tom. 2. liv. 7. p. 277, &c. ed. in 4°.

[B] Achmet ſided with the former.] It was ſurprizing that Achmet, born a ſoldier, brought up in the army, and who during the life of Mahomet, had been ſo much at variance with Bajazet, ſhould yet prefer him to Zezim a very worthy and couragious Prince; whereas Bajazet was of a very different character. But it is probable Achmet had political views, and conſidered his private intereſt more than that of the public. He flattered himſelf that under an effeminate Prince, who was immers'd in luxury, he would be more conſiderable and powerful, than under the government of a Sultan, who could command his armies in perſon (4). Thus was the fate of one of the greateſt empires at that time upon earth at the will and pleaſure of one man; and Bajazet owed the crown to the ſelfiſhneſs and ambition of Achmet. This, if true, is a ſtain in the character of that great General.

(4) Vertot, ubi ſupra, p. 334.

[C] Bajazet...took away the life of Achmet, by whom he had been raiſed to the throne.] The occaſion or pretence of it was as follows: Zezim, after his army had been routed by Achmet, fled to Rhodes, and put himſelf under the protection of the Great-Maſter (5) of the Knights of Rhodes (6); Bajazet was very uneaſy at it, ſtill fearing leſt his brother ſhould wreſt the ſcepter out of his hands. He therefore ſent Embaſſadors to the Great-Maſter, and under pretence of concluding a treaty of commerce between the ſubjects of the Sultan and thoſe of the Order of Rhodes, endeavoured ſecretly to kill Zezim: this obliged the Great-Maſter to adviſe that Prince to retire into France, which he accordingly did. Then the Grand-Maſter ſent Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople to conclude a peace with the Porte. Bajazet choſe Achmet for one of his Commiſſioners. The whole was very near being broke off by a preliminary upon which Achmet inſiſted, viz. that the Great-Maſter ſhould acknowledge himſelf a Vaſſal of the Grand-Segnior, and pay him a yearly tribute. The Embaſſadors very courageouſly rejected that preliminary; whereupon Achmet, the proudeſt of all men, ſaid, that his Maſter would go himſelf at the head of an hundred thouſand men to levy that tribute. The Embaſſadors hearing this declared they would break off the treaty and return home. But Paleologus, the other Commiſſioner on the part of the Porte told Achmet in the Turkiſh language, that the Sultan was reſolved to conclude the treaty at any rate. This made Achmet deſiſt from his preliminary, but as he was perſuaded, that this treaty would diſgrace the Sultan, he left the management of it entirely to Paleologus, who ſoon concluded it, and among other conditions it was agreed, that the Sultan ſhould remit yearly to the Knights of Rhodes thirty five thouſand ducats for the ſupport and guards of Zezim. Achmet could not hear without the utmoſt indignation, that the Sultan had promiſed to pay ſuch a ſum annually, ſo that he complained publickly that by this treaty the glory of the empire had been ſacrificed, and the Emperor ſhamefully diſgraced: and among his reproaches, he happened to level ſome againſt the Sultan himſelf. Bajazet was ſoon acquainted with it. The courts of Princes are never without malicious men, who by falſe, envious and artful reports, endeavour to ruin thoſe who are odious to them. Achmet's greateſt enemy was a Baſſa named Iſaac, whoſe daughter he had married, but he was divorced from her on account of what paſſed between her and Muſtapha, as was related in the remark [A]. Iſaac was ſo affected with this affront, that he reſolved to be revenged. He therefore embraced the opportunity which Achmet's raſh diſcourſes afforded him: he related them to the Sultan intermixed with that poiſon, which Courtiers

(5) Who was then Peter d'Aubaſſon.

(6) Afterwards call'd the Knights of Malta.

will take notice in its proper place of Zezim brother to Bajazet.

know ſo well how to prepare, and of which they are not ſparing on occaſion: and upon pretence of diſcovering his zeal for the Emperor, he hinted to him, that ſo powerful a Viſir as Achmet, who was adored by the whole army, would not dare to utter ſuch bitter taunts, if he was not underhand contriving ſome plot. On ſuch occaſions as theſe, eſpecially under an arbitrary Government like that of the Turks, the man who is ſuſpected, is thought guilty. Bajazet ever ſuſpicious and diſtruſtful, (the common fault of weak Princes) reſolved the death of Achmet. He had alſo another reaſon for it. Ungrateful as he was, it vexed him to ſee conſtantly a man, whoſe ſervices he could not reward as they deſerved. He therefore invited moſt of his principal Officers to a very great entertainment, where, contrary to their law, they all drank very plentifully; Bajazet, who intended to enſnare Achmet by making him diſcloſe his mind freely, turned the diſcourſe to the peace, which had been lately concluded with the Knights of Rhodes. He added, that having now no more enemies to engage with, he intended to leſſen the ſoldiers pay, and even to remove ſuch Officers, as were not well affected to his Government. Achmet the father of the ſoldiery, and a very proud and paſſionate man, was ſo affected at what he heard, that he anſwered immediately that the affection of the ſoldiery was the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the Throne, and that a Sultan who had ſtill a brother (7) living ſhould take care not to exaſperate the army. Some authors maintain that Achmet had no ſooner pronounced theſe words, but he was ſtabbed: Others ſay, that his death was delayed for ſome time, and relate alſo the following circumſtances, viz. That when the company parted, Bajazet made every one of them a preſent of a brocade veſt, and a purſe full of gold coin, but that there was put before Achmet only a black veſt, which he look'd upon as an ill omen. He was confirmed in his ſuſpicion, when going to follow the reſt of the company, he was ordered by the Sultan to ſtay, who ſaid he had ſome important affair to communicate to him. Achmet being now perſuaded that he was to be ſtrangled, cried out in a fury: Cruel tyrant, if thou didſt intend to make me die, why forcedſt thou me to ſin againſt God, by making me drink of a forbidden liquor. As Achmet was juſt going to be killed, the chief of the eunuchs, who was his particular friend, ſeeing Bajazet was drunk and in a paſſion, fell down upon his knees and ſaid to the Emperor, My Lord, don't be too haſty in making this man die; doſt thou not know how much he is beloved by thy Janizaries? ſtay till to-morrow to know how they will be affected at the news of his death: then thou may'ſt command according to thy abſolute authority. Fear, a paſſion extremely powerful in this weak and timorous Prince, had its uſual effect. Bajazet ſuſpended the death of Achmet, and gave orders that he ſhould be thrown into a dungeon half naked and loaded with irons. Achmet's ſon, who waited for his father at the gate of the ſeraglio, not ſeeing him come out, asked the other Officers what was become of him: but they were all ſo drunk, that he could learn only this from them, that the Sultan ſeemed very much exaſperated againſt him. This young man trembling at the danger his father was in, run to the Janizaries, and addreſſed them in this manner: Dear fellow-ſoldiers, the Sultan has ſeized my father, but will you ſuffer that General to die a cruel death, with whom for ſo many years you have eat bread and ſalt (8)? The Janizaries hearing this, took up arms, and ran in a body to the ſeraglio, and with great cries required that the gates ſhould be opened. Bajazet was ſoon acquainted with this uproar, and appearing at the window of his apartment, he ſpoke thus to the ſoldiers; Friends, what is it you deſire? what is the occaſion of all this noiſe? --- Thou ſhalt know it immediately, they all cried, drunken Philoſopher as thou art. Where is Achmet? we will ſee him this very moment, or revenge his death. The timorous Sultan hearing all his Janizaries exclaiming againſt him, anſwered, Achmet is in my ſeraglio; I detained him for no other reaſon, but to conſult him upon an affair of great importance. The menaces and fierce countenance of the Janizaries had terrified Bajazet to ſuch a degree, that he ordered Achmet to be immediately brought before them. Accordingly this General appeared at the gate of the ſeraglio, bare headed and bare legg'd, with only a waſt-coat on, as a man condemned to death, and juſt going to be executed. The Janizaries fired with indignation, at the ſhameful treatment this General had met with, pulled off the turbant from one of the principal Baſſas, and put it on Achmet's head. They alſo ordered a veſt to be immediately brought, and having cloathed him with it, they conducted him to his palace with great acclamations, as tho' they had gained a glorious victory.

(7) Zezim, whom we mentioned.

(8) Chalcondile's Life of Bajazet II.

Achmet either out of generoſity, or fearing leſt the love of the ſoldiers ſhould be accounted a new crime, entreated them to leſſen the tranſports of their joy. Bajazet is our Sovereign, ſaid he, and who knows, but I have by my own fault drawn his diſpleaſure upon me. At laſt by his entreaties he quelled that ſedition; but he learnt by ſad experience, that whatever advantage a ſubject may gain over his Prince, it at laſt proves fatal to himſelf. Bajazet diſſembled his reſentment for ſome time; and ſeemingly reſtored Achmet to favour; but when all his fears were removed, the Sultan commanded him to be ſtrangled, in a journey the Court made to Andrianople. Such was the fate of one of the greateſt Generals the Ottoman Empire ever boaſted, who thinking himſelf too neceſſary to his Prince, by that means became ſuſpected by him, and at the ſame time drew upon himſelf the hatred of all the other officers (9).

(8) Vertot, ubi ſupra, p. 348-357.

ACIDALIUS (VALENS) would have been one of the ableſt critics of the latter ages, had a longer life given him an opportunity of carrying thoſe talents to perfection which nature had given him (a). He was born at Witſtoch, in the Marck or March of Brandenbourg; and having viſited ſeveral academies of Germany, Italy, and ſome other countries, where he was very much beloved [A], he ſtopt at Breſlaw, the capital of Sileſia. Here he waited a long time for ſome employment, but nothing offering, he turned Roman Catholic, and was ſoon after made rector or principal of a ſchool [B]. It is related, that about four months after this a ſtrange accident befel him, for as he was following a proceſſion of the Hoſt, he was ſuddenly ſeized with a frenzy, and being carried home, he expired ſoon after. Some authors ſay that he killed himſelf [C]. It was great pity he died ſo ſoon, for he was a man of ſenſe,

(a) Adoleſcens ſummæ ſpei & eruditionis. i. e. "A youth of "prodigious eru- "dition, from "whom the "greateſt things "might be ex- "pected." Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 113. p. 687.

(3) Niſſa ad fluvium cognominem, Epiſcopi Wratiſlavienſis ſedes. i. e. "Niſſa "on the river of "the ſame name, "the See of the "Biſhop of Breſ- "law." Buno in Cluverii Introd. lib. 3. cap. 13. p. 196. edit. Amſtel. ann. 1697.

[A] Where he was very much beloved.] The correſpondence he held with Vincenzo Pinelli, Jeromo Mercuriale, Antonio Riccoboni, Aſcagno Perſio, &c. prove the high eſteem the moſt celebrated Literati in Italy had for him. He had lived three years in that country (1).

(1) Valens Acidal. in Epiſt. p. 209, 215.

[B] Rector or Principal of a ſchool.] This Barthius aſſures us, whoſe words are, Rector ſcholæ Neuſſanæ factus (2); but I believe it ſhould be Neiſſanæ or Niſſanæ. Nieſſa, which Acidalius always calls Nyſſa in his letters, is three or four leagues from Breſlaw. The Biſhop of this laſt place reſides there (3). He who then filled the epiſcopal chair, had John Matthew Wacker for his Chancellor, a great lover of learning and learned men, who ſent for Acidalius to Neiſſa, and took him into his houſe. See Acidalius's Epiſtles (4). I don't find in thoſe dated from that place, any mention made of his being Maſter of a ſchool.

(2) Apud Konig. Bibliothecæ, p. 6.

(4) P. 228, 318.

[C] That he killed himſelf (5).] Chriſtian Acidalius, brother to Valens, did not dare to ſpeak out, when he complained of this calumny which had been

(5) Barthius had writ this with his own hand in his copy of Acidalius's Poems. See Konigii Biblioth. vet. & nov. p. 6.

ſenſe, and very laborious. His death was owing to his too great application, according to Thuanus (b), who informs us, that his ſtudying too hard at nights in compoſing his Conjectures on Plautus [D], brought a diſtemper upon him [E], which carried him off in three days, viz. the 25th of May 1595, being juſt turned of twenty eight [F]. He left ſeveral works behind him (c); but a little book [G] printed anno 1595, the

(b) Ibid.

(c) See the remark [D].

been ſpread, concerning his brother's death; but we are not to doubt, after what Barthius had writ in one of his books, but that the ſubject of thoſe complaints was, the report which was raiſed of Acidalius's killing himſelf; a circumſtance which occaſioned much exclamation from the pulpit. Here follow Acidalius's words, after having told us that his brother had been buried with great pomp. Ut mirari ſatis nequeam calida multorum in judicando nimium præcipitantium & temerariorum ingenia, qui & ipſius morbi & loci etiam ſæpe deſignari quicquid maledicendo libido dictavit, vel fama quæ

Tam ficti pravique tenax quàm nuncia veri, de obitu ipſius ſparſit propagare porrò in exteras etiam regiones & propugnare, imo neſcio quas non tragœdias etiam in concionibus ad plebem, ubi regnare ſolent, excitare non erubuerunt. i. e. "So that I cannot "enough admire the raſh and precipitate, but ſly "conduct of many perſons, who tho' they often did "not know of what diſtemper, nor at what place, "he died; were yet ſo bold as to amplify and aſ"ſert ſtrenuouſly in foreign countries, whatever ca"lumny ſuggeſted, or fame,

"Who ſpreads around at random, truth or lies,

"publiſhed concerning his death; and to trump up "I know not what tragical ſtories in the pulpits, "where they are much in vogue (6)." He does not deny but that his brother was ſeized with a delirium. Graviſſimum illud febrium acutarum ſymptoma paraphrenitidem aliquoties ſenſit, quod extremum malorum animam etiam ſua ſede ejecit (7). i. e. "He ſometimes was ſeized with that worſt ſymptom "of acute fevers, a paraphrenitis, which worſt of "evils throws the ſoul itſelf from its ſeat." But he inſiſts, that very able Phyſicians, and the family of Mr. Wacker, at whoſe houſe he lay ſick, aſſiſted him till he died. Perhaps there is no ſubject on which fame ſpreads more untruths, than on the ſickneſs and death of illuſtrious perſons; for which reaſon Preachers, and all Moraliſts in general, ſhould be very reſerved in their reflexions on theſe occaſions. It is impoſſible to be diffident enough of the raſh credulity, or artful malice of theſe trumpeters.

(6) Chriſt. Acidalius in Præfat. Epiſt. Valentis Acidalii, Hanoviæ edit. anno 1606.

(7) Id. ibid.

[D] His conjectures on Plautus.] On the one ſide he had the ſatisfaction to ſee them advertiſed in the Frankfort catalogue (8), and on the other the vexation to be forced to make an hundred complaints againſt his bookſeller for being dilatory. In a word, they were not publiſhed till after his death. Barthius eſteemed this work. Pauci, ſays he (9), eum Comici locum aſſecuti ſunt..... ſolus Acidalius rectum ſenſum percepit, ut alia multa in Comico. That is, "Few have underſtood that paſſage of the "Comic-poet.... Acidalius only, thus hit on the "true ſenſe of this, as he has of ſeveral others in "Plautus." Teiſſier informs us, that Acidalius's Commentary on Quintus Curtius (10) is very much valued. This he dedicated to the Biſhop of Breſlaw, and was well rewarded for it, as appears from his thanks in his 89th epiſtle. He writ Notes on Tacitus, on the 12 Panegyrics, and on Velleius Paterculus; beſides Speeches, Epiſtles and Poems (11). The laſt mentioned work, inſerted in the Deliciæ or Delights of the German Poets, conſiſts of epic verſes, odes and epigrams, which Borrichius looks upon but as indifferent (12). Barthius is pleaſed with his diſſertation De conſtitutione carminis elegiaci (13).

(8) Valens Acidal. Epiſt. 317. 326.

(9) Barth. in Statium, tom. 1. p. 239.

(10) Teiſſier Eloges tirez de Monſ. de Thou. tom. 2. p. 215.

(11) Idem.

(12) Borrich. Diſſert. de Poët. p. 125.

(13) In Claudian. apud Kenigii Biblioth. p. 6.

[E] Brought a diſtemper upon him.] Thuanus does not tell us what his diſtemper was; but we learn from another author, that Acidalius heated his blood to ſo violent a degree, by too often ſitting up late, whilſt he was writing his commentaries on Plautus, that he was from that time ſubject to burning fevers. His brother writes as follows on this ſubject: Vratiſlaviæ, quæ Sileſiorum metropolis, per ſeſqui-annum plus minus utrumque ſe mihi præſtitit (præceptorem & patrem;) donec inde Nyſſam evocatus familiari morbo ſuo, quem ex nimiis vigiliis in adornandis Plautinis Divinationibus ſuis contraxerat, bilioſi alias etiam habitus juvenis, FEBRI SCILICET ACUTISSIMA opprimeretur (14). i. e. "During his abode "for a year and a half, or thereabouts, at Breſlaw "the metropolis of Sileſia, he was both a preceptor "and a father to me; till being called from thence "to Nyſſa, he was there attacked by, and died of his "uſual diſtemper, A VIOLENT ACUTE FEVER, which "he had contracted by his too great and frequent "application to his conjectures on Plautus, and that "in the night time." He was more than once very dangerouſly ill in Italy; and we find by his letters to his friends, that a fever was his habitual diſtemper in that country. See his epiſtles, pag. 97 and 112.

(14) Chriſt. Acidal. Præfat. Epiſtolar. Val. Acidalii.

[F] Being juſt turned of twenty eight.] Thus I tranſlate theſe Latin words of Thuanus, cum vix annum vigeſimum octavum exceſſiſſet, which du Ryer renders, n'ayant pas encore atteint ſa vingt-huitiéme année, i. e. not having yet attained his twenty eighth year; I leave the reader to judge, whether his verſion is more juſt than mine. Acidalius, according to Baillet, was but twenty ſeven years and ſome months old (15): poſſibly Baillet diſcovered, that Thuanus had not been exactly informed of the age of this young author.

(15) Baillet Jugem. ſur les Poët. num. 1346.

[G] But a little book — was falſly aſcribed to him.] Geiſler has cleared him from this falſe imputation, as appears from this paſſage of Placcius; Prioris (16) auctor quomodo non ex vero ſit habitus Valens Acidalius, vide apud Geiſlerum, decad 3. n. 8. (17). i. e. "See in Geiſler, Decad. 3. n. 8. how the "former piece was falſly aſcribed to Valens Acida"lius." We ſhall ſpeak of this diſſertation under the article GEDICCUS: but before I proceed farther, I ſhall obſerve on what foundation this piece was ſaid to be written by Acidalius. As he was ſeeking an opportunity to indemnify the Bookſeller who printed his Quintus Curtius, and often uſed to complain of his having loſt by it (18), he happened to meet with a manuſcript (the little piece in queſtion) of which ſeveral copies had been taken. Acidalius read it, and finding it very whimſical, tranſcribed it, and offered it to his Bookſeller, as a piece he might get money by. However, Acidalius did not adviſe him to print it; it was undoubtedly ſuppoſed, that the declaring it would indemnify him for the little ſucceſs the Quintus Curtius had met with, was ſufficient; but he was told very plainly, that it was his buſineſs to conſider what he had beſt do; whether the too ſevere touches of raillery, which were in that piece, would not be of prejudice to him? But all this made no impreſſion on the Bookſeller, who got it printed with all imaginable expedition. The diſſertation was ſtrongly inveighed againſt, inſomuch that the Bookſeller was ſeized; and he diſcovering the perſon who gave him the manuſcript, a terrible outcry was made againſt Acidalius, who was ſurprized to find that a few ſallies of wit ſhould occaſion ſo much clamour. Obſtupeſco ad judicia ſæculi noſtri, & tam irritabiles animos illorum (bonos non tango) Θιολογυμένων. Jocos nemo ferè jam admittit, & ex leviſſima quiſque re gravem calumniandi cauſam, & anſam captat (19). i. e. "I am aſtoniſhed at the "judgment of our age, and at the warm, captious "temper of Divines (I ſay nothing of the good ones.) "Very few will now bear a joke, but make the "moſt trifling circumſtance a handle for calumny." He intreated his good friend Monavius to intercede with the Magiſtrates and Profeſſors of Leipſic for his Bookſeller; and to prevail with them not to attempt any thing which might ſully his (Acidalius's) reputation. He was afraid that his enemies would not ſtop at defamation, (with which they almoſt oppreſt him) and was under ſome apprehenſions that he ſhould be expoſed to the fury of the populace; but above all, he earneſtly wiſhed that he might have no diſpute with the Preachers. Nomen ſit traductum

(16) i. e. Diſſertationis Mulieres non eſſe homines i. e. "The "Diſſertation to "ſhew that wo"men are not "of the human "ſpecies.

(17) Placcius de Anonymis, p. 72.

(18) Ut genus hominum lucri cupidum eſt, cum aviditati ejus emolumentum editionis non ſatis reſponderet, queſtum perſæpe de jactura ſua. i. e. "As this ſet of "men are greedy "of gain, when "the profits of "the edition did "not anſwer his "avaritious ex"pectations, he "often com"plained that he "had loſt by it." Valens Acidal. Epiſt. apolog. ad calcem Epiſtolarum.

(19) Acidalii Epiſtola Apologet. ad calcem Epiſtolar.

the ſubject of which was, that Women are not of the human Species, Mulieres non eſſe homines, was falſly aſcribed to him. I have read ſomewhere that he was a Phyſician [H], and that he would have written Notes on Aulus Gellius, had he lived ſome time longer (d). We find by his letters, that he had writ upon Apuleius. Baillet has given him a place among his Enfans célébres; and ſays, that he illuſtrated Plautus when he was but ſeventeen or eighteen years of age; not to mention ſeveral pieces of his of Latin Poetry ſtill extant, and which he compoſed at the ſame age. One of his firſt printed works was an edition of Velleius Paterculus, publiſhed by him at Padua in 1591. He himſelf tells us, that he was aſhamed of this too haſty offſpring of his pen (e); and was ſurprized to hear that the French intended to reprint it (f). Lipſius, who wrote ſome letters to him, filled with teſtimonies of eſteem and friendſhip (g), conſidered him as one who would one day be a great man, Ipſe Valens (non te fallam augur) gemmula erit Germaniæ veſtræ, vivat modo, i. e. "Valens himſelf (I am almoſt certain) if he does but live, "will be the jewel (ornament) of Germany;" thus he wrote to Monavius in 1594, as we find in the beginning of Acidalius's Epiſtles.

(d) Niſi juveni illi fata quietem miſerabiliter properaſſent. i. e. "Had not fate "unhappily haſtened the death "of this youth. Sciopp. de arte critica, p. 18.

(e) Val. Acidal. Epiſtolar. p. 70, 78, 127.

(f) Idem, pag. 160, 161, 209, 255.

(g) The xth and xxvith of the Centuria ad Ital. & Hiſp.

tum jam in vulgus calumnioſis fabulis ſatis ſit, quod eſt nimio plus ſatis; ulterius ne quid furori populari concedatur. In primis à Theologis & Concionatoribus ne quid noceatur mihi, cum quibus nolo committi, nec quicquam magis opto quàm illorum Tribunitiis edictis nunquam miſceri, nec ſcriptis publicis inceſſi (20). i. e. "Let it ſuffice that my name has been thus "falſly traduced in public by calumniators, which "indeed is too much; and let not the populace be "ſuffered to carry their rage farther. But eſpecially "I intreat that no injury may be done me by the Di"vines and Preachers, with whom I will not have any "ſquabble. Nor is there any thing I deſire more, than "to be never mentioned in their Tribunitial Edicts, "nor in printed papers. He died a few months after this, and as the ſcandal which the publication of the work abovementioned gave, was ſtill freſh in every one's memory, people were the more inclined to make a heavy bluſter on the kind of death he died of. Quæ calumniarum & mendaciorum lerna inde potiſſimum nata eſt, quod recens adhuc eſſet fabula illa in Apologetica Epiſtola ſatis refutata, quæ multorum animis altè nimis inſederat, ut facile eſſet improbis quidvis in invidiam trahere, conviciis proſcindere, & è plauſtro quaſi calumniari (21). i. e. "Which heap "of lies and calumnies aroſe chiefly from hence, that "this ſtory which I had ſufficiently refuted in my "Apologetical Epiſtle, was yet freſh in the minds "of the people, where it had taken too deep impreſ"ſion, ſo that it was an eaſy matter for any worth"leſs perſons to make me odious; to blacken my "reputation by the moſt injurious reproaches; and "to defame me publickly, &c." To conclude; he aſſures us that the little piece in queſtion had been handed about in manuſcript for ſome time; and very probable it had been written in Poland.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Chriſt. Acidal. Præf. Epiſtolar. Val. Acidal.

Few people will wonder, that Acidalius was afraid the Preachers, in caſe he ſhould come to a rupture with them, would be too hard for him; for as we are very prone to judge unfavourably of our neighbour, we often figure thoſe Preachers to our minds under the image of Æolus:

Æole namque tibi divum pater atque hominum rex,
Et mulcere dedit fluctus, & tollere ventos (22).

That is,

"O Æolus! for to thee the King of Heav'n
"The power of tempeſts, and of winds has given:
"Thy force alone their fury can reſtrain,
"And ſmooth the waves, or ſwell the troubled
"main. Dryden.

(22) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 65.

But in ſuch a manner, that they are more capable to raiſe, than to lay a ſtorm. For this laſt effect, men of a grave character are required:

Tum pietate gravem at meritis ſi forte virum quem
&c. (23)
. . . . . .
Ille regit dictis animos, & pectora mulcet.

(23) Ibid. ver. 151, 153.

That is,

"If then ſome grave and pious man appear,
"They huſh their noiſe; and lend a liſt'ning ear.
"He ſooths with ſober words their angry mood,
"And quenches their innate deſire of blood.
Dryden.

But leſs is required to produce the other effect.

[H] That he was a Phyſician.] He is ſo called in a work of Scioppius (24). He at laſt took his Doctor's degree, but it was only ad honores, for he never practiſed, nor intended to practiſe, intending only to cure the diſeaſes of manuſcripts. Medicum τῇ πράξει nec ago, nec agere propoſitum unquam fuit; certo conſilio tamen inter ejus artis candidatos nomen dedi, nec pœnitet, eo quod petii, inde jam ablato, &c. (25). i. e. "I neither practiſe phyſic, nor ever "intended to practiſe it. Nevertheleſs certain rea"ſons induced me to put down my name among "the candidates for that ſcience, nor do I repent of "it, becauſe I ſought it, having already brought "from thence, &c." A little before he had ſaid, Dabam illic (in Italia) me τοῖς Ἀσκληπιάδαις, quorum ſacris & in Italia fueram initiatus: i. e. "There "(in Italy) I enrolled my name among the Æſculapians, into whoſe myſteries I was initiated even in "Italy." What he ſays elſewhere (26) is more to "the purpoſe; Inde rediens cum ſolenni illorum "(ſtudiorum Medicinæ) honore. i. e. "Returning "thence with the uſual honour of thoſe ſtudies "(Phyſic).

(24) Scioppius de Arte Critica, p. 18.

(25) Val. Acidal. Epiſt. p. 215. ac etiam p. 194, 209.

(26) Ibid. p. 249.

☞ACILIA, the name of a Roman family, which was divided into three branches, Aviola, Balbus and Glabrio. It produced ſeveral conſiderable perſons; ſome of whom we ſhall mention. I. Marcius Acilius Glabrio was Conſul in the year of Rome 562. Antiochus the Great King of Syria having declared war againſt the Romans, he was ſent to oppoſe him with ten thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, and fourteen elephants (a). Antiochus waited for him at the Streights of Thermopylæ in Theſſaly, where they engaged, and the former was obliged to retire with a conſiderable loſs. Acilius then beſieged Heraclea, and took it (b). The Ætolians having followed Antiochus's party, he forced them to leave the country open to him, and beſieged them in Naupactum, which is ſituated upon the Gulph of Corinth, and is called at preſent Lepanto. But at laſt he granted them peace at the ſolicitation of T. Quintius Flaminius (c). Thus ended the war with Antiochus in Greece under Acilius's conduct. He built the Temple of Piety at Rome in the Herb-Market, in conſequence of a vow, which he made before the battle of Thermopylæ (d). The reaſon which is alledged for dedicating of that temple by the name of the Temple of Piety is very remarkable [A].

(a) Liv. lib. 36. c. 14. Note that Appian ſays, de Bello Syriaco, p. 99. edit. H. Stephani 1592, that he had 20000 foot and ſeveral elephants.

(b) Ibid. c. 25.

(c) Ibid. c. 23, 24, 25.

(d) Valer. Maxim. l. 3. c. 5. § 1. See Livy, l. 40. c. 34.

markable [A]. It was dedicated by his ſon M. Acilius Glabrio, who likewiſe placed in it a gilt Equeſtrian Statue of his father, which was the firſt of that kind that was ever ſeen in Rome or any part of Italy (e). II. Caius Acilius, one of Julius Cæſar's ſoldiers, who performed an action of aſtoniſhing bravery [B]. III. Acilius Aviola, Legate of Tiberius in Gaul in the fourth Conſulſhip of that Emperor, and the ſecond of Druſus, ſuppreſſed the commotions which were raiſed in that country by Julius Florus

(e) Valer. Max. ubi ſupra.

[A] The reaſon which is alledged for dedicating that temple by the name of the Temple of Piety is very remarkable.] Pliny tells us (1), that this temple was built in the ſame place where a woman had lived, who had ſhewn an extraordinary inſtance of piety to her mother. The ſtory, as it is related by Valerius Maximus (2), is as follows. The Roman Prætor had condemned a Lady of good quality for a capital crime, and committed her to the Triumvir to be put to death in priſon; but the keeper being touched with compaſſion, did not ſtrangle her immediately: nay, he even ſuffered her daughter to viſit her, after he had carefully ſearched her, to prevent her conveying in any food, imagining that ſhe muſt inevitably be ſoon ſtarved to death. But after ſeveral days had paſt, and he found no alteration in her, he begun to conſider with himſelf how it was poſſible for her to be ſupported ſo long; and at laſt, having watched the daughter, he obſerved that the mother was ſuſtained by ſucking the daughter's breaſt. This ſurprizing circumſtance was immediately told by the keeper to the Triumvir, who informed the Prætor of it, and he diſcovering it to the council of the Judges the Lady's puniſhment was remitted, and ſhe was diſcharged. Sanguinis ingenui mulierem prætor apud Tribunal ſuum capitali crimine damnatam, triumviro in carcere necandum tradidit. Quam receptam, is qui cuſtodiæ præerat miſericordiâ motus, non protinus ſtrangulavit. Aditum quoque ad eam filiæ, ſed diligenter excuſſæ, ne quid cibi inferret, dedit, exiſtimans futurum, ut inediâ conſumeretur. Cum autem jam dies plures intercederent, ſecum ipſe quærens, quidnam eſſet, quod tamdiu ſuſtentaretur; curioſius obſervatâ filiâ, animadvertit illam exerto ubere famem matris lactis ſui ſubſidio lenientem. Quæ tam admirabilis ſpectaculi novitas ab ipſo ad triumvirum, a triumviro ad prætorem, a prætore ad concilium judicum perlata, remiſſionem pœnæ mulieri impetravit. Pliny has given us the ſame ſtory, though with the alteration of ſome circumſtances. He tells us (3), that the daughter was a woman of low Plebeian rank; and that when this extraordinary inſtance of her piety to her mother was diſcovered, a perpetual allowance was appointed to maintain them both, and a temple built to the Goddeſs Piety upon the place where the priſon ſtood. Julius Solinus has given us the ſame ſtory almoſt in the very words of Pliny; tho' in ſome editions he ſays it was a father and not a mother who was thus ſupported by the daughter (4). But ſome critics have ſubſtituted parentem inſtead of patrem, becauſe the truth of the Hiſtory requires it; whereas the common reading very probably was occaſioned by a miſtake of the tranſcribers; quia ratio & fides hiſtoriæ hoc poſtulat, vel matrem vel parentem, unde fortaſſis patrem ex gloſs. in context. irrepſit, legendum videtur (5).

(1) Hiſt. Natur. lib. 7. c. 36.

(2) Lib. 5. c. 4. § 7.

(3) Lib. 7. c. 36.

(4) Solin. Polyhiſtor. cap. 7.

(5) M. Ant. Delrio Not. in locum.

[B] Who performed an action of aſtoniſhing bravery.] Suetonius, in order to give us an idea of the reſolution and valour of Cæſar's army, tells us (6), that a ſingle cohort of the ſixth legion, which was employed in defence of a caſtle, bore the ſhock of four of Pompey's legions for ſeveral hours together, tho' all of them were covered with wounds by the prodigious multitude of arrows, which were ſhot at them, 130,000 of which were found within the trench. Nor will this appear at all ſurprizing, if we conſider the exploits of particular men, as that of Caſſius Scæva, or C. Acilius. The former, tho' he had loſt one of his eyes, and was run thro' in the ſhoulder and thigh, and had his ſhield perforated in an hundred and twenty places, yet defended the door of the caſtle to the laſt. And Acilius in the ſea-fight at Marſeilles, having caught hold of one of the enemy's ſhips, had his right hand cut off; notwithſtanding which he leapt into the ſhip, and knockt down every one who met him, with his ſhield. Suetonius upon this occaſion mentions the famous ſtory of Cynægirus an Athenian ſoldier, who in the battle which Miltiades fought againſt the Perſians at Marathon, having killed a prodigious number of the enemies in the fight, and purſuing thoſe that fled to their ſhips, ſeized one of the ſhips with his right hand, which being cut off, he caught hold of it with the left, which met with the ſame fate as the other; ſo that at laſt he held the ſhip with his teeth, with all the fury of an enraged beaſt (7). Valerius Maximus likewiſe gives us an account of Acilius's action; but he varies a little in the circumſtances of it, for he tells us (8), that he caught hold of one of the ſhips of Marſeilles with his right hand, and when that was cut off, with his left, till at laſt he ſunk it. "This action, ſays he, is not ſufficiently known "among us; whereas Greece, which is very ver- "boſe in her own praiſes, has immortalized by her "panegyricks the ſame kind of courage and reſolu- "tion, which Cynægyrus the Athenian ſhewed in "purſuing the enemy." Quod factum parum juſta notitia patet. Cynægyrum Athenienſem ſimili pertinaciâ in conſectandis hoſtibus uſum, verboſa laudum ſuarum cantu Græcia, omnium ſæculorum memoriæ literarum præconio inculcat (9).

(6) Sueton. in Jul. Cæſare, c. 68.

(7) Juſtin. lib. 2. c. 9. See Herodot. l. 6. 114.

(8) Lib. 3. c. 2. § 22.

(9) Id. ibid.

Strada has introduced an account of the valour of two ſoldiers at the ſiege of Zutphen in Flanders, with a reflexion not much different from that of Valerius Maximus. "Their actions, ſays he (10), "would be rank'd with thoſe, which are moſt cele- "brated in antiquity, if we were not too great ad- "mirers of the ancients, while we are envious, or "at leaſt too inattentive and incurious with regard "to the great actions of thoſe of our own age and "country." Quâ quidem in expugnatione non ego præterierim duorum militum in utriſque partibus facinora, priſcis profecto æquanda, ſi nos, ut veterum admiratores ſumus, ita noſtrorum invidi certè non incurioſi non eſſemus. The firſt inſtance of bravery, which he mentions, is that of a ſoldier in the Spaniſh garriſon, who having loſt his right hand, retired a little, and bound his halbert to his wounded arm; which he managed ſo well with his left hand, that he kill'd and wounded ſeveral of the enemy, and at laſt obliged the reſt to ceaſe their attacks upon that part of the fort. "Let the fame of this valiant man, ſays the Hiſtorian, "be tranſmitted to poſterity, in "conjunction with Attilius, Cæſar's ſoldier, who is "ſo highly extolled by the ancients. Both of them "ſupplied the loſs of their hands by their valour: "but the latter only transferred the uſe of his "right hand, which was cut off, to his left: where- "as the former would not leave his antagoniſt room "to boaſt of having deprived him of his hand, but "reſtored it to its former employment, and armed "even his wounded limb with new force againſt "the enemy. The ſoldier of Toledo, who was by "no means inferiour to the Roman in the glory "of his action, deſerves to be honoured with the "name of Attilius, as long as his own is concealed "from us." Eat ad poſteros hujus quoque bellatoris fama cum Attilio Cæſaris milite veterum præconiis decantato.—Nempe uterque miniſterium amputatæ manus virtute ſupplevit; ſed ille uſum dexteræ amiſſæ in lævam tranſtulit; hic ne in amiſsâ quidem relinquens percuſſori locum gloriandi ſuam manui vim reſtituit, vulnuſque ipſum in hoſtem ferociùs armavit. Ut profectò Toletanus non infra Romanum facti gloria, quandiu nomine carebit ſuo, in Attilii cognomentum adoptari meritò poſſit (11). He then tells us a ſtory of an Engliſh Officer in the Earl of Leiceſter's army, whoſe name was Edward Stanley. He was at the head of his men, attacking a fort of the city of Zutphen, when one of the beſieged thruſt at him with his pike, which Stanley caught hold of, and endeavoured to wreſt from the other. But finding he could not do it, he ſuffered himſelf to be drawn up by the pike upon the wall of the fort, where he fought ſo bravely, that the enemy fled from him, and his own men took that (10) De Bello Belgico, Dec. 2. l. 8.

(11) Strada, ibid.

Florus and Julius Sacrovir (f). The manner of his death was very extraordinary (g) [C]. IV. Acilius Butas, a man of Prætorian rank, and famous for his luxury and debauchery under the Emperor Tiberius [D]. V. Acilius Glabrio, Conſul under Domitian with Trajan, who was afterwards Emperor (h). He was baniſhed by that Emperor, and afterwards put to death by his order (i) [E]. Lloyd, Moreri and Collier have been guilty of a great many errors in theſe articles [F].

(f) Tacit. l. 3.
(g) See Lipſius in locum Taciti ſupra citatum.
(h) J. Xiphilin. Epitom. Dion. Caſſii, p. 235. edit. H. Stephani 1592.
(i) Sueton. in Domitian. c. 10.

opportunity to mount the wall, and ſo immediately ſeized the fort. For this action he was knighted by the Earl of Leiceſter, and rewarded in a very handſome manner.

[C] The manner of his death was very extraordinary.] He was imagined to be dead by the Phyſicians and his ſervants; and having lain ſome time, he was carried to the funeral pile prepared for him; but as ſoon as the fire came to touch his body, he recovered, and cried out that he was alive, and deſired his Tutor, who was the only perſon that ſtaid there, to aſſiſt him; but the flames had by that time ſurrounded him, ſo that he was immediately burnt to death (12). The ſame misfortune happened likewiſe to L. Lamia a man of pretorian quality, who was heard to cry out upon the funeral pile (13). Pliny mentions alſo both theſe ſtories (14).

(12) Id. l. 1. c. 8. § 12.
(13) Ibid.
(14) Lib. 7. c. 52.

[D] Famous for his luxury and debauchery under the Emperor Tiberius.] We have a very humorous repreſentation of his character in Seneca (15). He introduces it with ſeveral fine reflexions upon the vicious and profligate manner of life, which many perſons led in his time. "As they are reſolved, "ſays he, to act every thing contrary to the dic- "tates of nature, they at laſt entirely abandon her. "If it is day-time, then they go to ſleep; if it "be night, they apply themſelves to the exerciſe "of their bodies, and ſit down to dinner. If "the day is juſt ready to break, then it is the "proper time for ſupper. It is wrong, they "think, to do as other people do. It is baſe and "ſordid, to live after the common and vulgar forms. "Let us leave the day for the uſe of the public; "but appropriate the morning to our own pleaſures. "I conſider ſuch people juſt in the ſame manner "as I do the dead; for where is the difference "between their manner of life and a funeral, when "they live only by torch-light (16)? I remem- "ber ſeveral perſons at one time, who us'd to "live this way; and particularly Atilius (17) Bu- "tas, a man of prætorian rank, who having ſpent "a very large eſtate, and complaining to Tiberius of "his poverty, the Emperor replied, Ah Butas, you "have waked a little too late. Montanus Julius, who "was a pretty good Poet, and well known for his "intimacy with Tiberius, tho' he afterwards loſt "his favour, uſed to recite his own verſes. He "was very fond of introducing deſcriptions of ſun- "riſing and ſun-ſet; ſo that when ſome body was "expreſſing his anger, that he ſhould take up the "whole day in reciting, and ſaid that it was im- "pertinent to go to hear him. Natta Pinarius an- "ſwered with a great deal of humour; Am not I "then very good-natur'd to him? why, I can ſub- "mit to hear him from ſun-riſe to ſun-ſet. When "Montanus, I ſay, was repeating the following "verſes;

(15) Epiſt. 122. Operum tom. 2. p. 469, 470 edit. Elzevir. 1658.

(16) Ad faces & cereos vivunt.
(17) This I preſume ſhould be Acilius, as it is generally read.

"Incipit ardentes Phœbus producere flammas,
"Spargere ſe rubicunda dies, jam triſtis hirundo
"Argutis reditura cibos immittere nidis
"Incipit, & molli partitos ore miniſtrat.

That is,

"Now Sol begins to urge his beamy carr
"Thro' heaven's expanſe; the ruddy day now
" dawns;
"The melancholly ſwallow to her neſt
"Brings home the food, and with parental fond-" neſs
"Divides it to her young.

"Varus, a Roman Knight, who was a companion "of L. Vinicius, and a notorious paraſite, and main- "tained himſelf by his buffoonry, cried out; Why "Butas is then juſt going to ſleep. But when the "Poet came afterwards to theſe verſes:

"Jam ſua paſtores ſtabulis armenta locarunt
"Jam dare ſopitis nox nigra ſilentia terris
"Incipit.

That is,

"The ſhepherd now within his ſtalls ſecures
"The tender flocks; now night with all her ſhades
"Spreads a deep ſilence o'er the weary world.

"Varus cried out again; What does he ſay? Is it "night then? I'll go now to Butas's Levee. No- "thing in the world was better known than his "manner of life, which was the reverſe of all the "common methods; and he had a great many com- "panions at that time, who led exactly the ſame kind "of life.— I have heard Pedo Albinovanus, who had "an excellent talent at telling of ſtories, give an "account of Sp. Papinius, who was one of theſe "men, who have an averſion to day-light (18). "Pedo lived juſt above Papinius's houſe. About "nine a clock at night, ſays he, I hear the noiſe "of whips. Upon this I enquire what the matter "is: they tell me, that he is ſettling accounts "with his ſervants. About twelve a clock I hear a "prodigious noiſe: they tell me, that he is exer- "ciſing his voice. About two in the morning I "ask what is the meaning of that noiſe of wheels? "they tell me, that he is carrying about in a litter. "About day-break there is a ſtrange running to and "fro, and calling of the boys, and buſtling of the but- "lers and cooks. When I ask what that is for? they "tell me, that he is calling for his mull'd wine and "broth, and juſt going out of the bath. But per- "haps you'll ſay, is his ſupper ſo long, that he can- "not finiſh it till after midnight? By no means, for "he lived extremely frugally, and ſpent nothing but "the night. And therefore, when people uſed to "call him miſer and ſordid fellow, nay, ſays Pedo, "you ſhould add too, that he is one, who lives by "candle-light (19)."

(18) Luciſugæ.
(19) Illum & Lychnobium dicetis.

[E] Put to death by his order.] Xiphilin tells us (20), that it was reported, that the ſame prodigies happened to this Acilius Glabrio and to Ulpius Trajanus, who were Conſuls the ſame year; tho' thoſe omens portended very different fates to them, to the latter the empire, and to the former death. The occaſion of Glabrio's misfortune was as follows (21). Domitian had him charged with becoming a proſelyte to the Jewiſh rites, and among other crimes, with having fought with wild beaſts; but the chief reaſon of the Emperor's reſentment againſt him was merely from envy. For he had obliged Acilius even during his Conſulſhip to attend upon him at the youthful games (22), and to fight with a lion of a prodigious ſize in the amphitheatre. But he was ſo fortunate as to eſcape without any wound, and killed the lion upon the ſpot.

(20) Epitom Dion. p. 235. ed. H. Stephani 1592.
(21) Idem, ibid. p. 236, 237.
(22) Νεανικὰ μετὰ Juvenilia.

Juvenal mentions this Acilius (23):

(23) Sat. 4. ver. 94, 95, &c.

Proximus ejuſdem properabat Acilius ævi,
Cum juvene indigno, quem mors tam ſæva maneret,
Et domini gladiis jam deſignata.

"Next him Acilius, tho' his age the ſame,
"With eager haſte to the grand council came:
"With him a youth, unworthy of the fate
"That did too near his growing virtues wait,
"Urged by the Tyrant's envy, fear, or hate.

Dryden.

The old Scholiaſt upon this paſſage tells us, that this Acilius was Conſul under Domitian, who ordered his ſon to be put to death, but kept him alive that he might feel the more exquiſite regret for the loſs of his ſon. Acilius conſul ſub Domitiano fuit, indignus pati, quæ paſſus eſt. Hujus filium juvenem cum occideret, ipſum Acilium ſervavit, qui pœnas ſentiret orbitatis.

[L] Lloyd, Moreri, and Collier have been guilty of a great many errors in theſe articles.] We ſhall conſider their errors under the particular articles. Under the firſt article, i. e. that of Manius Acilius Glabrio, Moreri tells us, that he went againſt Antiochus with ſeven hundred horſe and fifteen elephants, whereas ACINDYNUS (GREGORY) a Greek Monk, lived in the fourteenth Century. He aſſociated with Barlaam, who, from the time of his joining in communion with the Greek Church, had made it his buſineſs to confound the Heſycaſtes, who were greatly multiplied among the Monks of Mount Athos. The * Heſycaſtes were contemplative devotees, whoſe name plainly ſhews, that there were Quietiſts in the world even in that age. Theſe, in the utmoſt fervency of their prayers, imagined they ſaw a light like to that which ſhone upon Chriſt at his transfiguration on Mount Tabor; and aſſerted, that this light was uncreated, though it was very diſtinct from the eſſence of God (a). Acindynus, ſeconding Barlaam's impetuoſity, wrote againſt the illuſions of thoſe fanaticks, and was one of the greateſt ſticklers againſt them in the council of Conſtantinople: but he had the misfortune to meet with antagoniſts more powerful than either himſelf or Barlaam, who cauſed them to be cenſured and condemned in ſeveral councils. Notwithſtanding his ill ſucceſs in that of Conſtantinople about anno 1337, he nevertheleſs ventured to charge publickly of hereſy, the favourers of Gregorius Palamas, for which the Patriarch of Conſtantinople ſummoned him to appear in 1341. Accordingly he came to the council, and was condemned to ſilence, upon pain of excommunication. Six years after this, John Cantacuzenus being Emperor and loving Palamas, he was attacked more vigorouſly than before; and ſo many cenſures and excommunications were fulminated againſt Acindynus at different times, as afterwards reduced him to a calm, but a very obſcure life. James Gretſer, a German Jeſuit, publiſhed at Ingolſtad, in 1616, Acindynus's two books de eſſentia & operatione Dei. Leo Allatius alſo publiſhed a Poem (b), and ſome fragments of the ſame author (c), who having had the fate to be looked upon as a heretic for ſeveral years [A], has at laſt met with more learned and more equitable judges [B].

* From ἡσυχάζω quieſco, to be at reſt.

(a) See the authors cited by father Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Schiſme des Grecs. liv. 5. p. 149, 150, Dutch edit.

(b) Græc. Orthod. tom. 1. from page 756 to 770.

(c) In Libro II. cap. 16. de Conſenſu, &c apud Appendic. Cave, Hiſt. Liter. Script. Eccleſ. p. 34. Conſult this Appendix with regard to the preſent articles.

whereas both Livy and Appian aſſure us, that he had in his army two thouſand horſe; and the former informs us, that he had but fourteen elephants. He has likewiſe in giving an account of the gilt ſtatue, which was erected to this Conſul by his ſon the Duumvir, falſly tranſlated the word auratam ſtatuam, which ſignifies only a gilt ſtatue; une ſtatue D'OR PUR, a ſtatue of pure gold. In relating the ſtory of the woman, who was ſupported in priſon by ſucking her daughter's breaſts, Moreri, Lloyd and Collier have all of them miſrepreſented it, by telling us, that it was a man who was thus ſuſtained by his daughter; and yet they quote Valerius Maximus very particularly for this relation; whereas we have ſhewn, that this author repreſents it in a quite different manner. Nay Mr. Collier has egregiouſly miſtaken one circumſtance, where he tells us, that the Senate had forbid the man all manner of ſuſtenance; for it appears that the woman, of whom this fact is related, was ordered to be ſtrangled, but that the keeper having pity on her, would not diſpatch her in that manner, but choſe rather to ſuffer her to periſh with hunger. The occaſion of theſe writers miſtake in this point, aroſe very probably from their confounding a ſtory, which Valerius Maximus relates (24) of Cimon a very aged man, who was preſerved from being ſtarved to death in priſon, by ſucking his daughter Pero's breaſt, with the fact abovementioned. The former ſtory, according to this author, was a very common ſubject amongſt the painters before his time; and has employed ſeveral of the moſt eminent hands amongſt the moderns. Under the fourth article, viz. that of Acilius Butas, Moreri tranſlates the word prætorius in Seneca (25), Préfet du pretoire, i. e. "Prefect of the pre-"torium;" whereas the latter is always expreſſed in Latin by Præfectus prætorio. Under the fifth article, viz. that of Acilius Glabrio, who was Conſul under Domitian, Mr. Collier tells us, that this Emperor killed Acilius's ſon, upon the pretence, that he fought with wild beaſts, but really becauſe he dreaded his ſtrength, having killed a lion in Africa. He ſeems to have tranſlated this from Lloyd, tho' he differs from him in one circumſtance; for the latter ſays, that Acilius's ſon killed a lion in the Albanian mount. Theſe two authors quote no authority for what they mention in that point; and we have ſeen above that Dion Caſſius's account is extremely different from this.

(24) Valer. Max. l. 5. c. 4. Exempl. Extern. 1.

(25) Epiſt. 122.

[A] Looked upon as a heretic for ſeveral years.] As in the heat of a diſpute, a man who thinks of nothing but how to puſh home his adverſary, ſhall often be blinded to ſuch a degree, as not to perceive that he runs from one extreme to the other; or at leaſt carries his reaſons to ſuch a length, that they prove too much: I don't doubt but Barlaam and Acindynus gave Palamas their adverſary an advantage by this means; and that being orthodox at the bottom, they ſometimes argued like heretics. Prateolus has not omitted them in his catalogue; but then, it is impoſſible to make any thing of the ſentence of their condemnation as he has expreſſed it. A circumſtance that is leſs obſcure in his book with regard to Barlaam and Acindynus, is, that the Council which was aſſembled to condemn them, was held in the preſence of the bleſſed and moſt famous Emperor Michael Andronicus Paleologus, and of John his ſon; in the reign of Henry VII, Emperor of Germany, and Pope John XXII, about the year of our Lord 1313. (1). The whole paſſage ſwarms with errors; for 1ſt, In the Century in queſtion (2) no Emperor of Conſtantinople could be called bleſſed by a Roman Catholic, but Michael Paleologus, who joined in communion with the holy See, and died in that communion. Now he was not called Michael Andronicus; he had no ſon whoſe name was John, and he died in 1283. Secondly, the Emperor whoſe ſon was named John, is called barely Andronicus Paleologus, did not begin his reign till 1328, and was not cotemporary with Henry VII and John XXII. Laſtly, it is an error to ſay that Acindynus was ſentenced about anno 1313. Father Gaultier has not omitted Barlaam and Acindynus in his chronological tables, but has rank'd them among the heretics, and that on the authority of Prateolus.

(1) Prateoli Elench. Hæret. p. 86. edit. Colon. an. 1605. in 4°.

(2) Here this word is taken in general for an hundred years, to begin from what date one pleaſes.

[B] At laſt met with Judges who were more equitable.] See the authors quoted by Moreri; I mean Pontanus on Cantacuzenus, and Spondanus's Annals. See alſo thoſe of Bzovius, Gretzer (3), Father Maimbourg (4), and the authors cited by him in the work pointed out in the margin.

(3) Gretſeri Notæ in Cantacuzenum & in editionem Acindyni.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Schiſme des Grecs. liv. 5.

ACINDYNUS (SEPTIMIUS) was Conſul of Rome with Valerius Proculus, the ſame year that Conſtantine, ſon to Conſtantine the Great, was killed near Aquileia (a). He had been Governor of Antioch, and during his government there happened an event (mentioned by St. Auſtin) (b), which deſerves our notice. A certain man neglecting to carry to the treaſury the pound of gold he was taxed; Acindynus threw him into priſon, and ſwore he would hang him, in caſe he did not pay the money on a certain day which he appointed. The time was very near expired, when the poor man found it impoſſible for him to ſatisfy the demand of the Governor. He had, indeed,

(a) In 340, according to Calviſius.

(b) Auguſt. de Sermone Domini in Mont, lib 1. cap. 16.

indeed, a beautiful wife, but then ſhe had no money; and yet it was from her only that he could entertain any hopes of liberty. Now it happened that a very rich man, enflamed with the love of this woman, offered her the pound of gold on which her huſband's life depended; and deſired no other recompence but the pleaſure of paſſing away a night with her (c). The woman, taught by the Scriptures that her body was not in her own power, but in that of her huſband, acquainted him with the offers which the rich gallant made her, declaring that ſhe was ready to accept of them, provided he would give his conſent, as he had abſolute power over her body, and in caſe he were willing to ſave his life at the expence of her chaſtity, which was entirely at his diſpoſal. The impriſon'd huſband thanked his wife, and ordered her to go and lie with her gallant. She obeyed, giving on that occaſion her body to her huſband, not with reſpect to the uſual carnal gratifications, but to the deſire he had to live (d). The ſum agreed upon was given her by the gallant, but then it was ſlily taken away, and another purſe ſubſtituted in its place, filled only with earth. The good woman at her return home (for ſhe had waited upon her gallant at his country-ſeat) no ſooner perceived the fraud, but ſhe complained publickly of it, ſued for juſtice at the Governor's hands, and ingenuouſly told him the whole ſtory. Acindynus began by owning himſelf in a fault, and then declared that his ſeverity and menaces had forced the unhappy pair to have recourſe to ſuch remedies; and thereupon ſentenced himſelf to pay the pound of gold into the treaſury, and afterwards decreed that the woman ſhould poſſeſs the piece of ground whence the earth had been taken which was found in her purſe. St. Auſtin does not dare determine whether the woman's conduct on this occaſion, ought to be cenſured or applauded [A]; and he inclines much more to the latter [B], which is ſomewhat ſurprizing [C]. We have before ſeen (e) the ſame looſe morals in St. Chryſoſtom,

(c) Pollicens pro una nocte, ſi ei miſceri vellet, ſe auri libram daturum. Auguſt. de Serm. Domini in Monte, lib. 1. cap. 17.

(d) Illa corpus non niſi marito dedit, non concumbere, ut ſolet, ſed vivere cupienti. Auguſtinus ibid.

(e) In the remark [A] of the article ABIMELECH.

[A] Does not dare determine, whether this woman's conduct on this occaſion ought to be cenſured or applauded.] This is manifeſt from theſe words: Nihil hinc in alteram partem diſputo; liceat cuique æſtimare quod velit (1). i. e. "I ſhall not here diſpute "on either ſide, let every one form what judgment "he thinks proper." In another place he makes it a queſtion, whether a woman could properly be called unchaſte, in caſe, to ſave her husband's life, and by his order, ſhe were to lie with another man? Scrupuloſius diſputari poteſt utrum illius mulieris pudicitia violaretur, etiam ſi quiſquam carni ejus commixtus foret, cum id in ſe fieri pro mariti vitâ, nec illo neſciente ſed jubente permitteret, nequaquam fidem deſerens conjugalem, & poteſtatem non abnuens maritalem (2). i. e. "It may be the ſubject of a nice diſpute, whether "the chaſtity of a woman would be violated, even "tho' any one ſhould have carnal knowledge of her, "when ſhe allowed of this merely to ſave her huſ"band's life, and that not unknown to him but with "his conſent; and thereby neither relinquiſhing her "conjugal fidelity, nor denying the power of her huſ"band." Rivetus having cited theſe words, adds (3), that St. Auſtin informs us, that this incident happened under the Emperor Conſtantine (4), when Acindynus &c.

(1) Auguſt. de Sermone Domini in Monte, lib. 1. cap. 16.

(2) Auguſtinus contra Fauſt. Manich. lib. 22. c. 37.

(3) Riveti Exercit. 73. in Geneſ. Oper. tom. 1. p. 281.

(4) It is Conſtantius in the work of St. Auſtin I now cite.

[B] He inclines much more to the latter] (to approve her conduct). This appears very plainly from the following words: Non ita eſt exiſtimandum ne hoc etiam fœmina, viro permittente, facere poſſe videatur; quod omnium ſenſus excludit. Quamquam nonnullæ cauſæ poſſint exiſtere ubi & uxor mariti conſenſu pro ipſo marito hoc facere debere videatur... Nihil hic in alteram partem diſputo... Sed tamen narrato hoc facto (viz. that of the woman, whoſe husband had been thrown into priſon by Acindynus) non ita reſpuit hoc ſenſus humanus, quod in illa muliere, viro jubente commiſſum eſt, quemadmodum antea, cum ſine ullo exemplo res ipſa poneretur, horruimus (5). i. e. "We are not to ſuppoſe, that a wife may ſeem "to be allowed to do that, tho' with her husband's "leave; which is againſt the general opinion. Tho' "there may be ſome caſes in which the wife ought "to do this when her husband conſents to it.... "I pronounce nothing on either ſide... But now I "have told this ſtory (that of the woman whoſe "husband Acindynus had impriſoned.) The action "this woman committed in obedience to her huſ"band's command, is not ſo repugnant to the gene"ral ſenſe, nor ſtrikes us with ſo much horror as "before, when the thing is propoſed without an "example." I therefore don't know on what grounds the Proteſtant Divine, quoted in the preceding remark, aſſerts, that St. Auſtin was inclined rather to cenſure than to juſtify this woman. Quo facto Acindyni explicato, lib. rum unicuique permittit Auguſtinus æſtimare quod velit, quamvis in eam partem propenſior videatur, quod id fieri non liceat (6). i. e. "Which ſtory of Acindynus being related, St. Au"ſtin leaves every man to form what judgment he "pleaſes on it; tho' he ſeems rather inclined to "think that this is not a lawful action."

(5) Auguſt. de Sermone Domini in Monte, lib. 1. cap. 16.

(6) Riveti Oper. tom. 1. p. 281.

[C] Which is ſomewhat ſurprizing.] Should not ſo great a Divine as St. Auſtin have known, that our life, which is a merely temporal and periſhable bleſſing, ought not to be ſo dear to us, as to be thought worthy of being redeemed, when the law of God muſt be diſobeyed for that purpoſe? For as this diſobedience is a ſin which ſubjects us to everlaſting torments, and a moral evil, which offends an infinite Being; it is no leſs imprudent than irrational, to chuſe to commit a ſin, rather than lay down one's life. I paſs over thoſe abyſſes of corruption, which are open wherever we tread, by telling us, that an action which would be criminal were it not done with a deſign of ſaving life, becomes innocent, when committed with that view. Acindynus's priſoner would have been guilty of ſcandalous pimping, and conſented to the crime of adultery, properly ſo called, had he permitted his wife to lie with the Gallant, purely for the lucre of a pound of gold: but, as he conſents to it, merely in the view of ſaving his life, it is no longer a conſent to adultery, but an allowable action. Is it not manifeſt, that were ſuch a moral principle to take place, there is not a ſingle precept of the ten commandments, which the fear of death might not diſpenſe us from obeying? Where do we meet with any exceptions in favour of adultery? In caſe a woman is not obliged to obey the commandment, viz. not to defile her body, if it gives her an opportunity of ſaving her husband's life; ſhe won't be under an obligation of ſubmitting to it, when her own life lies at ſtake; for God does not require, that we ſhould love another perſon better than our ſelves. One may therefore violate the law of chaſtity with impunity, when it ſaves us from death; why therefore, from a parity of reaſoning, may not murther, theft, perjury, the abjuring of one's religion, &c. be allowed? The greateſt men are apt to go aſtray, and to loſe their way, even in the ſmootheſt roads. Is it not pretty evident, that St. Paul did not pretend, that a husband has the liberty to diſpoſe of his wife's body at random, and to whomſoever he pleaſes: St. Paul, I ſay, when he obſerves, that the wife has no power over her own body, but her husband? We nevertheleſs find theſe words of the Apoſtle puzzle St. Auſtin, and that he lays great ſtreſs on the diſtinction, marito jubente, i. e. "by her husband's command;" and, poteſtatem non abnuens maritalem, i. e. "not de"nying the authority of her husband." We ſhall take notice elſewhere (7), that he has employed this doctrine

(7) In the remark (L) of the article SARAH.

Chryſoſtom, with regard to the conduct of Abraham and Sarah.

doctrine of St. Paul, to juſtify Abraham and Sarah, with regard to Hagar's concubinage. Let us hear a Divine, who tho' he lived many centuries after the father abovementioned, was nevertheleſs a better moraliſt on this head. Quâ in re, (viz. the incident of the woman, whoſe husband was impriſoned by Acindynus,) mirum eſt talem ac tantum virum potuiſſe dubitare, cum ex ſacra ſcriptura conſtet apertiſſimè malum aliquod pœnæ nunquam eſſe redimendum malo culpæ, & vitam potius eſſe deponendam, quam ut eam nobis aut aliis ſervemus id facientes ex quo Deus offenderetur. Nullo modo itaque cenſendum eſt licitum eſſe adulterii remedium vel marito, vel uxori vitandæ alterius necis cauſa; quin potius mortem expectare convenit, imo verò ultro expetere quam alterutrius caſtitatem prodere, ob cujus conſervationem multæ pudiciſſimæ fœminæ non ſolum ab aliis occidi ſuſtinuerunt, ſed etiam (quod tamen probare nolim) ſibi ipſis vim intulerunt, non ſolùm inter Ethnicos, ſed etiam inter Chriſtianos (8). i. e. "It is ſurprizing that ſo "great a man ſhould heſitate in this matter, ſince it "is very evident from the ſacred writings, that no evil "of puniſhment muſt ever be ranſomed with the evil "of guilt; but that we ought to lay down life rather "than preſerve it for ourſelves or others, when "it cannot be preſerved without offending "God We are not therefore in any manner to "imagine that it is lawful for a husband or wife to "commit adultery, to ſave the life of either; but "rather that they ſhould wait for death, nay even "voluntarily ſeek for it, rather than betray each "other's chaſtity; to preſerve which, many of the "chaſteſt women, (not only among the Heathens but "even among the Chriſtians) not only ſuffered others "to kill them, but laid violent hands upon themſelves, an action however I don't approve." He quotes the example of Sophronia, which I ſhall mention in its place. Read Menage's Amœnitates Juris, chapter the 10th, entitled De mariti lenocinio; Adulterarum viros ordinari non potuiſſe. See page 52d of the Leipſic edition in 1680, in 8vo.

(8) Riveti Oper. tom. 1. p. 281.

☞ACME, was a Jewiſh Lady, retained in the ſervice of Livia, the wife of Auguſtus Cæſar [A]. She was bribed by Antipater the ſon of Herod the Great, to engage in his intereſt [B]; but one of her attempts to ſerve him proved very fatal to her ſelf, for having forged a letter in the name of Salome, that King's ſiſter, to her miſtreſs Livia, in order to expoſe the former to Herod's reſentment, the impoſture was detected [C], and ſhe was puniſhed for it in the manner, that ſo flagrant a crime

[A] Retained in the ſervice of Livia the wife of Auguſtus Cæſar.] Joſephus's words are, ἐδούλευε δὲ Ἰουλίᾳ τῇ καίσαρος γυναικί. i. e. "She was ſervant to Julia "the wife of Cæſar." We may obſerve that Joſephus and other authors always call her Julia, after ſhe was adopted into the Julian family by Auguſtus's will, as we find by Tacitus (1).

(1) Annal. l. 1. See likewiſe Caſaubon in Sueto-nium, p. 291.

[B] She was bribed by Antipater the ſon of Herod the Great to engage in his intereſt.] He was the eldeſt ſon of Herod by a woman of Aſcalon named Doris (2). He exaſperated his father ſo much againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus, his ſons by Mariamne, that they were ſtrangled by his order (3). When Antipater had thus removed them, his ambition prompted him to attempt his father's life, that he might obtain the kingdom (4). But this deſign of his was diſcovered at the ſame time that Herod had ſent him to Auguſtus with a large ſum of money and his will, in which he declared Antipater his ſucceſſor in the kingdom (5). Upon his return from Rome he was accuſed of the conſpiracy, and condemned by Herod and Quintilius Varus, who was then Governor of Syria, and kept in priſon till his father had ſent to Auguſtus to acquaint him with the affair (6) At laſt he was put to death by Herod's command, when he found, that upon a rumour of his death, he had attempted to bribe his keeper to let him eſcape (7).

(2) Joſeph. Antiq. l. 14. c. 11. p. 719. tom. 1. edit. Havercamp.
(3) Lib. 16. c. 6. tom. 1. p. 822.
(4) Lib. 17. c. 1. p. 826.
(5) Lib. 17. c. 3, 4. p. 832, 833.
(6) C. 3. & ſeq.
(7) C. 6.

[C] Having forged a letter in the name of Salome, that King's ſiſter, to her miſtreſs Livia, in order to expoſe the former to Herod's reſentment, the impoſture was detected.] While Antipater was in priſon for his deſigns againſt his father's life, there was a letter intercepted, written by Antiphilus, who lived then in Egypt, to Antipater, wherein he told him, that he had ſent Acme's letter to him, though with the utmoſt danger of his life. For, ſays he, you know that my ruin will be again attempted by both families, if I ſhould be diſcovered. Upon this Herod asked for the other letter, but it could not be found; for Antiphilus's ſervant, who brought that which had been read, affirmed very confidently, that he had received no other. While the King was in this perplexity, one of his friends imagined, that he ſaw a letter concealed in the foldings of the inner coat of the ſervant, which being examined, they diſcovered it. The letter was to this purpoſe: "Acme to Anti-"pater, greeting. I have written to your father in "the manner, which you deſired; and ſent him a "copy of the counterfeit letter of Salome to my "miſtreſs; which when he has read, I am confident, "that he will puniſh Salome for the ſuppoſed con-"ſpiracy." ΑΚΜΗ ΑΝΤΙΠΑΤΡΩ. Ἔγραψα τῷ πατρί σε οἷαν ἤθελες ἐπιστολήν, καὶ ἀντίγραφον ποιήσασα τῆς πρὸς τὴν ἐμὴν κυρίαν ὡς παρὰ Σαλώμης ἔγραψα· ἣν ἀναγνὺς οἶδ' ὅτι τιμωρήσεται Σαλώμην ὡς ἐπίβουλον. With regard to the letter, which was pretended to be written by Salome to Acme's miſtreſs, the ſenſe of it was dictated by Antipater, but Acme wrote it as follows: "Acme to King Herod greeting. "As I have the greateſt ſolicitude to diſcover every "thing, which is done contrary to your intereſt, "I have procured a letter of Salome written to my "miſtreſs; which I have taken a copy of, in order "to ſerve you, tho' with the utmoſt danger to "myſelf; and have here ſent it you. She wrote "this, being prompted by a ſtrong deſire of mar-"rying Syllæus. I deſire therefore you'll deſtroy "this letter, leſt my life ſhould be endanger'd by "the diſcovery (8)." This pretended letter of Salome contained the ſevereſt reproaches imaginable againſt Herod, and accuſed him of the moſt ſhocking crimes (9). When Herod ſaw ſuch a dreadful ſcene of villany opened, he was extremely enraged at his ſon Antipater, and reſolved to put him to death immediately, for having thus attempted his life, and that of his ſiſter, and even bribed Cæſar's family, in order to execute his purpoſe. Beſides Salome added new force to his reſentment, by ſhewing all the marks of ſorrow imaginable, and deſiring him to puniſh her with death, if any proof could be brought againſt her in that affair. Herod therefore ſent for his ſon, and commanded him to declare whatever he knew againſt her without any heſitation. But he continuing ſilent, the King ordered him, ſince his whole conduct appeared ſo extremely criminal, to diſcover immediately, who were his aſſociates and aſſiſtants in theſe villanous deſigns. Upon which he acknowledged that Antiphilus was the only perſon concerned in all theſe tranſactions. Herod being confounded with grief reſolved at firſt to ſend his ſon to Auguſtus, in order to receive the puniſhment due to the crimes, which he had intended. But afterwards being apprehenſive leſt he ſhould be reſcued by his friends, he kept him ſtill in priſon; and ſent Embaſſadors again to Cæſar with letters of accuſation againſt his ſon, and the proofs of the ſhare, which Acme had in carrying on his deſigns, and a copy of the letters, which had been intercepted. Αὖθις ὁ πρέσβεις ἐξέπεμψε καὶ γράμματα ἐπὶ κατηγορίᾳ τοῦ υἱέος, ὁπόσα τε Ἄκμη συγκακουργήσειεν αὐτῷ, καὶ ἀντίγραφα τῶν ἐπιστολῶν (10). Auguſtus immediately gave orders for the execution of Acme, and left it in Herod's power to puniſh Antipater in what manner he thought proper, either by baniſhment or death (11); and accordingly he ſuffered the latter, as we obſerved above (12).

(8) Lib. 17. c. 5. p. 841. tom. 1.
(9) De Bello Jud. l. 1. c. 32. pag. 138. tom. 2.
(10) Antiq. lib. 17. c. 5. tom. 1. p. 842.
(11) C. 7. pag. 847.
(12) In the Note [B].

crime deſerved (a), Moreri has been guilty of ſome errors even in this ſhort article [D].

(a) Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. l. 17. c. 5 and 7.

[D] Moreri has been guilty of ſome errors even in this ſhort article.] He tells us, that ſhe was a woman of the higheſt quality among the Jews; but gives no authority for that aſſertion. Joſephus only tells us, that ſhe was a Jeweſs by birth, Ἰουδαία τὸ γένος (13), and ſervant to Julia, or Livia, Ἰουλίας Σεραπαίνις (14). Moreri has likewiſe given us a very falſe and unintelligible account of Acme's contrivance againſt Salome; for he tells us, that ſhe wrote a letter to Herod, as if it came from her miſtreſs, againſt Salome; whereas it appears, that the letter, which ſhe wrote to him, was in her own name, and incloſed a pretended letter from Salome to Livia, full of complaints and reproaches againſt Herod (15).

(13) Antiq. l. 17. c. 5. p. 841. tom. 1.
(14) De Bello Judaic. l. 1. c. 32. tom. 2. p. 138. edit. Havercamp.
(15) See above Note [C].

☞ACOMINATUS (MICHAEL) CHONIATA, was born in Phrygia, and was Archbiſhop of Athens. He flouriſhed in the year 1204, but was then much advanced in years (a). He wrote ſeveral books of Hiſtory, part of which is ſtill extant in manuſcript in the Imperial Library at Vienna (b), and contains fifty ſeven leaves. His other writings we ſhall give ſome account of in the Note hereunder [A].

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Sec. xiii. p. 619, 620. ed. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.
(b) Cod. Hiſtor. xxvi.

[A] His other writings we ſhall give ſome account of in the note hereunder.] We have ſtill extant in Latin his Funeral oration upon the death of his Brother Nicetas, printed with Nicetas's works at Paris in 1566, and at Francfort in 1568, in fol. and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. xxv. pag. 180. Leo Allatius (1) has quoted ſome fragments of it in Greek and Latin. His Treatiſe of the Croſs is in the King's library at Paris (2), and likewiſe his Oration, in which he ſhewed, that the city of Athens was very much different from what it was anciently (3). In the Bodleian library (4) are the following manuſcripts under his name; Protheoria, contra reprehendentes, quod ægrè adduceretur ad ſpecimen ingenii ſui edendum, i. e. "A reply to thoſe, who blamed him for "not publiſhing ſome work." Encomium Nicetæ Choniatæ, i. e. "An elogium upon Nicetas Choniata." Oratio habita Athenis, i. e. "An oration "made at Athens." Cathecheſis prima, i. e. "The "firſt Catechiſm." Sermo in mediâ Quadrigeſimâ, i. e. "A ſermon preached in the middle of Lent." Sermo in Feſto Palmarum, i. e. "A ſermon preached "on Palm-ſunday." Alloquium Nicephori Prætoris, i. e. "The Speech of Nicephorus the Prætor." Sermo, cum primum inviſeret Euripum Euboicum, i. e. "A ſermon preached when he firſt viſited Euripus "in Eubœa." Epiſtolæ variæ, i. e. "Divers letters." Homilia de creatione hominis, i. e. "An homily up"on the creation of man." Lamentatio demortui Adyephi, i. e. "A lamentation upon the death of "Adyephus." Controverſia judicialis inter animam & corpus, i. e. "A judicial controverſy between the "ſoul and body," which begins thus, Τὴν δ' λογικὴν μόρφης. Letters to the Archbiſhop of Naupactum. An oration upon Iſaacius Angelus the Emperor, who aſcended the throne A. D. 1185, which begins thus, Εἰ ἡ Βασιλίσσα μὲν Νότε. A funeral oration upon Neophytus the Archimandrite of the Monks of Athens, which begins, Εἰ Σολομὼν ἔφη πᾶς γνοματίνων. Ad Euſtachium Theſſalonicenſem monodia, i. e. "A mono"dy to Euſtathius of Theſſalonica (5)."

(1) Adverſus Hottingerum, p. 197.
(2) Cod. 143. See Labbe in Specimine Novæ Biblioth. Manuſcriptor. Librorum, p. 74.
(3) Ibid. Cod. 2016. See Labbe, p. 135.
(4) Amongſt the Baroccian MSS. num. 131. See the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, p. 15, 16. apud Cave Hiſt. Liter.
(5) See Oudin Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. Sec. xii. tom. 2. Col. 1712.

☞ACOMINATUS (NICETAS) CHONIATA, brother to the preceding, when he was but nine years old, went to Conſtantinople to him, and was educated under him. He afterwards applied himſelf to a court-life, and became Secretary to Alexius Comnenus, and to Iſaacius Angelus ſucceſſively. He was raiſed gradually to the dignity of a Senator of Conſtantinople, great Logothete, Secretary of State, and Grand Chamberlain to the Emperor. But his good fortune, which had ſo long favoured him, at laſt deſerted him. For when the Latins took Conſtantinople in the year 1204 [A] he was

[A] When the Latins took Conſtantinople in the year 1204.] The ſtate of the Eaſtern empire and of the Greek church was expoſed to divers revolutions in the thirteenth Century. The Emperor Iſaacius Angelus, after he had held the crown nine years, was obliged to reſign it in the year 1195, to his own brother Alexius, who aſſumed the name of Comnenus; and having ordered Iſaacius Angelus to be depoſed, impriſoned him with his young ſon Alexius. But the latter eſcaped from Conſtantinople, and went to Germany to the Emperor Philip his brother-in-law, where he applied himſelf by the Emperor's advice to the army, which was juſt ready to depart for the Holy Land in the cruſade. He deſired them, before they ſailed to Paleſtine, to expel the uſurper from the throne of Conſtantinople, and to reſtore him to it, promiſing to join them in their expedition to the Holy Land with all the forces he could raiſe in his empire. This propoſition being made to the Croiſes, who were aſſembled at Venice, by the Emperor Philip's Embaſſadors and Alexius's Deputies, it was accepted by the Venetians and French, whoſe army laid ſiege to Conſtantinople in the year 1203, and took it in eight days time. The elder Alexius fled by the Boſphorus and the Euxin ſea to Zagora an iſland in Thrace. Upon which Iſaacius was ſet at liberty, and reſtored to the crown with his ſon Alexius. This Emperor promiſed to acknowledge the Pope's authority, to put an end to the ſchiſm, and to reunite all his ſubjects with the church of Rome. But not being then in a condition to diſcharge entirely what he had promiſed to the Princes of the cruſade, he perſuaded them to defer their expedition to the Holy Land till Eaſter the year following. During that interval the army of the Latins lay at the gates of Conſtantinople; and the natural averſion which they had for the Greeks occaſioned frequent conteſts between them; in one of which ſome of the ſoldiers of that army being inſulted by the Citizens, ſet fire to the city, and burnt part of it. This accident expoſed not only the Latins, but even the two Emperors, whom they had reſtored, to the hatred of the Greeks, and gave an opportunity to one of their relations, whoſe name was Murzulphle to ſeize the Government (1). It was by his Counſel that Alexius refuſed to perform his promiſe to the Croiſes; which occaſioned an open war between them, in which the Greeks having fail'd of the ſucceſs they expected, the people of Conſtantinople thought they were betrayed by their own Princes, and proclaimed Nicholas Cannabus Emperor. Murzulphle having ſeized the perſon of Alexius, procured himſelf to be acknowledged Emperor by the people, put Cannabus in irons, ſtrangled Alexius in priſon, and haſtened the death of Iſaacius. But this treachery of his was ſoon puniſhed by the Croiſes, who immediately laid ſiege to Conſtantinople, and took it by ſtorm the twelfth of April, 1204. Murzulphle having eſcaped the night before, Theodorus Laſcaris was choſen Emperor in his room by the Greeks. The city was given up to be plundered by the ſoldiers, who committed all the various kinds of cruelty and violence imaginable. The Latins having thus made themſelves maſters of the city, choſe Baldwin Earl of Flanders Emperor, and Thomas Moroſini a Venetian Patriarch; for it was agreed, that if the Emperor was a Frenchman, the Patriarch ſhould be a Venetian. They ſeized all the churches, and filled them with Latin Prieſts; they likewiſe extended their conqueſts into Greece, and reduced almoſt entirely whatever belonged to the Greek Emperors in Europe, and divided it among themſelves. Murzulphle and the elder Alexius falling into the hands of the Latins, the former was put was obliged to fly with his wife, who was then big with child, and with his children, in order to eſcape the calamities of the war. But at laſt he ſettled at Nice in Bithynia, where he died ſome time after the year 1206, for the particular time is not known (a). His Funeral Oration was pronounced by his brother Michael Acominatus, Archbiſhop of Athens, as we obſerved in the foregoing article (b). He wrote an Hiſtory in one and twenty books from the death of Alexis Comnenus in the year 1118, where Zonaras ended his, to the year 1203. There have been ſeveral editions of it [B]. It has been much applauded by the beſt criticks [C]. Beſides this he wrote ſeveral other works, of which we ſhall give an account in the Note hereunder [D].

(1) He was called ſo from his exceſſive large eye-brows.

(a) Oudin, Commentar. de Script. Eccleſ. Sæc. xii. tom. 2. Col. 1709, 1710, 1711.

(b) Note [A].

put to death, and the latter impriſoned; ſo that there remained only Theodorus Laſcaris, who having eſcaped to Aſia, fix'd the ſeat of his Empire at Nice (2), where our author Nicetas Acominatus at laſt ſettled himſelf, and died. We have a very tragical account of the taking of Conſtantinople in Nicetas's Hiſtory, who has repreſented the ſhocking barbarities, which the Latins were guilty of, in very ſtrong colours. But his teſtimony in this point has been rejected by a Roman Catholic writer (3), becauſe he was a Greek, and a man of very little credit, as he aſſerts; Nicetæ itaque hac in re teſtimonium, utpote viri Græci (4), ac ſubleſtæ admodum fidei, contemni merito debet. Tho' even this author immediately after acknowledges, that the Latins committed ſeverat crimes and ſacrileges upon that occaſion; and tells us, that the anonymous writer of the life of Pope Innocent III, ingenuouſly confeſſes the ſame.

(2) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 10. p. 87, 88. edit. Paris 1702.

(3) Fr. Ignatius Hyacinthus in Hiſtor. Eccleſ. tom. 5. Collcq. 1.

(4) So I imagine it ſhould be read, and not Græcæ, as it is in the 2d edition, Auguſtæ Vindelic 1727.

[B] There have been ſeveral editions of it.] It was printed in Greek with a Latin verſion and notes by Hieronymus Wolfius at Baſil in 1557, in fol. at Paris in 1566, at Francfort in 1568, in fol. at Geneva 1593, in 4to, and at Paris amongſt the Byzantine Hiſtorians in 1647, in fol. with a Gloſſary by Carl. Annabali Fabroti (5). In the year 1702 and 1705, John Boivin publiſhed in two volumes in folio, The Byzantine Hiſtory of Nicephorus Gregoras, printed at Paris by John Aniſſon the King's Printer in Greek and Latin; and at the end of the ſecond volume he added, in Greek and Latin from a manuſcript in the King's library, Nicetæ Choniatæ narrationem de ſtatuis Conſtantinopolitanis, quas Latini captâ urbe confractas, in monetam conflaverant (6): i. e. "Nicetas Choniata's account of the ſtatues of "Conſtantinople, which the Latins, when they had "taken that city, melted down, and coined into "money." We find by the author of the Supplement to Lambecius's account of the Emperor's library at Vienna (7), that there is a Greek manuſcript intitled, Mich. Chonjatæ Hiſtoria, i. e. "The Hiſtory of "Mich. Choniata." This unqueſtionably belongs to Michael Acominatus, whom we aſcrib'd it to in the preceding article; but the learned Caſimir Oudin (8) has mentioned it under that of one Nicetas Acominatus; which is certainly an error. But Dr. Cave is right in aſcribing it to the former (9).

(5) Oudin, ubi ſupra, and Olearius in Biblioth. Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 11. edit. Jenæ 1711.

(6) Oudin, ibid. Col. 1710.

(7) Daniel de Neſſel in Breviario & Supplemento Comment. Lambecii de Biblioth. Cæſareâ Vindobonenſi, Parte 5. Cod. 26.

(8) Ubi ſupra.

(9) Hiſt. Litt. Sæc. xiii. p. 620. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.

[C] It has been much applauded by the beſt critics.] Lipſius tells us (10), that even amongſt the later Greek writers there are two authors, who are not to be contemned. The firſt is Nicetas Choniates, who is at preſent but little known, but well deſerves to be generally read. He was a man of excellent and ſolid ſenſe above any writer of that age. His ſtile is elaborate, and ſhews very often that he affected to imitate the Poets, and particularly Homer. His manner of writing is diſtinct, clear, and without any impertinence; it is conciſe and exact. He introduces many noble obſervations; and the judgment which he paſſes upon things, is always free and ſolid. The learned reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee this paſſage in Lipſius's expreſſive tho' peculiar Latin ſtyle. Jam inter infimos quoque Græcos duo ſunt, quos non contemno. Prior eſt Nicetas Choniates. Is parùm adhuc vulgo notus fateor; ſed digniſſimus notitiâ; purum rectumque ingenium, ſi aliud illo ævo. Stylus ejus operoſus, Poetas & Homerum ſæpe reſipiens: ut res & narratio ipſa diſtincta, compoſita, ſine vanitate, ſine ineptiis, brevis, quod ſatis eſt, & fida. Crebra apud eum & opportuna monita; judicia non libera ſolùm, ſed ſana. Voſſius obſerves (11), that he was a diligent reader and imitator of Homer, ſo that the unuſual and poetical turn, which he affects to give his ſtile, renders it ſometimes a little harſh and ſtiff; eſpecially in his preface: but the reſt of his work is much more clear and flowing, as he promiſes in that preface. So that, as that learned writer tells us, he ſeems in his preface to have deſigned to ſhew what a talent he had at coining new words; but if he had done ſo in his Hiſtory, it would not have deſerved near ſo much applauſe, as it now has. Diligens fuit Homeri lector ac imitator, adeo ut ob poeticam atque inſolentem dictionem quandoque durior fiat: cum primis in præfatione, quæ ſanè ſalebroſa; in cæteris mollius fluit; quod & de ſe in præfatione promittit. Ut mihi videatur præfatione ea oſtentare voluiſſe, quam logodædalus foret: quod ſi pariter in hiſtoriâ feciſſet, profecto quidem multo minus etiam laudis mereretur quam nunc habeat. If the reader deſires to ſee the judgment of other writers upon this work, he may conſult Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Cenſura celebr. Autorum (12).

(10) Politicor. l. 1. c. 9. § 12.

(11) De Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. 2. c. 28.

(12) P. 404.

[D] He wrote ſeveral other works, of which we ſhall give an account in the note hereunder.] The treaſure of the orthodox faith, in xxvii Books. The firſt five books of that work were tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed with learned notes by Peter Morell at Paris in 1580, at Geneva in 1592 in 8vo, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. xxv. pag. 54. A fragment of the xxth book, concerning the method obſerved by thoſe, who are converted from the ſuperſtition of the Saracens to the Chriſtian faith, is printed in Greek and Latin without Nicetas's name amongſt Sylburgius's Saracenica, Heidelberg in 1595, in 8vo, p. 74. (13). Dr. Cave tells us, that he ſaw a beautiful copy of this work in Greek in the Bodleian library (14), where it is ſtill preſerved. Acominatus likewiſe wrote a Confutation of the Mahometan Law, which is extant in Greek amongſt the manuſcripts in the Colbertine library, cod. 4753, with this title, Τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ Μωάμεθ νομοτεθέντα περὶ τῆς θρησκείας τῶν Τέρκων, παρεκβληθέντα ἐκ τῆς αὐτῶ Βίβλου καλουμένης κορὰν, καὶ Χωνειάτου ἀντιῤῥήσεις (15). i. e. "The laws and inſtitu- "tions of Mahomet, with relation to the religion of "the Turks, extracted from the Koran, with Cho- "niata's confutation of them." This Dr. Cave (16) thinks to be a different work from any particular part of his Treaſure of the orthodox faith. We have likewiſe his Compariſon between winter and ſummer, to ſhew that winter is more eligible, which begins thus, Παλαί ποτε; and ſix Epiſtles of his, in Greek among the Baroccian manuſcripts in the Bodleian library at Oxford, num. cxxxi.

(13) Dr. Cave, and Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(14) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(15) Du Freſne in Catalogo MSS. Græcorum, quem ſubjunxit Gloſſario mediæ & infimæ Græcitatis, Col. 30.

(16) Ubi ſupra.

ACONTIUS (JAMES) a Philoſopher, Civilian and Divine, was born at Trent in the ſixteenth Century (a). He embraced the reformed religion, and coming into England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, ſhe indulged him the higheſt teſtimonies of her favour, which he acknowledges in a work dedicated by him to that Queen [A]. This

(a) Moreri places him in the 15th Century, but it is an error.

[A] He acknowledges in a work dedicated by him to that Queen.] Inſtead of an epiſtle dedicatory, he only inſerted an inſcription in the ſtrain of canonization, which begins thus; DIVÆ ELIZABETHÆ, ANGLIÆ, FRANCIÆ, HIBERNIÆ, REGINÆ, To the divine Elizabeth, Queen of England, France and Ireland, He declares that he dedicates his book to her Majeſty, as a teſtimony of his gratitude: In ſignum memoriamque grati animi, ob partum ejus liberalitate, quum in Angliam propter Evangelicæ veritatis profeſſionem

This work is the celebrated collection of the Stratagems of Satan, which has been so often tranſlated, and borne ſo many impreſſions. It was firſt printed at Baſil in 1565, a little after which the author died in England (b). James Graſſerus procured a ſecond edition of it anno 1610, in the laſt mentioned city. In this edition we meet with Acontius's letter de ratione edendorum librorum, wherein he gives ſuch good advice to thoſe who intend to ſet up for authors; but his treatiſe Of the Method, &c. (c), which is a valuable piece [B], although the author publiſhed it merely as an Eſſay (d), is not inſerted. He had written a work in Italian, on the manner of fortifying cities, which he tranſlated into Latin, during his ſtay in England (e), but I believe it was never printed. He alſo was compoſing a Treatiſe of Logic (f), and in all probability died before it was finiſhed, which was a loſs to the world. He had a juſt turn of thinking, and was happy in a very diſcerning and penetrating genius. He had formed the moſt rational idea of this work, and fancied himſelf obliged to be ſo much the more careful in writing it, as he foreſaw the ſucceeding age would be more enlightened than that in which he lived [C]. His conjecture was juſtly grounded [D]. His principles in religious matters did not agree with thoſe of Calvin, for he was a great friend to toleration, and in general maintained certain maxims, which made him very odious to ſome Proteſtant Divines [E]. I have met with very few particulars of his life, but he

(b) Graſſerus, in Epiſt. ad Lectorem, initio Stratagematum Satanæ.

(c) See the title of it at the end of the remark [B].

(d) Poſt illud tempus, quo excidit nobis inchoatum illud de Methodo opuſculum, ſcis me bis ſedem & locum mutaſſe Argentoratum primo, deinde in Angliam. i. e. "Since "the time that "this imperfect "work de Methodo got out "of my hands, "you know I "have twice "changed my "ſituation, firſt "to Strasburg, "and afterwards "to England." Acontius in Epiſt. ad Joh. Wolfium Tigurinum, de ratione edendorum Librorum, p. 410. 'Tis dated at London, 20 Nov. 1562.

(e) Acontius, Epiſtola ad Wolfium. p. 410.

(f) Ibidem, pag. 411.

profeſſionem extorris appuliſſet, humaniſſiméque exceptus eſſet, literarium otium. i. e. "As a ſign and "memorial of his gratitude, for the happy literary "leiſure he was indulged in by her liberality, when, "being baniſhed for profeſſing the Proteſtant Reli-"gion, he withdrew into England, where he was "received with the utmoſt humanity." He obſerves in his letter to Wolfius, that the penſion which was ſettled on him, relieved his wants in ſome meaſure, and gave him ſome opportunity of ſtudying. Ut autem quicquid eſt operæ id iſtam in artem (muniendorum oppidorum) conferrem, ex parte privatis ſum rationibus adductus, etenim in hoc voluntario meo exilio inopiam UTCUNQUE ſublevat, & otii ad alia ſtudia ſuppeditat NONNIHIL, impetrato mihi ab hujus ſapientiſſimæ atque optimæ Reginæ liberalitate honeſto ſtipendio. i. e. "I am partly in-"duced by private reaſons, to apply myſelf to the "utmoſt of my power to this art (of fortify-"ing cities); for in this my voluntary exile it IN "SOME meaſure relieves my wants, and affords me a "LITTLE leiſure to purſue other ſtudies, by procuring "me a pretty conſiderable penſion from the wiſeſt "and beſt of Queens: So liberal is ſhe to me (1)." What reſtrictions are here! and how plainly they ſhew how vaſtly difficult it is to content the exiled!

(1) Acontii Epiſt. ad Wolfium de Ratione edendorum Librorum, p. 411.

The reader may obſerve, that he obtained this penſion, not as a Divine, but in quality of an Engineer: this appears from the reaſon he gives, why he employed his time in compoſing a work, on the fortification of Cities.

[B] Which is a valuable piece.] A learned Carteſian has given it that character (2), in a letter written by him to father Marſenne, a few days after the publication of Des Cartes's Meditations. "He declared that he was "particularly pleaſed with the method, in which "Des Cartes had treated his ſubject; he admired the "proprieties of it, and extolled the advantages it had "over thoſe of the common ſchools; but above all, "he eſteemed his judgment, and the reaſons which "made him prefer the analytic method, or that of "reſolution, to the ſynthetic method, or that of "compoſition, as well for teaching as for demon-"ſtrating. He had not met with any thing "hitherto in that caſt, except the little book Of "the Method, &c. written by James Acontius; "who, beſides this excellent treatiſe, had alſo pub-"liſhed a beautiful eſſay on the Analytic method, in "his work of the Stratagems of Satan, which he "recommends to the peruſal of all thoſe, who wiſh "for the peace of the church; notwithſtanding that "Acontius is not therein free from the prejudices "of perſons of his communion, and intended there-"in to favour thoſe of his own party (3)." This little piece of Acontius, whoſe title is, Methodus ſive recta inveſtigandarum tradendarumque artium ac ſcientiarum ratio, i. e. "The method and right "way of inveſtigating and treating of arts and ſci-"ences," was inſerted anno 1658, in a collection of diſſertations De ſtudiis bene inſtituendis, printed at Utrecht.

(2) Heulnerus His letter is dated Aug. 29, 1641. See Baillet, Vie de des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 138.

(3) Baillet, ibid.

[C] The ſucceeding age would be more enlightened, than that in which he lived.] We muſt hear our author himſelf After having touched upon the other reaſons, which rendered the execution of his plan vaſtly difficult; he proceeds as follows: Intelligo etiam me in ſæculum incidiſſe cultum præter modum, nec tam certè vereor eorum, qui regnare nunc videntur, judicia, quàm exorientem quandam ſeculi adhuc paulo cultioris lucem pertimeſco. Etſi enim multos habuit habetque ætas noſtra viros præſtantes; adhuc tamen videre videor neſcio quid magis futurum (4). i. e. "I am alſo ſenſible that I live in "a more than uſual enlightened age; however, I "don't ſo much dread the judgment of thoſe who "now ſeem to have attained the higheſt pitch "of knowledge, as the riſing light of a politer "age than the preſent. For though that we now "live in has given birth to, and ſtill continues to "produce many great men, I yet ſeem to perceive "ſomething, (I know not what) greater, that will "afterwards ariſe."

(4) Acontii Epiſt. ad Wolfium, pag. 412.

[D] His conjecture was juſtly grounded.] I am of opinion, that the ſixteenth Century abounded more with learned men than the ſeventeenth; and yet this latter age was much more enlightened than the former. During the reign of Criticiſm and Philology, ſeveral prodigies of erudition aroſe in all parts of Europe. The ſtudy of the new Philoſophy, and that of the modern languages, having introduc'd another taſte, men were no longer fond of treaſuring up ſo prodigious a ſtock of learning; but to compenſate this, a certain more delicate and refin'd genius, accompanied with a more exquiſite diſcernment, diffuſed itſelf over the republic of letters: In a word, the men of this age are not ſo learned, but their abilities are greater. Acontius therefore might very juſtly perceive, in a diſtant proſpect, an age, when men would be more formidable judges of the logical ſyſtem he was then compoſing, than thoſe of the age in which he lived could be. The reader is to take notice, that it is not I who preſume to aſſert the ſuperiority of our age; for I only agree in opinion with thoſe who are allowed to be the greateſt judges in theſe matters. "In our age, ſays "one of theſe (5), ſenſe and reaſon is more attend-"ed to than any thing elſe. Wherein it may be "ſaid to the praiſe of our co-temporaries, that we "are better acquainted with the character of ancient "authors, and entred more into the ſoul of their "writings, than our predeceſſors. The difference "between them and us, is, that in the laſt age, eru-"dition was much more in faſhion than it is in "ours. . . . It was the genius of thoſe times, in "which nothing was more cried up than a great "capacity and profound literature: languages were "then thoroughly ſtudied: the Literati attempted "to reſtore the text of ancient writers by far-fetch'd "interpretations, to cavil about an equivocal ex-"preſſion, to lay down a conjecture in order to "eſtabliſh well a correction; in fine, thoſe men "confined themſelves to the literal ſenſe of an au-"thor, becauſe they had not genius ſufficient to ſoar "ſo high as his ſpirit or genius, in order to under-"ſtand him thoroughly, as the men of this age, "who are not ſo learned but have more good under-"ſtanding and ſet a much higher value upon plain "good ſenſe, than upon an injudicious capacity."

(5) Father Rapin, in his preface to his Compariſon of Thucydides and Livy.

[E] Odious to ſome Proteſtant Divines.] That the reader may not think I advance this at random, and without he himſelf informs us tranſiently, that he had ſpent a conſiderable part of it in ſtudying Bartolus, Baldus, and ſuch like barbarous authors, and been ſeveral years at court (g). (g) Idem, ibid.

Acontius's letter publiſhed in 1696 (h), proves that he had an accurate judgment, and was well acquainted with true Logic: It is dated from London the fifth of June 1565, and is of uſe to clear up an aſſertion of his, which had been cenſured, with regard to Sabellius. We are to obſerve, that notwithſtanding moſt Proteſtant Divines have him in the utmoſt deteſtation, he yet has been highly applauded by ſome of them [F]. (h) By Mr. Crenius, in page 131 & ſeq. Part II. of Animadverſiones Philologicæ & Hiſtoricæ.

without authority, I ſhall quote the words of a Miniſter of the Hague. Jacobus Acontius, ſays he (6), (de quo jure quod de Origine dici ſolet, "ubi benè, nemo "melius; ubi malè, nemo pejus,") . . . fuit . . vir verè doctus, ſed ingenii ut acris quidem, ita & elatioris, & juſto liberalioris: quin à neſcio quali ſcepticiſmo & indifferentiſmo in ipſam Theologiam introducendo haudquaquam alieni, quod tractatu ſuo De Stratagematis Satanæ teſtatum ſatis fecit; libello (Simone Goulartio judice) omnium malorum peſſimo *. Voetius ei adſcribit †, quod vel imperite vel ſubdole communem confeſſionis conceptum molitus ſit, ſub cujus vexillo militari poſſunt & ipſi Ariani. i. e. "James Acon- "tius, ſays he, (to whom may be juſtly applied what "is ſaid of Origen, viz. where he is right, no body "better; and where he is wrong, no body worſe,) .. "was a truly learned man, of a quick genius, "but bold, and too liberal: He was even too "much inclined to introduce a kind of ſcepticiſm and "indifference into Divinity itſelf, as ſufficiently ap- "pears from his treatiſe of the Stratagems of Satan; "(which, according to Simon Goulart, is the worſt "book that ever was written.) Voetius declares, "that he either ignorantly or cunningly attempted a "confeſſion of faith, to which ſtandard the Ari- "ans themſelves might ſubſcribe." I don't remember, that what is related above of Simon Goulart, occurs any where in his works; but I believe that it is borrowed from Uytenbogard, who tells us in ſome part of his writings, that when he ſtudied at Geneva, Simon Goulart reprimanded him for reading Acontius; and aſſured him, that his book of the Stratagems of Satan, was the moſt wicked book in the world, eſſe librum omnium malorum peſſimum (7), I have met with another paſſage in Voetius, relating to the affair in queſtion: This Doctor there ranks Acontius among thoſe hereticks, who left Italy upon pretence of the Reformation (8); and aſſerts, that had the venom which is latent in ſome part of his book * been taken notice of, he would have been excommunicated, or have been conſtrain'd to ſign an orthodox confeſſion of faith. Judicetur quis anguis in herba latuerit, quòd hic vir in fundamentalibus aſſertionibus nunquam τὸ ὁμοούσιον trium perſonarum ſtatuerit, nec adverſarios, Samoſatenum, Photinum, Arrium, Eunomium, Pneumatomachos, aut eorum errores rejecerit, contentus ſolos illos rejectos, qui negarent filium non eſſe alium a patre (9). i. e. "Judge "what a ſnake lies hid in the graſs, when this man ne- "ver aſſerted the SAMENESS of SUBSTANCE in the three "perſons in his fundamental aſſertions; nor rejects the "adverſaries, Samoſatenus, Photinus, Arius, Euno- "mius, and the Pneumatomachi *, nor their errors; "being contented with only rejecting thoſe who de- "nied that the Son is not diſtinct from the Father."

[F] He yet has been highly applauded by ſome Proteſtants.] Crenius furniſhes us with authorities on theſe two circumſtances. He obſerves (10), that Conrad Bergius declares, that Acontius reaſons in a very prudent aud pious manner. This Bergius was a Miniſter, and Profeſſor of Divinity in Bremen; and the book where he delivers himſelf in this manner, is entitled, Praxis Catholica divini Canonis contra quaſvis hæreſes & ſchiſmata, &c. and was printed at Bremen anno 1639 in 8vo. Rivetus having had a copy of this work, ex dono authoris, i. e. "preſented him by the author," wrote ſome remarks on it, whence I ſhall borrow that which concerns Acontius. Miror cur pag. 524, tanti faciat vir doctus judicium Acontii, hominis ambiguæ fidei & Socinianorum vel prodromi, vel commilitonis, cujus rei gratiâ ab Arminianis toties recuſus eſt & commendatus, etiam in varias linguas vulgares tranſlatus. Huic homini ſcopus fuit, ut ex toto libro apparet, ad tam pauca neceſſaria doctrinam Chriſtianam arctare, ut omnibus ſectis in Chriſtianiſmo pateret aditus ad mutuam communionem. Vellem doctiſſimum & pium virum à talibus laudandis & imitandis abſtinuiſſe (11). i. e. "I wonder why, in pag. 524, this learned man "ſhould have ſo great a regard for the judgment of "Acontius, a man whoſe faith is ambiguous, and "either the forerunner or fellow-ſoldier of the So- "cinians; upon which account his works were ſo "often reprinted and extoll'd by the Arminians, "and even tranſlated into ſeveral of the vulgar "tongues. The aim and deſign of this writer, as "appears from his whole book, is to reduce the Chri- "ſtian religion to ſo few fundamentals, as to open "a door to a mutual communion of all the ſects in "Chriſtendom. I wiſh the learned and pious writer "had not applauded and imitated ſuch things." The book whence I copied this paſſage, informs me alſo, that Iſaac Junius (12), Miniſter of Delft, rank'd Acontius, the Remonſtrants, and Socinus in the ſame claſs; and conſidered Acontius as a man who was for reducing all ſects into one, and include them all in one ark, in the ſame manner as Noah ſhut up all ſorts of animals in his; where they were preſerved, tho' they lived upon different food. We meet in the ſame book with the judgment which Peltius paſt on Acontius, viz. that by reducing the points neceſſary to ſalvation, to a ſmall number, and in requiring a toleration for all ſuch opinions as claſhed with the other articles, he thereby opened a door to every individual hereſy (13). To conclude, we find in the ſame work, that Acontius has been very much applauded, not only by Arminius and Grevinchovius, but alſo by Ameſius and George Pauli (14), both Divines of the reformed church. Jacobo Arminio tamen in Reſponſ. ad Excerpta Theol. Leidenſ. p. 65. Acontius eſt divinum prudentiæ ac moderationis lumen. i. e. "Acontius is a divine Lumi- "nary of prudence and moderation." Ameſio Præfat. ad Puritan. Anglicanos & Grevinchovio in Abſterſione calumn. Smoutii pag. 125. apud B. Hulſemannum in Dedicat. Supplementi Breviarii Theologici pag. 6. Idem Acontius eſt δυναστάτος ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς, qui ſementem eccleſiæ Anglicanæ calore & rore cæleſti fovit ſedulo (15). i. e. "The ſame Acontius is very "mighty in the ſcriptures, and diligently cheriſhed the "ſeed-plot of the church of England, with heat "and heavenly dew."

(6) Saldenus de Libris, &c. pag. 337, 338.

* Trigland Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 232.

† Voetius, Polit. Eccleſ. Part III. in Indice, & p. 31, 398.

(7) Uytenbogard, Hiſt. Belgicè conſcripta, cap. 1. pag. 7. edit. 4°.

(8) Voetius, Diſput. Theol. tom. 1. p. 495.

* Pag. 114, 123, 341. edit. Baſil. An. 1610.

(9) Voetius, Diſput. Theol. tom. 1. pag. 501.

* Pneumatomachi, ſo called from the Greek πνεῦμα ſpirit, μάχοι oppoſers, or combattants, were a ſect of heretics who declared that the Holy Ghoſt was not one of the three perſons of the Trinity. They aroſe in the time of the Emperor Conſtantine and Pope Liberius, about anno Dom. 359.

(10) Thom. Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. & Hiſtoric. Part II. p. 32.

(11) Rivet. apud Crenium, ibid. p. 30.

(12) Iſaac Junius in Examine Apologiæ Remonſtrantium, p. 45. apud Crenium, ibid.

(13) Peltius in Dedicatione Harmoniæ, apud Crenium, ibid. p. 31.

(14) In Reformato Auguſtano, ſeu Apologia pro Dictatis ſuis de Aug. Confeſſ. apud Crenium, ibid. p. 32.

(15) Crenius, ibid. p. 32.

☞ ACONTIUS (JAMES) [A] was a particular friend of Francis Betti a Roman [B]. Both

[A] Acontius (James,)] in Italian Giacomo Contio. That Contio, and not Acontio, was the name by which he was commonly called among the Italians, I have the teſtimony of his deareſt friend Betti, who in a letter (1) to the Marquis of Peſcara his patron, mentions him by that name.

[B] A particular friend of Francis Betti.] The expreſſions of friendſhip he uſes in the dedication of his book De Methodo, are a convincing proof of what I here advance. Communes ferè, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to Betti, quos diu ſuſtinuimus labores, ac ſollicitudines, eadem propemodum ſtudia, idem velle, ac nolle, & quod omnia ſuperat, eadem de religione ſententia, idemque ſumptum relinquendæ ob eam rem patriæ conſilium, ita arcto nos vinculo conjunxerunt, ut conjunctius jam eſſe nihil poſſit. Certè quæ deſiderari à perfecta poſſunt amicitia, ea ſemper abs te in me profecto ſunt omnia; amorem verò erga te meum, & ſi nulla magna in re expertus unquam es, tibi tamen adeo notum eſſe confido, ut planè injurius tibi ſim, ſi illum vel ſuſpicer, ullo indigere teſtimonio. That is, "The labours we undertook and the cares we long

(1) This letter was printed in 1557 in 8vo, without the Printer's name, or the place where printed. But by what I can judge from the paper and letter, it was printed at Zurich. The letter is dated the 10th Oct. 1557, a little after he left Italy.

Both took the reſolution of leaving Italy for the ſake of religion [C]. Betti left it firſt and went to Baſil, where he waited for Acontius, who repaired thither a little more than two months after, and from thence both retired to Zurich [D]. Not long after Acontius publiſhed his book de Methodo [E], which he dedicated to his friend Betti. From Zurich he went to Straſburg, and thence to England, where he died [F], leaving ſome of his papers to John Baptiſt Caſtiglioni, who publiſhed a little piece of his in Italian [G]. Ramus had a great opinion of Acontius's knowledge in the Mathematics, and wrote a very obliging letter to him [H]. His Stratagemata Satanæ have been tranſlated " ſuſtained in common; our almoſt mutual ſtudies, " the ſame will which we ſeemed reciprocally to " have, and a circumſtance which is ſuperior to all " the reſt, the ſame opinion we entertained with re- " gard to matters of religion, and the ſame reſolution " we had formed of leaving our native country for " its ſake; all theſe things bound us by ſuch ſtrict " ties, that it was impoſſible for any to be ſtronger. " Certainly, whatever teſtimonies could be wiſhed " for from the moſt perfect friendſhip, you have " ever indulged me. And though you never ex- " perienced the love I have for you in any af- " fair of great importance, I yet truſt you are " ſo ſenſible of it, that it would be injurious in me " even to ſuſpect that it ſtood in need of any " proof.

[C] For the ſake of religion.] The reformation in thoſe times had made a great progreſs in Italy, particularly among men of letters; and had not the court of Rome uſed the greateſt artifices, and the moſt violent methods to ſtop it, or had the Italian Proteſtants been indulged the protection of a powerful Prince, I am perſuaded that Italy would either have followed the example of Germany, Switzerland, &c. or at leaſt that the ſtate of religion would have been upon another foot than it is there at preſent. But the advantages which the Italian Princes and their families might expect from the Papal Court, beſides their own preſent intereſt with regard to other Princes of a higher rank and ſuperior power, were a great check to the reformation in Italy. The perſecutions and dangers to which thoſe who had embraced the doctrines of Luther and Calvin were expoſed, obliged them to quit Italy, and ſeek a refuge among the Proteſtants. Acontius was one of the Literati who left Italy on this account (2). This was in the year 1557, which is the date of Betti's letter quoted in the margin in the remark [A] (3). In this letter Betti ſays, that as ſoon as he left Italy he came to Baſil, where he waited above two months for Acontius, who at laſt came and went along with him to Zurich. From thence Betti wrote a letter to the Marquis of Peſcara his patron, in his own juſtification, and therein gave him an account of the reaſons which had obliged him to leave his ſervice. Now we may naturally ſuppoſe that this letter was writ a little after he had left his patron and Italy; that is to ſay, as ſoon as himſelf and his friend Acontius were out of danger, and in a place where he might freely declare the motives which had prompted him to take that reſolution. This was the reaſon why he did not write immediately upon his coming to Baſil, becauſe, as was ſaid above, Acontius was not yet come to him, and becauſe his writing at that time might very probably have expoſed Acontius to danger, who was well known to be his intimate friend, and perhaps ſuſpected to adhere to the then called new opinions; Betti therefore deferred writing till Acontius came to him, and was out of danger. Now the date of this letter being the 16th of October 1557, it is not to be doubted but that Acontius left Italy that very year. While Acontius was at Zurich he contracted a friendſhip with Friſius, Simler, and other learned men, but particularly with John Wolf.

(2) Propter Evangelicæ veritatis profeſſionem extorris, ſays he of himſelf in the dedication of his book to Queen Elizabeth.

(3) I have not the letter by me at preſent, but only an extract of it, which I made ſome years ſince; ſo that I cannot give the reader Betti's ownwords.

[D] Both retired to Zurich.] The Griſons, Switzerland and Geneva were then the ordinary refuge of thoſe perſecuted Italians, as being the Proteſtant countries that lay neareſt to Italy, from whence they could more conveniently maintain a correſpondence with their relations and friends by the commerce which was carried on between thoſe people: not to mention that the fame and renown of ſeveral reformers, and men of great learning who were then there, engaged a great number of Italians to ſettle in thoſe countries, and to eſtabliſh Italian churches. There are even to this day, in thoſe countries, many Italian families which are deſcended from thoſe who fled thither at the time of the reformation.

[E] His book de Methodo.] He publiſhed this book at Baſil in 1558, the true title of it is this; Jacobi Acontii Tridentini de Methodo, hoc eſt, de recta inveſtigandarum, tradendarumque ſcientiarum ratione. It was printed by Peter Perna an Italian Printer who ſettled at Baſil: It is a ſmall octavo volume, conſiſting only of a hundred and thirty eight pages. It was afterwards (in 1582) reprinted at Geneva per Euſtathium Vignon, multo quàm antea caſtigatius, as is ſaid in the title; and at laſt, as Mr. Bayle remarks, in 1658, in the collection of diſſertations de Studiis bene inſtituendis.

[F] To England, where he died.] I do not find when Acontius came into England, but it is certain he was there in 1562, which is the date of his letter to Wolfius. In 1565 he publiſhed his book intitled Stratagemata Satanæ, and died a little after. Graſſerus, who was in England in 1607 ſays, that he was informed of this by perſons of good credit; and Simler, though in a doubtful way, fixes his death to 1566. Obiit in Anglia, ni fallor an. 1566.

[G] A little piece of his in Italian.] This John Baptiſt Caſtiglioni was an Italian Gentleman, who had been chief maſter of the Italian tongue, and afterwards Gentleman of the Privy Chamber to Queen Elizabeth, who had a great eſteem for him. Peter Bizari, another Italian, who lived many years in England at that time, and even was a Fellow of St. John's College in Cambridge, is my author (4). Ma in particolare, ſays he, ſpeaking of Queen Elizabeth, poſſede ella ottimamente la noſtra più terſa, e più elegante favella, di cui ſuo principal precettore è ſtato il Sir Gio. Battiſta Caſtiglioni, hora gentil huomo della camera privata di lei; il quale è coſi ornato di generoſe maniere, e di coſi nobili, & honorate creanze, che meritamente per queſto, e per lo ſuo valore è cariſſimo a coſi gran Reina. i. e. "But in particular (ſays he, ſpeaking of Queen Elizabeth) " ſhe is a perfect miſ- " treſs of our polite and elegant language, in the " learning of which Signior Giovanni Battiſta Caſti- " glioni (now Gentleman of her Privy Chamber) " was her principal Maſter. This Gentleman is ſo " well verſed in every thing that forms the Gen- " tleman and the man of honour, that upon this " account, and for his great merit in other reſpects, " he is highly eſteemed by ſo great a Queen." Acontius left ſome of his papers to this Gentleman, who having found among them an Exhortation (in Italian) to the fear of God, written in Acontius's own hand, and judging by the ſtyle that it was compoſed by Acontius, he therefore publiſhed and dedicated it to Queen Elizabeth. The title of this book is as follows: Una eſſortazione al Timor di Dio, con alcune rime Italiane, nuovamente meſſe in luce. In Londra appreſſo Gio. Wolfio (5) ſervitore delle illuſtriſſimo Signior Filippo Sidnei, without date.

(4) In his Hiſtory of the Wars of Hungary, &c. in Italian, p. 206. printed at Lyons by Rovillio 1568 in 8vo.

(5) This Wolf was an Engliſhman who went into Italy to learn the art of Printing, and printed ſeveral Italian books in thoſe times.

[H] A very obliging letter.] The date of the letter is 14. Calend. Januarii 1565, Lutetiæ (6). Ramus ſays, Jacobi Acontii nomen è præclaris ingenii monumentis jampridem orbi notum atque illuſtre eſt; ſed tamen Jo. Laſcii Poloni è Britannia reditu nobis etiam jucundum, charumque factum eſt. Etenim cum doctos in ea inſula, & mathematis præſertim deditos noſſe cuperem, & ad te forte fortuna Laſcius delatus eſſet, operæ pretium nobis fuit Lutetiam reverſum de humanitate & gratia, de variis & reconditis artibus Acontii narrantem audire, inter quas laudes cum Archimedeam illam de machinis & urbium munitionibus Geometriam audiviſſem, non putavi tantam docti & ingenui animi ſalutandi occaſionem mihi prætermittendam eſſe. Interea Bibliopolæ noſtri Francoforto Lutetiam reverſi, attulerunt octo libros Stratagematum, quorum lectione

(6) Among Ramus's Letters, p. 203.

tranſlated into ſeveral languages [I]. He was a man of great penetration and judgment [K], and of great modeſty and moderation [L] in matters of religion, which expoſed him to the cenſure of ſome Divines [M]. It were to be wiſhed that we had all the books he wrote [N].

ACOSTA

non ſolùm recreatus ſum vehementer, ſed quibuſdam apud nos melioris & notæ, & literaturæ theologis legendos propoſui, qui modeſtiam orationis, & diſputationis prudentiam mirificè comprobarunt. Libellum autem De Methodo multò jam ante legeram non abhorrentem quidem ab inſtitutis noſtris, ſed neque plane convenientem. Equidem mirifico deſiderio teneor tua omnia perlegendi ac cognoſcendi, præſertim ſi geometricum aliquid & mechanicum commentatus es; iis enim ſtudiis modo totus deditus ſum: ea de cauſa ſcribo etiam ad Joannem Dium; literas noſtras eodem faſciculo concluſi, ſatis confiſus te protinus ei redditurum: nec dubito utrumque veſtrum, nec unquam dubitabo quemquam veſtri ſimilem provocare gratiâ vel accipiendâ, vel etiam referendâ. Hoc enim liberalis animi commune inter bonos, & humanitati deditos eſſe arbitror. i. e. "The name of James Acontius has been "long known and celebrated in the world by illuſtri- "ous monuments of learning. It is however made "ſtill more pleaſing and dear to us, by the return "of John Laſicius a Poliſh Gentleman from England. "For whilſt I was wiſhing to get acquainted with the "Learned in that iſland, particularly with the Ma- "thematicians; and Laſicius happening to be intro- "duced to you, I thought it worth my while at his "return to Paris, to hear him diſcourſe of your hu- "manity, affability and knowledge in various and "uncommon arts; among which having particu- "larly heard the praiſe of that Geometry relating "to engines of war and fortifications, after the "manner of Archimedes, I would not loſe the fa- "vourable opportunity of ſaluting a man of ſuch "great abilities and learning. In the mean time our "Bookſellers being returned from Frankfort to Paris, "brought your eight books of Stratagems, with whom "I myſelf am not only delighted, but have alſo "propoſed them to the peruſal of ſome of our beſt "and moſt learned Divines, who have highly approv- "ed the modeſty of your diſcourſe, and your pru- "dent conduct in treating it. But I had long ſince "read your little book De Methodo, which indeed "does not differ very much from my ſcheme of ſtu- "dies, nor is it altogether conſonant to it. I have "a very great deſire to know and peruſe carefully "all your works, eſpecially thoſe on Geometry and "Mechanicks, in caſe you have writ any thing on "theſe ſubjects, I being now entirely devoted to "ſuch ſtudies, for which purpoſe I am ſending let- "ters to (7) John Dee in the ſame packet, being "firmly perſuaded that you'll deliver them into his "hands. Nor do I, nor ſhall I ever ſcruple to take the "opportunity of troubling either of you, or perſons "who are of your character, or receiving favours from "either. This is a liberty that ought to be reciprocal "among the learned and the virtuous." By this letter the reader may ſee the great eſteem which Ramus had for Acontius, and his works; and what judgment the ableſt French Divines formed of his book entitled Satanæ Stratagemata.

(7) The celebrated Engliſh Mathematician in Queen Elizabeth's time.

[I] Into ſeveral languages.] The very ſame year that this book was printed at Baſil by Perna in 8vo, that is in 1565, a tranſlation of it in French came out, printed at the ſame place, and by the ſame Printer in 4to. No mention is made of the tranſlator, nor is any thing ſaid, by which it could appear that it was a tranſlation; ſo that thoſe who don't know that Acontius writ in Latin, may be eaſily miſtaken, and take it not for a tranſlation, but for an original. By this miſtake la Croix du Maine places Acontius in his Bibliotheque among the French authors. I have alſo ſeen a tranſlation of it in Engliſh, but only of the firſt four books, printed in London 1648. The tranſlator did not put his name to it, but promiſed to go on with the reſt, in caſe he met with the approbation of his readers; but whether or not he performed his promiſe I cannot tell.

[K] Of great penetration and judgment.] His books are a proof of what I aſſert, and whoever will take the pains to read them, will admire both his reaſoning and his method. I will add a particular inſtance of his judgment with regard to books and authors. Francis Patricius of Salò, living in Italy, and being yet a young man, publiſhed ſome Dialogues in Italian concerning Hiſtory and Rhetoric. Acontius by the peruſal of them foreſaw what a great man Patricius would prove in time. Equidem, ſays he to Wolfius, after having praiſed Patricius, ſeriò dico, ex iis, quæ videre licuit, ita conjicio, effecturum eum, ſi vixerit aliquandiu, (vix enim virilem ingreſſus eſt ætatem) ut quod invideat ſeculum noſtrum antiquitati ingeniorum quidem præſtantia habiturum non ſit &c. It would be too long to tranſcribe all he ſays of him, the reader will find it at the latter end of the abovementioned letter. And indeed he was not miſtaken; Patricius anſwered the expectation which Acontius had conceived of him.

[L] Great modeſty and moderation.] The manner in which he treats ſo delicate a ſubject as that of the book entitled Satanæ Stratagemata, ſhews plainly his modeſty and precaution not to give offence by naming perſons who were living, altho' this would have been an illuſtration of ſome paſſages in his book. He gives in his preface an account of his conduct in writing that work; he alſo promiſes a ſecond edition of it more full and correct, minus jejuna & incompta; looking upon what he then publiſhed as an untimely birth, quaſi abortum.

[M] By ſome Divines.] Acontius's moderation in matters of religion might be the ſubject of many reflections, which however would be too prolix, and the readers perhaps would look upon them as foreign to our deſign. I will content my ſelf with only two; the firſt, that in the opinion of many judicious and moderate men, there is no other way to preſerve the peace and unity of the church in the profeſſion of faith, but by not loading the conſciences of people with ſo many articles of faith, and propoſing thoſe only that are expreſly mentioned in the Scriptures, employing no other expreſſions than what the Holy Ghoſt inſpired the ſacred writers with, or words equivalent to them; and by allowing a mutual and charitable toleration with regard to the belief of thoſe points which are ſubject to diſputes, and which depend on the interpretation of ſome obſcure paſſages of the Scripture. This method would entirely baniſh out of the Chriſtian Church the odious name of hereſy with which men charge one another. This, they add, was the practice of the Jewiſh church, wherein there were different ſects, and one in particular called the Sadducees, who held opinions ſo obnoxious, that one of them alone would in our days make a man paſs for a Deiſt at leaſt, if not for an Atheiſt, yet none of them were forbid the temple, or excluded from any eccleſiaſtical or civil employments. This right they poſſeſſed becauſe they conformed to the public worſhip of God: ſo that as this practice of the Jewiſh church ſeems to ſome to be a great argument for toleration in point of faith, ſo alſo it ſeems to be a great one againſt thoſe, who not contented with the liberty of believing in their own way, will not join with the reſt in the public worſhip as by law eſtabliſhed, and yet complain of not being admitted into civil and eccleſiaſtical offices. But whatever thoſe judicious and moderate men ſay, I do not find that the great toleration allowed by the Jews prevented quarrels and diſſentions among themſelves: diverſity of opinions in religion having great influence upon mens actions and behaviour towards one another. My ſecond obſervation is, that it is no wonder Acontius was ill treated by ſome Divines, ſince all the moderate men in points of religion have met with the ſame uſage from thoſe Divines, who in matters of religion will only allow men to think according to their own way, or not to think at all. Such Divines are indeed found in every church, as bad men are in every country, but our church has the advantage of all others, in having the feweſt of this kind.

[N] All the books he wrote.] Simler in his Bibliotheca mentions, Ars muniendorum oppidorum, Italicè primò deſcripta, & poſtea in Latinam linguam tranſlata: Præterea Libri de Dialectica, cœpti quidem ſcribi ſed ut arbitror non abſoluti. Theſe two books were never printed, neither can I tell in whoſe hands the Manuſcripts are.

ACOSTA (URIEL) a Portugueze Gentleman, was born at Oporto about the cloſe of the ſixteenth Century. He was brought up in the Romiſh religion, of which his father was a ſincere Profeſſor (a), although deſcended from one of thoſe Jewiſh families which had been violently conſtrained to ſubmit to the ceremony of baptiſm. He alſo had an education ſuitable to his birth, and was inſtructed in a variety of ſciences, the laſt of which was the Law. He had received very happy diſpoſitions from Nature [A], and Religion had made ſo deep an impreſſion on his mind, that he ardently deſired to practiſe all the injunctions of the church, in order to avoid eternal death, which he greatly dreaded. For this reaſon he applied himſelf very aſſiduouſly to the reading of the Goſpel, and other ſpiritual books, and conſulted very carefully the abridgments of the Confeſſors; but the more he devoted himſelf to theſe ſtudies, the more difficulties ſtarted up, which at laſt oppreſt him to ſuch a degree, that not being able to ſolve them, he fell into the moſt dreadful agonies of mind. Acoſta did not think it was poſſible for him punctually to diſcharge his duty with regard to the conditions which are required for abſolution, according to good caſuiſts; and thus he deſpaired of ſalvation, in caſe there was no other way of obtaining it: but as it was a difficult matter for him to abandon a Religion he had been accuſtomed to from his infancy, and which the force of perſuaſion had rooted deeply in his mind; all he could do was, to ſeek whether the ſeveral things which are told concerning the other life might not poſſibly be falſe, or whether they are agreeable to reaſon; and he imagined that reaſon furniſhed him inceſſantly with arguments againſt them. Acoſta was then two and twenty, and this was the ſtate in which he fixed; he was oppreſt with doubts, and the reſult of his reflections (be the conſequence what it would) was, that he could never ſave his ſoul in the Religion he had imbib'd. He nevertheleſs ſtudied the Law, and at the age of five and twenty obtained a benefice (b). However, as the Popiſh doctrines would never ſuffer his mind to be at reſt, and that he yet reſolved to profeſs ſome Religion or other, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Moſes and the Prophets, which gave him more ſatisfaction than the Goſpel, and at laſt he was perſuaded the Jewiſh Religion was the true one; but, as it would be impoſſible for him to profeſs it in Portugal, he reſolved to leave it. Accordingly he reſigned his benefice, and embarked for Amſterdam with his mother and brothers, whom he had dared to inſtruct in the Jewiſh principles [B], and which they indeed had pretty well imbibed. Immediately after their arrival in the laſt mentioned city, they

(a) Pater meus verè erat Chriſtianus. Uriel Acoſta, in his Exemplar Vitæ humanæ, inſerted by Mr. Limborch at the end of his Amica Collatio cum Judæo de veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ. i. e. "Friendly Diſpute with a Jew concerning the truth of the Chriſtian Religion." Printed at Amſterdam in 1687 4°.

(b) The dignity of Treaſurer in a Collegiate Church.

[A] He had received very happy diſpoſitions from Nature.] He was ſo tender-hearted and compaſſionate, that he could not forbear ſhedding tears, whenever he heard of any misfortune which was befallen his neighbour. Shame had taken ſuch deep root in his ſoul, that he dreaded nothing ſo much as infamy. Brave and ſuſceptible of anger on a lawful occaſion, he oppoſed thoſe inſolent, thoſe brutal wretches, who delight in inſulting others, and joined to the weak party. This is the character he gives of himſelf. Infirmorum partes adjuvare cupiens, ſays he (1), & illis potiùs me ſocium adjungens.

(1) Uriel Acoſta, in Exemplari Vitæ humanæ, init. p. 346.

[B] Whom he had dar'd to inſtruct in the Jewiſh principles.] He does not omit the circumſtances, which were proper to heighten the ſacrifice he was making to his religion. He tells us, that he reſign'd an honourable and profitable benefice; and a fine houſe, which his father had built in the beſt part of the city (2). To this he adds the danger he run in embarking; no one of Jewiſh extraction being allowed to leave the kingdom without the King's ſpecial leave. Navem aſcendimus, non ſine magno periculo, (non licet illis qui ab Hebræis originem ducunt à regno diſcedere, ſine ſpeciali regis facultate) (3). In fine; he tells us, that had it been known he diſcours'd with his father and brothers, in favour of the Jewiſh Religion, it would have been his utter ruin. However, the love he bore them, made him overlook that danger. Quibus ego fraterno amore motus ea communicaveram, quæ mihi ſuper religione viſa fuerant magis conſentanea, licet ſuper aliquibus dubitarem; quod quidem in magnum malum meum poterat recidere, tantum eſt in eo regno periculum de talibus loqui (4). We may here obſerve, by the way, that the Spaniards and Portugueze have uſed every art, which the refin'd and moſt ſevere policy could invent, to maintain a party. All this they have done to ſupport the Chriſtian, and to ruin the Jewiſh religion: and it would be very unjuſt to accuſe them, of having reſigned the church to the protection of heaven, with the frame of mind of thoſe perſons who patiently hope to obtain all they ask for, from the efficacy of their prayers. One would conclude rather, that they had followed the advice which a Heathen Poet has given in an affair relating to huſbandry.

(2) Ibid. p. 347.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

Non tamen ulla magis præſens fortuna laborum eſt,
Quam ſi quis ferro potuit reſcindere ſummum
Ulceris os: alitur vitium, vivitque tegendo:
Dum medicas adhibere manus ad vulnera paſtor
Abnegat, & meliora Deos ſedet omina poſcens (5).

(5) Virgil. Georg. lib. 3. ver. 452.

That is,

" Receipts abound; but ſearching all thy ſtore,
" The beſt is ſtill at hand, to lance the ſore,
" And cut the head: for, till the core be found,
" The ſecret vice is fed, and gathers ground;
" Whilſt, making fruitleſs moan, the ſhepherd ſtands,
" And when the lancing knife requires his hands,
" Vain help, with idle prayers, from Heaven demands. Dryden.

Or elſe one would conclude that they had copied their conduct, from the reproaches which Cato made to the Romans, when he blamed them for truſting in the aſſiſtance of the Gods, who, added he, are ever deaf to the indolent, for idleneſs is a mark of the anger of heaven. Vos . . . inertia & mollitia animi alius alium expectantes cunctamini, videlicet Diis immortalibus confiſi, qui hanc rempublicam in maximis ſæpe periculis ſervavere. Non votis, neque ſuppliciis muliebribus auxilia Deorum parantur; vigilando, agendo, bene conſulendo, proſperè omnia cedunt. Ubi ſocordiæ tete atque ignaviæ tradideris, nequicquam Deos implores: irati infeſtique ſunt (6). That is,

" You keep things in ſuſpence by your ſluggiſhneſs
" and want of courage, every one waiting till the reſt
" may have taken their reſolution. You truſt in the " immortal Gods, who have frequently ſaved the " commonwealth in the moſt imminent dangers:
" However, the aſſiſtance of the Gods is not ob" tained by womaniſh vows and prayers, but vigi" lance, activity, and taking a proper courſe, give " ſucceſs to every thing. It is in vain for a man
" who delivers himſelf up to ſloth and faint idle-
" neſs, to implore the Gods, for on theſe occaſions he " is always ſure to find them impropitious and an" gry." Finally, one would conclude, that the leſſon they are the fondeſt of is the laſt part of the axiom, which a modern author gives us as follows:

(6) Saluſt. in Bello Catilin. p. 160.

they made themſelves members of the ſynagogue, and were circumciſed according to the uſual cuſtom; and thereupon Acoſta changed his name of Gabriel for that of Uriel. He had been but a few days among the Jews, before he perceived that their morals and rites were not conformable to the laws of Moſes, upon which occaſion it was impoſſible for him to be ſilent. However, the chiefs of the ſynagogue gave him to underſtand, that he muſt obſerve exactly their tenets and cuſtoms, and that he would be excommunicated in caſe he deviated ever ſo little from them. But Acoſta was not terrified at this menace, and thought it would be beneath a man, who had left his native country, and the affluence he enjoyed in it purely for the ſake of liberty of conſcience, to ſubmit to a ſet of Rabbis, who were not inveſted with a judiciary power [C]; and that it would argue either want of courage or piety, in caſe he ſhould betray his ſentiments on ſuch an occaſion as this; and therefore he went on. Upon this he was excommunicated, which had ſuch an effect, that his own brothers, whom he had inſtructed in the

A man muſt, as it were, abandon himſelf to the providence of God, as tho' all human prudence were vain; and muſt regulate his actions by the rules of human prudence, as tho' there were no ſuch thing as providence (7). They would undoubtedly laugh at a writer, who ſhould blame them for treating the Chriſtian religion, as an old palace that is grown ſo crazy, as to require props or ſupporters on all ſides; and the Jewiſh religion as a fortreſs, which cannot be weakened, unleſs it be perpetually bombarded. We may juſtly cenſure certain methods of maintaining the good cauſe; but in ſhort, it requires ſuccour, and diſtruſt is the mother of ſafety. See the note [B] of the article DRABICIUS, and the note [E] of the article LUBIENIETSKI.

(7) Cotin, Oeuvres Galantes, tom. 1. in the diſcourſe on the Truth of Dreams, p. 260.

[C] To a ſet of Rabbis who were not inveſted with a judiciary power.] There is, undoubtedly, a wide difference between the tribunals, which Acoſta juſtly dreaded in his own country, and that of the ſynagogue of Amſterdam. The latter can inflict canonical puniſhments only; but the Chriſtian inquiſition can puniſh with death; for this tribunal delivers over thoſe whom it condemns, to the ſecular arm. I therefore don't wonder, that Acoſta was not ſo much afraid of the Jewiſh inquiſition, as of that of Portugal. He was ſenſible, that the ſynagogue had no tribunals belonging to it, which took cognizance either of civil or criminal cauſes; and therefore he conſidered their excommunications, as a brutum fulmen: he did not obſerve, that this canonical puniſhment terminated either in death, or any chaſtiſement by the executioner; in impriſonment or pecuniary fines. He therefore thought, that as he had been courageous enough not to betray his religion in Portugal, he had much more reaſon not to be afraid of ſpeaking what his conſcience dictated among the Jews, tho' they ſhould excommunicate him; which was the worſt he had to fear from a body of men, who have no power to enact and execute laws. Quia minimè decebat ut propter talem metum terga verteret ille, qui pro libertate natale ſolum & utilitates alias contempſerat, & ſuccumbere hominibus, præſertim JURISDICTIONEM non habentibus, in tali cauſa nec pium nec virile erat; decrevi potius omnia perferre & in ſententia perdurare. i. e. "As "it would ill become that man to turn his back "through ſuch a fear, who had deſpiſed his native "land and other conveniencies for the ſake of liber"ty, and that it would be neither manly nor pious, "in ſuch a cauſe, to ſink under the oppreſſion of "men, eſpecially ſuch as have no juriſdiction; I "therefore choſe rather to ſuffer all things, and to "perſiſt in my opinion (8)." But it was with Acoſta as with moſt people who form a judgment of complicated evils. Theſe imagine, that the unhappineſs ariſes from the conjunction of two or three evils; and that the caſe of that man would not be very hard, who ſhould ſuffer but one of them. However, theſe perſons experience the contrary, when providence expoſes them but to one of thoſe two or three evils; and they feel it much heavier, than they imagined it would prove. The inquiſition of Portugal appeared in a dreadful light to Acoſta the Jew, and for this reaſon, becauſe he ſaw it joined to an immediate or mediate power of impriſoning, tormenting and burning. Had he conſidered it only with relation to its excommunicatory prerogative, he would have dreaded it but very little. This was the motive of his contempt for the menaces of the ſynagogue at Amſterdam; but experience had taught him, that the bare power of excommunicating is very dreadful, tho' quite unaided by the ſecular arm; for after his excommunication he was look'd upon as an hideous creature *; and his own two brothers did not dare ſo much as to pull off their hats to him. Ipſi fratres mei, quibus ego præceptor fueram, me tranſibant, nec in platea ſalutabant, propter metum illorum (9). i. e. "My ve"ry brothers, to whom I had been preceptor, paſt "by me, nor ſaluted me in the ſtreet; ſo great was "their fear of thoſe people." The boys hooted him in the ſtreets; curs'd him to the pit of hell; they gathered in crowds before his houſe, and threw ſtones at it. Jamque faces & ſaxa volant. i. e. "They now threw firebrands and ſtones." He could not be eaſy, either at home or abroad. Pueri iſtorum, à Rabbinis & parentibus edocti, turmatim per plateas conveniebant, & elatis vocibus mihi maledicebant, & omnigenis contumeliis irritabant, hæreticum & defectorem inclamantes. Aliquando etiam, ante fores meas congregabantur, lapides jaciebant, & nihil intentatum relinquebant ut me turbarent, ne tranquillus etiam in domo propriâ agere poſſim (10). The evils to which the ſentence of excommunication ſubjected him were ſo great, that at laſt he found them inſupportable; for, notwithſtanding the hatred he bore to the ſynagogue, he choſe to return to it by a feigned reconciliation, rather than to be publickly ſeparated from it. And, indeed, he ſaid to ſome Chriſtians who deſign'd to turn Jews, that they did not know what kind of a yoke they were going to lay on their own necks: Neſciebant quale jugum ſuis cervicibus imponerent (11). But how great was his perplexity, when, after having refuſed to ſubmit to the ignominious penance which the ſynagogue had enjoined him, he ſaw himſelf excommunicated a ſecond time! He was ſpit at as he paſt along the ſtreets, and even little boys were taught to do ſo. Multi eorum tranſeunte me in platea ſpuebant, quod etiam & pueri illorum faciebant ab illis edocti; tantum non lapidabar, quia facultas deerat (12). They would have ſtoned him, had it been in their power; his relations perſecuted him, and not a ſoul viſited him in his ſickneſs. To make ſhort. He was aggrieved ſo many ways, that the Jews at laſt extorted from him the ſubmiſſion they required. Duravit pugna iſta per annos ſeptem, intra quod tempus incredibilia paſſus ſum (13). That is, "This combat laſted ſeven years, "during which my ſufferings were incredible." The reader will find in the note [E], the puniſhment that was inflicted on him. Acoſta was then more ſenſible than ever, how formidable thoſe men are who are veſted with the power of inflicting eccleſiaſtical cenſures, tho' they have no civil authority or juriſdiction.

(8) Acoſta, Exemplar Vitæ Humanæ. p. 347.

* The original ſays an Owl.

(9) Acoſta, Exemplar Vitæ Hum. p. 347.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ibid. pag. 348.

(12) Ibid. p. 349

(13) Ibid.

I am far from aſſerting, that the arguments of the independents are of any weight; they who are ſo offended at the Church, for aſſuming the power of excommunicating, that is, of inflicting puniſhments which are ſometimes more infamous than burning in the hand; and which expoſe a man to a greater number of temporal evils, than the corporal puniſhment to which the ſecular judge may ſentence him. The ſentences of the civil Magiſtrate do not ſuppreſs the acts and offices of humanity, much leſs do they exclude the duties of conſanguinity: but excommunication ſometimes arms a father againſt his children, and children againſt a father: it ſtifles all the ſentiments of nature; breaks the bands of friendſhip and hoſpitality; reduces a man to the miſerable condition of perſons infected with the plague, and even to a more abandoned ſtate.

the Jewiſh Religion, did not dare to ſpeak to, or even ſalute him, whenever they met him in the ſtreets. Acoſta being under theſe circumſtances, writ a book in his own juſtification, wherein he ſhewed, that the rites and traditions of the Phariſees, claſh directly with the writings of Moſes. He had ſcarce begun this work, when he embraced the opinion of the Sadduces, having wrought himſelf to a ſtrong perſuaſion, that the rewards and puniſhments of the old law, relate to this life only; and that chiefly, becauſe Moſes does not any where mention, either the joys of paradiſe or the torments of hell. His adverſaries rejoiced greatly to hear he had imbibed the opinion abovementioned, foreſeeing that this would be a good handle, whereby to juſtify (in the minds of the Chriſtians) the proceedings of the ſynagogue againſt him, &c. Hence it was, that even before his work was printed, they publiſhed (c) a book upon the immortality of the ſoul, written by a Phyſician, who uſed all the arguments he could think of, to make Acoſta paſs for an Atheiſt. Children were even ſpirited up to inſult him in the ſtreets, and to throw ſtones at his houſe; but all this did not prevent his writing a treatiſe againſt the Phyſician, in which he did his utmoſt to invalidate the doctrine of the ſoul's immortality (d). The Jews had recourſe to the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam, and impeached him as a man who ſapped the foundations both of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Religions; whereupon he was thrown into priſon, but was bailed about eight or ten days after; however, all the copies of his work were confiſcated, and he was obliged to pay a fine of three hundred florins. Acoſta nevertheleſs did not ſtop here, for time and experience made him carry matters much farther. He examined whether the law of Moſes came from God, and imagined he had found ſolid reaſons to convince himſelf that it was merely of human invention; but inſtead of drawing the following conſequence from it, I therefore ought not to return to the communion of the Jewiſh church, he put the following queſtion to himſelf, Why ſhould I perſiſt in abſtaining from it all my life time, expoſed to ſo many inconveniencies; eſpecially as I am in a ſtrange country whoſe language I am ignorant of? Will it not be better for me to play the ape among apes? Having weighed theſe matters, he returned again to the Jewiſh church, fifteen years after his excommunication, and retracting what he had written, ſubſcribed every thing as they directed. Some days after he was impeached by a nephew of his, a young lad, that lived in the houſe with him, who had perceived, that his uncle did not obſerve the laws of the ſynagogue, either with reſpect to eating, or other points. This accuſation was attended with ſtrange conſequences, for a relation of Acoſta, who had reconciled him to the Jews, fancied he was bound in honour to perſecute him with the utmoſt virulence [D]. The Rabbis, and all the members of their ſynagogue, were fired with the ſame ſpirit, eſpecially when they heard that Acoſta had adviſed two Chriſtians who were come from London to Amſterdam, not to turn Jews. He therefore was ſummoned to appear before the great council of the ſynagogue, when he was aſſured, that a ſecond excommunication would be fulminated againſt him, in caſe he did not make ſuch ſatisfaction as would be required at his hands; but he found the terms of it ſo hard, that his anſwer was, he could not ſubmit to them, upon which the Jews reſolved to turn him out of their communion. Words could never expreſs the inſults with which he was afterwards loaded, or the injurious treatment he met with from his relations. Having ſpent ſeven years in this melancholy condition, he reſolved to declare that he was ready to ſubmit to the ſentence of the ſynagogue; for he had been given to underſtand, that by making ſuch a declaration, matters might be eaſily made up, becauſe the Judges, ſatisfied with his ſubmiſſion, would ſoften the ſeverity of the puniſhment. However, Acoſta was catched, and was forced to undergo, in its utmoſt rigour, the penance which had at firſt been propoſed to him [E]. Theſe are the particulars I have extracted, without the leaſt diſguiſe or alteration,

(c) In 1623.

(d) The title of this work is, Examen Traditionum Philoſophicarum ad legem ſcriptam. i. e. "An Enquiry "into the Philoſophical Traditions compared with the "written law.

[D] A relation . . fancied himſelf bound . . to perſecute him with the utmoſt virulence.] Here follow the evils he brought upon him. Acoſta was juſt going to marry a ſecond wife; one of his brothers had a great many effects of his in his hands, and it was very much the intereſt of Acoſta, to continue trading with him. Now this relation was his enemy on all theſe occaſions; for he cauſed the intended match to be broke off; engaged Acoſta's brother to keep all the effects that were in his poſſeſſion, and to trade with him no longer. This hard uſage was probably one of the reaſons which confirmed Acoſta in his impious way of thinking; for there is no doubt but he was perſuaded, that thoſe paſſions and unjuſt proceedings might be authorized by ſome paſſages in the Old Teſtament, wherein the law commands brothers, fathers and husbands, not to ſpare the lives of their brothers, children and wives, in caſe theſe apoſtatize (14). And it is to be obſerved, that he made this an argument againſt the law of Moſes; aſſerting, that a law which overthrows the religion of nature, could not proceed from God, the author of that religion (15). Now, ſays he, the religion of nature eſtabliſhes a bond of friendſhip among relations. See how Limborch anſwers this ſophiſm (16.)

(14) See Deut. xiii.
(15) Acoſta, Exemplar Vitæ Humanæ, p. 352.
(16) Philippus à Limborch in Refut. Urielis Acoſtæ, p. 361 & ſeq.

[E] Forc'd to undergo in its utmoſt rigour, the penance which had been propoſed to him at firſt.] The deſcription he gives of it is as follows. A great crowd of men and women being come to the ſynagogue to ſee this ſight, Acoſta came in, and at the time appointed went up into the pulpit, where he read with a loud voice a writing, by which he confeſſed that he had deſerved a thouſand deaths, for not obſerving the ſabbath-day, nor the promiſe he had made; and for having diſſuaded ſome perſons from embracing the Jewiſh religion, who had that deſign; that, to atone for theſe crimes, he was ready to ſuffer whatever they ſhould inflict, and promiſed not to be guilty of the like faults. Being come down from the pulpit, he was ordered to withdraw to a corner of the ſynagogue, where he ſtript himſelf to the waiſt; pulled off his ſhoes and ſtockings, when the door-keeper faſtned his hands to a pillar, this being done, the chief chaunter gave him juſt thirty nine laſhes with a whip; for in theſe kind of ceremonies care is taken not to exceed the number preſcribed by the law: Then the Preacher came; who making him ſit on the ground, declared him abſolved from the excommunication; ſo that the gates of Paradiſe were no longer ſhut againſt him, as before.

tion, or without pretending to warrant the truth of them, from a little piece written by Acoſta (e), and publiſhed and refuted by Limborch (f). It is believed that he drew it up a few days before his death, after having determined to lay violent hands upon himſelf, which ſtrange reſolution he executed a little after he had failed in his attempt to kill his principal enemy (g). For the moment that the piſtol with which he intended to ſhoot him, as he paſt by his houſe, miſſed fire, he ſhut the door and ſhot himſelf with another piſtol (b). This happened at Amſterdam, but the year is not exactly known [F]. Here is an example which favours thoſe that condemn the liberty of philoſophizing on religious ſubjects, the principal ſtreſs of whoſe argument lies in this, that it leads inſenſibly to Atheiſm or Deiſm [G]. I ſhall conſider Acoſta's reflection on the following circumſtance, viz. that the Jews, to make him more odious, affected to ſay that he was neither Jew, Chriſtian, nor Mahometan [H].

(e) Entitled, Exemplar Vitæ Humanæ.
(f) See the above citation (a).
(g) This was his brother or couſin. Limborch in Præfat. Exemplar. Vitæ Humanæ.
(b) Limborch, ibid.

☞ ACREMAH

Et ita jam porta cæli mihi erat aperta, quæ antea fortiſſimis ſeris clauſa me à limine & ingreſſu excludebat (17). i. e. "That thus the gate of Heaven was "open to me, which before being ſhut with vaſtly "ſtrong locks, excluded me from the entrance, and "from going into it." Acoſta after this took up his clothes, and went and laid himſelf on the ground at the door of the ſynagogue, where all thoſe who came out, walked over him.... I imagined that the reader would be pleaſed to meet here with this little ſpecimen of the Jewiſh ceremonies (18).

(17) Acoſta Exemplar Vitæ Hum. p. 350.

(18) I extracted it from the Exemplar Vitæ Humanæ of Acoſta, p. 349, 350.

[F] But the year is not exactly known.] It is very probable that he laid violent hands upon himſelf, a little after the ceremony of his abſolution; exaſperated at the treatment he had received, contrary to the hopes he had entertained, that the ſeverity of his penance would be mitigated. However, this cannot fix exactly the date, ſince we don't know the year he underwent this penance. If we knew how long he had been excommunicated when the Phyſician publiſhed his book, viz. in 1623, it would not be difficult to make an exact computation; ſince he obſerves that his firſt excommunication laſted fifteen years; his ſecond ſeven; and that this in queſtion followed ſoon after it. It is ſuppoſed in the Bibliotheque univerſelle, that he killed himſelf about the year 1647 (19); but according to others, it was in 1640 (20).

(19) Biblioth. Univerſ. tom. 7. p. 327.
(20) Joh. Helvicus Willemerus in Diſſert. Philologica de Sadducæis, p. ult. He cites Mullerus Judaiſm. Proleg. p. 71.

[G] That it leads inſenſibly to Atheiſm or Deiſm.] Acoſta ſerves as an example to theſe people. He refuſed to comply with the deciſions of the catholic church, becauſe he did not find them conſiſtent with reaſon; and he embraced the Jewiſh religion, becauſe he found it more conformable to the knowledge he had acquired. He afterwards rejected a numberleſs multitude of Jewiſh traditions, becauſe he judged they were not contained in the holy ſcripture; he even denied the immortality of the ſoul, upon pretence that it is not mentioned in the law of God; and laſtly, he denied the Divinity of the books of Moſes, becauſe he thought that the religion of nature was not conformable to the ordinances of that Legiſlator. Had he lived ſix or ſeven years longer, he poſſibly would have denied the religion of nature, becauſe his wretched reaſon would have ſuggeſted a great number of difficulties in the hypotheſis concerning the providence and free will, of the eternal and neceſſary Being. Be this as it will every one who makes uſe of his reaſon, ſtands in need of God's aſſiſtance; for without this, it is a guide that leads us aſtray: and we may compare Philoſophy to powders, which are of ſo corroſive a nature, that they not only eat away the proud fleſh of a wound, but the ſound alſo; rot the bones, and pierce to the very marrow. Philoſophy refutes errors at firſt, but in caſe ſhe is not ſtopp'd there, ſhe attacks truths; and if ſuffered to grow head-ſtrong, ſhe goes ſuch lengths, that ſhe loſes herſelf, and does not know where to fix. This muſt be imputed either to the weakneſs of the mind of man, or to the ill uſe he makes of his pretended ſtrength. Happily, or rather by the wiſe diſpenſation of providence, few men are capable of falling into this abuſe.

[H] Affected to ſay, that he was neither Jew, Chriſtian, nor Mahometan.] This aſſertion, anſwered Acoſta, was the reſult both of malice and ignorance: Had Acoſta been a Chriſtian, the Jews would have conſider'd him as an abominable idolater, who, with the Founder of the Chriſtian religion, the true God would have puniſhed as an apoſtate; and had he profeſſed the Mahometan religion, he would have been reviled with the ſame odious language: He therefore could not any way eſcape the malice of their tongues, but by adhering devoutly to the traditions of the Phariſees. Let us conſider his own words: Scio adverſarios iſtos (21), ut nomen meum coram indoctâ plebe dilanient, ſolitos eſſe dicere, Iſte nullam habet religionem; Judæus non eſt, non Chriſtianus, non Mahometanus. Vide prius, Phariſæe, quid dices; cæcus enim es, & licet malitiâ abundes, tamen ſicut cæcus impingis. Quæſo, dic mihi, ſi ego Chriſtianus eſſem, quid fuiſſes dicturus? Planum eſt, dicturum te, fœdiſſimum me eſſe idololatram, & cum Jeſu Nazareno Chriſtianorum Doctore pœnas vero Deo ſoluturum, à quo defeceram. Si Mahometanus eſſem, nôrunt etiam omnes quibus me honoribus fuiſſes cumulaturus: & ita nunquam linguam tuam poſſem evadere; unicum hoc effugium habens, nempe ad genua tua procumbere, & fœdiſſimos pedes tuos, tuas inquam nefarias & pudendas inſtitutiones oſculari. i. e. "I know that "theſe adverſaries, in order to make me ſtill more "odious to the people, uſed to ſay, This man has "no religion; he is neither a Jew, a Chriſtian, nor a "Mahometan. Conſider firſt, thou Phariſee, what thou "ſayeſt, for thou art blind; and tho' thou aboundeſt "with malice, thou ſtumbleſt like a blind man. Pray "now tell me, were I a Chriſtian what would you "ſay then? It is manifeſt you would ſay that I am a "moſt deteſtable idolater, and that I ſhould be puniſhed by the true God, (for apoſtatizing from him) "with Jeſus of Nazareth the teacher of the Chriſtians; were I a Mahometan, every one knows the "honours they would then heap upon me, and thus "I could never eſcape your malicious tongue, having this only refuge left, viz. to fall proſtrate be"fore you, and to kiſs your filthy feet, I ſay your "wicked and ſhameful inſtitutions." Another anſwer he uſes againſt his adverſaries, is his asking them whether, beſides the three religions abovementioned, (the two laſt of which they conſider more as a falling from God, than a religion) they acknowledge any other? He ſuppoſes that they acknowledge a natural religion as true; as a means to pleaſe God, and as ſufficient to ſave all nations, the Jews excepted. It is that comprehended in the ſeven precepts, which Noah and his deſcendants till Abraham, obſerved. You yourſelves therefore, ſays he, acknowledge that there is a religion I may reſt myſelf upon, tho' I am of Jewiſh extraction; for, in caſe my entreaties cannot prevail upon you to ſuffer me to mix in the crowd of other nations, I ſhall preſume to take that liberty of my own accord. Having ſpoke thus, he makes an encomium on the religion of nature.

(21) Acoſta, Exemplar Vitæ Hum. p. 351.

By his firſt anſwer, we may eaſily perceive, that the objection which the Jews ſtarted to him, was ſpecious rather than ſtrong, and more glaring than ſolid; better adapted to ſerve their own ends, than conformable to the laws of juſt reaſoning; in a word, there ſeemed to be a fraud at the bottom of it. The ſpeciouſneſs and glare of it ariſes from hence. The mind of man is ſo formed, that from the firſt impreſſions which are made on it, neutrality with regard to the worſhip of God, is more ſhocking to him than falſe worſhip; whence it follows, that whenever he hears a perſon has forſaken the religion of his fathers, without embracing another, he is ſeized with a greater horror, than if he had been told, that ſuch a perſon had left the beſt religion for the worſt. This firſt impreſſion dazles and agitates him in ſuch a manner, that he makes it a ſtandard whereby to form a judgment of them; and to this

How greatly the idea of neutrality with regard to religion diſguſts and exaſperates the minds of men.

he

☞ACREMAH, ſon of Abu Jahl an idolater (a). Acremah was one of the Proſcrib'd (b) whom Mahomet had excepted out of the general pardon, and whom he was reſolved to put to death at the taking of Mecca. Acremah the day the Prophet made his entry into that city, fled towards the ſea; but Omm-Hakim his wife, daughter of Al Hâreth Ebn Heſhâm, who had embraced Iſlamiſm before, having thrown herſelf at the feet of the Apoſtle of God (as the Moſlems call Mahomet) and obtained his pardon, immediately ſet out after her huſband. Being come to the ſea-coaſt, ſhe perceived Acremah was got on board a ſhip which was ready to ſet ſail. Upon this ſhe took boat, and coming up with the ſhip, aſſured her huſband that ſhe had obtained his pardon, and prevailed on him to return back to Mecca. A little after ſhe introduced him into the Prophet's apartment, who gave him a very kind reception, and ſpake to him as follows. Welcome, O fugitive; I pardon you, upon condition that you make the double confeſſion of faith. Acremah obeyed immediately, and holding down his head out of modeſty, ſaid thus to the Prophet: Thou art the father of men, and I truſt that thou wilt keep thy word with me. With regard to my ſelf, as much as I have been thine enemy and have oppoſed the way of God, ſo much will I be thy ſervant, and devoted to the way of God; and I will combat in thy defence to the laſt drop of my blood. The converſion of this idolater was highly pleaſing to Mahomet [A]. Acremah had been but very lately married to his wife, when the Prophet, as a teſtimony of his favour to them, made Acremah commander of the body of troops of the tribe of Hawazen, and this was his wife's portion. Acremah engaged afterwards in all the wars, fighting valiantly for the new religion, till at laſt he obtained the glory of martyrdom, he being killed in the battle of Yermuc, under the Khalifat of Abu Becr, with this remarkable circumſtance, viz. that upwards of ſeventy wounds, made by ſabres, lances and darts, were found in his body (c). Abu Jahl his father was one of the moſt bitter enemies to Mahomet and his religion [B].

(a) Abu Jahl, ſignifies father of folly, a nickname his enemies had given him out of deriſion, his true ſirname being Abu'l Hecm, that is, Father of Wiſdom. His proper name was Amru Ebn Heſham the Makhzumite.

(b) Theſe were in all eleven men and ſix women according to Al Bokhari; but Abul Fedâ computes ſix men and four women.

(c) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet tom. 2. p. 138, 139. Amſterdam 1732, 8°.

ACRONIUS

he proportions the averſion he conceives againſt them. He does not allow himſelf time to conſider thoroughly, whether in reality it is better for a man to enliſt himſelf under the Devil's banners in ſome of the falſe religions which that enemy to God and man has ſet up, or to be of no religion. It may therefore be ſuppoſed, that the only reaſon why the Phariſees, who perſecuted Acoſta, laid ſo much ſtreſs upon their objection, was merely, becauſe they found it very well adapted to enflame the minds of the vulgar, and engage the Chriſtians in the diſpute. I will indeed own, that they would not have made ſuch an uproar, had he embraced the Chriſtian faith at Amſterdam, or the Mahometan belief at Conſtantinople; but then they would not have thought him leſs undone, leſs damn'd, or leſs an apoſtate; and their forbearance would have been merely the effect of policy, and a juſt dread of the reſentment of thoſe who profeſſed the eſtabliſhed religion. To judge of things from the firſt impreſſions; there are very few Proteſtants, who, upon hearing that Titius had quitted the reformed Church without joining in any other communion, but would aſſert, that he would not have been guilty of ſo great a ſin, had he turned Papiſt: But I would willingly put the following queſtions to ſuch Proteſtants; Have you thoroughly conſider'd your own hearts? Have you well weigh'd what you would ſay, in caſe he were become a great bigot in the Popiſh religion; that he ſhould be ſeen loaded with relicks, and running after every proceſſion; in a word, that he ſhould practiſe the greateſt extravagancies of idolatrous and Monkiſh ſuperſtitions? Are you ſure you would not change your note, ſhould you hear that he was turn'd Jew, or Mahometan, or worſhipped the Chineſe Pagods? Once again, ſuch is the frame of the mind of man: the firſt thing that ſtrikes him is the ſtandard of his paſſions; he takes advantage of the preſent ſtate of things, and does not caſt about for what he ſhould ſay, were the ſituation of them to be changed. Such a man, (do theſe people ſay,) has forſaken us, and is not joined with any other body of men; it is on this ſide we muſt attack him: his indifference ſhall be objected to him as his greateſt crime: Had he turn'd Heathen, we would have attack'd him on that ſide; and we would ſay, or at leaſt think thus, Had he continued neuter, and adhered, in the main, to the religion of nature; this would have been tolerable; but &c.

Acoſta, by his ſecond anſwer, deprived his adverſaries of a great advantage, for he ſecured himſelf from that ſtrong battery, viz. that it is better to profeſs a falſe religion than none at all. But notwithſtanding this, we ſhall conclude with ſaying, that he was a man of a deteſtable character; and was of ſo wrong a turn of mind, that he loſt himſelf miſerably, in the capriciouſneſs of his falſe Philoſophy.

[A] The converſion of this idolater was highly pleaſing to Mahomet.] The ſatisfaction the Prophet received on this occaſion, aroſe undoubtedly from this, that our Acremah's father, Abu Jahl, had been one of his greateſt enemies. With regard to Acremah's converſion, it is related that Mahomet one day in a dream found himſelf in Paradiſe, and there ſaw an engine * much uſed in the Levant for drawing of water. Mahomet asking whom this engine belonged to, was anſwered that it was Abu Jahl's. The Prophet being greatly ſurprized to hear this name, What has Abu Jahl, ſays he, to do in Paradiſe, which he muſt never enter? It happened however ſome time after this dream, that our Acremah turn'd Moſlem, which gave Mahomet the greateſt ſatisfaction, who then comprehended the meaning of his dream; for Abu Jahl had been as it were the engine which God had made uſe of to draw his ſon from the bottom of the well of infidelity, whilſt he himſelf had plunged into it (1). The reader will no doubt obſerve the great contraſt in theſe images. That of the bucket is as low, as the place it is brought into is exalted.

* I think we call it a Swipe.

(1) D'Herbelot Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 21.

[B] Abu Jahl was one of the moſt bitter enemies to Mahomet and his religion.] He was very conſiderable in his tribe, and had been one of Mahomet's greateſt friends, but afterwards inſulted him upon every occaſion, and invented the moſt inveterate calumnies againſt him ever ſince the Prophet had endeavoured to convert him from idolatry, at a feaſt to which he had invited him and ſome others. However, Mahomet's followers were as zealous in defending, as his enemies were in perſecuting him; an inſtance of which, among many others, we have in this Abu Jahl. One day as Mahomet was ſitting in a houſe on Mount Safâ, call'd afterwards the houſe of the reed, whither he was fled to ſhelter himſelf from the tribe of Koreiſh, it happened that Abu Jahl paſt before it and inſulted the Prophet of God; throwing out a numberleſs multitude of injurious reproaches, to which however the Apoſtle of God (as the Mahometans ſtile him) did not make one word of anſwer, upon which Abu Jahl left him, and went to the aſſembly of the tribe of Koreiſh. A little after Hamza Mahomet's uncle being returned from hunting, was told in how ill a manner the Prophet had been treated, upon which being enflamed with anger to think that a man on whom God ſhower'd down ſo many favours ſhould be uſed in ſo unworthy a manner, ACRONIUS (JOHN) taught the Mathematics and Phyſic at Baſil, with great reputation, and writ ſome books, viz. de Terræ Motu, de Sphæra, de Aſtrolabii & Annuli Aſtronomici Confectione. He was a native of Friezland, and died at Baſil in the flower of his age, anno 1563. This author eſcaped the diligent reſearches of Voſſius (a), notwithſtanding that Swertius and Valerius Andreas had given him a place in their Bibliotheque of the Low-Countries, in which they alſo have omitted another JOHN ACRONIUS, a Clergyman, and perhaps born in the ſame Province with our Acronius. This Eccleſiaſtic was of a very reſtleſs and ſeditious diſpoſition. He abandoned the church of Weſel, at a time when it was in very great danger. The inhabitants of Daventer found, that had they choſen him for their paſtor, they would have introduced a worthleſs man among them: He left the church of Groningen in a very unhandſome manner: when he intruded himſelf into the Divinity Profeſſorſhip at Franeker, he was found not to be learned enough for that chair. Laſtly, he was Miniſter in Haerlem, where he behaved as uſual, that is, contradicted and criticis'd every thing. The Hiſtoriographer of that city allows him to have been a very learned man, but takes notice at the ſame time, that he had a turbulent ſpirit (b).

(a) He does not mention him in his book de Scientiis Mathematicis.

manner, and exaſperated to find his nephew become the object of the implacable hatred of the tribe of Koreiſh, he proteſted aloud that he would revenge him. Saying theſe words, he immediately went home to take ſome refreſhments a moment; and a little after, (having his bow ſtill over his ſhoulder,) going to the place where the tribe of Koreiſh were aſſembled, he drew near to Abu Jahl, and raiſing his bow, he diſcharged ſo vigorouſly at him, that he made a large and deep wound in his head, ſaying at the ſame time, Is it thou who haſt vented ſo many opprobrious expreſſions againſt Mahomet my Kinſman, and againſt his religion? All thoſe of the family of Malchzum roſe up in order to aſſiſt Abu Jahl, upon which Hamza declared in favour of Mahomet's religion; but Abu Jahl denied the fact, imagining no one had heard what he had ſaid, and the matter went no farther (2). Another time Mahomet being deſired by Habib Ebn Malec to perform a miracle, (to bring ſudden darkneſs at a time that the ſun was in his meridian, &c.) Abu Jahl being then preſent roſe up in tranſport, and clapping his hands, cried out, Admirably well ſaid! O Habib Ebn Malec; you could not poſſibly have done us a greater piece of ſervice. This gives us perfect conſolation, and you have removed the ſorrow of our hearts. However, the Prophet made him a very ſharp reply; Sit down again, ſaid he to him, thou dog of thy people; the moſt deſpicable, the moſt abject of thy family and of thy fellow-citizens (3). Upon Mahomet's retiring to take a little breath to the main body of the Haſhemites, before he performed the great miracle abovementioned which Habib required from him; the Arabians imagining he was confounded began to hoot, and declared that the Haſhemites would be put to confuſion. And Abu Jahl riſing from his ſeat, ordered his ſervants to prepare immediately a mixture of coal-duſt and camel's urine*, and to keep it ready in a great baſon againſt the next morning, in order to black the faces and clothes of the Haſhemites with it, the inſtant they ſhould appear (4). However, the Prophet ſet about the miracles demanded of him, and immediately wrought the firſt, which was to bring ſudden darkneſs upon the earth. This being done, he ſet about the ſecond miracle, viz. to bring the moon into his ſleeve. Which it is ſaid Mahomet effected. That this planet afterwards skipped thro' his gown with wonderful agility, and then dividing itſelf into two equal parts, ſoared up to the heavens. The learned Mr. Gagnier has given us the particulars of this miracle at large in his Life of Mahomet (5), but the whole is a moſt ſilly legend, not believed by the Mahometans themſelves of any underſtanding, and contradicting hiſtory in ſeveral points. A little time after Mahomet had given an account of his wonderful nocturnal journey to heaven, as he was ſitting at the threſhold of the door of the moſque, Abu Jahl, who kept as cloſe to him as his ſhadow, went up and ſat down by him out of deriſion. Is there any thing new, ſaid he to Mahomet? The Apoſtle of God replied, I performed a nocturnal journey laſt night. And whither replied Abu Jahl? To the houſe of Jeruſalem anſwered Mahomet. Admirable! ſays Abu Jahl; thou madeſt a journey to Jeruſalem this night, and art return'd hither this morning to us. The Prophet after having related ſome particulars of his journey to Jeruſalem, and declaring that he had there ſeen Jeſus ſon of Mary, Ibrahim (Abraham) the friend of God; Abu Jahl asked him whom he had ſeen beſides: "I have alſo ſeen, ſays Mahomet, "John the ſon of Zacharias, he who bec-"koned with his finger; he is red-hair'd, ſhort and "ſquatt, and his hair has been burnt by the ſun; I "never in my life ſaw a man more like him than "thou Abu Jahl, and alſo than thou Mactam ſon of "Abul-Hur." Mactam hearing this ſaid to him. O Apoſtle of God! I don't like to be compared to that Saint. But the Prophet, to comfort him, replied immediately: "There is a wide difference "between him and thee, for he is an unbeliever, "but thou art faithful (6)." This ſudden unexpected turn from words of ſorrow to conſolation, puts me in mind of what is ludicrouſly told of a certain diſſenting Preacher, famous for his whimſical flights and odd reflexions. This Orator declared to his pious audience that they were all damned. All in the galleries, all in the pews, all in the iſles. Some venerable old women who were in none of thoſe places, hearing the dreadful ſentence the Preacher pronounced, began to ſob and whine in a moſt lamentable manner, which the Preacher, who was naturally tender-hearted, obſerving, cried out with great vehemence. "O but I don't mean you upon "the ſtairs." But to return to Abu Jahl; he afterwards formed a bloody deſign to kill Mahomet, which was, that a man ſhould be choſen out of every tribe, who ſhould thruſt their ſwords into his body, in order that his blood might be ſhed equally by all the tribes; however the Angel Gabriel diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to Mahomet, which the latter by that means defeated by a ſtratagem (7), as we ſhall relate upon another occaſion. Abu Jahl loſt his life at ſeventy years of age, in the famous battle of Bedr, in which the tribe of Koreiſh were ſo ſignally defeated by the forces of Mahomet. Mo'adh ſon of Amru, meeting with Abu Jahl in the heat of the engagement, gave him ſo fierce a blow as quite cut off his thigh, upon which he fell from his horſe. Abdo'llah the ſon of Mas'ud coming by, found Abu Jahl juſt breathing his laſt, and thereupon ſet his foot on his throat and ſpake to him in theſe words: Thou art then there, O enemy of God! Thou art puniſh'd according to thy own deſerts. Abu Jahl anſwered: Is it ſo great a wonder that people ſo wicked as you are ſhould have murther'd a man? He added: Tell me, I pray thee, on whom depended the fortune of the day? On God, replied Abdo'llah, and on his Apoſtle. Abu Jahl anſwer'd: Thou art puff'd up with pride upon that account, little ſhrimp of a man as thou art; thou deſpicable keeper of ſheep, proud, cruel. Abdo'llah would not ſuffer him to go on, but ſtriking off his head brought it to the Prophet, who when he ſaw it fell proſtrate on the ground, and glorified God ſaying, This man was the Pharaoh of our nation (8). Such is the hiſtory of Abu Jahl as related by the friends and followers of Mahomet. Had it been told by one of Abu Jahl's own party, there is no doubt but it would have appeared in a very different light. Let a man's character be drawn by one of his partizans, and he ſhall appear an Angel. His enemy undertakes it, and he comes forth a Devil.

(2) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, Vol. 1. p. 124.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 166.

* This was a puniſhment among the Arabs, often inflicted in a judiciary way.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 168.

(5) Vol. 1. pag. 177. & ſeq.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 255.

(7) Ibid. p. 284.

(8) Idem, ibid. p. 328.

(b) Theodorus Screvelius.

rit (b). Some writer has compared him to Heſhuſius, upon whom the following diſtich was handed about:

Quæritur, Heſhuſi, quarta cur pulſus ab urbe?
In promptu cauſa eſt, ſeditioſus eras.

Engliſhed,

" Heſhuſius, why drove four times from the city?
" 'Cauſe he was turbulent, as runs the ditty.

(c) See Martin Schoockii, Exercitat. Sacr. pag. 255. edit. 4°.

Acronius writ a book in the Flemiſh tongue, de Jure Patronatus, wherein he has inſerted ſeveral citations from the Canon law (c). I am apt to think that he is the author of Elenchus Orthodoxus Pſeudo-Religionis Romano-Catholicæ, printed at Deventer in 1615. He alſo very probably writ a treatiſe de Studio Theologico, which Konig aſcribes to the Acronius who left a work on the Sphere. Konig tells us alſo of one RUARD ACRONIUS who publiſhed Catechetical Expoſitions in 1606. It might have been added, that in the infancy of the troubles which the opinions of Arminius occaſioned, he wrote a piece in oppoſition to the hypotheſes of the Arminians, with regard to the power of magiſtrates in religious matters; and it was he who publiſhed a ſermon which Uytenbogard had preached at the Hague before the breaking out of the commotions, widely different from the doctrine he afterwards maintained on that queſtion (d). Ruard Acronius was one of the Proteſtant champions for the Reform'd, againſt the Arminians, in the famous conference held at the Hague anno 1611.

(d) Ex Voetii Polit. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 126.

(a) Dr. Cave, Hiſt. Litt. Sæc. 13. p. 640. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

☞ACROPOLITA (GEORGE) was born at Conſtantinople (a), and educated at the court of the Emperor John Ducas at Nice, till he was ſeventeen years of age, when he applied himſelf to his ſtudies, and learned Mathematics, Poetry, and Rhetoric of Theodorus Exapterygus, and Logic of Nicephorus Blemmidas. In the twenty firſt year of his age he maintained a very learned diſputation with Nicholas the Phyſician concerning the Eclipſe of the Sun before the Emperor John. He was at laſt raiſed to the poſt of Great Logothete, and employed in the moſt important affairs of the Empire. He was ſent on ſeveral embaſſies by the Emperors of Conſtantinople, and particularly by John Ducas to Lariſſa, in order to eſtabliſh a peace with Michael Deſpote of Epirus. He was likewiſe appointed Judge by the ſame Emperor to try Michael Comnenus for a ſuſpicion of being engaged in a conſpiracy. Theodorus Laſcaris, the ſon of John, who had been inſtructed by Acropolita in Logic, made him Governor of all the weſtern provinces of his Empire. About the year 1255 he was engaged in a war with Michael Angelus, who had revolted from Theodorus, and taken priſoner by him. But he gained his liberty by means of the Emperor Michael Palæologus in the year 1260, and was ſent by him Embaſſador to Conſtantine Prince of Bulgaria. Upon his return from this embaſſy, he applied himſelf wholly to the inſtruction of youth, which employment he diſcharged with great honour for many years, till at laſt he grew weary of the fatigue of it, and reſigned it to Holobolus. He was appointed in the year 1272 one of the Judges for determining the cauſe of John Vecchus Patriarch of Conſtantinople. The year following he was ſent by the Emperor to Pope Gregory X, in order to conclude a peace and re-union between the two churches, which he ſwore to in the Emperor's name at the ſecond council of Lyons in 1274 [A]. He was ſent Embaſſador to John Prince of Bulgaria in 1282, and

[A] In order to conclude a peace and re-union between the two Churches; which he ſwore to in the Emperor's name at the 2d council of Lyons in 1274.] We ſhall endeavour to give the reader a clear notion of this affair, by tracing a little more particularly the progreſs of it. Michael Palæologus having ſeized upon the empire, and foreſeeing, that the Pope would inevitably excite the Weſtern Princes to take up arms againſt him, and recover Conſtantinople, reſolved to propoſe a reunion of the Greek church with that of Rome, in order to deliver himſelf from the apprehenſion of ſo formidable a cruſade againſt him. He ſent therefore to Pope Urban IV, Nicholas Biſhop of Crotona, a Greek by birth, but educated in the Church of Rome, to aſſure him, that he was ſatisfied, that the Greeks and Latins were of the ſame faith, and to deſire him to ſend a Legate, who might conclude the union between the two Churches as ſoon as poſſible. The Pope ſent immediately two Nuncio's to him with the Biſhop of Crotona; but this accommodation was not executed then, becauſe the Emperor finding himſelf out of danger, neglected the proſecution of it. But this Pope's Nuncios having made ſome conceſſions to the Greeks, which were diſpleaſing to his ſucceſſor Clement IV, the latter ſent him a confeſſion of faith containing the articles of the creed explained in the ſtrongeſt and moſt explicit terms, and particularly the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Father and the Son; to which he added the doctrine of the Church of Rome concerning baptiſm, purgatory, hell, the ſeven ſacraments, eſpecially the euchariſt made of unleaven'd bread, the unlawfulneſs of diſſolving a marriage, and the permiſſion of third and fourth marriages; and laſtly the primacy of the Pope. The Emperor apprehending at that time that the preparations of St. Lewis of France, and Charles Duke of Anjou King of Sicily were deſigned againſt him, wrote to St. Lewis ſoon after Clement's death, that he was ready to abjure the ſchiſm, and deſired him to be an arbitrator in that affair. When Gregory X was elected Pope, the Emperor ſent Embaſſadors to him with letters, in which he declared his deſire for a re-union; in anſwer to which the Pope told him, that the beſt expedient to determine the diſputes between the two Churches was for the Patriarch, Biſhops, and Clergy of the Greek Church to ſign the confeſſion of faith drawn up by Clement IV, and for himſelf to appear in perſon, or to ſend his Embaſſadors to a general council, which he intended to call. Palæologus endeavoured to the utmoſt to procure this union, and made uſe of force as well as perſuaſion. The Greeks at firſt oppoſed this ſcheme extremely, and particularly the Patriarch Joſeph, who could never be prevailed upon to agree to it; ſo that the Emperor was obliged to ſend Embaſſadors to and died immediately after his return (b]. Georgius Cyprius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, has given a very great character of him [B]. He wrote an Hiſtory, and ſeveral other works [C].

(b) See Cave, Hiſt. Litt. ubi ſupra. and Du Pin, Nouv. Biblioth. des Aut. Eccleſ. tom. 10. p. 93. edit. Paris 1702.

☞ ACROLITA had made in the Council of Lyons. Their letters were not delivered to Pope Nicholas, but to Martin IV, his ſucceſſor, who being attached by intereſt to Charles King of Naples and Sicily, excommunicated the Emperor Palæologus in 1281 as a ſchiſmatic, and favourer of the ſchiſm of the Greeks. Michael was ſo exaſperated at this, that he once forbid the Pope's name to be mentioned in the Diptychs, and was very near breaking off the union. However he did not do it, tho' Martin repeated his cenſures; and the union continued till his death, tho' it was frequently attacked by the Greek Monks in their writings, againſt the Patriarch Vecchus, who anſwered them with a great deal of vigour.

to the Pope, to aſſure him, that he did all that was in his power to promote the accommodation; but that it could not be concluded in ſo ſhort a time, becauſe it was neceſſary to call together the Biſhops, who lived in very remote parts. The Pope in his anſwer told him, that a great many perſons believed, that the Greeks were not ſincere in deſiring an union, and only intended to protract that affair. The Emperor to remove that ſuſpicion, obliged Joſeph the Patriarch to retire to a monaſtery in Conſtantinople, till the re-union ſhould either be concluded or laid aſide, on condition, that if it did not ſucceed, he ſhould keep his ſee; but if it was carried, and he would not approve of the union, another Patriarch ſhould be elected in his room. Moſt of the other Biſhops followed the Emperor's opinions, ſo that he ſent Embaſſadors to the Pope with a letter, in which he declared, that the Greek Church approved of the confeſſion of faith, which was ſent from Rome, and acknowledged the primacy of the Church of Rome, and deſired only, that they might be allowed to repeat the creed without the addition. The Greek Biſhops likewiſe ſent a Deputy with a letter from the Archbiſhop of Epheſus and thirty Greek Biſhops, who approved of the union, and diſavowed the oppoſition, which Joſeph the Patriarch made to it. Theſe letters were preſented to the Pope and the General Council at Lyons in 1274. And George Acropolita ſwore in the Emperor's name to maintain the confeſſion of faith abovementioned, to recognize the primacy of the Church of Rome, and to abjure the ſchiſm. The Deputy of the Greek Churches did the ſame in their name; and the union being thus concluded, the Pope ſung Te Deum, and ordered the confeſſion of faith to be recited in Greek and Latin, and the article of the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt to be twice repeated. He wrote likewiſe to Michael Palæologus; and his ſon Andronicus, and to the Greek Biſhops, to congratulate them upon the re-union, and to urge them to reduce thoſe, who ſtill continued averſe to it. When the Embaſſadors were returned, Joſeph the Patriarch was depoſed, and John Veccus, who had before been of the ſame ſentiments with him, was elected in his room, and recited the name of Gregory in the Dyptichs, ſtiling him the Oecumenical or Univerſal Pope. This new Patriarch endeavoured with all the attention imaginable to finiſh the reunion; and the Emperor ſent Embaſſadors to the Pope to inform him, that the whole affair was brought to a concluſion. However many of the Greeks ſtill refuſing to comply with the re-union, Pope John XXI ſent his Legates to the Emperor, who promiſed to perform every thing, which his Embaſſadors had promiſed in the Council of Lyons; and ſent other Embaſſadors to Rome to aſſure the Pope, that he had call'd a Council of Greek Biſhops, who had again approved of what was done at the Council of Lyons. Theſe Embaſſadors had letters from the Emperor Michael, and his ſon Andronicus, and from Vecchus and the Greek Council, which contained a confeſſion of faith ſomewhat different from that of Pope Clement IV, eſpecially in the article of the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt, tho' it was the ſame in ſubſtance. Theſe letters, which were written in 1277, were not delivered till after John XXI's death to his ſucceſſor Nicholas III, who complained of the alteration, which the Greek Biſhops had made in the confeſſion, and inſiſted upon their ſigning that of Clement IV, and adding to the Creed the word Filioque. He ſent his Legates with inſtructions to the ſame purpoſe; and they were expreſly enjoined to repreſent to the Greeks, that the Latins were ſurprized, that the Patriarch and Greek Biſhops had not applied to the See of Rome for a confirmation of their dignities, and an abſolution from the cenſures, which they had before incurred. The Greek Biſhops gave no anſwer to theſe propoſitions of Pope Nicholas, which were never executed; and the Emperors Michael and Andronicus only ſigned in their name a declaration to the ſame purpoſe with that, which George Acropo-

But after Michael's death in December 1283, Andronicus his ſon declared againſt the union; and refuſed his father even the funeral honours, which were always paid to the Greek Emperors. Vecchus retired into a monaſtery, and Joſeph was raiſed again to the Patriarchſhip of Conſtantinople. But he was oppoſed by Arſenius's party; and at laſt Georgius Cyprius ſirnamed Gregory was choſen Patriarch after his death. He baniſhed Vecchus to mount Olympus, from whence he was ſent for to appear before the Council, which Andronicus call'd in 1284 in the palace of Blacherne at Conſtantinople, in which he was condemned, and all the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, who had maintained the union moſt vigorouſly, were depoſed Vecchus was ſoon after confined in the caſtle of St. George in Bithynia, with two of his Prieſts whoſe names were Conſtantine Melitieniota and George Metochita, where he died ſome time after; and his two companions, who were ſet at liberty, without changing their ſentiments, and ſtill continuing to defend them, were at laſt ſent into exile, where they died (1). We were willing to give the reader this piece of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, becauſe it was tranſacted in an age, which is generally but little known; and will afford a variety of reflexions to the judicious from a view of the melancholy ſtate, which religion was then reduced to by the ambition and avarice of thoſe, who were under the higheſt obligations from their character, to diſplay the contrary virtues in the moſt attractive and amiable light. Were the conduct of Chriſtians, eſpecially of thoſe, who have the honour of teaching religion, formed upon the principles of humanity and univerſal benevolence, it muſt effectually vindicate their religion to the candid and ſincere; for it is certain, that the moſt formidable objection againſt it will for ever reſult from the vices of its profeſſors. When the conduct both of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, eſpecially of the latter, is examined by this rule, how ſhocking muſt it appear? We ſee that Michael Palæologus's reaſon for promoting an union, was merely to ſecure himſelf in the throne of Conſtantinople, which he had obtained by very criminal methods; and we find, that Du Pin himſelf owns (2), tho' a good Papiſt, that Pope Martin IV's motive for excommunicating that Emperor, was his own attachment to Charles King of Naples and Sicily, who was an enemy to Palæologus. But it is unneceſſary to anticipate the reader's obſervations upon ſo obvious a ſubject.

(1) See Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Aut. Eccleſ. p. 89, & ſeq.

(2) Ubi ſupra.

[B] Georgius Cyprius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, has given a very great character of him.] He tells us in his encomium upon him prefixed to Acropolita's hiſtory, that he was ſuperior to every one in all parts of learning, ὡς ἀν ἰδιὸν πρὸς ἰδίνα κατὰ δίχιδας σύγκρισιν; and equal to Ariſtotle in Philoſophy, and to Plato in the knowledge of divine things and Attic eloquence. But this is certainly too extravagant a compliment to him; and is to be aſcribed either to Georgius Cyprius's friendſhip for him, or to the defect of that age, which was incapable of judging of the excellencies of Ariſtotle and Plato. However it muſt be allowed that he was a learned, diligent, prudent, and faithful writer.

[C] He wrote an Hiſtory, and ſeveral other works.] The former is a continuation of the Greek Hiſtory from the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins till ☞ACROPOLITA (CONSTANTINE), ſon of the preceding, who was called νέος Μεταφράσης, i. e. the younger Metaphraſtes, Great Logothete, or Chancellor, flouriſhed at Conſtantinople under the Emperor Michael Palæologus and his ſon Andronicus about the year 1270 (a). He appears to have been the ſon of George Acropolita from a paſſage in the Hiſtory of George Pachymeres (b); where he tells us, that Michael the Emperor was exaſperated againſt Conſtantine Acropolita, (whom he had taken from his father the Great Logothete, and educated at his court in learning), becauſe of his obſtinacy in the ſchiſm, and deprived him of the ſhare, which he had before enjoyed in his favour, and removed him from his court, which happened in the laſt year but one of his reign. But Conſtantine ſoon recovered with the ſon Andronicus what he had loſt with the father, and was raiſed to the dignity of Great Logothete in the year 1294. He was a very zealous defender of the cauſe of the Greeks againſt the Latins (c). He wrote ſeveral works [A]. It is uncertain when he died.

(a) Oudin, Commentar. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 3. Sæc. 13. Col. 668. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(b) L. 6. c. 26.

(c) Oudin, ubi ſupra, and Cave Hiſt. Litt. Sæc. 13. p. 641. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

till it was recovered by Michael Palæologus in 1261. This work being found at Pera, and bought by George Cantacuzenus, was brought to Conſtantinople by George Douza, and publiſhed with a Latin tranſlation and notes by his brother Theodore at Leyden in 1614 in 8vo. The year following it was reprinted at Geneva without the notes, at the end of Laonicus Chalcondylas in folio. Leo Allatius publiſhed it afterwards much more perfectly with a new verſion and notes, to which he ſubjoined a long diſſertation De Georgiis & eorum ſcriptis, i. e. "Of the authors, whoſe names were George, and of "their writings." This edition was printed at Paris in 1651, in fol. We may obſerve that Leo Allatius makes two editions of this Chronicle; one much ſhorter, in which many paſſages are retrenched, which is that publiſh'd firſt by George Douza; the other more full and perfect, which is that tranſlated and publiſh'd by himſelf. Beſides this he wrote a Treatiſe concerning faith, virtue and the ſoul; Thirty Prayers uſed by him after the recovery of Conſtantinople, and mentioned in his Hiſtory: A diſcourſe upon the taking of Conſtantinople to the Emperor Michael, mentioned at the cloſe of his Hiſtory: An expoſition upon the ſermons of St. Gregory Nazianzen (3). Leo Allatius has likewiſe publiſhed (4) a piece of his intitled, A reply to thoſe, who ſay, that the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of the Son, becauſe he is of the ſame nature with him, or becauſe he is given by him to thoſe who are worthy: Adverſus eos qui dicunt, ideo Spiritum Sanctum dici Spiritum Filii, quod habeat eandem atque ille naturam, vel quod dignis ab eo ſuppeditatur.

(3) See Dr. Cave and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(4) Græciæ Orthodoxæ tom. 1. p. 390.

[A] He wrote ſeveral works.] Particularly divers treatiſes concerning the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt. Leo Allatius tells us (1), that he ſaw two of them, which are mentioned in the Greek writers; one which begins thus, Ἀνδρὶς Ῥωμαῖοι; and the other thus, Ἐμοὶ δὴν καὶ ἄλλα λέγε τῶν ἀντιλεγόντων ἡμῖν; of which ſeveral fragments are found in MS. Pachymeres tells us (2), that Theodore Muzalo burnt Acropolita's commentary together with his own, becauſe they treated only of Doctrines or Opinions, περὶ δογμάτων. Conſtantine wrote likewiſe an Oration upon the holy Martyr Theodoſia, who was born at Conſtantinople, and ſuffered under Leo Iſaurus on account of the worſhip of images. Leo Allatius mentions this in his diſſertation de Script. Simeon (3), and quotes ſome paſſages from it in another book of his (4). We have alſo an Oration of his upon the Holy Martyr Neophytus (5), and another upon St. Theodore Tero (6), and a third upon St. John Damaſcenus (7). This laſt encomium, which is very long, is publiſhed in Greek and Latin by the ſucceſſors of Bollandus (8) under our Author's name. Leo Allatius has given us ſome extracts from it (9).

(1) De Conſens. Orient. & Occid. l. 2. c. 15. num. 14. Col. 780.

(2) L. 7. c. 8.

(3) P. 84.

(4) Adverſus Hotting. p. 200.

(5) Leo Allat. de Script. Simeon. p. 105.

(6) Ibid. p. 109.

(7) Ibid. p. 112.

(8) Tomo 2. Menſis Maii ad diem 6. p. 731.

(9) In Conſens. de Purgat. p. 761.

ACTOR [A] is the name of ſeveral perſons in fabulous hiſtory. Thus one of Hercules's companions in the war with the Amazons was called, who having received a wound, would have returned home, but died by the way (a). It is alſo the name of Patroclus's grandfather; for Menætius, father of Patroclus, was ſon to Actor and Ægina. This Actor, according to ſome writers (b), was a native of Locris, but he ſettled in the iſland of Oenone, after having married Ægina, daughter of the river Aſopus, and there begot Menætius. Others ſay he was a Theſſalian, ſon to Myrmidon, who was ſon of Jupiter (c), and that the nymph Ægina having had a ſon, called Æacus by Jupiter, went into Theſſaly, where Actor did not ſcruple to marry her, though ſhe had been enjoyed before (d). He had ſeveral children by her, who conſpired againſt him (e), which obliged him to drive them out of the kingdom, and to beſtow it on Peleus, together with his daughter Polymele. Peleus was ſon to Æacus, and conſequently grandſon to Ægina: he had fled to Phthia (where Actor reigned) after having killed his brother Phocus. There was one Actor ſon of Hyppaſus, who went in the Argonautic expedition (f); another, who was ſon to Neptune and Agamede [B], daughter

(a) Carol. Stephanus in Dictionar. Hiſt.

(b) Scholiaſt. Homeri in Iliad. lib. 18.

(c) Euſtath in Iliad. I. Scholiaſt. Apollon. in lib. 4.

(d) Scholiaſt. Pindari in Olymp. 9.

(e) Euſtath. in II. Iliad.

(f) Hygin. cap. 14.

[A] ACTOR.] Moreri has changed this name, into Actorius, but without having any reaſon for ſo doing: however, this is a trifling error compared to that he makes a few lines after, when he endeavours to prove by this line,

Quæ fuit Attoridæ cum magno ſemper Achille,
Engliſhed,
"Patroclus ever was with fam'd Achilles, that Ovid, from whom it is quoted, ſpeaks of one Actorius. How was it poſſible for him not to ſee, that the perſon here ſpoken of, was not called Actorius or Actorides, but Patroclus; to whom the Poets, for the ſake of the verſification, generally give the patronymic Actorides, which is as much as to ſay, deſcended from Actor?

[B] Son to Neptune and Agamede.] Munckerus, in his commentary on the 157th fable of Hyginus, pretends that the Scholiaſt on Homer declares this Actor to be the ſon of Neptune and Molione, but the Scholiaſt does not ſay ſo. Homer in Iliad 2d, verſ. 749, mentions two brothers whom he calls Ἀκτορίωνε Μολίονε, Actorionas Molionas. His Scholiaſt tells us hereupon, that by theſe words we are to underſtand Cteatus and Eurytus, ſons of Actor and Molione; or according to ſome writers, of Molione and Neptune. Homer thought them to be ſons of this God, for he adds, that they would have been killed, had not Neptune, their father ſuccoured them in the fight, by covering them with a thick fog.

Εἰ μή σφωε πατὴρ ἰφυκρειὼν Ἐνοσίχθων
Ἐκ πολέμου ἐσάωσε, καλύψας ἠέρι πολλῇ (1).
That is,
"Then Actor's ſons had died, but Neptune ſhrouds
"The youthful Heroes in a veil of clouds.
Pope.

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. 11. ver. 750.

daughter of Augeus (g); and another (b) who was ſon of Axeus [C], and father of Aſtyochia, by whom the God Mars had two ſons, who, at the ſiege of Troy, commanded the forces of Aſpledon and Orchomenos, cities of Bœotia. Another Actor, ſon to Phorbas, built a city in Elis his native country, and called it Hyrmine, after his mother's name (i). Augeas King of Elis, who, according to ſome writers, was his brother (k), and whoſe ſtables cleaned by Hercules, have made ſo much noiſe, aſſociated him and his two ſons in his kingdom (l). The names of theſe two ſons were Eurytus and Cteatus, and poetically Molionides, from their mother Molione. See the article MOLIONIDES. Laſtly, there was one ACTOR among the Aurunci, who has been deſcribed as an hero of the firſt rank [D].

(g) Id. cap. 157.
(b) Homer Iliados lib. 2. Pauſan. in Bœoticis.
(i) Pauſan. lib. 5. p. 148.
(k) Apollodor. Bibliotheque lib. 2. pag. 138. edit. Salmur.
(l) Pauſan. lib. 5. pag. 148.

[C] Who was ſon of Axeus.] Homer calls him Axeus, Οὓς τέκεν Ἀστύοχη δόμῳ Ἄρηος Ἀξιάδαο (2). i. e. "Whom Aſtyoche brought forth in the palace of Actor Azidas. Meziriac (3) cenſures an error of the author of Etymologicum magnum, who imagined, that the Actor mentioned here by Homer, was grandfather to Patroclus. This Poet, however, does not ſpeak of him, but of a Bœotian Actor, grandſon of Erginus, and great grandſon of Clymenus. Meziriac quotes Euſtathius on the 2d book of the Iliad, and Pauſanias in Bœticis, for this deſcent; but Clymenus, according to Pauſanias, was grandfather, and not great grandfather of Actor (4).

(2) Idem, Iliad l. 2. In enumeratione Navium ver. 20.
(3) Epitres d'Ovide, p. 44.
(4) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 311.

[D] One ACTOR ... who has been deſcribed as an hero of the firſt rank.] Virgil has drawn him in this light, in the 12th book of the Æneid, ——— Validam vi corripit haſtam,

Actoris Aurunci ſpolium, quaſſatque trementem,
Vociferans: Nunc ô nunquam fruſtrata vocatus
Haſta meos, nunc tempus adeſt: te maximus Actor,
Te Turni nunc dextra gerit ——— (5).

That is,

" He ſeized the lance Aruncan Actor wore;
" Which with ſuch force he brandiſh'd in his hand,
" The tough aſh trembled like an Oſier wand.
" Then cry'd, O pond'rous ſpoil of Actor ſlain,
" And never yet by Turnus toſs'd in vain,
" Fail not this day thy wonted force. Dryden.

(5) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 12. ver. 93, & ſeq.

ACTUARIUS [A], a Greek Phyſician, and author of ſeveral works [B]. Ambroſius Leo of Nola who tranſlated ſome of theſe, and gives him the higheſt encomiums, owns that he could not diſcover who he was, nor his country (a). Petrus Caſtellanus, in his Lives of Illuſtrious Phyſicians *, and Wolfgang Juſtus in his Chronology of Phyſicians, confeſs the ſame thing (b). Moreau, in his treatiſe of Bleeding in Pleuriſies, is of opinion that he lived about the year 1100 [C].

(a) Apud Geſnerum, Bibliothecæ folio 3 verſo.
(b) See Merckli-nus, in his Lindenius renovatus, pag. 6.

* The title is Petri Caſtellani, Vitæ illuſtriorum medicorum. Antwerpiæ 1617, 8o. This work is alſo inſerted in Gronovius's Theſaurus Græcar. Antiquit. tom. 10.

[A] ACTUARIUS.] Some writers call him John, ſon of Zacharias (1); and others, ſon of John Zacharias (2). Voſſius, who is for the latter, in the 13th chapter of his book De Philoſophiâ, ſpeaks a little after of a John Actuarius, who lived in the time of Conſtantine Ducas (3), as is inferred from his having a ſiſter, on whom Michael Pſellus compoſed a Monodia, or mournful ſong. In caſe this John Actuarius, and the Phyſician in queſtion, ſhould be the ſame perſon, Voſſius ought not to have diſtinguiſh'd them, and ſhould have called the Phyſician John: but it is ſcarcely probable, by the remark [C], that they were the ſame. Du Cange ſhews, that the title Actuarius denotes a peculiar dignity, appropriated to the Phyſicians at the court of Conſtantinople; and acknowledges that he cannot find out the reaſon of this, notwithſtanding the great reſearches father Poſſinus had made. He likewiſe confeſſes, that he does not know, whether the Actuarius in queſtion, whom he calls John ſon of Zacharias, poſſeſs'd that dignity (4).

(1) Hyde Catal. Biblioth. Oxon. & Mercklinus, in Linden. renovato.
(2) Geſner, Biblioth. & ejus Epitomatores.
(3) He began his reign in 1059.
(4) Du Cange, Gloſſar. Græc. pag. 46.

[B] Author of ſeveral works.] Theſe were printed at Paris, in one volume, folio, by Henry Stephens, anno 1567. They had been publiſh'd before elſewhere, in three volumes 8vo; and have borne ſeveral impreſſions ſeparately. The moſt conſiderable, are, De actionibus & affectibus ſpiritus animalis ejuſque nutritione, Libri II. De Urinis, Libri VII; firſt tranſlated into Latin by Ambroſius Leo, and printed at Venice anno 1519; afterwards reviſed and illuſtrated with notes, by James Goupil. De medicamentorum compoſitione, which Ruel tranſlated: Methodi medendi, Libri VI; tranſlated by Henricus Mathiſius of Bruges, and Printed at Venice in 1554 (5).

(5) Mercklinus in Lindenio renovato, p. 6, 7.

[C] That he lived about anno 1100.] Du Cange is afraid of placing him in the reign of Alexis (6), tho' his book De affectibus ſpiritus animalis, is dedicated to Joſephus Racondytes; and that a perſon of this name is mentioned by Nicetas, in book 2d, numb. 5, of the Hiſtory of Alexis. Du Cange approves of the deciſion of Lambecius, with regard to the age of this Phyſician (7); viz. that he lived under Andronicus the elder, becauſe that in a manuſcript copy of one of his works in the Emperor's library, we find by the title that it was dedicated to Apocauchus. Now, it is known that Apocauchus lived under the Andronicus abovementioned. Du Cange has obſerved that Actuarius relates, in the beginning of his Methodi medendi, that he was ſent by the Emperor his ſovereign to the Hyperborean Scythians. Conſequently Moreau miſtook a little in his calculation, for Andronicus the elder did not begin his reign till anno 1283, and did not die till 1332.

(6) He underſtands this (but had better have expreſt it) of Alexis Angelus who began his reign in 1195.
(7) Lambec. de Bib. Cæſar. lib. 6. p. 113.

ACUÑA (a) (CHRISTOPHER DE) a Spaniſh Jeſuit, born in Burgos, entred the ſociety at fifteen years of age, in 1612. After having devoted ſome years to his ſtudies, he went into America, and laboured for the converſion of ſouls in Chili and Peru, and was profeſſor of moral Divinity. In 1640 he returned back to Spain, when he gave the King his Sovereign an account in what manner he had acquitted himſelf of the commiſſion he had received to make diſcoveries on the river of the Amazons; and the year following, publiſhed a deſcription of that river at Madrid. He was ſent to Rome as Procurator of his Province; and returning into Spain with the title of † Qualificator of the Inquiſition, he went back to the Weſt-Indies. He was at Lima, when father Southwell, from whom I borrowed the particulars abovementioned, publiſhed at Rome in 1675. the Bibliotheque of the writers among the Jeſuits *. The relation of our de Acuña is intitled, Nuevo Deſcubrimiento del gran Rio de las Amazonas, i. e. " A " new Diſcovery of the great river of the Amazons." The author was ten months together upon that river, and was commanded to make the moſt exact enquiries concerning it, in order to facilitate and improve its navigation, and to report the whole to the King. For this purpoſe he went on board a ſhip at Quito (b), accompanied with Peter Texeira, who had advanced thus far up that river, and whom the government

(a) It is pronounced Acugna, but the Spaniards write it Acuña.

† Theſe Qualificators are not Judges, and only give their opinion with regard to ſuch propoſitions as are preſented to them.

* [The title is Petri Ribadeneiræ, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu, a Phil. Alegambe ad an. 1642, & a Nathanaele Sotuello ad an. 1675. continuata, Romæ 1676, folio.]

(b) 'Tis a city of Peru.

was very desirous of sending thither again. They embarked in February 1639 [A], and did not reach Para till December following. 'Tis thought, that the revolutions of Portugal, by which the Spaniards lost all Brasil, and the colony of Para at the mouth of the river of the Amazons, were the cause why the relation of this Jesuit was suppressed (c); for the Spaniards were afraid, since they now could not reap any benefit from it, that it might be of advantage to the Portugueze. The copies of this work grew extremely scarce, insomuch that those who published the French translation of it at Paris (d), gave out, that there was not one copy of the original remaining, except that which the translator made use of, and, perhaps, that in the Vatican Library. We are obliged to Gemberville for this French version, which was not published till after his death, together with a long dissertation, worthy our perusal, which the relation itself also deserves. Such as have it not by them, may find some account of it in the Paris Journal (e), in that of Leipsic (f), and in Chevreau's History of the World (g).

(c) See the Preface to the French translation.

(d) In 1682 12°.

(e) Of April 19 1683.

(f) Pag. 323. ann. 1683.

(g) Chevreau, Hist. du Monde, tom. 4. p. 171. Dutch edit.

[A] In February, 1639.] I will be so ingenuous as to own, that I have not Father Christopher de Acuña's relation by me (1), and therefore borrow this date from Chevreau, which I prefer to that of January, in the Leipsic journal; because the typographical error which we meet with in the preceding page of the last mentioned work, gives me some reason to distrust it. I find page 324 of this journal, that the Governor of Brasil caused Peter Taxeira to go up the river of the Amazons in 1639, and that Taxeira could not reach Quito in less than a year (2). He therefore did not embark again at Quito in January 1639, as it is asserted in page 325. Chevreau deserves more credit, when he relates, that Peter Taxeira set sail in October 1637; and gave an account of his voyage to the Vice-Roy of Peru (3) in September (4), 1638: but Chevreau has mispelt the name of the author of the Relations, for he calls him Christopher d'Alcuna.

(1) I don't say d'Acuña, having observed in Nicholas Antonio, that the Spaniards don't put an apostrophe between the article de, and a proper name that begins with a vowel.

(2) Acta Erudit. Lipsi. anni 1683.

(3) He was called Count of Chincon.

(4) Chev. Hist. du Monde, p. 171. Dutch edition.

ADA, daughter of Hecatomnus (a), and sister of Artemisia Queen of Caria, married her own brother Idrieus, and reigned with him in Caria, after the death of Artemisia, who survived her husband Mausolus (b) but two years. Idrieus reigned seven years [A], and died of sickness, leaving no posterity behind him. His widow, after having swayed the scepter about four years, was dethroned by Pexodares her younger brother (c), who, in order to maintain himself in his usurpation, gave his daughter in marriage [B] to a Persian Lord, called Orontabates. Her name, as well as that of the dethroned Queen, was Ada; and her mother's name was Aphneis, daughter of Synnesis, King of Cappadocia. Orondates succeeded his father-in-law in the kingdom six years after, and defended Halicarnassus against Alexander (d). The revolutions which happened at that time, proved favourable to Ada, who imploring the protection of this Conqueror against the Usurper, delivered up to the former the city of Alinda which she still possest; and promised to use all her endeavours, in order to reduce several others under his power (e). Alexander gave her a very kind reception, and restored her to the authority she had before enjoyed over all Caria, after he had taken the city of Halicarnassus. Ada thought to give some testimony of her gratitude, by sending him all sorts of refreshments, sweetmeats, pastry, delicate viands, and the best cooks she could hear of; but Alexander answered, that he had no occasion for such things; and that Lecnidas his tutor, had formerly furnished him with much more excellent cooks, by

(a) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 452.

(b) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 16. It is from this author I have extracted the length of the other reigns.

(c) Strab. and Diod. ibid.

(d) Arrian. lib. 1.

(e) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 17. Strab. lit. 14.

[A] Idrieus reigned seven years.] This Diodorus Siculus informs us of (1). Chevreau, who has changed the years into months (2), should perhaps have lengthened the time, rather than have shortned it; for Idrieus was not dead, when Isocrates writ his Philippic. Now, if we are to credit Hermippus (3), he composed it a little before his own death and that of Philip; Idrieus must therefore have lived till the 110th Olympiad, since Isocrates died a few days after the battle of Chæronea, which was fought the 2d year of the 110th Olympiad, and only two years before Philip's death. As therefore Idrieus did not begin to reign, till about the 3d year of the 107th Olympiad (for I have shewn in the remarks under the article ARTEMISIA, that Mausolus her husband, whom she survived two years, did not die till the end of the 106th) the seven years reign which Diodorus gives him, are too few. I nevertheless believe, that his Chronology is more to be depended upon, than that of Hermippus; for where would Hermippus place the reign of Ada, and that of Pexodares, (one whereof lasted four, and the other six years;) and both of which preceded Alexander's expedition?

(1) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 16.

(2) Chevreau, Hist. du Monde, tom 4. p. 33. Dutch edition.

(3) See the Summary of this speech.

[B] Gave his daughter in marriage.] Valesius thought that Philip, King of Macedon, demanded the daughter abovementioned of Pexodares in marriage for Arideus his brother, and quotes Plutarch for it (4). But this historian does not inform us, whether the daughter of Pexodares mentioned by him, was called Ada; but one may naturally infer it, from his observing that she was the eldest (5); for it is known, moreover, that Orontobates, having married a daughter of Pexodares called Ada, thought himself lawful possessor of the crown of Caria. Hitherto, therefore, Valesius seems to have very good grounds for what he asserts; but he had no reason to say, that Philip endeavoured to make up this match for his brother Arideus; for it was Pexodares sought for her in marriage, and sent an Embassador to Philip for that purpose. On the other side, Arideus was not brother but son to Philip. Plutarch declares this expresly, and adds an incident which may give us an idea of the fraudulent practices of Courts. Alexander's friends alarmed him with regard to the propositions which were made by Pexodares's Embassador, and insinuated, that the only view of Philip, in promoting Arideus to so considerable a match, was merely to give him a better opportunity of succeeding to the crown. Alexander, in order to defeat this project, dispatch'd an express to Pexodares, who represented to him that he ought to cast his eyes on Alexander, rather than on Arideus, who was a bastard, and almost a fool. Pexodares did not hesitate on the choice; but Philip having got notice privately of what was carrying on, reproved Alexander very sharply, and told him that he would discover a mean spirit, and be unworthy of succeeding him in the kingdom, in case he condescended to marry the daughter of a Carian, Vassal to a Barbarian Prince. At the same time, Philip banished all his son's confidents, and dispatch'd orders to the Corinthians, to send him bound hand and foot the Express, (whose name was Thessalus and was a Comedian,) whom Alexander had dispatch'd to Caria.

(4) Valesii Notæ in Harpocrat. p. 99.

(5) Plut. in Alexandro, p. 669.

by teaching him, that he who would have an appetite to his dinner, muſt riſe early and take a walk; and if he is deſirous of making a delicious ſupper, he muſt eat moderately at dinner (f).

(f) Plut. in Alexandro, p. 677.

ADAM, the ſtock whence all mankind have ſprung, was created immediately by God on the ſixth day of the creation. His body having been formed of the duſt of the earth [A], God blew into his noſtrils the breath of life; that is to ſay, he animated, or gave it life, and formed thereof that compound called man, which comprehends an organiz'd body, and a rational ſoul. The ſame God who had brought forth Adam, placed him in a beautiful garden (a), and, in order to enable him to give the ſeveral beaſts a name, he made them all come before him; after which he cauſed him to fall into a deep ſleep, and took away one of his ribs [B], of which he formed woman. Adam knew that this woman was bone of his bone, and fleſh of his fleſh, and lived with her; they not being aſhamed of their nakedneſs. There was a tree in the garden, of which God had forbidden them to eat, upon pain of death; but notwithſtanding this prohibition, the woman, ſeduced by a ſerpent (b), eat of that fruit, and perſuaded Adam to eat of it alſo. From that moment they perceived that they were naked [C], and made themſelves girdles of fig-leaves ſewed together. God came and pronounced the puniſhment he would inflict on them for the crime they had committed; drove them out of the garden, and made them garments of ſkins. Adam called his wife by the name of Eve, and conſummated his marriage. He begot Cain and Abel; afterwards Seth, and ſeveral other ſons and daughters, whoſe names are not known, and died aged nine hundred and thirty years (c). Theſe are all the authentic particulars we know concerning Adam; but a numberleſs multitude of others are related of him, which are either abſolutely falſe, or very doubtful. It muſt be confeſſed, that ſome may be conſidered as not repugnant to the articles of faith, nor improbable. I rank among the latter, the particulars we are told concerning his prodigious knowledge [D], though, what we read concerning this matter in Geneſis, would rather (a) 'Tis commonly called the terreſtrial paradiſe and the garden of Eden.

(b) With regard to this ſerpent, ſee the remarks of the article EVE.

(c) See the firſt five chapters of Geneſis.

[A] Of the duſt of the earth.] Photius, if we are to credit Father Garaſſe (1), relates, that the Egyptians uſed to ſay, that wiſdom laid an egg in the terreſtrial Paradiſe, whence our firſt parents iſſued like a couple of chickens. I don't believe that Photius ſaid ſo; and am very much miſtaken, if this is not too licentious a paraphraſe of the Jeſuit abovementioned, forged on what Photius relates concerning a certain Mer-man, Oé by name, who, ſome writers tell us, ſprung ἐκ δ πρωτογόνε Ωᾶ̃ (2), that is, according to Father Garaſſe in another book (3). "From the race of the firſt man, whoſe name was Egg;" or, according to Father Schottus, è primo parente Ωᾶ̃, i. e. "From the firſt parent Ωᾶ̃ (Egg)." A thouſand enquiries might be made concerning the Egg, which, according to the doctrine of the ancients, ſerv'd for the production of things, when the Chaos was diſpelled. We ſhall mention ſome particulars of this, under the word ARIMANIUS.

(1) Garaſſe, Doctri. curieuſe. pag. 232.

(2) Photius ex Helladio, Biblioth. p. 1583. num. 279.

(3) Somme Theologique, p. 126, where he relates this with a thouſand alterations.

[B] And took away one of his ribs.] A modern author (4), endeavouring to ſhew the Roman-catholicks, that they are in the wrong to fancy their abilities greater than thoſe of the Proteſtants, reproaches them, among other miſtakes, with that of a Preacher (5), who declared that Adam had been formed out of one of Eve's ribs. This Preacher related, that a Philoſopher having propoſed the three queſtions following to Theodorus diſciple of St. Pacomius, viz. What man was not born, but died? What man was born, and did not die? What man was born and died, but did not rot? was anſwered; that thoſe three perſons were Adam, Enoch and Lot's wife. Adam, added the Preacher, was not born, but was formed out of one of Eve's ribs. His ſermon was printed at Vienna in Auſtria in 1654, with the approbation of Father Leonard Bachin the Jeſuit, at that time Sub-deacon of the Profeſſors of Divinity. This Jeſuit declares that he had read over the ſermon, and did not find any thing therein, contrary to faith or morality; a proof how careleſly the cenſors of books examine certain manuſcripts.

(4) Daniel Franc. Diſquiſit. de Indicib. Libror. prohib. Epiſt. Dedicat.

(5) Florentin Schilling, clerk-regular of St. Paul, and a Barnabite. *[Theſe were eſtabliſhed by the expreſs bulls of Pope Clement VII, in 1553. Their employment is to teach, to catechiſe and to ſerve in miſſions. They were founded by Antonio Maria Zacariah, and received their name from the church of St. Barnabas in Milan.]

[C] They perceived that they were naked.] The Scripture ſays, their eyes were opened. This expreſſion made the vulgar believe, that Adam and Eve were blind, till they had tranſgreſſed the commandment of God. Neque enim cæci creati erant, ut imperitum vulgus opinatur (6). That is, "For "they were not created blind, as the ignorant vul"gar think." St. Auſtin ſtrongly refutes this falſe notion, in ſeveral parts of his writings (7), and tells us, that this opening of the eyes of our firſt parents, conſiſted in their perceiving certain bodily motions, which, till then, they were ignorant of, and which made them aſhamed: Extitit in motu corporis quædam impudens novitas, unde eſſet indecens nuditas, & fecit attentos, redditque confuſos (8). i. e. "There was a certain impudent novelty in the "motion of their body, whence nakedneſs became "indecent, which raiſed their attention, and made "them aſhamed."

(6) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. lib. 14. cap. 17.

(7) Ibid. and lib. 11. de Geneſi ad liter. cap. 31; and lib. 1. de Nupt. & Concupiſc. cap. 5; and lib. 1. Locutionum in Geneſ. num. 9. and lib. 2. de Peccat. Merit. & Remiſſ. cap. 22.

(8) Id. de Civit. Dei, lib. 14. cap. 17.

[D] The particulars we are told concerning his prodigious knowledge.] Moreri is not ſatisfied with aſſuring in general, that Adam was perfectly skilled in the ſciences, eſpecially in Aſtrology, ſeveral curious ſecrets of which he had taught his children; but adds, that according to Joſephus, Adam engraved the obſervations he had made on the courſe of the ſtars, on two different tables. I look'd for this paſſage in Joſephus, but the only particulars I met with are, that the deſcendants of Seth, ſon of Adam, invented Aſtrology; and cauſed their inventions to be engraved on two pillars, the one of brick and the other of ſtone, in order to preſerve them from the general deſtruction, which, according to the predictions of Adam, would happen once by fire, and once by the deluge (9). A writer who is capable of corrupting in ſuch a manner the words of an author he cites, does not examine the text of his vouchers ſo cloſely, as not to make them ſay more than they really do; hence I am not ſurprized to find Moreri aſſert, that our grand Parent gave to the ſeveral plants their reſpective names, altho' the ſcripture mentions his naming the beaſts only. They who infer from this impoſition of names, that Adam was a great Philoſopher, argue too poorly to merit a refutation. But to return to the prodigious knowledge aſcribed to Adam, I ſay, that, according to the common opinion (10), he knew more the very firſt day of his birth, than any other man can learn by long experience. Very few things eſcaped his knowledge, except contingent futurity, the thoughts of the heart, and part of the individuals. Cajetan has been very much cenſured, for not allowing him a perfect knowledge of the planets and of the elements. Some perſons having diſputed, whether Solomon ought not to be excepted from the general poſition, viz. that Adam ſurpaſſed all men in knowledge; theſe perſons, I ſay, have been ſentenced to own Adam's ſuperiority on this head. Pinedo indeed excepts politics; but his private opinion is not regarded. It is aſſerted, that the ſpeculative underſtanding of the firſt man was informed with all the philoſophical and mathematical knowledge which the human mind is naturally capable of attaining; and that his practical underſtanding was endued with a conſummate prudence, with regard to a man's conduct in all things, whether in private or public life: and beſides this, all the mo-

(9) Joſeph. Antiqui. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(10) See Saliani Annalium, tom. 1. p. 107, 113.

mi

rather give us a different idea of it; notwithſtanding which, Adam may poſſibly have come out of the hands of his Creator, endued with innate ſciences, nor loſe them by his guilt; in like manner as the bad Angels are not become leſs learned ſince their fall; and that the crimes which the Learned commit, don't obliterate out of their minds the ſciences they before were maſters of. We may alſo rank among the probable things, what ſome writers relate concerning Adam's beauty [E]; but it is a direct falſhood, to aſſert that he was created both male and female [F]. A man muſt have very groſly miſtaken the ſenſe of the Scriptures (d), to figure to himſelf ſo ſtrange a chimera. The revelations of Antoinette (Antonia) Bourignon [G], would be improperly (d) God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. Geneſ. i. 27.

ral ſciences and liberal arts, as Rhetoric, Poetry, Painting, Sculpture, Husbandry, Writing, &c. Every one has heard of the applauſes which have been laviſhed on Ariſtotle's memory; as tho' men had ſtudied to outvye one another on this occaſion. All the images and compariſons had been employed which could poſſibly enter the mind of man, when an honeſt Carthuſian Friar, attempting to climb a ſuperlative, which till then had eſcaped the ken of mortals, aſſerted, that Ariſtotle's knowledge was as extenſive as that of Adam (11). Some Rabbis have contented themſelves with equalling the knowledge of the firſt man with that of Moſes and Solomon (12); but others have maintained, that he excelled the Angels in this reſpect, and quote the teſtimony of God himſelf, as a proof of it (13). Theſe tell us, that the Angels having ſpoken with a kind of contempt of man to God, when he adviſed with them about his creation; God anſwer'd, that man had greater abilities than they; and to convince them of the truth of this aſſertion, he cauſed all kinds of animals to come before them, and ask'd them their names. The Angels did not know what to anſwer. But a moment after, putting the ſame queſtion to man, he nam'd them all one after another; and being asked what his own name would be, and that of God, he made a very pertinent reply, and gave to God the name of Jehovah. According to the Rabbis abovementioned, the aphoriſm of their Doctors, Adam's ſtature extended from one end of the world to the other, muſt be explained in this ſenſe, viz. that he underſtood all things (14).

(11) Henry de Haſſia. He lived in the beginning of the 15th Century.

(12) Apud Rivini Serpent. ſeduct. p. 50.

(13) Ibid. pag. 49, 56, 57.

(14) Ibid. p. 56.

[E] Concerning Adam's beauty.] Had writers contented themſelves with telling us, that he was a handſome, well-ſhap'd man, this would have been very probable; but inſtead of ſtopping here, they have employed on this occaſion, all the flouriſhes of Rhetoric, Poetry, and even Chimæra. We are told, that God intending to create man, cloathed himſelf with a perfectly beautiful human body, and made this his model in the formation of Adam's body: whence God might ſay, that with regard to the body, he had made man after his own image. It is added, that this appearance of God under a human form, was the firſt prelude to the incarnation, that is, that the ſecond Perſon of the Trinity, aſſumed the appearances of the ſame nature, he was one day to aſſume, ſo far as fleſh and bones; and that under the appearance of the moſt beautiful man that ever exiſted, he laboured at the production of Adam, whom he made a copy of the great, the divine original of beauty, with which he himſelf was cloathed. Hanc ſpeciem divinamque pulchritudinem clementiſſimus formoſiſſimuſque aſſumens, quam erat poſt multa tempora uſque ad carnem & oſſa aſſumpturus, creabat hominem, largiens ei ſpeciem hanc tantam, ipſe primus archetypus, ſpecioſiſſimus ipſe ſpecioſiſſimæ prolis Creator (15). i. e. "The moſt clement, and moſt beautiful being, aſſuming this form and divine beauty, which he was to aſſume (even to fleſh and bones) after a great many ages were paſt; created man, beſtowing on him ſuch great beauty, himſelf the Original or Architype, the moſt beautiful Creator of the moſt beautiful off-ſpring." We are, after this, not to wonder, that ſuch exclamations as the following ſhould be made: Quantam qualemve credas fuiſſe primi hominis illius venuſtatem? quantum in ore decus, quas gratias inſedisſe? That is, "What and how great would you imagine the beauty of this firſt man to be? What charms, what graces muſt have been in his graceful countenance?" For finally, this form with which the Word cloathed itſelf, was like to that form which was ſeen by St. Peter on mount Tabor; by Moſes on mount Sinai, and that under which Moſes and Elias revealed themſelves at Chriſt's Transfiguration. But the circumſtance which has moſt of the marvellous in it, is, that Adam himſelf ſaw the Artiſt who formed him, and the manner how his body was formed, by the beautiful hands of his Creator. Cum fingeretur homo manus illas divinas aſpexit, ambroſioſque vultus illos pulcherrima brachia corpus ſuum fingentia, ſinguloſque artus ducentia (17). i. e. "When man was formed, he beheld "thoſe divine hands, that ambroſial countenance, "thoſe moſt beautiful arms which were forming "his body, and drawing forth the ſeveral limbs of "it." All theſe wild whimſies ſprung from the brain of a very great man (18); and there are not wanting people who approve at leaſt a part of them.

(15) Eugubin in Coſmopæia, apud Salian. Annal. tom. 1. p. 106.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Salian. Annal. tom. 1. pag. 106.

[F] It is a direct falſhood to aſſert, that he was created both male and female.] A great number of Rabbis believed, that Adam was created with a double body, viz. male on the one ſide, and female on the other; and that the two bodies joining together at the ſhoulders, the faces look'd oppoſite ways, like thoſe of Janus (19). Now theſe pretend, that when God was deſirous of creating Eve, he had no more to do but to divide this body in two, when that on which the male ſex was, was Adam, and that of the female, Eve. Manaſſeh, Ben-Iſraël, the moſt learned Rabbi of the 17th Century, has aſſerted this whimſical notion (20), if Heidegger may be credited; who likewiſe aſſures us, that the learned Maimonides, the honour and glory of the Jewiſh nation, had before maintained the ſame thing (21). Eugubin tells us a like ſtory, except his differing with regard to the ſituation of the two bodies; for, according to him, their ſides were glued together, and reſembled each other in all reſpects, the ſex excepted. The male body was on the right, and threw its left arm round the other's neck, whilſt the other did the ſame with its right arm. Each body was animated, and each fell into a deep ſleep, when God would form Eve, that is, ſeparate her from the male body. Any one who is but barely able to read the Scriptures, may fully refute all thoſe idle chimæras. Before I proceed to other matters, I ſhall ſay a word or two of the Androgyni, on whom Plato (22) has ſo largely expatiated. Theſe were hermaphrodites, having four arms, four legs, and two heads, (the faces turn'd towards one another) on one neck. This duplicity of limbs made them very ſtrong, and therefore vaſtly inſolent, ſo that they had the boldneſs to meditate war againſt the Gods. Upon this there was a debate in heaven about the moſt proper methods to check their pride, when the opinion of Jupiter prevailed, which was, to divide them into two, which was accordingly done. Each of the ſeparated pieces preſerved a ſtrong propenſion to unite together again, and hence the origin of love, according to that Philoſopher; but it was neceſſary to change the ſituation of certain members, that this reunion might be prolific. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that thoſe who mention the Androgyni of Plato, ſeldom give us a true account of that particular. They make him ſay, that in the beginning, men were born of the ſpecies abovementioned; whereas Plato ſpeaks this of one part only; and acknowledges, that there were males and females at that time, as in this. See the remarks on the article SALMACIS. The author of a piece entitled, Le nouveau Viſionaire de Rotterdam (23), aſſures us, that, according to the Rabbis, Adam and Eve were both hermaphrodites before their fall (24); but I don't know any other author, who aſcribes this opinion to the Rabbis.

(19) Apud Heidegg. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 1. p. 128.

(20) Conciliat. in Geneſin, apud Heideggerum, Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 1. pag. 128. See Hoornbeeck, who refutes him in ch. 1. Book 4. de convertendis Judæis.

(21) In Moreh Nevochim, p. 2. cap. 30. apud Heidegg. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 1. p. 128. But it is to be obſerved, (as Mr. Van Dale informs me) that Mr. Heidegger does not quote faithfully the opinion which Manaſſeh ben Iſrael and Maimonides liked beſt.

(22) Plato in Convivio, pag. 1185. edit. Francof. anno 1602.

(23) Printed in 1686.

(24) Nouv. Viſion. de Rotterdam, p. 36.

[G] The revelations of Antoinette Bourignon.] The books of this Gentlewoman's compoſitions, prove that ſhe entertained very particular notions; but none were perhaps more ſtrange, than thoſe ſhe advanced with regard to the firſt man. According to her, Adam before his fall, poſſeſſed in himſelf the principles perly quoted to corroborate this falſe interpretation; and the romantic relations of James Sadeur [H] might be as juſtly employed for this purpoſe. It is equally falſe to ſay principles of both ſexes, and the virtue or power of producing his like, without the concurrent aſſiſtance of woman; and that the neceſſity which each ſex is now under, of joining with the other in order to propagate, is a conſequence of the change which ſin wrought in the human body. Men, ſays ſhe (25), imagine they were created by God, in the form under which they now appear, which is falſe, ſince ſin has diſfigured in their perſons the work of God; and inſtead of being men as they ought to be, they are become ſo many monſters in nature, divided into two imperfect ſexes, incapable of producing their like alone, as trees and plants do, which, in this particular, poſſeſs a greater perfection than either man or woman can boaſt, who are incapable of procreating alone; and no otherwiſe than by a mutual conjunction, and that too with pain and miſery. In another work (26), the particulars of this myſtery are explained, in the manner as God revealed them to Mrs. Bourignon. She fancied that being in an extaſy, ſhe ſaw Adam in the ſame form under which he appeared before his fall, and the manner how himſelf, alone, was capable of procreating other men. But what is much more, ſhe imagined it was told her, that he had carried this ſingular procreative faculty ſo far, as to produce the human nature of Jeſus Chriſt. Tho' this paſſage is a little of the longeſt, I nevertheleſs ſhall tranſcribe it at length, that the reader may ſee, what extravagant ideas the mind of man is capable of forming.

(25) Preface to the book entitled Le Nouveau ciel & la nouvelle Terre; i. e. "The new heaven and new earth," printed at Amſterdam in 1679.

(26) Vie continuée de Madem. Bourignon, p. 315.

"God repreſented to her mind, without the mediation of the corporeal eyes, which would have been oppreſſed under the weight of ſo refulgent a glory, the beauty of the firſt world, and the manner how he had drawn it from the chaos: Every thing was bright, tranſparent, and darted forth light and ineffable glory. He ſhewed to her, in the ſame ſpiritual manner, Adam the firſt man, whoſe body was purer and more tranſparent than cryſtal, vaſtly fleet and flying, as it were; and thro' which veſſels and rivulets of light were ſeen, which penetrated from the inward parts to the outward, thro' all his pores; veſſels in which flowed fluids of all kinds and of all colours, vaſtly bright and quite diaphanous, not only of water and milk, but of fire, air, &c. The moſt raviſhing harmony aroſe from every motion of his; all things obeyed him, and nothing reſiſted, or could annoy him. His ſtature was taller than that of the preſent race of men; his hair was ſhort, curl'd, and of a colour inclining to black; his upper lip covered with ſhort hair; and inſtead of the beſtial parts which modeſty will not allow us to name, he was faſhioned as our bodies ſhall be in the life eternal, which I know not whether I dare reveal. In that region, his noſe was form'd in the manner of a face, which diffuſed the moſt delicious fragrancy and perfumes, whence alſo men were to iſſue, all whoſe principles were inherent in him, there being in his belly a veſſel, where little eggs were formed; and a ſecond veſſel filled with a fluid, which impregnated thoſe eggs. And, when man heated himſelf in the love of his God, the deſire he had that other creatures ſhould exiſt beſides himſelf, to praiſe, love and adore that ſublime Majeſty, cauſed the fluid abovementioned, (by means of the fire of the love of God,) to drop on one or more of thoſe eggs with inexpreſſible delight: and being thus impregnated, iſſued ſome time after out of man, by this canal, in the ſhape of an egg, whence a perfect man was, by inſenſible degrees, hatched. Thus, in the life eternal, there will be a holy and endleſs generation, very different from that which ſin introduced thro' woman, whom God form'd of man, by taking out of Adam's ſides the veſſel that contained the eggs; which woman now poſſeſſes, and whence men ſtill continue to be born, according to the new diſcoveries in Anatomy. The firſt man whom Adam brought forth without any concurrent aſſiſtance in his glorified ſtate, was choſen by God, to be the throne of the Divinity; the organ and inſtrument by which God would communicate himſelf eternally to men. This is CHRIST, the firſt-born, united to human nature, both God and Man (27)." I wiſh that the author of the Nouveau Viſionaire de Rotterdam, had not attacked the wild chimæras of our female enthuſiaſt, and thoſe of the Clergymen he cenſures, in ſo ludicrous a manner: a critic might ridicule the whimſies of the latter with regard to Adam and Eve's marriage, without being ſo vaſtly merry on that head.

(27) Ibid.

To this I ſhall only ſubjoin two ſhort reflections. Firſt, that Antoinette Bourignon ſhould not have fancied, that ſhe would riſe after death, ſince, according to her own principles, the groſs ſubſtance, which, ſince the fall, has been united to the body of man, and which rots in the grave, will not riſe again (28); and reſurrection is only the reſtoring of man to his ſtate of innocence: a ſtate in which, according to the whimſical Revelations of our Antoinette, there were no women. Some Centuries ſince (29) a heretic, whoſe name was Amaulri, was ſome time ſince condemned at Paris, aſſerting among other errors, that at the end of the world, both ſexes will be reunited in the ſame perſon; that this re-union had begun in JESUS CHRIST; and that had man continued in the ſtate wherein God had brought him forth, there would not have been any diſtinction of ſexes (30). Faber Stapulenſis believed, that Adam in the ſtate of innocence would have brought forth his like, without the joint aſſiſtance of woman (31). Mrs. Bourignon, therefore, was not the firſt who taught theſe opinions; but then ſhe has enlarged them very much with her own chimæras, ſuch as the perpetual propagation which, ſhe tells us, will continue in Paradiſe, after the ſame manner as men would have multiplied upon earth, had they preſerved their innocence. What ſhall we ſay of Paracelſus, who believed, that our firſt parents had not the parts neceſſary to procreation, before their fall; but that after this, they roſe from them as an excreſcence, or in the ſame manner as the evil breaks out in the throat. Negabat primos parentes ante lapſum habuiſſe partes generationi hominis neceſſarias, poſtea acceſſiſſe ut ſtrumam gutturi (32). My ſecond reflexion is, that this Lady aſcribes to Chriſt born of Adam, the ſeveral appearances under which God revealed himſelf, according to the Old Teſtament; and that ſhe believes, that when he reſolved to cloath himſelf with the corruption of our fleſh and blood, in the womb of the bleſſed Virgin, he ſhut up his body therein, either by leſſening it to the ſize he was of at his firſt conception or birth; or in ſome other manner incomprehenſible to our groſs, imperfect reaſon (33).

(28) Preface to the Nouveau Ciel.

(29) In the beginning of the 13th Century.

(30) Prateoli. Elench. Hæret. voce Almaricus; & Defenſio Relationis de Ant. Burign. in Acta Erudit. Lipſienſ. inſertæ, p. 150.

(31) Apud Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſ. cap. 2. ver. 24.

(32) Paracelſus apud Voſſium de Philoſophia, cap. 9. p. 71.

(33) Vie continuée de Madem. Bourignon, pag. 517.

* These are Mr. Bayle's words.

* These two reflexions, which were ſufficient in the firſt edition of this work, are not ſo in the ſecond, ſince ſome perſons have been ſo peeviſhly-fantaſtical, as to aſſert that my article of ADAM was filled with the moſt abominable obſcenities. To theſe I muſt anſwer, that they are not only too delicate and ſcrupulous, but are even not acquainted with the privileges of an hiſtorian. They who write the life of a wicked man, may and ought to repreſent, in general, the lewd ſcenes thro' which he paſt; on which occaſion, how cautious ſoever they may be of the expreſſion, the ideas muſt neceſſarily be impure, and ſuch as pollute the imagination. This is unavoidable. All they can do, is to avoid deſcending to particulars, or employing ſuch words as may ſhock a modeſt ear, and this I have done. They likewiſe who write the Hiſtory of Sects, whoſe tenets or actions were impure, are under the ſame neceſſity; and tho' the ſtile be ever ſo chaſte, yet it is impoſſible but ſome of the images muſt be filthy and obſcene. What juſtifies me here particularly is, that the abſurdities I have related are borrowed from a book that is ſold publickly; beſides which, I have the example of the ancient Fathers of the church, who have not ſcrupled to relate the moſt abominable impurities of heretics.

[H] The romantic relations of James Sadeur.] This is a fictitious account of certain nations of hermaphrodites, inhabitants of Terra Auſtralis. See the article SADEUR.

(e) This the Jews aſſure. See Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 1. p. 291.

ſay, that Adam came into the world circumciſed (e); and that as he was diſpleaſed at it, he committed the fault of thoſe, whom St. Paul mentions in one of his Epiſtles (f). We are alſo to rank under the head of fiction, what we are told of his gigantic ſtature [I]; of the books he compoſed [K]; of his ſepulchre [L], and of a tree planted over it [M]

(f) 1 Cor. vii. 18.

[I] Of his gigantic ſtature.] Philo believed that Adam ſurpaſſed all other men both in body and ſoul (34), but the Talmudiſts go infinitely farther. Theſe aſſure, that Adam extended from one end of the world to the other, when God created him; that after he had ſinned, God laid a heavy hand on him, and reduced his ſtature to an hundred ells (35). According to ſome writers, God did this at the requeſt of the Angels, who were afraid of ſo gigantic a creature; but they ſuppoſe that God did not ſink Adam's ſtature under the height of nine hundred cubits. See Vol. 1ſt, pag. 65 and 66, of Father Bartolocci's Bibliotheca Rabbinica. Barcepha mentions ſome authors, who related that the terreſtrial Paradiſe was ſeparated from our world by the ocean; and that Adam, after he was baniſh'd that Paradiſe, walked into our world croſs the ſea, which he found every where fordable, his ſtature was ſo enormous (36). This is juſt the picture of the Orion or Polyphemus of the Poets:

(34) Philo de Opific. Mundi.

(35) In Libro Sanhedrim.

(36) In Tractatu de Paradiſo.

——— ——— Quam magnus Orion
Cum pedes incedit medii per maxima Nerei
Stagna viam ſcindens, humero ſupereminet undas (37).

(37) Virgil. Æncid. lib. 10. ver. 763.

——— ——— Summo cum monte videmus
Ipſum inter pecudes vaſta ſe mole moventem
Paſtorem Polyphemum, & littora nota petentem (38).

(38) Id. ibid. lib. 3. ver. 655.

——— ——— Graditurque per æquor
Jam medium, necdum fluctus latera ardua tinxit (39).

(39) Id. ibid. lib. 3. ver. 664.

In Engliſh,

——— ——— "He ſtood,
"Like tall Orion, ſtalking o'er the flood:
"When with his brawny breaſt he cuts the waves,
"His ſhoulders ſcarce the topmoſt billow laves.

——— ——— "When, on the mountain's brow,
"We ſaw the giant—ſhepherd ſtalk before
"His following flock, and leading to the ſhore.

——— ——— "Thro' ſeas he ſtrides,
"And ſcarce the topmoſt billows touch'd his ſides.
Dryden.

According to the Arabians, our firſt fathers were of as prodigious a ſtature, as the authors hinted at by Moſes Barcepha related that of Adam to have been. Here follows what Monconis relates: My Arabian told me, that the caravan of Cairo arrived firſt at Mecca, and after having offer'd up their prayers in that city, they went to the foot of the mountain, which is at a league's diſtance from it, where they waited for the other two caravans of Damaſcus and Bagdat, which arrived at Mecca ſome days after; and being all arrived the ninth of the twelfth moon, which is Diel Heghe; at the end, I ſay, of the ninth day entring into the tenth, which is that of Aſſer, all the three caravans aſcend this mountain, on the top whereof, (which is very low, like thoſe hillocks that riſe in the midſt of plains) theſe people believe Eve leaned her head when Adam knew her the firſt time; and that her two knees laid very far off, in the bottom of the plain, on two other hills, two muſket ſhot diſtant one from the other, in each of which places a column has been erected; between which, thoſe who would be look'd upon as good Agis or pilgrims, muſt paſs, in their way to and from the mountain, on the ſummit whereof is a moſque, built in the form of a nich, into which not above ſeven or eight people can enter (40). I find one John Lucidus cited, who was of opinion, that Adam ſurpaſſed all the giants in ſtature (41), which he pretended to prove by theſe words of the ſcripture according to the Vulgate. Nomen Hebron ante vocabatur Cariath-arbe: Adam maximus ibi inter Enacim ſitus eſt (42). That is, "Hebron was before call'd Cariath-arbe: "There Adam, the greateſt among the Anakims, "lies buried." St. Jerom infers from this paſſage, that Adam was buried at Hebron (43); but it is plain, that neither the Hebrew, nor the Septuagint mention any thing concerning Adam, or of any ſepulchre (44). We find it thus in the Geneva verſion; The name of Hebron before was Karjath-Arba, which Arba had been very great among the Hanakims (Anakims). In the iſland of Ceylon ſtands a mountain, which is called the Peak (mountain) of Adam; ſo named, according to the tradition of the country, from its having been the place of Adam's reſidence (45). The print of his footſteps, above two palms in length, are ſtill ſeen there. Pythagoras, who judg'd of Hercules's ſtature from the length of his foot, would not, from the proportion above, have pronounced Adam to have been of ſo gigantic a ſize, as ſome relate (46). We are alſo told, that there ſtill exiſt on this mountain ſome monuments of the tears, which were ſhed at Abel's death; but, according to others, Adam and Eve bewail'd his death in a cave at Judæa, where their ſtone beds, thirty foot in length, are ſeen (47).

(40) Moncon. Voiag. part I. p. 372, 373. edit. Lions.

(41) Joh Lucidus de Emendat. Tempor. lib. 1. cap. 4. apud Pererium in Geneſ. lib. 4. Quæſt. 3.

(42) Joſhuah xiv. laſt verſe.

(43) Hieron. in Matt. cap. 27.

(44) Pererius in Geneſ. lib. 4. Quæſt. 3.

(45) Ludovic. Romanus Patricius in ſua Navigat. apud Biſſelium, Illuſt. Ruinarum Decade 1.

(46) A. Gellius, Noct. Attic. lib. 1. cap. 1.

[K] Of the books he compoſed.] The Jews pretend, that Adam writ a book on the creation of the world, and another on the Deity (48), the firſt of which is mentioned by Maſius (49). A Mahometan writer, Kiſſæus by name, relates that Abraham being in the country of the Sabeans, opened Adam's trunk, and there found the books he had written, with thoſe of Seth and Edris (50); the laſt of which names the Arabians give to Enoch. Theſe relate, that Adam was poſſeſſed of twenty books that fell from heaven, which comprehended a great number of laws, promiſes, menaces from the Almighty, and the predictions of a great many events (51). Some Rabbis aſcribe the 92d Pſalm to Adam; and in ſome manuſcripts the Chaldee title of this Pſalm declares expreſly, that this is the ſong of praiſe which the firſt man repeated, for the ſabbath-day (52). Euſebius Nieremberg, the very ſoul of credulity, gives us two canticles which he had faithfully tranſcribed from the revelations of the bleſſed (canonized) Amadeus, in the library of the Eſcurial (53). We are told that theſe two pieces were written by Adam, one of which he made the time he ſaw Eve, and the other is the penitential Pſalm which he and his wife repeated after their fall.

(47) Apud Saldenum, Otiorum Theolog. p. 346.

(48) Heidegger. Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 1. p. 481.

(49) Vide Salian. tom. 1. p. 230.

(50) Apud Stanleium, Philoſoph. Orient. lib. 3. cap. 3.

(51) Hotting. Hiſt. Orient. pag. 22. citante Lyſero in Polygamia, triumph. p. 145.

(52) Gaſper Schottus, Tech. curioſæ, p. 556.

(53) Lib. 2. cap. 13. de Orig. Sac. Script. apud Schottum, ibid. p. 556.

[L] Of his ſepulchre.] The reader has already heard, how St. Jerom imagined, without any foundation, that Adam had been buried at Hebron; but we ſhould have as much reaſon to believe this particular, as to fancy with ſo many others, that Adam was interred on Mount Calvary (54). I own that the latter notion is better per la predica (better ſuited to the pulpit) as it is a much finer field for alluſions, antitheſes, moral reflections, and all the beautiful figures in rhetoric; but ſuch a reaſon as this is of very little uſe, except to ſerve as a proof againſt ſuch perſons as ſhould ask, why St. Jerom's notion ſhould have had fewer followers than the other. But competition apart, let it ſuffice us to know, that a great number of the fathers have believed, that the firſt man died on the very ſpot where Jeruſalem was afterwards built, and was buried on a neighbouring mountain called Golgotha, or Mount Calvary, whereon Chriſt was crucified. In caſe the reader ſhould ask, how it was poſſible for Adam's ſepulchre to reſiſt the impetuoſity of the deluge, and for his bones to keep their place, in order to receive the ſprinkling of our Lord's blood; for there lies the myſtery:

(54) See Salian, Ann. tom. 1. p. 225. where he ſhews that St. Jerom himſelf adopts the common opinion in ſome places.

Hic hominem primum ſuſcepimus eſſe ſepultum,
Hic patitur Chriſtus; pia ſanguine terra madeſcit,
Pulvis Adæ, ut poſſit veteris cum ſanguine Chriſti
Commixtus, ſtillantis aquæ virtute lavari (55).

(55) Tertullian Carm. contra Marcion. lib. 2. cap. 4.

Engliſh'd,

"We're told that here the firſt man was interr'd;
"Here Chriſt was crucified: the pious earth
"Was wet with gore; that antient Adam's duſt,
"Mixing with the moſt precious blood of Jeſus,
"Might by the virtue of the dropping water
"Be waſh'd.

ſt [M] &c.; but we muſt be aware of entertaining the ſame doubts with regard to his ſalvation, as the Abbot Rupert did (g); much leſs to believe, with the Tatianites (b), that he was condemned to hell-flames. We have no reaſon to adopt the notion of Origen, of St. Auſtin, St. Athanaſius, and ſeveral others, viz. that Adam was one of the firſt among thoſe who roſe from the dead with Jeſus Chriſt (i); much leſs are we obliged to believe, that his repentance would have plunged him into ſorrows that would have killed him, had not God ſent the Angel Raziel to comfort him (k). But reaſon will have us believe, that his faith and his prayers obtained him mercy, and that he made a very good end; though we are not therefore to ſuppoſe that he made a ſpeech to his children, before he breath'd out his ſoul; and recommended to them expreſly, that they ſhould honour their mother, and bury her by him. A writer ſhould not take the liberty to forge ſuch ſpeeches as theſe [N], and relate them as (g) Ruperti Comment. in Geneſ. lib. 3. c. 31.

(b) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 46. Euſebius Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 27.
(i) Apud Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſ. cap. 5. ver. 5.
(k) See Reuchlinus de Art. Cabbal. p. 8. and Heidegger, Hiſt. Patriarch. tom. 1. p. 160.

* Rothomagi apud Ludovicum du Meſnil MDC.LXII.

*[The four Latin lines above, ſtand thus in another edition:

Hic hominem primum ſuſcepimus eſſe ſepultum,
Hic patitur Chriſtus; pio ſanguine terra madeſcit,
Pulvis Adæ ut poſſit veteris cum ſanguine Chriſti
Commixtus, ſtillantis aquæ virtute levari. *]

In caſe, I ſay, the reader ſhould make this objection, Barcepha will anſwer it, from a Doctor who was in great veneration in Syria (56). According to this Doctor, Noah inhabiting Judea, planted in the plains of Sodom, the cedar-trees with which he built the ark, and took Adam's bones into it. That after his coming out of the ark, he divided them among his three ſons, giving the skull to Shem, whoſe deſcendants poſſeſſing themſelves of Judea, buried this skull in the very place where Adam's ſepulchre had ſtood.

(56) Dominus Jacobus Orrohaïta (ſive Edeſſenus.) St. Ephreim who lived in the 4th Century was his diſciple. See Salian. Annal. tom 1. p. 226. Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſin, p. 105.

[M] Of a tree planted over this ſepulchre.] Cornelius à Lapide tells us, that the Hebrews relate that Seth, at the command of an Angel, put ſome of the ſeed of the forbidden tree into Adam's mouth after he was buried, whence a tree ſprung, of which Chriſt's croſs was made; and that it was juſt that Chriſt ſhould expiate Adam's ſin, on the very ſame tree which had cauſed the latter to fall (57). The Jeſuit abovementioned refers us to Pinedo, who gives this fictitious ſtory at length. But who are we to underſtand by the Hebrews? The Jews undoubtedly; but do theſe acknowledge that Chriſt expiated Adam's ſin, by the ſuffering on the croſs, to which their nation ſentenced him under Pontius Pilate? When a writer is full of a thing, he fancies that other people are ſo too; and is not always aware of the abſurdities he himſelf gives into, by aſcribing his own thoughts to them. To conclude, this fiction has been related variouſly; for we find in a Rabbi, who lived long before Chriſt, and whoſe work is entitled Gale Raſejah (58), that the Angels carried to Adam in the deſart, a branch of the tree of life which Seth planted, and that afterwards it grew up to a tree which proved of great ſervice to Moſes; for after taking the rod from it with which he wrought ſo many miracles, he alſo took the branch from thence which ſweetened the bitter waters, and that on which he fixed the brazen ſerpent. According to ſome writers, Adam ſent Seth to the gate of the garden of Eden, to beſeech the Angels who guarded the entrance of it, to let him have a branch of the tree of life, which requeſt was granted (59).

(57) Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſ. cap. 2. ver. 9. p. 74.

(58) See (with regard to this Rabbi and his work, the Nouvelles de la Republiq. des Lettres, for July 1686. Art. 3. p. 770, & ſeq. extracted from Mœvius de Æneo Serpente.

(59) See Saldeni Otia Theolog. p. 608.

[N] To forge ſuch ſpeeches as theſe.] I have Salian in view in this cenſure, who not contented with giving us the ſpeech in queſtion, has alſo written a long epitaph on Adam, where he has ſhadowed his own name, under the three letters J. S. P. (60). Salian has alſo drawn up epitaphs for Abel, Abraham, Sarah, &c. But this is pardonable only in a young writer, who has juſt gone through a courſe of rhetoric: and I am very much perſuaded that Sirmondus, Petavius, Hardouin, and the reſt of the celebrated authors among the Jeſuits, would think as I do on this occaſion.

(60) They ſignify Jacobus Salianus poſuit.

*[The following was communicated to us by a learned hand, as a Supplement to the remark [D] of the foregoing article.

A great many authors might be quoted to prove what Mr. Bayle ſays; but I will content myſelf at preſent with Suidas, whom I have choſen among the reſt, not only becauſe of the peculiarity of his expreſſions, but alſo becauſe I ſhall have an opportunity of clearing and correcting that paſſage. He, or rather the author whom he tranſcribed, ſays (1), that Adam ought juſtly to be called the firſt wiſe-man as being the firſt reſemblance and image made by God; and as he was repleniſhed with all gifts, and had all the faculties both of ſoul and body pure and uncorrupted. Μαρμαρυγαὶ γάρ, adds he, τινες, ὡς εἰπεῖν, ἐκ τῆς ἐκείνης ψυχῆς ἀπαστράψασαι, καὶ θείων ἐννοιῶν καὶ ἐνεργειῶν πλήθυσαι κατὰ πᾶσαν εἰσέτρεχον φύσιν, εὐτόχως καὶ ἀναμαρτήτως τὸ οἰκεῖον ἑκάστης πλεονέκτημα φθάνυσαι. The author has not clearly expreſſed his meaning, which made Kuſter, who publiſhed the laſt edition of Suidas, to doubt whether there was not an error in the laſt words εὐτόχως καὶ ἀναμαρτήτως τὸ οἰκεῖον ἑκάστης πλεονέκτημα φθάνυσαι. And he acknowledges that he does not very well underſtand them. Indeed, were this paſſage to be tranſlated into Engliſh literally, it would be nonſenſe. However, I'll endeavour to make it as clear as I can. I take Suidas's meaning to be this; that Adam's knowledge was repleniſhed with ſuch divine thoughts and operations, that, like rays darted from his ſoul, it made its way thro' all nature, i. e. the nature of every thing, which made him perfectly know the peculiar advantage and power, that each particular nature of one thing has above another before it was manifeſted, and made known to him by their effects and his own obſervation. This peculiar advantage and power is what Suidas calls τὸ οἰκεῖον πλεονέκτημα. With the word ἑκάστης it is to be underſtood φύσεως, which he has mentioned juſt before: πᾶσαν φύσιν, the ἑκάστης here anſwering the precedent πᾶσαν. The verb φθάνυσαι expreſſes admirably well the ſupernatural way of Adam's knowledge by its being antecedent to, and going before obſervation and experience; by which means human knowledge is acquired. That this is the ſenſe of theſe words is evident by what he ſays afterwards, when he ſpeaks of Adam's giving the names to the animals. Ἐκάλεσεν ὀνόματα, τὴν φύσιν αὐτὴν, καὶ τὴν ὑποσάσιν ἑκάστου ζώου ὥσπερ ὑπογραφόμενος, οὐ μελετήσας, οὐ προσκιψάμενος, οὐδέ τι πρὸ πόνου τῶν ὅσα μεταμανθάνουσιν ἄνθρωποι; by which words he would have us to underſtand, that Adam did not give names to animals in like manner as men would do; that is, by obſerving and conſidering their natures, properties and qualities, but by a perfect knowledge of their natures, which he had acquired before he knew any thing of them, or had reflected on their actions &c. By this knowledge he gave them names, that expreſſed their natures as in a picture; ſo that his knowledge was not like that of men, who are ſubject to error, and do not always think of the ſame thing after the ſame manner; but change their notions and opinions, growing wiſer by their miſtakes, and a longer and more exact experience. Such was the knowledge of Adam if we may believe this author, which was not only an uncommon one, and ſuperior to human knowledge, but reſembling that of the Divinity. By this Adam could not but be happy, if what Virgil ſays be true,

(1) In the article Ἀδάμ.

Felix qui potuit rerum cognoſcere cauſas.

The ſame author to prove what he has advanced concerning Adam's knowledge in giving names to animals, tells us, that altho' ſince Adam's creation many and innumerable generations are paſt, yet no man as ſpoken by the perſons themſelves. We have taken notice elſewhere (l), of what is told concerning the duration of his ſtate of innocence.

(l) See the remark [A] of the article ABEL.

☞ ADAM

man has been able to change the name even of the ſmalleſt and moſt inſignificant animal; nor to attain to the ſublimity of Adam's underſtanding and knowledge; but rather that all men diſperſed up and down the earth have conſtantly followed his unchangeable oracles. What truth there is in this aſſertion is not eaſy to be determined; but it is however ſurprizing and incredible; ſince whoever believes this muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe, firſt, that the language Adam ſpoke was the ſame with that in which the ſcripture is written. Secondly, that the ſame language did, and does continue ſtill thro' the whole world; or at leaſt, that all languages are derived from that of Adam, which altho' altered and changed ſuch a multitude of ways as to form new languages, yet the names of the animals in all languages give the very ſame idea which Adam's names expreſſed; i. e. that ſuppoſing Adam gave an animal a name expreſſive of that animal's ſtrength, in like manner the name of that animal expreſſes alſo its ſtrength in all other languages. But what convincing proof can be given of this I cannot ſay. The argument drawn from etymology is an uncertain and precarious one, not to mention that many languages are entirely loſt; ſo that we cannot know, whether the names of animals in thoſe languages anſwered the names which Adam gave them. Suidas not content with what he had ſaid of Adam's knowledge, goes further, and declares, that he diſtinctly knew, and clearly explained all the differences of the ſeeds and plants; the virtues of the ſeveral roots and herbs, and whatever elſe nature has appointed to every animal for their ſubſiſtence, or cure. That he examined all things, and preſcribed them their exact rules and bounds. The arts, ſciences, learning, both liberal and illiberal; prophecies, ſacrifices and luſtrations; the written and unwritten laws; the ſeveral inſtitutions, and every thing that is neceſſary, and commodious to life, all theſe were his invention. What can a man ſay more, or what greater idea can we form to ourſelves of Adam's wiſdom and knowledge?

Since I am upon Suidas's article of Adam, I'll not leave it without taking notice of a paſſage there, which wants to be cleared and corrected. Suidas ſpeaking of Adam's ſin, the corruption of human nature, and the Devil's power in the world, among other particulars ſays, that the Devil having thrown the whole creation upon his ſhoulders, and brought man as a ſlave under his power; making his way towards heaven, and walking round the earth, and ὡς ὠὸν (2) πάντα κατέχων, ὡς αὐτός πω φησὶν ἀλαζονευόμενος, thought his throne was to be fix'd above the clouds of heaven, and that himſelf would be like unto God. I do not remember any place in Scripture, wherein the Devil ſpeaks thoſe words of himſelf. I only find in Iſaiah c. x. v. 14. the following: Καὶ σείσω πόλεις κατοικημένας καὶ τὴν οἰκουμένην ὅλην καταλήψομαι τῇ χειρὶ ὡς νοσσιὰν καὶ ὡς καταλελειμμένα ὠὰ ἀρῶ. But theſe are put by the Prophet into Sennacherib's mouth, who is boaſting of his power; ſo that if Suidas, or his author had this paſſage in view, they were certainly miſtaken in the perſon whom they ſuppoſed to have ſpoke; which miſtake however is not to be wonder'd at, ſince Tertullian has applied part of them to God (3). Unleſs a man will ſay, to excuſe Suidas or his author, that by theſe allegorical interpretations, very common in Eccleſiaſtical Writers, they made Sennacherib to be the Devil. But I am inclined rather to think, that they had in view what the Devil ſaid of himſelf when he tempted our Saviour. Σοὶ δώσω τὴν ἐξουσίαν ταύτην ἅπασαν, καὶ τὴν δόξαν αὐτῶν· ὅτι ἐμοὶ παραδέδοται, καὶ ᾧ ἐὰν θέλω, δίδωμι αὐτήν; by which words he makes himſelf equal to God, as Sovereign of the world, and diſpoſing of it as he pleaſes: So that inſtead of ὡς ὠὸν, or ὡς ὠὰ, I would read ὡς Θεὸς ὤν.

(2) The firſt edition of Suidas made at Milan 1499, has ὡς ὠὰ, which various reading has not been remarked by Kuſter.

(3) Adverſ. Marcion. l. 2. c. 25. Adverſ. Prax. c. 16.

To return to Adam. It is not to be doubted, but that he was indued with uncommon wiſdom and knowledge, that is ſuch a one, as was neceſſary to the ſtate he was then in, in order to accompliſh thoſe ends for which he was created, and to execute thoſe orders which God had given him, viz. to multiply his own ſpecies, to repleniſh and ſubdue the earth, to have dominion over all the animals, and to dreſs and cultivate the garden which God had ſet him in. We muſt therefore ſuppoſe, that Adam at his creation expreſſed all the wiſdom and knowledge neceſſary to the performance of thoſe things; but to believe all the extravagant notions that moſt Jews and Chriſtians have had of Adam's wiſdom and knowledge, is to believe what has no manner of foundation either in reaſon or Scripture. Reaſon tells us, that wiſdom and knowledge are not natural to us, although the means and diſpoſition for acquiring them are without doubt natural, that is, born with us; but we can never attain them without reflection and experience; ignorance always preceding knowledge and wiſdom as a firſt-born child. To Adam, indeed, we muſt allow (ſince he was created and not born) not only the diſpoſition and means to acquire wiſdom and knowledge, but alſo an immediate wiſdom and knowledge as ſoon as he came from the hand of the Creator: but as to the degree of his wiſdom and knowledge, this is what no one can poſitively ſay. Whilſt he continued in the ſtate of innocence and felicity, he did not want either ſuch ſciences as conſiſted in pure ſpeculations; nor thoſe arts which owe their invention to neceſſity, or the corruption of man's nature: ſuch wiſdom and knowledge is ſo far from making man happy, that in the opinion of many they render him the moſt miſerable of all creatures; certain it is, that they are an evident mark of man's unhappy condition. The perfection in which Adam was created, is no argument to prove his having ſuch an extraordinary and prodigious wiſdom and knowledge as is pretended. Every being is perfect in its own nature, whatever its nature be; and it is ſaid that every thing God created was good. Imperfection is not in the nature of things, but in their compariſon one with another.

From what the Scripture ſays of Adam's being created by God in his own image (4), no convincing argument can be drawn to determine the degrees of Adam's wiſdom and knowledge, ſince the interpreters do not agree in what this image of God conſiſted. The variety of opinions on this text is a proof of its obſcurity. Neither do the interpreters agree in the ſenſe of that paſſage of the Scripture, wherein it is ſaid, that Adam gave names to all the cattle, &c. (5). I will not examine this text now for fear I ſhould tire the reader; I will only obſerve, that the giving names to animals does not neceſſarily imply a perfect knowledge of all the particular natures of them. The different impreſſions which animals made on Adam's ſenſes; and the judgment he paſſed from thoſe impreſſions on their nature, were a ſufficient knowledge for Adam to give them names. The Scripture ſays nothing of Adam's being ſuch a wiſe and knowing man as they would have us believe him to have been. But ſuppoſe his wiſdom and knowledge was as great as they pretend it to have been, they yet muſt confeſs, that Adam, in his primitive ſtate, had not the knowledge of good and evil; a knowledge of great extent, and very neceſſary for the conduct of our actions; and yet it would have been happy both for himſelf and his deſcendants had he continued in that ſtate of ignorance. In caſe the greatneſs of a man's wiſdom appears in the conduct of his actions, Adam's conduct in tranſgreſſing God's commandment is a proof, if not of the want, at leaſt of the ill uſe he made of his great wiſdom. With regard to his knowledge in the arts, the Scripture ſays expreſly, that God made clothes for Adam and Eve to cover themſelves (6); which conſequently ſuppoſes, that Adam was not able to invent thoſe things which were moſt proper for himſelf and his wife to cover their nakedneſs. The Scripture has alſo recorded the names of thoſe who were the inventors of ſeveral arts (7), which had Adam known, the invention of them would not have been aſcribed to the deſcendants of his ſon Cain. Whether Adam after his guilt retained thoſe ſciences which were infuſed into him by God, is what Mr. Bayle ſeems to think not impoſſible. "In the ſame manner, ſays "he, as the Angels did not become leſs wiſe after "their

(4) Gen. i. 27.

(5) Gen. ii. 20.

(6) Gen. iii. 21.

(7) Gen. iv. 20, 21, 22.

☞ADAM. Beſides the ſeveral curious particulars which Mr. Bayle has extracted from the Rabbis and others concerning our grand parent, there are a great many fabulous things related of him in the Eaſtern Legends. Some of the moſt curious of which we ſhall now give the reader, as falling in naturally with our plan. The name of Adam in the Oriental languages, ſignifies Man in general, and the firſt Man by way of eminence (a). He is ſurnamed by the Arabians Abu'lbaſhar, that is, the Father of Men (b), and they give him the title of Seſi Allah, that is, created pure by God (c), or choſen of God (d). The Moſlems, and particularly the Perſians, ſometimes call him alſo Adam the Prophet, and Adam the Khalif, a title they beſtow on none but Legiſlators and their Deputies, or direct ſucceſſors (e). The records of the Perſees declare, that the name of the firſt man was Adamah (f). The Moſlems look upon him as the firſt Prophet, and ſay, that he wrote ten books by Divine inſpiration (g). The Koran mentions the ſubſtance he was formed of [A]. God commanding the Angels to fall proſtrate before Adam, and to acknowledge him as his Vicar or Lieutenant upon earth, a great many of them obeyed, but Eblis or Lucifer and his adherents refuſed to do it, becauſe of the meanneſs of Adam's origin [B]. An idle tale is told of the manner how his ſoul animated his body, viz. that Gabriel prevailed upon the former to enter the latter by playing on the flagelet (h). The account of Adam's creation (according to Khondemir) after God had ſent ſeveral Angels to take from the bowels of the earth wherewith to form the ſubſtance of man, and the Earth's complaint to God upon that account is very whimſical [C]. The Eaſterns have likewiſe ſome particular

(a) Voyages de Monſieur le Chevalier Chardin en Perſe, &c. tom. 3. p. 179. Amſterdam, chez Jean Louis Delorme, 1711, 4°.

(b) D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 53. Paris, 1697, fol.

(c) Voyages de Chardin, ibid.

(d) D'Herbelot, ibid.

(e) Voyages de Chardin, ibid.

(f) The Religion of the Perſees, by Henry Lord, p. 7. printed for Francis Conſtable, 1630, 4°.

(g) D'Herbelot, ibid.

(h) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 3. p. 179.

" their fall; and that the crimes of learned men do " not make them forget the ſciences they knew be- " fore." But if I am not miſtaken Mr. Bayle's compariſon is not juſt. The Angels by their fall, and learned men by their crimes, ſuffer no alteration in their ſubſtance, as Adam did; for before his guilt his body was immortal, which became afterwards mortal; ſo that although the ſoul continued to be immortal, yet from the union that is between the ſoul and body, the faculties of the former muſt neceſſarily have been changed by the alteration wrought in the body. Immortality and mortality are ſo oppoſite, that it is impoſſible to conceive the paſſage from one to the other without a great alteration in the ſubject or ſubſtance which ſuffers this paſſage. And in caſe ſin affected and altered the underſtanding and will of Adam (as is the general opinion) I don't ſee any reaſon why memory ſhould not be alſo affected and altered; ſo that in caſe Adam's ſin did not wholly obliterate from his mind the ſeveral ſciences infuſed into him, he at leaſt was not ſo great a maſter of them as before. The advantageous opinion and blind veneration which men have for antiquity and their anceſtors; and the more for Adam, as being the firſt father of all mankind who was created immediately by God, are the cauſe why ſo many encomiums and excellencies have been beſtowed upon him.

[A] The Koran mentions the ſubſtance Adam was formed of.] Theſe are the words: We created man of dried clay and black mud: but as for the Genii, we had before created them of a ſubtile fire (1). How beautiful was our firſt parent created, tho' form'd of ſuch groveling materials!

(1) The chapter of al Heir.

Whom his great Maker took ſuch care to make,
That from himſelf he did the image take (2).

(2) Lord Rochester's Satyr againſt Man.

With native honour clad
In naked Majeſty ſeem'd Lord of all.

His large fair front and eye ſublime declared
Abſolute rule; and hyacinthin locks
Round from his parted forelock manly hung Cluſtring.

(3) Milton book IV.

A commentator on the abovementioned words of the Koran, ſays, that God cauſed rain to fall for ſeveral days on the earth with which he formed Adam's body, and that after having form'd it, he left this earth to dry during ſeveral days before he animated it (4).

(4) D'Herbelot, p. 54.

[B] Eblis or Lucifer and his adherents refuſed to fall proſtrate before Adam &c.] The Angels, who are ſometimes comprehended under the name of Genii, were formed of fire. It is ſaid that they were created of very pure fire, which had been detached from the moſt groſs matter, like to that of the thunder of heaven (5). Upon their refuſing to pay the homage to Adam which God required, he asked Eblis, or the Devil, the motives of his diſobedience; who anſwer'd, that he was of a more excellent nature than man, and conſequently ought not to be ſubject to him: For thou haſt created us, ſays he to God, of a ſublime, ſubtil and luminous ſubſtance; whereas that new creature was form'd of groveling, groſs and gloomy materials (6). An author obſerves, that Eblis ought not to have judged of the excellency of Adam from the qualities of the materials of which he was made, but ſhould have conſidered in man the hand of God, who had formed, and the breath of his Spirit with which he had animated him. This reflexion has been thus paraphraſed by another writer.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) The effect of this is ſeen in the above-cited chapter of the Khoran and elſewhere.

Adam being form'd (ſupreme of human beings)
Satan conſider'd his frail body only,
Which, to his eye, appear'd an earthen idol.
He did not pierce to what was hid within,
And wou'd not paſs for one who worſhipp'd ſtatues.
But thy conjectures, Lucifer, are falſe:
Adam is not a vain, terreſtrial idol.
Open but well thine eyes, and thou'lt perceive
A ray, ſhot from the Majeſty of God,
That animates and beautifies his form.

An anonymous Perſian Poet writes as follows on the ſame ſubject:

There is a treaſure in this earthly houſe
Not found in other periſhable creatures:
And yet the boaſted ſplendor of this manſion
Is nothing when compar'd to that rich treaſure.
For, in a word, the Being who inhabits
This palace, is the awful King of men,
And the great Monarch of this ſpacious globe.

[C] The account of Adam's creation, according to Khondemir, . . is very whimſical.] God having reſolved to create Adam, commanded Gabriel to take a handful of earth from each of the ſeven beds or ſtages of earth. Gabriel having taken his flight in order to execute the orders of God, deſcended on our earth, and declared to her, that God deſigned to take out of her bowels wherewith to form man, who was to be the Sovereign over her, and the Lieutenant of God. The earth, terrified at what ſhe heard, beſought Gabriel to acquaint God with the fear ſhe was under, viz. that this creature, the materials of which ſhe was to furniſh, would one day rebel againſt him, and draw down upon her the curſe of Heaven. Gabriel being touched with compaſſion for the earth, preſented her petition to God, who rejected it, and thereupon ſent the Angels Michael and Aſrafil upon the ſame meſſage, who likewiſe favouring the earth, Azrael was at laſt ſent by the Creator, who without any manner of ceremony forced away ſeven handfuls from ſeven different beds and ſtages of earth, and carried them to a ticular notions with regard to Adam's dreſs, whom, they ſay, God cloathed in a wonderful attire ſuitable to his dignity [D]. The notions of the Arabians with regard to his fall are not very different from what we are told in Scripture [E]; but thoſe of the Perſians vary from them [F]. Hakem ſon of Haſhem was of opinion that a ray of the Divinity was communicated to Adam, which paſt to all the other Prophets ſucceſſively (i). One of the twelve Imams (k) declared that there were three Adams before our Adam, and that there would be ſeventeen after him (l). The Arabians taken notice of the number of children he had by Eve [G]; and relate, that he ſaw all his poſterity under the form or Ants [H]. They alſo tell us of the place where he was buried [I]. Chardin informs us, from the Moſlem Legends, of Adam's building a chapel at Mecca [K], (copied from the model of the fourth heaven) after he

(i) Idem, ib. p. 56.

(k) The twelve Imams are Ali and his eleven firſt ſucceſſors and his deſcendants in a direct line.

(l) Idem, ibid.

place which is found between the cities of Mecca and Tayef in Arabia. This earth having been kneaded by the hands of the Angels, God formed a mould of it with his own hands, which being dry, was expoſed a long time in the ſame place, to the view of the Angels, who often went thither for that purpoſe. Eblis, or Lucifer, who was one of them, not ſatisfied with viewing this mould on all ſides, touched it, and ſtriking upon its breaſt and belly, perceived by the ſound that it was hollow. Eblis then ſaid, this creature which will be empty within, will often require to be filled, and conſequently will be obnoxious to ſeveral temptations (7).

(7) D'Herbelot, p. 55.

[D] God cloathed Adam in wonderful attire ſuitable to his dignity.] This we are told was done immediately after his creation. In the chapter of the Koran, entitled al Arâf, God is ſaid to ſpeak as follows concerning this attire: We have given you cloaths that came down from Heaven, ſome to cover your ſhame, and others to adorn and defend you; but the moſt precious of all theſe garments is the robe of piety and innocence with which we have cloathed you. The author of Bahir al-Hakaik tells us, that this robe of piety and innocence is not that mean coarſe habit (call'd Khirkah) which the Moſlem Friars wear out of humility and by way of penance; but that they are the laudable and virtuous habits which relate to the mind and the underſtanding (8). Thus our Milton ſpeaking of our firſt parents after their fall:

(8) Idem, p. 56.

——— Innocence, that as a veil
Had ſhadowed them from knowing ill, was gone.
Juſt confidence, and native righteouſneſs,
And honour from about them, naked left
To guilty ſhame, he (God) cover'd (9).

(9) Paradiſe Loſt, Book IX.

[E] The notions of the Arabians with regard to the fall are not very different from what we are told in Scripture.] After God had cloathed Adam in wonderful attire, as was ſaid above, and adorned his ſoul with the excellent habits of the ſeveral ſciences and virtues, all the Angels, Eblis excepted, proſtrated themſelves before Adam. Eblis for his diſobedience to God's command was driven from Paradiſe, and his place was given to Adam. It was here that Eve was taken out of his left ſide as he was ſleeping, and was given to him for a wife. Soon after God commanded him not to eat of a certain tree, and it was then Eblis curſed him, aſſociating himſelf with the peacock and the ſerpent, when coming up to Adam and Eve, he had a long diſcourſe with them, and prevailed upon them to eat of the forbidden fruit. But ſcarce had they eat this fatal morſel, but the attire wherewith God had cloathed them, immediately fell at their feet, which made them ſenſible of the ſin they had committed, by covering them with ſhame and confuſion at the ſight of their nakedneſs. Immediately they run to a fig-tree to cover themſelves with its leaves, and had not been here long when they heard the thundering voice of the Lord pronounce the following words: Get ye down, all of you, from this place. You ſhall become mutually enemies to each other, and ſhall have your habitation and ſubſiſtence on earth for a time (10).

(10) Idem, p. 55.

[F] But thoſe of the Perſians vary from them.] Theſe tell us, that God permitted Adam to eat of all the fruits of Paradiſe without diſtinction, obſerving however, that if he eat only of the fruit of trees, thoſe light aliments would digeſt ſo perfectly, that the moſt groſs parts of them would evacuate thro' the pores; but that in caſe he eat wheat, it would form a coarſe ſubſtance in his ſtomach, which could not be emitted thro' the pores, like that of other fruits; and this coarſe ſubſtance being a filth which fouls the place where it is laid, Adam would not be ſuffer'd to reſide in Paradiſe, ſhould he happen to lay any of it there. However, Eve not giving due attention to what God declared, eat of this wheat, at the inſtigation of the Devil, and made her husband eat of it alſo. They fed ſo heartily upon it that they overcharged their ſtomachs, upon which their eyes were opened, and immediately the Angel Gabriel drove them from heaven, for fear they ſhould pollute it, which they would have done had they continued any longer in it. The Mahammedans however ſay, that they did not commit a ſin in eating of this wheat, but only that they had better not have eat of it; and that they were not driven out of Paradiſe by way of puniſhment, but only to prevent their polluting it (11). We ſhall obſerve however that this is apocryphal. The various ſects of the Mahometans are very much divided in opinion with regard to the quality of the forbidden fruit; ſome declaring it was the grape, others the Indian fig, which for that reaſon is called Adam's Fig, and others ſome other fruit which they don't name.

(11) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 2. p. 323, 324.

[G] The number of children he had by Eve.] Adam being precipitated from Paradiſe fell on the iſland of Serandib or Ceylon, and Eve on Jodda a port of the Red-ſea, not far from Mecca. After a ſeparation of upwards of 200 years, our firſt parents withdrew into the iſland abovementioned, where they multiplied. Eve had twenty deliveries, and at each birth brought forth twins, the one male and the other female (12). Another author (13) tells us, that Eve was delivered but eight times; that ſhe brought forth every time twins, a male and a female, and that theſe married together.

(12) D'Herbelot, p. 56.

(13) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 3. p. 179.

[H] Adam ſaw all his poſterity under the form of Ants.] We are told that it was on the following occaſion. God being determined to make a covenant between himſelf and man, by which all mankind ſhould oblige themſelves to acknowledge him as their Sovereign, he for that purpoſe aſſembled them all, under the ſhape of ants (but endued with underſtanding) in the valley of Nóman near mount Arafat, or according to the author of Lebab, in the plain of Dahia in the Indies. That there God ſaid, as we find it in the Koran (14). We have ſummoned witneſſes, in order that men may not ſay in the day of judgment, We know nothing of this covenant. And that they may not ſay as an excuſe for their impiety, Our fathers have been idolaters like us; we have imitated them like our deſcendants; will you, O Lord, deſtroy us, for what fools and ignorant people have done againſt you? The witneſſes hinted at above are the Angels, who will teſtify againſt ſuch men as ſhall plead ignorance (15).

(14) In the chapter al Araf.

(15) D'Herbelot, p. 54.

[I] They alſo tell us the place where he was buried.] According to Khaithemah, Adam was buried near Mecca on mount Abukobeis. Several others declare that Noah, having laid his body in the ark, cauſed it to be carried after the deluge to Jeruſalem by Melchiſedech ſon of Shem his grandſon, of which opinion are the Eaſtern Chriſtians. The ancient Perſians affirm that he was interred in the iſland of Serandib, where his corps was guarded by lions, at the time that the giants warred on each other (16).

(16) D'Herbelot, p. 56. Voyages de Chardin, tom. 3. p. 180. See Viaggi di Pietro della Valle, Parte quarta, p. 572. In Roma appreſſo Vitale Maſcardi 1650.

[K] Adam's building a chapel at Mecca.] Adam being driven out of the celeſtial paradiſe and ſent upon earth, beſought God, as a conſolation for his baniſhment, to let him build a chapel on the model of the

he was drove out of the celeſtial paradiſe; and how he threw ſtones at the Devil when he came to him, after he had cauſed him to commit the crime, which was the cauſe of original ſin (m). An odd reaſon is aſſigned for the various colours which are ſeen in mens ſkins, viz. that God took ſeveral kinds of earth in order to form Adam's body, which being quite different in quality and in colour, was the cauſe why men are white, black, yellow, red, and differ ſo much in humour and in complexion (n). The Banians call the firſt man Pourous and his wife Parcoutee. According to theſe Banians, God having created the world and the creatures thereto belonging, formed man as a being that might be moſt capable of the works of the Creator. That at his voice and command, the earth gave this creature out of its bowels, his head appearing firſt, and afterwards his body with all its parts and members, into whom God conveyed life, which was no ſooner done, but this creature gave tokens of it, for his lips became tinctured with red, his eyelids diſcloſed the two lights of nature; the parts of his body diſcovered their motion, and his underſtanding being informed, he acknowledged and worſhiped his Maker (o). According to the author from whom we have borrowed this, the firſt man and woman had four ſons; and the relation of their firſt meeting with their wives contains ſome beautiful images, like thoſe we meet with in Milton's deſcription of our firſt parents [L].

(m) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 2. p. 432.

(n) D'Herbelot, p. 54.

(o) A Diſcovery of the Sect of the Banians, &c. gather'd from their Bramins, &c. By Henry Lord, p. 3 and 4. London printed by T. Cotes, &c. 1630, 4°.

the fourth heaven, where he dwelt with the Prophets; towards which he might turn his face when in a journey; and in which he might ſay his prayers when it ſhould be preſent; and go in proceſſion round it, in the ſame manner as he had ſeen the Angels go in proceſſion round the throne of God. They add, that God not only heard Adam's prayers, but alſo created a glorious, reſplendent temple after the model of the fourth heaven, or after the model of a temple which is in the fourth heaven, and placed it in the ſame place where Mecca now ſtands; and that Adam performed religious worſhip in it ſo long as he lived. His deſcendants however having rendred themſelves unworthy of entring it becauſe of their extreme corruption, God withdrew this temple ſo that it was ſeen no more, at which mankind being very much afflicted, they built another in the ſame form, as near as they could remember, which remained till the deluge, or according to others after it. Others declare that the temple of Mecca was built by Abraham (17). Gabriel taught Adam the ſeveral ceremonies he was to practiſe round this temple, in order to obtain pardon for his ſin, and to reconcile himſelf truly with God (18).

(17) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 2. p. 430.

(18) D'Herbelot, p. 55.

[L] The relation of their firſt meeting with their wives contains ſome beautiful images &c.] The names of theſe four ſons are Brammon, Cuttery, Shuddery and Wiſe. Theſe went towards the four oppoſite points of the earth, in order to get themſelves wives. Brammon travelled towards the Eaſt, came to a valley, thro' which a brook flowed in the deſcent of which there appeared a woman, quenching her thirſt at the ſtream. They were both naked, innocence not being then aſhamed to reveal her retirements and privacies; nor having ſinned ſo much with theſe immodeſt parts, as to need a veil to ſhroud them from ſight (19). Thus Milton, (19) Diſcovery of the Sect of the Banians, by Henry Lord.

> Nor theſe myſterious parts were then conceal'd
> Then was not guilty ſhame, ...
> So paſs'd they naked on, nor ſhunn'd the ſight
> Of God or Angel, for they thought no ill (20).

(20) Paradiſe Loſt, Book IV.

Brammon afterwards addreſſing the woman abovementioned, prevailed upon her to become his wife, for joy whereof, the Sun put on his nuptial luſtre, and looked brighter than ordinary, cauſing the ſeaſon to ſhine upon them with golden joy; and the ſilver moon welcomed the evening of their repoſe, whilſt muſic from heaven ſent forth a pleaſing ſound, like the accents of the ſonorous trumpet, joined in concert with the triumphant drum (21). So at the nuptials of Adam and Eve,

(21) Diſcovery of the Sect of the Banians, p. 10.

> ——————— All heaven,
> And happy conſtellations on that hour
> Shed their ſelecteſt influence; the earth
> Gave ſign of gratulation, and each hill.
> Joyous the birds; freſh gales and gentle airs
> Whiſper'd it to the woods, and from their wings
> Flung roſes, flung odours from the ſpicy ſhrub (22).

(22) Paradiſe Loſt, Book VIII.

The woman that Cuttery the ſecond ſon met with is deſcribed to have been a creature of a comely aſpect like himſelf. She advanced, ſays our author, with a martial gate, no leſs ſlow than majeſtic. Adown her ſhoulders her treſſes fell gracefully, and theſe, by the motion of the air, were turned into an agreeable diſorder. Every blaſt that made a change in their diſpoſition, gave a new grace to her excellent perſon, and made her preſence more full of majeſty (23). This is partly the deſcription which Milton gives of Eve,

(23) Diſcovery of the Sect of the Banians, p. 12.

> She as a vail down to the ſlender waiſt
> Her unadorned golden treſſes wore
> Diſhevel'd, but in wanton ringlets wav'd,
> As the vine curls her tendrils (24).

(24) Paradiſe Loſt, book IV.

> Grace was in all her ſteps, heaven in her eye,
> In every geſture dignity and love (25).

(25) Idem, book VIII.

The deſcription we have of the firſt interview of Wyſe, Pourous's fourth ſon, with the woman who was deſtined to be his bride, is alſo poetical. But we ſhall give the authors own words which have a noble ſtrength and beauty, tho' written upwards of an hundred years ſince. "Wyſe chancing to caſt his "eye upon her, . . deſcended to take a fuller con- "templation of her beauty, whoſe feature deſerved "his better notice, for ſhe was of a body amiably "white, and her treſſes were ſcattered with powder- "ed ſaunders and other odours, the ſcent of which "the blaſts of the wind diſperſed in ſuch a manner, "that he became partaker of them by his approach, "which enkindled his ſenſes with new deſires to be "nearer her, who at ſuch diſtance gave him a ſmell "of ſo great ſweetneſs: whoſe approach ſtruck her "into a bluſh; but her ſhame giving place, ſhe "moved the queſtion to him, how he came to that "place where ſhe, only, had lived, to interrupt her in "her free walks and wanderings?" He made anſwer, "That God the Maker of light, that makes all ob- "jects viſible, had ſent him thither to admire her "excellency, which was ſo rare," (this is fixing the date when compliments were firſt made) "that it was not fit it ſhould be ſhaded in a "place ſo ſolitary, but had reſerved it as a bleſſing "for his eyes to view and admire." It is related, that this woman rejected Wyſe's love and fled from him, upon which he went in ſearch of, and found her, in a vally, cropping the flowers, and gratifying her ſenſes with the ſeveral odours, on whom intruding he ſaid; "Oh ſweeter than all flowers or "ſcents that the fields can boaſt, whoſe lovelineſs "hath drawn me to make proffer of a new kind- "neſs, fly me not." But ſhe left him a ſecond time with diſdain, which threw him into the deepeſt affliction, when he thus vented his amorous wailings, "Witneſs, O ye Heavens, under whoſe "azure roof I now am, the ſorrow I ſuffer! and "witneſs, O ye green trees, that if you were ſenſible "of my complaint, you would ſpend your ſelves in "gummy tears, becauſe of the agony that perplex- "eth me (26)." However, they afterwards became man and wife.

(26) Diſcovery of the Sect of the Banians, p. 24, 26, 27, 28.

ADAM, Archdeacon of the patriarchal Chamber, and Superior of the Monks of Chaldea, was ſent to Rome in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, by Elias the Neſtorian Patriarch of Babylon. This Patriarch, after his Biſhops had examined the confeſſion of faith which Pope Paul V. had ſent him, commiſſioned Adam to preſent it to that Pontiff, with the alterations they had made in it; but with orders, at the ſame time, to correct all ſuch particulars in it as the Pope ſhould object againſt. This embaſſy of our Adam was an embaſſy of Obedience. Being arrived at Rome, he acquitted himſelf of his commiſſion to the beſt of his power. Adam had brought a writing, the ſubject of which was, to unite the faith of the Eaſterns with that of the Romiſh church; and to ſhew that their diſputes were merely about words [A]. He had firſt communicated this piece to his Patriarch; afterwards, by his order, to all the Biſhops of that party, and had ſpent a whole year in going from city to city, to obtain the approbation of thoſe ſeveral Biſhops. Peter Strozza, Secretary to Pope Paul V. was appointed to anſwer this writing. His anſwer ſavoured more of harſhneſs than condeſcenſion; for he did not give a favourable interpretation to any one particular; and the Patriarch's Legate was obliged to ſubmit, not only to the tenets, but to the very expreſſions which were dictated at Rome. Adam ſigned every thing the Pope directed; and not ſatisfied with abjuring the ſeveral errors of his countrymen, he writ books, and addreſt them to the latter, in order to communicate to them the lights he had acquired under the Pontiff. After having reſided three years in Rome, he returned home, and preſented to Elias his Patriarch a brief of Paul V, who rejected the ſeveral methods of reconciliation which this Patriarch propoſed, and obliged him to explode all the terms which might ſerve as a diſguiſe to any erroneous opinions (a). Adam was accompanied by two Jeſuits (b), who were commanded to labour at the entire reunion of this ſect.

(b) Nic. Godignus de rebus Abaſſinorum, lib. 1. apud Aub. Miræum, de Statu Relig. Chriſt. p. 226.

(a) Extracted from ch. x. book 5. of the Perpetuité de la Foi defendue. Mr. Arnauld cites the treatiſe of Peter Strozza, de Dogmatibus Chaldæorum.

[A] That they diſputed merely about words.] The Sieur Moni *, in his Critical Hiſtory of the Levant, ſeems ſtrongly perſuaded, that Elias the Patriarch had reaſon to aſſert, that the diſpute between the Neſtorians of this age and the Catholicks, was merely about words, The Neſtorianiſm of this age, ſays he (1), is only an imaginary hereſy; all this diverſity with regard to opinions, conſiſts only in equivocal expreſſions, inaſmuch as the Neſtorians underſtand the name of perſon, in another ſenſe than the Latins. It may be asked, why then would not the Romaniſts agree to the expoſitions which the Patriarch of Babylon laid down? The anſwer is, that for decorum ſake, and from a falſe punctilio of honour, the Romaniſts perſiſted in aſſerting, that Neſtorianiſm was a dangerous hereſy; for otherwiſe they would have proſtituted the honour of general Councils. This is what de Moni would have declared in a free country; but being in France, he was obliged to diſguiſe a little his expreſſions. As the hereſy of Neſtorius, ſays he (2), was condemned by Councils, it was, methinks, neceſſary that thoſe at Rome ſhould ſhew, that Neſtorianiſm was really a hereſy, ſince it had been condemned by the Church in a general Council. He adds afterwards with the ſame caution, that ſome might infer from the very acts of ancient Councils, that Neſtorianiſm is but a nominal hereſy, and that Neſtorius and St. Cyril might have reconciled their opinions, had they underſtood one another (3).

* This is a fictitious name aſſumed by father Simon in this work

(1) Moni, Hiſt. Critique de la Creance & des Coutumes des Nations du Levant, p. 93.

(2) Moni, Hiſt. Critiq. du Levant, p. 93, 94.

(3) Ibid. p. 94.

ADAM (JOHN) a French Jeſuit, was a celebrated Preacher [A] in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born in the Province of Limouſin, and entred among the Jeſuits in 1622, at fourteen years of age (a). His ſuperiors finding he had talents requiſite for the pulpit, obliged him to cultivate them, after he had taught Claſſical Learning and Philoſophy. He was a profeſſed preacher forty years, and was heard in the chief cities of France, and even at the Louvre (b). He began by preaching, as it was proper he ſhould, in the Provinces; but after he had ſufficiently ſignalized himſelf there, he was ſent to the metropolis of the kingdom. The complexion of the times favoured him very much; the diſputes about Janſeniſm had already heated mens minds; and no man could have been fitter than father Adam, to be ſent as volunteer againſt the party, he being naturally bold and fiery, and poſſeſſing all the qualities which form a great declaimer. The Lent-ſermons he preached at Paris in St. Paul's Church, anno 1650, made great noiſe; Adam having gone ſuch lengths, that had he not been protected by perſons in power, he would have been ſilenced [B]. He was ſincere enough to own [C] that St. Auſtin no way favoured Moliniſm, and he exclaimed

(a) Sotuel, Biblioth Societatis Jeſu, p. 397.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] Was a celebrated Preacher.] See Balzac's letter to him, dated the 15th of Janu. 1643 (1), after having peruſed the fifteen ſermons which that father had ſent him.

[B] He would have been ſilenc'd.] This we learn from a letter of Guy Patin, dated Apr. 12th, 1650. Our Archbiſhop, ſays he, has forbid Mr. Brouſſel Doctor of Navarre, and Canon of St. Honoré, the pulpit, who is a ſtrong anſeniſt, and no ways a friend to Cardinal Mazarine, for having delivered himſelf too freely there three days ago; Father Adam the Jeſuit would have met with the ſame ſeverity, for preaching againſt St. Auſtin in St. Paul's church, and calling him the hot-headed African and fiery Doctor, had he not been ſupported by the Jeſuits and Capuchins, who diſſuaded the Archbiſhop (2).

[C] He was ſincere enough to own &c.] This muſt be underſtood cum grano ſalis, with ſome reſtriction; and the reader would be miſtaken, ſhould he imagine that our Jeſuit did not make uſe of the artful fraud of thoſe, who pretended that St. Auſtin does not favour either the Calviniſts or the Janſeniſts; for in the very ſermon which was ſo much inveighed againſt, and which he divided into two parts; the ſecond was to ſhew from the doctrine of this father, that Chriſt died for all men, without exception; and he had before publiſhed a treatiſe entitled, Calvin defait par ſoi-même, & par les armes de St Auguſtin, qu'il avoit injuſtement uſurpées ſur les matieres de la grace, de la liberté, & de la predeſtination. That is, "Calvin ſelf-defeated, and overcome by the "weapons of St Auſtin, which he had unjuſtly u- "ſurped in the doctrines of grace, liberty and pre- "deſtination (3)." Now Father Adam did not ſcruple to ſay, that Janſenius and Calvin teach the ſame doctrine with regard to grace; and he made the following

(1) This is the 11th letter of book 3, part 1, of Lettres Choiſies, pag. 109, Dutch edit.

(2) Patin, letter 37. p. 162, of vol. 1. Genev. edit. 1691, 12°.

(3) Defenſe de St. Auguſtin, contre le P. Adam, p. 2.

ed with great vehemence againſt that antient Doctor. The Janſeniſts would not ſuffer this public inſult to paſs uncenſured [D], but publiſhed an anſwer to his ſermon; and not ſatisfied with apologizing for St. Auſtin, they refuted ſome other propoſitions which that Jeſuit had laid down, and that expreſly which related to the inſpiration of the canonical writers [E]. Father Adam took no manner of notice of the clamour which lowing anſwer a few days after the preaching of his ſermon, to one who reproached him for having gone ſuch lengths in it. I fear nothing: no one can cenſure my ſermon, or my treatiſe on Grace, without undertaking at the ſame time, to ſupport Calvin (4). What, therefore, is the reader to underſtand by the ſincerity I aſcribe to this Father? It is this; That the liberty with which he delivered his thoughts concerning St. Auſtin's errors, plainly ſhewed he was deſirous of having it known, that he did not think this Father's faith, in matters of this nature, a proper model for others to imitate.

(4) Ibid.

[D] The Janſeniſts would not ſuffer this public inſult to paſs uncenſur'd.] A few days after, they publiſhed a pamphlet of ſixty pages in 4to, entitled, Defence de St. Auguſtin contre les erreurs, les calomnies & les invectives ſcandaleuſes, que le pere Adam, jeſuite a prechées dans l'egliſe de St. Paul, le ſecond jeudi du Carême, ſur le texte de l'Evangile de la Chananée... Je ne ſuis envoyé qu'aux brebis perdues de la maiſon d'Iſrael. That is, "A Defence of St. "Auſtin, againſt the errors, calumnies and ſcandalous "invectives, which Father Adam the Jeſuit vented "in his ſermon preached in St. Paul's church, on the "2d Thurſday in Lent, on this text of the Goſpel "where Chriſt ſays to the Canaanitiſh woman .. I am "not ſent but unto the loſt ſheep of the houſe of "Iſrael *." They accuſed him of aſſerting, "firſt, "that the writings of St. Auſtin were perplex'd and "obſcure; that being animated with the violent, "fiery ſpirit of the Africans, he had frequently diſ-"covered too much paſſion, and run into extremes; "had overſhot the boundaries of truth, in his con-"flicts with the enemies of Grace; in like manner "as it ſometimes happens to a man, who intending "merely to ſtrike his enemy, puſhes him with ſo "much violence, that he throws him againſt a tree, "and thereby makes him rebound back upon him-"ſelf, contrary to his intention. Secondly, That "St. Auſtin, even in aſſerting the tenet of original "ſin in oppoſition to the Pelagians, had himſelf "fallen into an exceſs of error, by declaring that "original ſin was puniſhed in ſuch children as die "unbaptized, with hell-fire and damnation. Third-"ly, That St. Auſtin was not well fixed in what "he writ, ſince, according to Mr. Gamache's re-"mark, he had varied thrice on the article of "Grace." Theſe reproaches, and ſome others of the like nature, had already appeared in one of Father Adam's pieces. Such as have not this book, will meet with them in a work that may eaſily be procured, I mean the Vindiciæ Auguſtinianæ, where Father Adam is the firſt of St. Auſtin's modern adverſaries, whom Father Noris has refuted.

* Matth. xv. 24.

[E] Which related to the inſpiration of the canonical writers.] "Let no one wonder that Fa-"ther Adam declared in his ſermon, that St. Au-"ſtin's zeal carried him to too great lengths, ſince "that Jeſuit tells us in a wicked piece, which a-"bounds with falſities and errors †, That this weak-"neſs is not ſo criminal; but that God permits it "in writers he himſelf inſpires, and whom we call "canonical ... and that St. Paul's natural vivacity "and fire were capable of making him launch out "into expreſſions of that nature... To prove that "canonical writers are ſometimes weak, and that "they clothe thoſe things which God reveals to them, "in whatever expreſſions fancy may ſuggeſt, he ob-"ſerves, that when the Prophet Elias complains of "the impiety of the times in which he lived, he ſays to "God,—that faith is extinguiſhed in the hearts of "all men, and that he is the only one who continues "to worſhip him on earth... David declares, that no "age was more diſſolute and corrupt than that he "lived in; and that there is not ſo much as one "man to be found, who does a good action."... This is the tenet which Father Adam's adverſaries reproach'd him with; the reſult of which was, that the doctrine which God inſpired, and the expreſſion of the inſpired writer were different things: that the former only came from God, who left the latter to the imagination or fancy of the perſon he inſpired, and did not prevent this imagination from exceeding the dictates of the Holy Ghoſt. This, undoubtedly, is what Father Adam underſtood; for the examples he brings of Elias and David, would be wholly unneceſſary to a man, who ſhould believe that God revealed, that Elias was the only one who worſhipped the true God; and in the age David lived, there was not ſo much as one good man upon the earth. The perſon, therefore, who employed thoſe examples, muſt be perſuaded that God did not give any ſuch revelation, but only, that there were very few good men Upon this foot the imagination of an inſpired writer makes that univerſal which was revealed with reſtriction, and falls into the ſophiſm, à dicto ſecundùm quid ad dictum ſimpliciter: In a word, this imagination adulterates revelation, deceives the Church, and tells a lye. The Janſeniſts did not fail to exclaim againſt this doctrine as impious, and as giving a handle for cenſuring the authority of the ſacred writings (5) on a thouſand occaſions; For if God, ſaid theſe (6), permits any weakneſs in the canonical writers whom he inſpires; if there be a native fire in St Paul, which is not that of God, the conſequence is, that whatever a libertine or a heretic meets with in the holy Scriptures repugnant to his own way of thinking, will be by him pronounced the reſult of man's native weakneſs or fire, and not the Spirit of God... To allow any part of Scripture to have a tincture of man's natural ſpirit or weakneſs, is granting every one a liberty of pronouncing as he pleaſes upon it, and of rejecting whatever he does not approve of in the ſacred Writings, as dictated by man's weakneſs, rather than by the Spirit of God... The libertine will aſſert, that hell fire will not be eternal, and that when St. Matthew ſays, — Go ye curſed into everlaſting fire, he made uſe of this too-ſtrong expreſſion, only to denote the long duration, and the greatneſs of the torments which were prepared for the wicked, according to the fancy or imagination of that Evangeliſt (7). Father Adam's adverſaries aſſerted, that the only motive of his laying down theſe principles was, merely that he might have an opportunity of invalidating St. Paul's expreſſions, which would appear to him harſh and contrary to his way of thinking; and of teaching the art of ſporting with the invincible ſtrength of the words of the Apoſtle of the Gentiles (St. Paul) on Grace and divine Predeſtination, as well as thoſe of St. Auſtin. In caſe he finds himſelf cloſely attacked by thoſe words of St. Paul in his epiſtle to the Romans chapt. ix. ver. 18, viz. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth; he may anſwer, that St. Paul's natural fire made him launch into ſuch expreſſions; that it is a weakneſs which God permits in canonical writers; that it is the expreſſion of an idea or thing revealed agreable to the imagination, the diſpoſition, and temper of St. Paul (8). I ſhall not trouble the reader with the anſwer which Father Adam's adverſaries made to the examples of Elias and David; and ſhall only obſerve, that they found he had committed a great miſtake with regard to fact, in the former of thoſe citations; for the canonical writer who relates the complaint which Elias made, does not deliver it a the expreſſion of one inſpired, but as the expreſſion of a man who miſtook, and to whom God revealed that he was miſtaken. Whence it follows, that the author who related this unjuſt complaint of Elias, did not thereby deviate in any manner from the greateſt hiſtorical exactneſs. The Janſeniſts abovementioned made the public recollect, that "among "the ſeveral propoſitions extracted from the "public lectures of the Jeſuits of Louvain; re-"cognized by them, and cenſured by the Fa-"culties of Louvain and Doway, in 1588, the "two following are found. Firſt, To conſtitute holy

(5) Défenſe de St. Auguſtin, contre le P. Adam, p. 11.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. p. 16.

(8) Compare what is ſaid pag. 374 of Avis aux Refugié

† Part III. ch. 7. p. 622.

which was raiſed againſt his ſermon, and againſt a book, in which he had wrote with great virulence againſt St. Auſtin, but continued to write on in the ſame ſtrain, and would not retract ſo much as a tittle. Hereupon the Janſeniſts revived their complaints and their writings, ſo that a particular conflict aroſe between them and father Adam. They criticis'd the books he publiſhed, and he, on the other ſide, drew up ſome pieces for the uſe of devout perſons, purpoſely to thwart their deſigns; in which view he publiſhed the Pſalms of David, the Hymns and Prayers of the Church in Latin and French. Every body knows that the Janſeniſts endeavoured to recommend themſelves, by their French tranſlations of this kind of works. They attacked father Adam's muſe, I mean his French tranſlation (in verſe) of thoſe Hymns [F]; however, this paper-war between father Adam and his antagoniſts, was of a very ſhort duration. He began to write in 1650, and the year following laid down his pen [G], which, in all probability, was found of leſs ſervice to the church and the ſociety he belonged to, than his other talents. He was ſent to Sedan, in order to found a college of Jeſuits there; but this he would ſcarce have been able to effect in Marſhal de Fabert's life-time, who of all men was the leaſt inclined to bigotry, and adhered moſt inviolably to the principles of the true faith. The Proteſtants were very eaſy under his government, but things took another turn after his death (c); for this Jeſuit ſet every engine at work in order to diſtreſs and aggrieve them; extorting monies from them, and obliging them to reſign certain funds, by which means he amaſſed a ſum ſufficient for founding at Sedan the college he had projected. He publiſhed a project, to which Mr. de St. Maurice Profeſſor of Divinity in the laſt mentioned city (d) writ a reply, that was never anſwered. Father

(c) He died in May 1662.

(d) He was the ſame in Maeſtricht after his leaving France after the revocation of the Edict of Nantz, till his death, which happened the 29th of Auguſt 1700. Father Adam laid an hundred ſnares for him, but met with an adverſary who extricated himſelf very artfully from them all.

" Scripture, it is not neceſſary that all the words of " it ſhould be inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt. Secondly, It is not neceſſary, that the Holy Ghoſt ſhould " immediately inſpire the ſacred writer with all the " truths and all the maxims contained in their writings." But theſe two propoſitions, what modifications ſoever they may otherwiſe require, differ widely, and are infinitely leſs dangerous, than the tenet which Father Adam advanced (9).

(9) See Mr. Simon's anſwer to the Sentimens de quelques Théologiens de Hollande, ch. 12. and his Crit. Hiſt. of the New Teſtament, ch. 23. See alſo Bibliotheque Univerſelle, tom. x. p. 132. tom. xi. p. 80, and tom. xix. p. 499.

I have enlarged upon this ſubject, becauſe I obſerved that it was not known to thoſe authors, who upon occaſion of the piece intitled Sentimens de quelques Théologiens de Hollande, i. e. " The ſentiments of ſome Divines in Holland," have written ſo much within theſe few years on the inſpiration of the books of Scripture. By the way, all communions have their Father Adam; and we find writers every where, who deſerve the ſame rebuke as our Jeſuit met with. Here follows that of Mr. Saurin Miniſter at Utrecht, to Mr. Jurieu Miniſter of Rotterdam (10). " The compariſon which Mr. Jurieu " made between the imagination or brain of the " Prophets which has been impreſſed from a- " bove, with a wheel, which being ſet a going " does not ceaſe to turn, tho' the hand ceaſes to " move it (11), is another prophane aſſertion. For, " altho' he has not applied this immediately to the " greater Prophets, yet the tranſition to them is " very natural; or, he ought to have ſhewn, that " their imagination when put in motion, did not, " by its proper impetuoſity, run beyond the impreſ- " ſion that was made on it, in the ſame manner as a " wheel that has been turn'd round, as he declares " was the caſe with other inſpired perſons, in whom " God produces theſe extraordinary emotions, purpoſely " that they may be as ſo many ſigns and prodigies, " and who often go farther than they ought to do. " By what mark would he have us diſtinguiſh thoſe perſons whom God ſends as ſo many ſigns, in caſe their " imagination once ſet a going, blends and confounds " thoſe things which God reveals, with their own " whimſies; and in caſe they publiſh both truth and " falſhood, with the air of perſons out of their ſenſes, " and who diſcover wild, diſorderly emotions? This " mixture of divine inſpiration and chimæra, conceal- " ed under the exterior reſemblance of frenzy or mad- " neſs, is repugnant to the idea we form to ourſelves of " God's wiſdom (12)." The imagination of ſome people is heated to ſo prodigious a degree, that they never repeat any particular they are told, without heightening it. Theſe are ſatisfied with barely retaining the circumſtances they hear, but as to the expreſſion, they no ways regard it; but then they ſubſtitute others, which being enlivened with all their fire muſt conſequently prove a very unfaithful image of the things that were told them. Perſons of this character naturally perſuade themſelves, that the Prophets and Apoſtles made the ſame uſe of the ideas which the Holy Ghoſt revealed to them.

(10) In 1692.

(11) See the 20th Paſtoral Letter.

(12) Saurin, Examen de la doctrine de Mr. Jurieu, by way of anſwer to a Libel entitled, Seconde Apologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 21.

[F] The French tranſlation he had given, in verſe, of thoſe hymns (13).] What we find on this ſubject in the ninth part of the difficulties propoſed to Mr. Steyaert deſerves to be mentioned. " For many years, " no prayer-book was in greater eſteem than that in- " titled, L'Office de l'Egliſe & de la Vierge, en Latin " & en François, avec les Hymnes traduites en Vers; " qu'on appelle autrement, Les Heures de Port-Royal; That is, The Office of the Church and of the Virgin, in Latin and in French, with the hymns tranſlated into verſe, which are otherwiſe called, the Primer of Port-Royal. " Four editions were made of " this book in one year, which gave the Jeſuits ſo " much umbrage, that they ſet every engine at " work, in order to ruin the credit of it: They " raiſed a great number of frivolous objections to it, " which were immediately anſwered: They oppoſed " to it Father Adam's Primer, under the name of " Les Heures Catholiques, or the Catholic Primer, as " tho' the former were heretical. The hymns in it " were alſo tranſlated into verſe, but in ſo ridiculous " a manner, that they only ſerved to raiſe the merit " of thoſe of Port-Royal. Finally, the Jeſuits com- " plained of this Prayer-book to the Inquiſition at " Rome, and employed all their credit to get it " condemned by that Tribunal (14)." Cardinal Spada gave Mr. de St. Amour to underſtand, that in caſe Father Adam's piece abovementioned, ſhould be complained of to the Inquiſition, it would certainly be condemned; Mr. de St. Amour anſwered... That if the Primer he had defended, had loſt its reputation,.. he was as willing it ſhould be ſo alone, as in company with that of Father Adam: and that he did not think it was proper to make uſe of thoſe Fathers (the Jeſuits) to write a ſilly book, whenever they ſhould find a good one publiſhed that did not pleaſe them, merely in hopes of getting both condemned, upon pretence of holding the ſcales even, and of reconciling both parties (15).

(13) See Mr. Daillé's Reply, Part 2 p. 19. Part 3. p. 234 and 424.

(14) Difficultez propoſées à Monſ. Steyaert. Part 9. p. 42.

(15) Ibid. p. 45.

[G] He began to write in 1650, and the year following laid down his pen.] Father Southwel mentions but five works of Father Adam, the laſt of which is intitled Réponſe à une lettre de Mr. Daillé. i. e. " A Reply to a letter of Mr. Daillé," and was publiſhed in 1660. The titles of his other pieces are as follows: Calvinus à ſeipſo & à S. Auguſtino profligatus, Pariſiis 1650, in 8*vo.* i. e. " Calvin defeated by his own weapons and by St. Auſtin." Pſalmi Davidis, Latinè & Gallicè, cum canticis undecim quibus utitur eccleſia, Pariſiis 1651, in 12*mo.* i. e. " David's Pſalms in Latin and French, with " eleven hymns uſed by the Church." Fidelium regula ex ſacrâ Scripturâ & ſanctis Patribus depromta, Pariſiis 1651, in 12*mo.* i. e. " A rule or guide " for the faithful, extracted from the ſacred Scrip- " tures and the holy Fathers." Preces Catholicæ, Latinè & Gallicè, Pariſiis 1651, in 8*vo* & 12*mo.* i. e. " Catholic Prayers in Latin and French."

Father Adam continued ſome years at Sedan, where he laboured with all his power, at advancing the intereſts of the Jeſuits, and the project he had drawn up for bringing over converts to the Romiſh profeſſion. At laſt the higher powers themſelves grew ſick of him; and whether it were, that they now dreaded his bold and intriguing genius, or that they found that his way of preaching was not grave enough for a city in which there was a Proteſtant Univerſity; they were very glad when his ſuperiors recalled him; and I have been told, that entreaties were made for that purpoſe. He had been ſent to preach in Loudun, at the time that the Proteſtants held a national ſynod in that city, about the cloſe of the year 1659. It was this very probably engaged him to write a work, which made him better known to the Proteſtants of France than any thing elſe, and more than a great many writers of the firſt claſs are known to them. A Miniſter of Poitiers (e), having changed his religion, a little after the breaking up of this ſynod, wrote a letter, in which he animadverted very maliciouſly, on the Faſt which the laſt mentioned aſſembly had enjoined all the reformed churches in the kingdom (f). Mr. Daillé, who had been Moderator of that ſynod, anſwered the letter of this quondam Proteſtant Clergyman, who writ a reply to it; and father Adam engaging in the controverſy, publiſhed an anſwer to Mr. Daillé's piece [H] in 1660. Mr. Daillé anſwered both of them in one book. Perhaps none of Mr. Daillé's works met with greater ſucceſs than that in queſtion, or was ſo much read by Proteſtants of all profeſſions; and this is the reaſon why father Adam, who is mentioned almoſt in every period of it, and whoſe genius and temper are frequently deſcribed in the ſtrongeſt colours, is better known to them than a hundred abler writers. This work of Mr. Daillé was never anſwered [I], which we are not to wonder at; for thoſe whoſe buſineſs it was to do this, were not able to cope with ſo powerful an adverſary, who might have defeated them, even though he had undertaken the defence of a bad cauſe. I don't know the year in which father Adam was Procurator at Rome, for the Province of Champagne; nor do I find it in the Bibliotheque of the Jeſuits (g); which, however, informs me, that he was ſuperior of the * Jeſuits Houſe at Bourdeaux in 1674, in which character I think he died, anno 1680. He had publiſhed ſome controverſial ſermons relating to the Euchariſt (the only topic of diſcourſe throughout all France, whilſt the controverſy laſted between Mr. Arnauld and Mr. Claude) ſince the publication of father Southwell's (Sotuellus) work; and preached them, if I miſtake not, in the height of that controverſy. They are well enough written, except that they have too much the air of the Drama, in thoſe places where Mr. Claude is introduced as an interlocutor; but this I know only by hearſay. Father Adam was attacked by father Jarrige, but with much more lenity than a great many others,

(e) His name was Mr. Cottibi.

(f) See Mr. Daillé's Life, p. 33, & ſeq.

(g) Rexit collegium Sedanenſe in Provincia Campaniæ, a quâ electus eſt procurator ad urbem. i. e. "He governed the college of Sedan "in Champagne, "where he was "elected Procurator to Rome.

* [The French is Maiſon profeſſe; The word Profez or Profeſſe ſignifies a Monk or Nun who have taken their religious vows in a convent, and alſo ſignifies the houſe inhabited by ſuch Jeſuits as have made their vows.

[H] An anſwer to Mr. Daillé's piece.] Father Southwel intitles this work, Reſponſum ad epiſtolam D. Allii Miniſtri Charentonenſis hæretici. i. e. "An anſwer to the letter of Mr. D. Allius, the heretical "Miniſter of Charenton." This is a moſt wretched way of latiniſing Mr. Daillé's name, and ſhews that Father Southwel knew very little of controverſial writings. For what writer of controverſy but has heard of Mr. Daillé's Latin pieces; and conſequently knows that he was called in Latin Dallæus? All perſons, who know, in general, that there was a Miniſter of Charenton, whoſe name was Allix, would immediately ſuppoſe that Father Adam had written a book againſt him, had they no other lights than thoſe which the article of this Jeſuit gives in his continuation of Alegambe; whence we ſee, that the ſmalleſt miſtake in proper names is capable of miſleading readers. A perſon who had once miſtaken Mr. Allix for the Allius of the continuator abovementioned, might very naturally place him in the catalogue Des Enfans celebres, or celebrated youths, and ſend it, by way of addition to Mr. Baillet (16); for he would imagine it was printed ſo early as 1660, and refuted by a famous Jeſuit.

(16) He publiſhed in 1688, a book entitled, Des enfans devenus célebres par leurs études, ou par leurs ecrits. i. e. "Of ſuch youths "as had raiſed a "reputation by "their ſtudies or "by their writings.

[I] This work of Mr. Daillé was never anſwer'd.] The curious will not be diſpleaſed to hear what the ſon of this able Miniſter has obſerved with regard to this work. It is, ſays he, in every body's hands; and has been ſo well received, that it has already borne two impreſſions. Thoſe of our communion, for whoſe uſe it was chiefly calculated, are pleaſed to find moſt of our controverſies treated there in a very inſtructive manner; and our religion cleared from all the aſperſions, which its enemies generally throw upon it. And if any advantage may be drawn from the ſilence of our opponents, methinks they ſtand ſelf convicted; ſince they have not hitherto written any thing againſt it, tho' they had often promiſed they would, and have been reproached more than once upon that account (17). The younger Mr. Daillé had juſt before ſaid a thing, by which he plainly inſinuated, that Cottibi the Miniſter had been converted by Father Adam; a circumſtance I muſt not omit, as it is one of the gallant atchievements of our Jeſuit. Let us, therefore, once again quote the author of Mr. Daillé's life. "Not "only the Romiſh Neophyte, who was the party "concerned, defended himſelf in a pretty voluminous anſwer he publiſh'd; but as tho' his cauſe had "not been ſafe in his own hands, a celebrated Je"ſuit came likewiſe to his aſſiſtance, of whom one "of his own perſuaſion obſerved, that he is the firſt "(greateſt) man in the world, no otherwiſe than by "his name." It is plain that the perſon here hinted at is Father Adam, who, in order to ſupport his PROSELYTE, publiſhed at the ſame time a ſecond anſwer, about the ſame ſize and of equal force with his.

(17) Abrégé de la Vie de Mr. Daillé. p. 35. 'Twas printed in 1670.

This expreſſion, the firſt man uſed in the paſſage above, furniſhed me in the firſt edition of this Dictionary with a marginal note, which I ſhall now take into this column. It is as follows: "I have heard that the "Queen mother, having asked a Nobleman of great "diſtinction, who had waited upon her at Father "Adam's ſermon, what he thought of it; he thanked "her Majeſty for his having been ſo thoroughly convinced by it, of the hypotheſis relating "to the Pre-Adamites. The Nobleman being deſired to explain this enigma, made the following "anſwer: This ſermon has very plainly proved, "that Adam is not the firſt man *." The reader will find this ſtory in the ſequel of the Menagiana (18), where we are told, that the Nobleman of great quality who anſwered the Queen in this manner, was the Prince de Guimené; and that the ſermon which gave occaſion to this repartee, met with a very ill reception both from the City and the Court (19). Father Adam made a very odious compariſon in it between the Pariſians and the Jews who crucified our Saviour. He compared the Queen to the Virgin Mary, and Cardinal Mazarin to St. John the Evangeliſt. We are to obſerve, that others aſcribe the abovementioned repartee to Benſerade; as we find in his life prefixed to the laſt edition of his works (20).

* The joke here lies in the ambiguity of the French word premier, which not only ſignifies the firſt, but the greateſt; a ſenſe in which it is often taken in Engliſh.

(18) Pag. 39. Dutch edit.

(19) This was a ſermon on Chriſt's paſſion, preached by father Adam at St. Germain de l'Auxerrois.

(20) That of 1697.

others, and came off upon very reaſonable terms [K]. By the way, he is not the firſt who has ſpoke ſlightingly of St. Auſtin [L], and endeavoured to make people believe, that St. Paul's too great vivacity made him exaggerate [M].

ADAM

